"It always tranquillizes me," said Margery, as they stood side by side on the bank, "to look out over the water. Doesn't it have that effect on you?"

"No!" exclaimed Clyde. "It does not tranquillize me a bit. Nothing could tranquillize me at a moment like this. Margery, I want you to know that I love you. I did not intend to tell you so soon, but what you have said makes it necessary. I have loved you ever since I met you at Peter Sadler's, and, no matter what you say about it, I shall love you to the end of my life."

"Even if I should send you away with one of the others?"

"Yes; no matter what you do."

"That would be wrong," she said.

"It doesn't matter. Right or wrong, I'd do it."

Margery gave him a glance from which it would have been impossible to eliminate all signs of admiration. "And if I were to arrange it otherwise," she said, "would you undertake to keep the others away?"

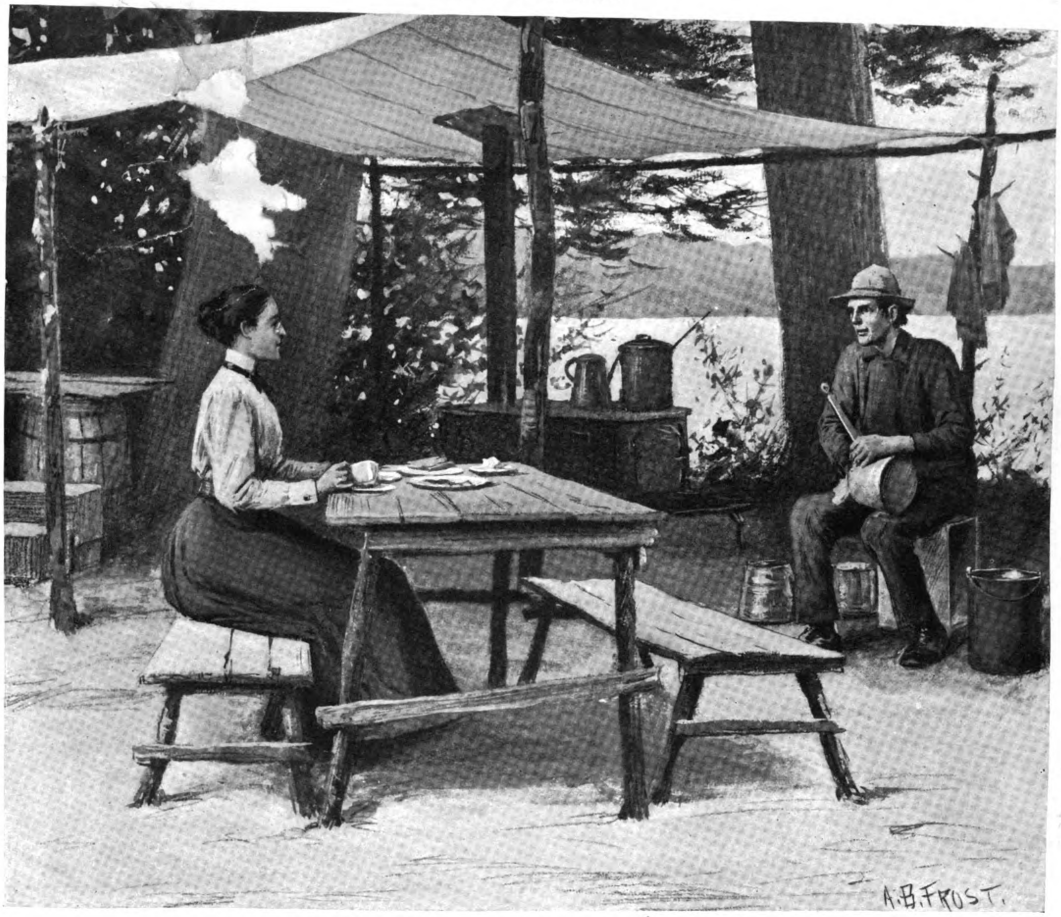
There was no answer to this question, but in a minute afterward Clyde exclaimed, "Do you think any one would dare to come near you if they saw you now?"

"Hardly," said Margery, raising her head from his shoulder and looking up into his sparkling eyes. "Really, Harrison, you ought not to speak in such a loud voice. If Aunt Harriet were to hear you she might dare to come."

Margery was late at dinner, although the horn was blown three times.

Much to the surprise of his wife, Mr. Archibald returned to camp about an hour before dinner.

"How is this?" she exclaimed. "Wasn't the fishing good?"



"I have had a disagreeable experience," he said, "and I will tell you about it. I was fishing in a little cove some distance down the lake and having good sport, when I heard a thumping, and looking around I saw Raybold

* Begun in Harper's Weekly No. 2167.

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

"MISS RAYBOLD DID NOT APPEAR TO NOTICE HIS STATE OF MIND, AND ATE HEARTILY."

in a boat rowing toward me. I suppose he thought he was rowing, but he was really floating with the current; but as he neared me he suddenly pulled his boat toward me with such recklessness that I was afraid he would run into me. I considered his rowing into the cove to be a piece of bad manners, for of course it would spoil my fishing, but I had no idea he actually intended to lay alongside of me. This he did, however, and so awkwardly that his boat struck mine with such force that it half tipped it over. Then he lay hold of my gunwale, and said he had something to say to me.

"I was as angry as if a man in the street had knocked my hat down over my eyes and said that he did so in order to call my attention to a subscription paper. But this indignation was nothing to what I felt when the fellow began to speak. I cannot repeat his words, but he stated his object at once, and said that as this was a good opportunity to speak to me alone, he wished to ask me to remove what he called the utterly useless embargo which I had placed upon him in regard to Margery. He said it was useless, because he could not be expected to give up his hopes and his plans simply because I objected to them; and he went on to say that if I understood him fully, and if Margery understood him, he did not believe that either of us would object. And then he actually asked me to use my influence with her to make her listen to him. From what he said, I am sure he has been speaking to her. I did not let him finish, but turned and blazed at him in words as strong as would come to me. I ordered him never to speak to me again or show himself in my camp, and that if he did either of these things he would do them at his peril; and then, for fear he might say something which would make me lose control of myself, I jerked up my anchor and rowed away from him. I didn't feel like fishing any more, and so I came back."

"His behavior is shameful," said Mrs. Archibald. "And what is more, it is ridiculous, for Margery would not look at him. What sort of a man does he think you are, to suppose that you would give your permission to any one, no matter who he might be, to offer marriage to a young lady in your charge? But what are you going to do about it? I think it very likely he will come to this camp, and he may speak to you."

"In that case I shall have him driven out," said Mr. Archibald, "as if he were a drunken vagabond. I personally shall have nothing to do with him, but I shall order my guides to eject him."

"I hope that may not be necessary," said his wife. "It would make bad feeling, and deeply wound his sister, for it would be the same thing as putting her out. She talks too much, to be sure, but she is a lady, and has treated us all very courteously. I wish we could get through the rest of our stay here without any disturbance or bad feeling."

"I wish so too, with all my heart," said her husband. "And the only thing necessary to that end is that that ass Raybold shall keep out of my sight."

It was about two o'clock that afternoon, and Mrs. Archibald, under her tree, her basket of stockings all darned, and her novel at its culminating point of interest, was the only visible occupant of Camp Rob, when Corona Raybold came walking toward her, an obvious purpose in her handsome face, which was somewhat flushed by exercise.

"I do not think," she said, as soon as she was near enough for Mrs. Archibald to hear her, "that the true purpose and intention of our plan is properly understood by all of the party. I think, after some explanation, everything will go well, but I have been endeavoring for the last half-hour to find Mrs. Perkenpine, and have utterly failed. I am very hungry, but I can discover nothing to eat. All our stores appear to be absolutely raw, or in some intermediate state of crudity. I intend to order some provisions in cans or boxes which will be at all times available, but I have not done so yet, and so I have come over to speak to you about the matter. Did your guides prepare your dinner as usual?"

"Oh yes," said Mrs. Archibald. "A hermit life seems to make no difference with Mr. Matlack. We become associates at meal-times, but, as you see, we have separated again."

"I must instil into Mrs. Perkenpine's mind," said Corona, "that, in order thoroughly to act out her own nature, she must cook and do other things of a domestic character. Of course she will do those things in her own way; that is to be expected; but she must do them. It is impossible to imagine a woman of her class whose soul is not set more or less upon domestic affairs. I will instance Mr. Matlack. His nature belongs to the woods and the out-of door world, and that nature prompts him to cook what he shoots."

Mrs. Archibald laughed. "I think his nature is a very good one," she said; "and I will go with you to find him and see if he cannot give you a luncheon, if not a dinner."

"Thank you very much," said Corona; "but indeed I do not wish to trouble you. I will go to him myself. You are very kind, but it is not in the least degree necessary for you to accompany me. A cup of tea and some little trifle is all I shall ask him for."

For a moment Mrs. Archibald hesitated, and then she said, "As we are hermits, I suppose we must not keep together any more than we can help, and so I will let you go alone."

Corona found Phil Matlack by his kitchen tent, busily engaged in rubbing the inside of a large kettle. He was not in a good humor. The departure of Martin had thrown all the work of his camp upon him, and now the appearance of a person from another camp requesting to be fed aroused him to absolute anger. He did not scold; it would have been impossible to look at that beautiful and imperturbable face and say hard words to it. He did not refuse the cup of tea or the bread and butter for which he was asked, and even added some cold meat; but he indignantly made up his mind that he would stand no more of this nonsense, and that if necessary he would go to Sadler and throw up the job. He had not engaged to cook for three camps.

Miss Raybold did not appear to notice his state of mind, and ate heartily. She thought it was fortunate that he happened to have the kettle on the stove, and she asked him how he liked the hermit life—the living for himself alone.

"Haven't tried it," he answered, curtly.

"I understand," said Corona, "you have had to live too much for other people; but it is too soon to expect our plan to run smoothly. In a short time, however, we shall be better able to know our own natures and show them to others."

"Oh, I can do that," said he; "and I am goin' to, precious soon."

"I have no doubt of it," she answered. "And now can you tell me where Mr. Archibald has gone? I did not see him this morning, and there are some matters I wish to speak to him about."

"No, miss," said Matlack, promptly; "I don't know where he is. He's a real hermit. He's off by himself, most likely miles away."

Corona reflected. "Mr.—the bishop? Have you seen him? He may be able to—"

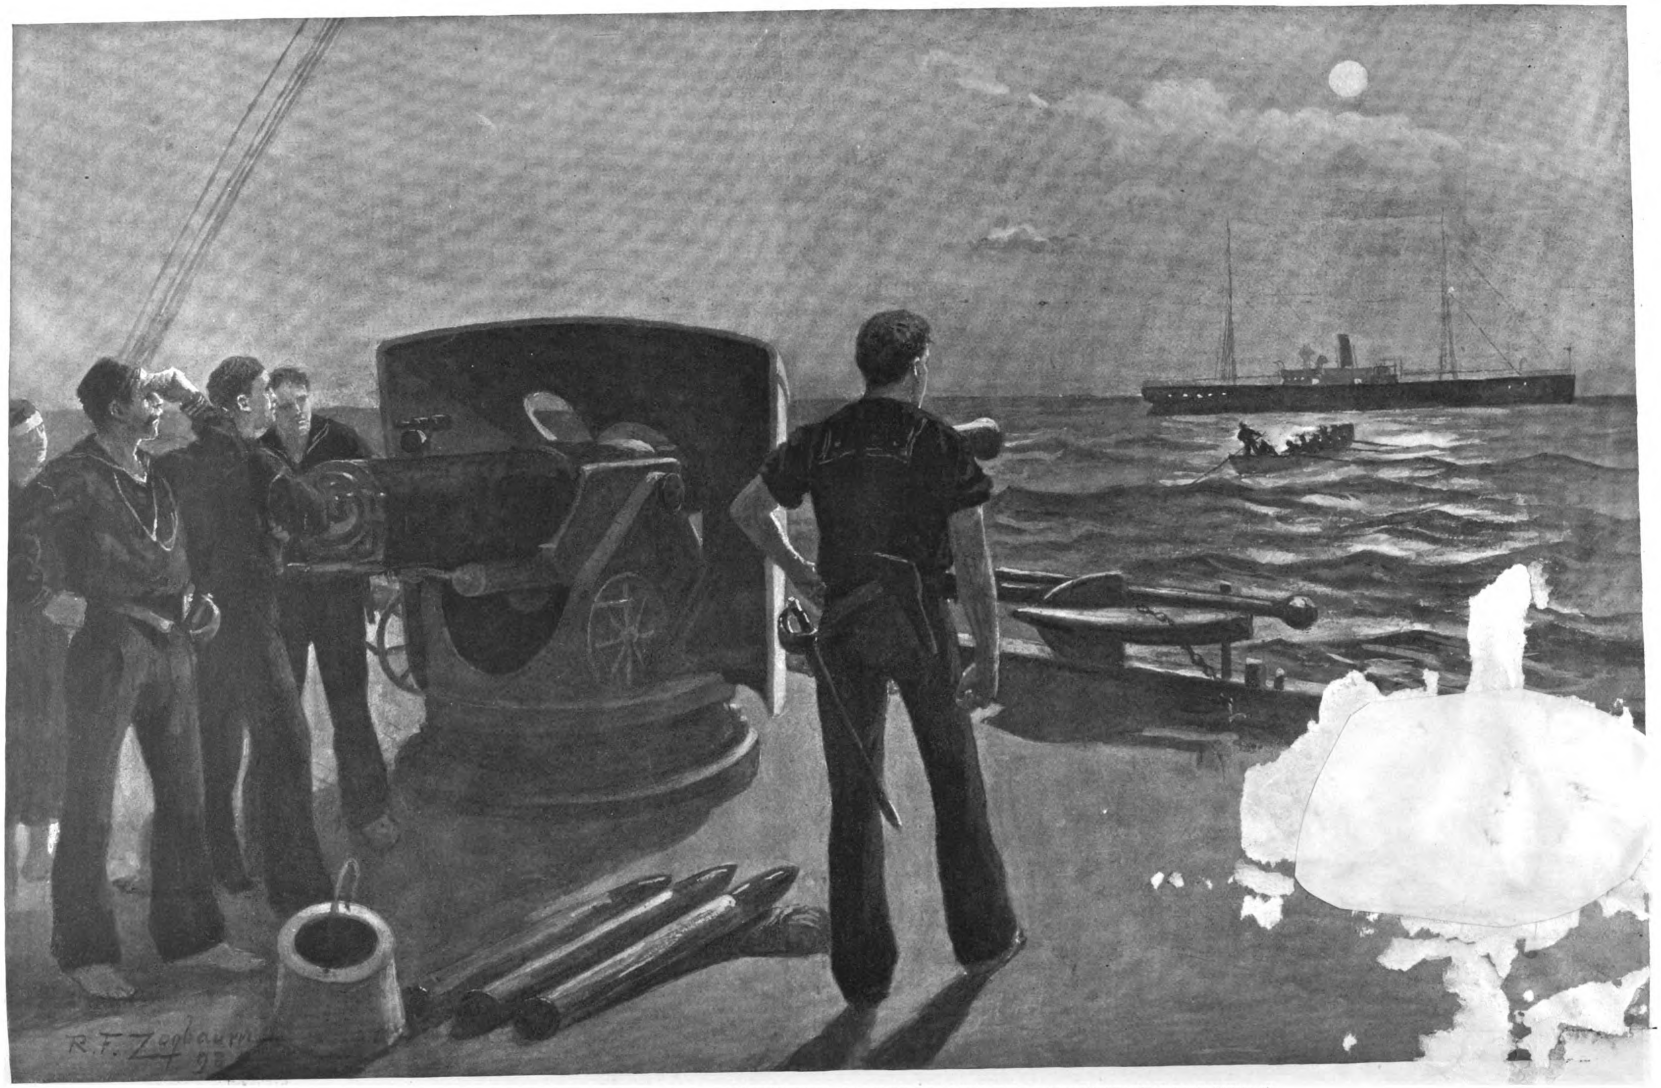
The guide grinned grimly. He had seen the man of muscle—not fat—conversing that morning with Corona, and an hour afterward he had seen him, not in the same place, but in the same companionship, and it gave him a certain pleasure to know that the man who could heave rocks and break young trees could not relieve himself from the thralls of the lady of the flowing speech.

"The bishop?" said he. "Don't you know where he went to?"

"He left me," she answered, "because he was obliged to go to prepare dinner for my brother and Mr. Clyde; but he is not in Camp Roy now, for I went there to look for Mrs. Perkenpine."

"Well," said the wicked Matlack, pointing to the spot where, not long before, Margery had found a tranquilliz ing breeze, "I saw him going along with a book a little while ago, and I think he went down to the shore, just beyond that clump of bushes over there. He seems to be a man who likes readin', which isn't a bad thing for a hermit."

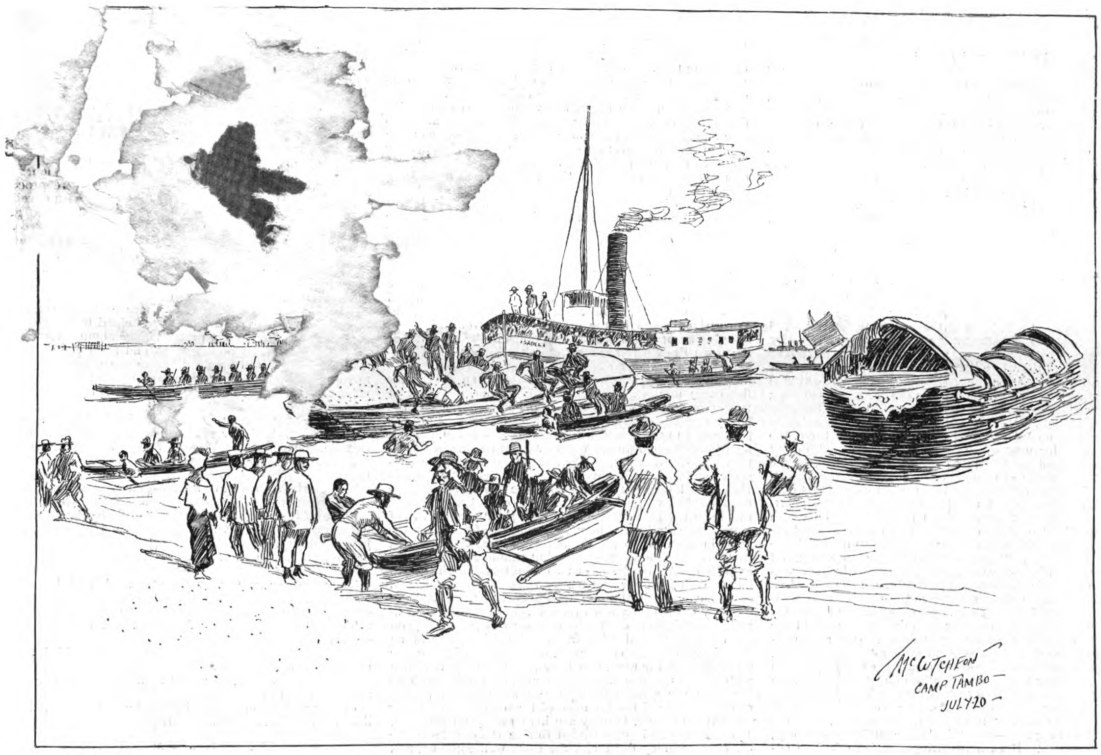
"Thank you," said Miss Raybold, rising. "I do not care for anything more. You are very kind, and I am quite sure I shall not have to trouble you again. To-morrow everything will be running smoothly."



Matlack looked at her as she quietly walked away. "She's a pretty sort of a hermit," he said to himself. "If she really had to live by herself she'd cut out a wooden man and talk to it all day. It won't be long before she accidentally stumbles over that big fellow with his book."

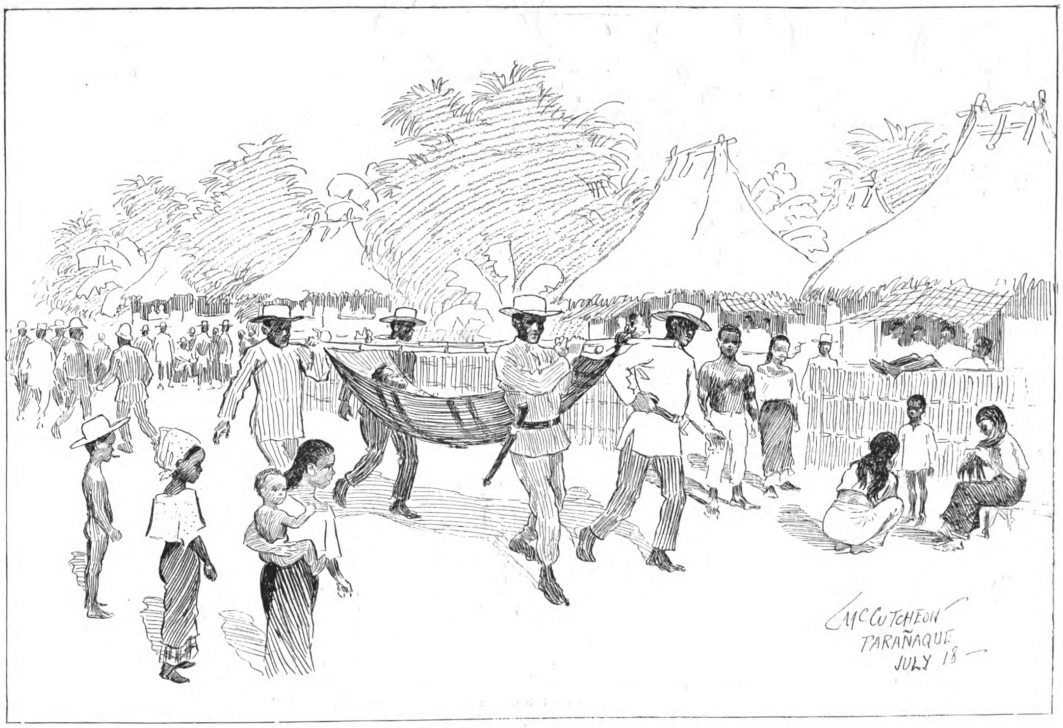
[TO BE CONTINUED.]

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google



Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Digitized by Google



ON THE BLOCKADE OFF SAN JUAN—"UNDER THE CRUISER'S GUNS."—Drawn by Rufus Fairchild Zogbaum.

Original from PENN STATE

1st COLORADO VOLUNTEERS LANDING ON THE BEACH NEAR CAMP TAMBO—CRUISER "BOSTON" IN REAR OF "ISABEL."

BRINGING IN A WOUNDED INSURGENT FROM THE TRENCHES NEAR MALATE.

OUR ARMY IN THE PHILIPPINES.

SKETCHES BY JOHN T. McCUTCHEON, SPECIAL ARTIST WITH GENERAL MERRITT'S TROOPS.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

HOW THE STARS AND STRIPES CAME TO ARROYO.

On Board U.S.S. "Wasp."

At daylight, Monday, August 1, the Wasp and Gloucester, acting under orders received during the night, got under way and proceeded to the eastward to find a landing for a division of General Brooke's Second Army Corps, which it was intended should land at a point from where it could advance to turn the flank of the probable Spanish position on the road to San Juan. I was awakened by the hurry of men on deck and sound of the engines turning, and jumped into my clothes and hurried to the bridge to see what was going on. A gray and threatening sky lowered overhead, and the sleeping transports loomed big and black as we swept by them. The Cincinnati, Columbia, and Massachusetts swung at their anchors, the morning watch just turning to to scrub down decks. We soon left them behind us with the silent town and harbor, and raced after the Gloucester, that anchored farther out and had a good start of the little Wasp.

The charts of this coast are utterly unreliable, and not even the presence of a native pilot on the bridge could make Captain Ward believe his vessel safe when we turned in towards the land at the spot on the map marked Port Jobos, five fathoms by the chart and only three by the lead. That would not do; and as we saw the Gloucester draw off, and the white line of breakers on either side of the entrance, not even the assurances of the dark-skinned gentleman referred to could make the passage seem safe; so slow speed was rung, and as we crept toward the only spot of smooth water the lead was kept going constantly —now five, now seven, and then shoaling to three, too little even for a vessel drawing thirteen feet. "Plenty of water," said the pilot; and there was just then, for the squalls and spills of rain that had kept the decks wet all the morning now culminated in a perfect deluge that shut out the shore-line and made the windows in the chart-house gray blots, through which nothing could be seen but the figures of oil-coated officers on the bridge and the barefooted pilot, one shoulder twisted up as if in defiance of the downpour. "Stop her," now came the order, and "Slow astern"—no venturing in such a place, in such weather; but tropic showers do not last long, and presently a gleam of sunlight showed through the rain, and the horizon at sea straightened out again. Only the dark hills were still wrapped in sheets of rain, but we could see them and hear the harbor bar moaning. Orders are orders, so try again is the word, and we shoot ahead—slowly, though—while the lead goes continually, and the leadsman cries, "Quarter less seven—five fathom—four," and then "three"—slow speed and twenty men looking for danger. The sun struggles through the mist; we can see the bottom over the side. "Slow her down—steady," for the swell lifts along here—and "Yes, we're on," comes the cry; "we've struck. Back her—full speed astern." The engines respond, and off we go, leaving a trail of muddy water as long as the ship—good work, for if we had trusted the chart or the pilot we would have been stuck sure; but a careful skipper takes no chances, and the Wasp is free as ever.

The Gloucester is off now to the eastward, hailing us, for they see there is no getting in there. "We are going to Arroyo; follow us." Follow, indeed! We'll find our own way, and we do. Arroyo, thirty-seven miles from Ponce, port of the fine city of Guayama, and right in the midst of many large plantations and a fertile cultivated country, is marked on the map with dotted lines, showing uncertainty as to the channel and coast-line. Think of it! Islands in the Pacific where nobody ever goes are better charted; but that is the Spanish way of doing things; and they would not allow the United States to make a chart of their possessions. Never!

Shoals are marked that do not exist, and deep water where it is shallow; but in we go, the lead giving seven fathoms one minute and fourteen the next, followed by five—a bad bottom truly, and a guess at the course; but in time the town looms up before us, straggling along on the beach, with a fertile plain beyond, and dark hills shut in with rain. Off to the left a few miles inland is the city of Guayama, set on low hills, and crowned with a great cathedral, one of the finest in the Western world. Sugar plantations and their tall-chimneyed works for crushing the cane line the shore, and the lower hills are marked in squares of varied color that remind one of the well-tilled hill-sides of France. Altogether it is a pretty and prepossessing country, and so much more interesting than Cuba as to make us agree that the term "Queen of the Antilles" ought to belong to it in preference to any other.

The Gloucester had come to anchor, in about five fathoms of water, off the town, at a few minutes before eleven o'clock. We followed, anchoring just astern and slightly outside, at 11.06. Both ships were cleared for action, and the crew of the Wasp, fresh from their victory at Nipe over the Jorge Juan, were eager to try again their powers, and looked in vain for a Spanish flag. None was to be seen, however. Four French flags and one English union-jack floated over the town. That was all. No sign of Spanish colors.

A crowd had gathered on the beach in front of the custom-house—the entire population apparently—watching the approach of the boat carrying a little white flag. The alcalde and the village priest stood out in front of the crowd on the beach and bowed low to the Americanos. Lieutenant Wood of the Gloucester informed them of the terms of surrender, and after a short parley went up to the custom-house and hoisted the American flag at 11.28. The crowd flocked around the officers and cheered the flag, and seemed to be glad it had come.

There were one or two citizens, however, who did not want to surrender without taking a good long time to discuss the matter. One of these was the captain of the port, a Spanish naval officer, who was made a prisoner of war and released on parole. The alcalde and other civil authorities, with foreign consuls, were taken off to the Gloucester, and the town formally surrendered to the United States. The small force of regulars and volunteers stationed at Arroyo had retreated in haste to Guayama, and a messenger was sent demanding the surrender immediately of the city and forces. Meantime the Wasp made careful soundings about the harbor, establishing the course, so that the St. Louis and other large vessels could find their way in without trouble.

During the night the British consul, whose life had been threatened by the soldiers, took his family to the consulate, and many women and children flocked there for protection, and all passed an anxious night. The Gloucester withdrew her small guard of bluejackets, but remained off the town, keeping watch. The consul's office is right on the beach, and during the night the work of getting the fleet of lighters found at Arroyo ready for work in the morning was pushed on by the energetic consul, who was also an agent for the United States.

About midnight a column of volunteers came stealing down the street, taking long steps and looking from side to side like the villains in a comic opera. They ranged up in front of the houses on the beach, and opened fire from their Mausers at the Gloucester. Their fire caused consternation to the scared people in town; but the Gloucester only turned her search-light on the beach and the would-be heroes, who immediately turned and fled, scattering cartridges all along the street in their haste, which were picked up in the morning as souvenirs. The Gloucester couldn't fire very well without hurting friends as well as foes, but her search-light served just as well to put the enemy to flight, and the balance of the night passed in peace. Early in the morning the Cincinnati left Ponce for Arroyo, followed by the St. Louis and St. Paul, and the work of landing the troops was immediately begun. We arrived again in the afternoon, and went ashore at once. The presence of Spanish troops in the outskirts of the town drew a few shots from the St. Louis and Cincinnati, which did no harm, so far as known, except to kill some cattle grazing in the broad green fields. As there was no dock or facilities of any kind, the work of landing was somewhat slow. Ships' launches towed the heavy lighters, crowded with men and stores, as near as they could to the beach, when they were poled in, and the men jumped out into the water or upon the beach as best they could. Work was immediately begun on a landing-stage, and they now have a quite sufficient one. As at Ponce, and before that in Cuba, the army would have been helpless without the aid of the navy launches, and the handling of so many men and great quantities of stores has entailed an immense amount of work on the boats in addition to the regular ships' work—a demand that has been successfully met, but should not be always expected. A harbor tug or two as a forethought would have saved the wear and tear of the ships' launches, and could have been left for permanent work in these harbors.

Arroyo is a pretty town on a level plain with a background of high hills. The streets are wide, and the principal one is shaded with trees, and reminds one of an American village. The houses, mostly built of wood, are set back from the road, and have pretty front yards filled with flowers. The inhabitants greeted the soldiers as brothers; the women brought out flowers, and pinned roses on their shirts—for none of them wears a coat, nor scarcely an officer, as they are here purely on business. The Third Illinois was landed during the day from the St. Louis, and by dusk had the town well guarded, and its outpost far on the road to Guayama. Late in the afternoon a skirmish took place, with no harm done on our side. From the headquarters of Major Bennett, on the top of the building in which the British consul has his office, we could see the troops moving up the road, and the reports of their rifles and little puffs of smoke caused a temporary excitement; otherwise it was the most delightful war imaginable, and the soldiers, glad to be ashore and in a country so beautiful, were already establishing the most friendly relations with the population, especially the female part. In fact, except for the former capitan del puerto, who stood at his front gate smoking a pipe and watching the soldiers pass, and frowning hard at them too, I did not see a look or expression other than that of pleasure. It was a great day for Arroyo; the little harbor never saw so many big ships, and the streets never echoed to the tread of so many men. The entire population was out-of-doors too, and was just as glad as if it had been American always. There is a handsome church in Arroyo, standing in a little square off the main street, with the priest's house embowered in flowers near it, and the father in charge offered his services from the first to aid in keeping order and helping the people to understand the new order of things; but Arroyo needed not to be conquered, but was only waiting for the coming of the stars and stripes.

Ponce, August 9.

On Thursday, the 4th, the Third Illinois and Fourth Ohio regiments had a skirmish with the enemy, who occupied a position in the woods extending across the road from Arroyo to Guayama. The enemy were well hidden in the woods, and it took five hours of Indian fighting, from tree to tree and bush to bush, to drive them out; and with their smokeless powder they had a great advantage over our men, whose whereabouts was exposed by the smoke from their rifles at every discharge. It finally became too hot for the Spaniards, and they retreated to Guayama, and then through the town, firing back on their own city when our forces occupied it. Five of our men were wounded, and the Spanish loss was not discovered.

One dead soldier was found thrown into a well. The rest of their dead and the wounded had been carried off. Guayama is a fine healthy city, and an important point on the road to San Juan. Every day at Ponce has seen the gradual straightening out of army affairs—vast stores of ordnance and provisions have been landed and stored or sent on to the front.

The transports are now all unloaded, and the army in good condition to advance. Wilson's outposts are now seventeen miles from Ponce, and a general advance will be made within a day or two. The arrival of Troops A and C, New York cavalry, has given Ponce quite a metropolitan touch, and these men, who have worked like troopers—and there is no more expressive phrase—swarmed into Ponce on Sunday. Liberty for a few hours was celebrated by baths and clean shirts—if they had them—and a dinner at the little Hotel Française, headquarters for those off duty and for the navy and correspondents. There were many greetings, and more bottles of "Monopole" opened than ever before in the history of one day in Ponce, I am sure, and it is not often that soldiers at $15 60 per month ride expensive horses and drink champagne. This was an incident only of the peaceful occupation of Ponce. The rule has been work, night and day, and the New York men have sweated and toiled as hard as the regulars.

A theatrical troupe—from the Bowery, I should judge—which has been "doing" the West Indies this summer, has just arrived in Ponce from St. Thomas, and is advertised to open at the handsome theatre here this evening, booming, and the town never had so much excitement in its history before. American money changed at 100 and at 75 per cent., according as you make your purchases. The quartermaster's headquarters gives 100 per cent., but the natives are inclined to take advantage of the scarcity of silver in that little matter.

The road to San Juan is a fine, broad, macadamized thoroughfare, passing through many towns and villages, and bridged for the most part very well. Some of the bridges are forded, and the frequent rains, together with the heavy army traffic, have made some of the fords impassable in places to get over. I drove out Sunday, with a party of officers, many miles in the country. There were long processions of heavy pack-wagons rumbling along the road, escorts trotting ahead and behind them, and a column started in heavy campaign order at dark, and kept on the road, looking very like regulars and experienced; a heavy wagon with four vigorous, kicking mules obstructed one ford and blocked the road. The drivers were swearing, the mules kicking, and the population turning out to see the excitement as we splashed through, giving some nautical advice that was scorned, but which we felt sure would have helped matters had it been heeded. There is a pretty village about seven miles from Ponce, nestled among trees, and from the top of a low hill, as the road bends down to the town, there is a magnificent view of the rolling country and distant hills, glimpses of big trees and houses snuggled in masses of foliage.

Well cultivated and more comfortable-looking than any spot in the West Indies, Puerto Rico seems a veritable El Dorado, and with the infusion of fresh energy and more equitable laws, this fair island has vast possibilities before it. On this point I enclose an editorial from a Ponce paper, which starts with a new name—and new sentiments, I fancy—just at this time.

Some of these sentiments about public hygiene are due to the vigorous measures of Chief Medical Inspector Major Woodbury, a New York man, who has taken charge of the local health affairs in a way new to this easy-going race.

They are to have a new cemetery. A plot has been selected and blessed, and the old burying-ground, used over and over again for two hundred years, and right in the midst of the city, is to be closed, and one source of danger to public health removed.

The weather has been excessively hot, but probably not more unendurable than is New York in August, and this is the hot season here, too; next month it will be comfortable, the Puerto-Ricans say.

From the La Nueva Era, Ponce, August 8, 1898. Published partly in English and partly in Spanish:

IT SEEMS LIKE A DREAM.

Yes, it does seem like a dream, that the flag of the United States, should be waving over Ponce guaranteeing all the longings for prosperity and happiness, that filled our soul, for this our beloved island of Porto Rico.

As true disciples of the Republican doctrine, we never forsook our ideal, and never bowed our head before the false idols of Monarchism, which only serve to corrupt and make abject slaves of men.

Immense therefore is our joy to see the Republican form of government triumphant forever—yes, forever—in this beautiful land.

In our inmost soul, like the Hebrew of old, on seeing the Promised land, we lift up to God our song of praise and gratitude. We are ready now to go to our graves with an easy mind, for we know, that our children are, and will be, citizens of a free and truly great country.

The immense load of mistrust does not overwhelm us with its weight, nor does it fetter our mind. We are citizens of the great land of Washington and Lincoln!

Henceforward our Municipalities will be absolutely Autonomous and will not be dependent on the smile or frown of our former Lords and masters, to do, or not do, what they think best for the interests of the community.

It will be by the direct vote of the people, that those men thought worthy of confidence will be empowered to manage the Communal interests.

We are going to have all the responsibility, and all the glory, of our actions as an integral part of a great people.

We will be free to legislate on everything concerning the suffrage, electoral procedure, etc., in fact, on all matters that refer to our local administration and government. If we err we will have no one to blame but ourselves, but if we hit the mark, the glory and benefit will be exclusively our own.

We ought, therefore, to look at the situation full in the face and begin to prepare ourselves to enter into the community of civilized peoples.

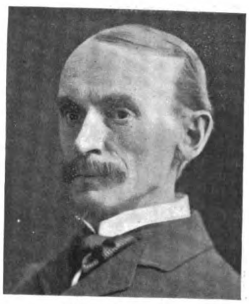
It is not possible that an island like Porto Rico should be longer without Railways, roads, bridges, and harbors adequate to the requirements of modern traffic; without a Postal and Telegraph service worthy of the name; without having its agricultural products better known in the consuming markets, especially its tobacco, not inferior, by any means, to that of the Vuelta-abajo; without developing its industry to the proper degree.

It is not possible that a city like Ponce, should continue with an inefficient Police force, nor with Public Hygiene, so abandoned, that for want of a Filter, in the Aqueduct, we have to drink, when there are freshets, water full of all kinds of impurities.

It is no longer bearable that an extensive town like ours should not have a system of Sewers for its proper Sanitation.

All these matters, and many others, which we will go on pointing out, must be attended to. When we have done so, when, everything which means civilization and advancement, spread their beneficent influence over us, then we shall have a better reason to say:

It seems like a dream, yes, but a very beautiful and comforting dream.



Carlton T. Chapman.

DIARY OF THE WAR.

Thursday, August 18.—General Merritt's account of the capture of Manila was received at the War Department. After referring to the notification to the Spanish commander (August 7) to remove non-combatants from the city, and the reply stating that the Spanish were without places of refuge, the despatch continues:

"On the 9th inst. sent joint note [i.e., in conjunction with Admiral Dewey] inviting attention to sufferings in store for sick and non-combatants in case it became our duty to reduce defences, also setting forth hopeless condition of Spanish forces, surrounded on all sides, fleet in front, no prospects of re-enforcements, and demanded surrender as due to every consideration of humanity. Same date received reply admitting their situation, but stating council of defence declares request for surrender cannot be granted, but offered to consult government if time was

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

WILLIAM R. DAY,
Secretary of State.

EDWARD DOUGLASS WHITE,
Associate Justice United States Supreme Court.

CUSHMAN K. DAVIS,
United States Senator from Minnesota.

WILLIAM P. FRYE,
United States Senator from Maine.

WHITELAW REID,
Formerly United States Minister to France.

THE PEACE COMMISSION.

granted necessary for communication viâ Hong-kong. Joint note in reply, declining. On 13th joined with navy in attack, with following results: After about half an hour's accurate shelling of the Spanish line, McArthur's brigade on right and Greene's on left, under Anderson, made vigorous attack, and carried Spanish works. . . . Behavior of troops excellent; co-operation of the navy most valuable. Troops advanced rapidly on walled city, upon which white flag shown, and town capitulated. . . . Insurgents kept out. No disorder or pillage."

Friday, August 19.—In Madrid it is said that the Cortes will meet about the middle of September, to provide the indispensable authorization for the signing of articles of peace on the part of Spain.

Saturday, August 20.—General Merritt cables the terms of the capitulation of Manila: "The Spanish troops, European and native, capitulate, with the city and defences, with all honors of war," etc. In another despatch he states that our loss in the assault was five killed and forty-three wounded.

Naval parade in New York Harbor. The cruisers and battle-ships New York, Iowa, Indiana, Brooklyn, Massachusetts, Oregon, and Texas passed in review.

Monday, August 22.—A general order issued to-day, in relation to the volunteers, prescribes that a thorough physical examination shall be made of officers and enlisted men immediately prior to their muster out. The records are to be preserved in view of pension claims arising from war service.

An elaborate report by General Calixto Garcia on the operations of the Cuban forces at Santiago was published to-day, and together with this the information is received that his resignation has been accepted by the "insurgent government."

Tuesday, August 23.—A despatch from Manila states that General Merritt has relinquished to General Otis the immediate command of our forces at that point, and has assumed his duties as Military Governor. Improvement is noted in the attitude of the insurgents toward the Americans.

Wednesday, August 24.—At a conference between our commanders and the leaders of the Philippine insurgents, the latter declared they were willing to co-operate with the Americans, and to surrender their arms promptly if assured of American or British protection. Otherwise they refuse to disarm.

Orders have been issued at Washington for the mustering out of sixteen organizations in the volunteer army.

Secretary Alger arrived at Camp Wikoff, Montauk Point. In the evening, after having inspected the camp, he said, "I am very agreeably surprised with the whole situation." Rather more encouraging than such misplaced cheerfulness was the Secretary's promise that the conditions should be improved in many particulars, and without delay. M. W.

ADVICE TO MOTHERS.—MRS. WINSLOW'S SOOTHING SYRUP should always be used for children teething. It soothes the child, softens the gums, allays all pain, cures wind colic, and is the best remedy for diarrhœa. —[Adv.]

RAISED TO HEALTH.

MORE infants have been nourished with Gail Borden Eagle Brand Condensed Milk than by all other so-called infant foods combined. Thousands of mothers testify to its merit.—[Adv.]

BANISH the blues by taking ABBOTT'S—The ORIGINAL ANGOSTURA BITTERS—lightens heart, helps health. —[Adv.]

DR. SIEGERT'S ANGOSTURA BITTERS are the most efficacious stimulant to excite the appetite.—[Adv.]

USE BROWN'S Camphorated Saponaceous DENTIFRICE for the TEETH. 25 cents a jar.—[Adv.]

ADVERTISEMENTS.

This man

has been persuaded to try one of the many substitutes offered in place of WILLIAMS' Shaving Soap. See the Thin, Frothy Lather. Note how quickly it dries. It "kills the razor," which pulls and "rasps." The face smarts, burns and itches—the skin is parched and drawn. It's bound to make a man cross and miserable.

Danger lurks in such soaps too.

But this man

sticks to the "old reliable" Williams' Shaving Soap. Note the Great, Rich, Creamy Lather. It holds its moisture indefinitely—softens the beard—so that the razor cuts easily and without pulling. The face has a smooth, velvety, refreshed feeling after shaving. He feels jolly and contented, and at peace with the world.

Which of these men would you rather be?

A half Century of unrivalled popularity has demonstrated that Williams' are the only Real Shaving Soaps.

Williams' Soaps are sold everywhere, but sent by mail, if your dealer does not supply you.

Williams' Shaving Sticks, 25c.
Genuine Yankee Shaving Soap, 10c.
Williams' Shaving Soap (Barbers') 6 cakes, 1 lb., 40 cts. Exquisite also for toilet.
Luxury Shaving Tablets, 25c.
Swiss Violet Shaving Cream, 50c.

Trial cake 2c. Stamp.

THE J. B. WILLIAMS CO., Glastonbury, Conn.

London: 64 Great Russell St.
Sydney, Australia: 161 Clarence St.

Williams' Exquisite "Jersey Cream" Toilet Soap, 15c.

Eau de Cologne No. 4711

The most pungent, exhilarating and refreshing Perfume. Used by persons of refinement. Imported into America for three-quarters of a Century. Be sure to get "No. 4711," which is the standard in all civilized countries.

MÜLHENS & KROPFF, N. Y., U. S. AGENTS.

INSURE IN
The Prudential

LIFE INSURANCE, $15 to $50,000
ALL AGES....BOTH SEXES
Write for information
THE PRUDENTIAL INSURANCE CO.
...OF AMERICA...
John F. Dryden, Pres. Home Office: Newark, N. J.

BOKER'S BITTERS
The oldest and best Specific against dyspepsia; an appetizer and a promoter of digestion.
Ask your Grocer, Liquor Dealer, or Druggist.

THIRTY-SECOND NATIONAL ENCAMPMENT OF G. A. R. AT CINCINNATI, O.

Reduced Rates via Pennsylvania Railroad.

For the thirty-second National Encampment of G. A. R., to be held at Cincinnati, O., September 5 to 10, 1898, the Pennsylvania Railroad Company will sell excursion tickets at rate of single fare for the round trip.

These tickets will be sold on September 3, 4, and 5, and will be good to leave Cincinnati returning not earlier than September 6 nor later than September 13, except that by depositing ticket with Joint Agent at Cincinnati on September 5, 6, 7, 8, or 9, and on payment of twenty-five cents, return limit may be extended so that passengers may remain at Cincinnati until October 2.

CRESCENT BICYCLES

are more largely used in this country than any other. Crescent Bicycles stand up and Crescent Prices are not cut. Quality Unexcelled.
Art Catalogue, with "Care of the Wheel," FREE.
Chicago WESTERN WHEEL WORKS New York

THE CELEBRATED
SOHMER
Heads the List of the Highest-Grade Pianos.

Caution.—The buying public will please not confound the genuine SOHMER Piano with one of a similar-sounding name of a cheap grade.
Our name spells—
S—O—H—M—E—R
New York Warerooms
SOHMER BUILDING
Fifth Ave., cor 22d St.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

WILHELMINA, QUEEN OF HOLLAND.

THE QUEEN OF HOLLAND.

THE 31st of August of this year the young Queen of Holland will attain her majority. According to the Dutch Constitution a sovereign must have accomplished eighteen years before ascending the throne. As the little Queen first saw the light at six o'clock in the evening, it is at that hour that the regency of her mother will end, and that Wilhelmina will begin to reign over the united Netherlands.

Her first act will be to sign a decree, in which she will make an opportunity of thanking her mother officially for the devotion with which she has fulfilled the position of Regent and watched over herself and her education. That night there will be religious services in all the churches in Holland.

On Monday, the 5th of September, the two Queens will go from The Hague to Amsterdam, where they will be formally received at the Eastern Railway Station, and conducted to the Palais Royal in the Dam—the old palace which was formerly the Hôtel de Ville, but which was given by the city in the beginning of this century to Louis Napoleon, when he was King of Holland. For the escort of the two Queens there will be a guard of honor on horseback, one on foot, and there is talk of a guard of honor of women. All the towns in Holland will be draped with flags and beautifully decorated. And as Amsterdam is considered the Venice of the North, there will be Venetian fêtes at night and brilliant illuminations.

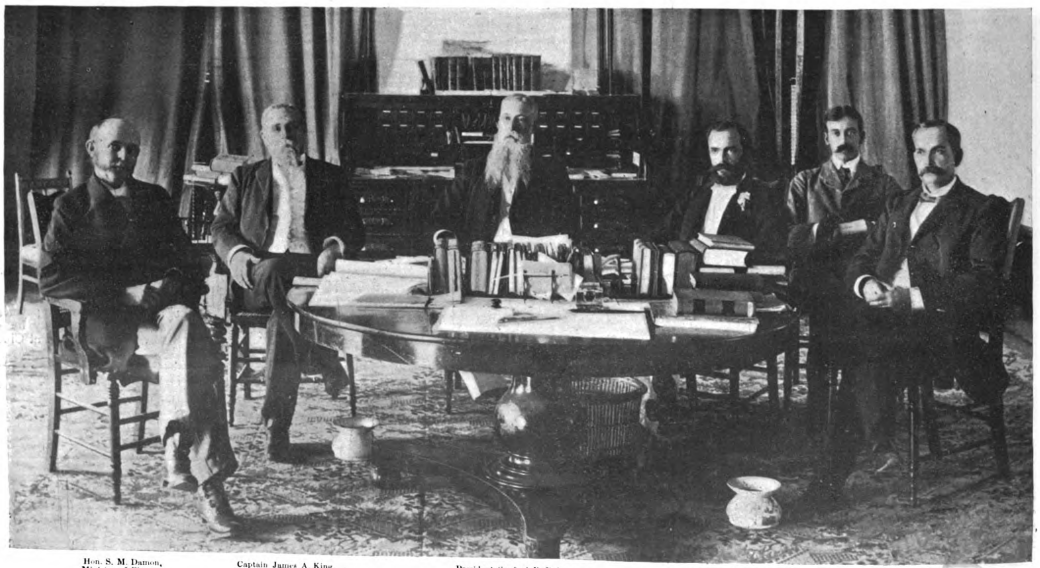
No foreign princes will be invited to the ceremony, which can scarcely be called a coronation, for the very good reason that in Holland two of the vital elements are lacking—a crown and a crowner. The Dutch speak of it as the intronisation, or the enthronement. Foreign princes are not asked, so I am told by the best authority on the inside of things at the Dutch court, for two reasons. First, it is feared that the German Emperor might cast a too preponderating shadow over the event. Next, all the courts which have aspirations towards the young Queen's hand would try to outvie each other in sending a handsome young man. From the same authority I learn that the Queen has decided not to marry for some years. She wishes first to have her people accustom themselves to seeing her upon the throne, and to keep the relation between her and them without any outside influence. When she does marry, her husband will be a prince-consort. Her wish is to make her accession to the throne an intimate fête between herself and her people. The princes under the suzerainty of Holland have asked permission to be present, and received it, such as the Sultan of Deli, the famous tobacco country, the Emperor of Solo, the Queen of Gowa.

On Tuesday morning, the 6th of September, the enthroning will take place. This is neither a religious nor a military nor a civil function. It is parliamentary, and is as republican in form as the inauguration of an American President at Washington. It is not yet decided whether the Queen will go on foot or by carriage from the Palais Royal to the New Church, where the ceremony will take place. Kings always go on foot. In the cortége is carried the regalia, which contains one thing entirely peculiar to Holland, and that is a copy of the Constitution, richly bound. It is upon this that the Queen takes the oath.

In the church she finds herself surrounded by her ministers, the dignitaries of state, governors of her provinces, etc. And in presence of the representatives of the States-General, one hundred members of the Second Chamber, eighty members of the First, she takes the oath as follows: "I swear to the Dutch people that I will always maintain and observe the Constitution of this country, that I will defend it with all my power, and will guard the independence of the territory of this country. That I will protect the general and individual rights of all my subjects, and will forward the general and special well-being by all the means that the law places at my disposition, as is the duty of a good king or queen."

Then the members of the States-General take the oath of fidelity, one by one, by holding up two fingers of the right hand. Even the ministers do not take the oath. It is a bond established between the Queen and her people in the person of their representatives.

The following day there will be a military fête, at which it is probable the Queen will present flags to the regiments; and in the evening there will be a great maritime fête, in which flotillas from every commune in Holland will take part. This does not mean the Dutch navy alone, but every craft that lives on the Dutch canals, filled with groups of peasantry in the national costume of each town.



Holland is arranging for an exhibition of souvenirs of the house of Orange-Nassau during the coronation fêtes, and also for the most remarkable and complete exhibition of Rembrandt's works that has ever been made, for which Queen Victoria and many others have promised to lend their private collections. "We want to show the world," a distinguished Hollander said to me, "that while we find the house of Orange-Nassau interesting, we find our Rembrandt one of our national glories also, and, as we are republican in spirit, no less worthy of notice than our Queen."

A sum of money will be offered by the Dutch people to the Queen-Regent on her daughter's accession, as a token of sympathy and of gratitude, which she has signified her intention of devoting to the foundation of a charity or some useful enterprise. The Holland people also wished to make a present to the Queen, but her mother has published a statement that by mutual agreement between herself and Queen Wilhelmina the latter would accept nothing, feeling that she has as yet merited nothing.

PARIS, August 18. ALLEN SERGEANT.

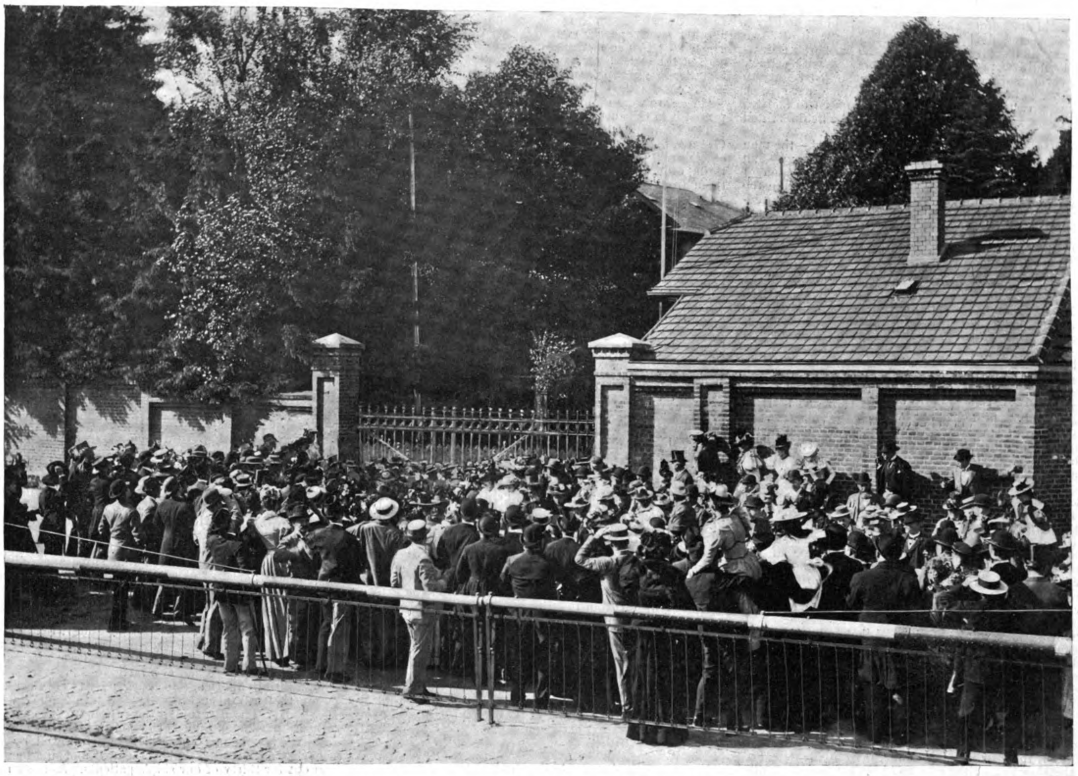
EMMA, QUEEN-REGENT OF HOLLAND.



Hon. S. M. Damon, Minister of Finance. Captain James A. King, Minister of Interior. President Sanford B. Dole. Hon. H. E. Cooper, Minister of Foreign Affairs. Stenographer. Hon. W. O. Smith, Attorney-General.

THE LAST MEETING OF THE HAWAIIAN CABINET

Copyright, 1898, by Davey, Honolulu, H. I.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THE BURIAL OF BISMARCK—CROWDS AT THE GATE OF THE SCHLOSS AT FRIEDRICHSRUH.

THE BURIAL OF BISMARCK.

BY JULIAN RALPH,
SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT OF "HARPER'S WEEKLY."

HAMBURG, August 6.

THE obsequies of the most extraordinary man since Napoleon, if not of the entire century, were as unconventional as had been his career. "I detest 'first-class funerals,'" he had said to Dr. Schweninger, as the two sat looking at the green hill crest on the edge of the forest opposite his house. "I want to be buried there, quietly. See that no fuss is made over me." He thought a moment, and then a gleam in his eye betokened a flash of the dry humor which always distinguished his speech. "At all events, I had a first-class funeral when I left Berlin nine years ago, and that is enough."

Prince Otto von Bismarck died on Saturday, July 30, at his Schloss in Friedrichsruh, in the Sachsenwald, seventeen miles from Hamburg. He had been very weak for months, but was actually ill only parts of a few days. He was so entirely without consciousness of what was coming that on the day before he died he gave his servant two new meerschaum pipes to color for him. His daughter and her husband, Count Rantzau, managed the Schloss for him, and she was at his side when the end came. His sons and his physician and intimate friend of fifteen years' standing—Dr. Schweninger—had gone their ways, and had to be telegraphed for. The last to return was the doctor, who only reached the Schloss in time to feel the final flutter of the Iron Chancellor's pulse.

Germany was as unprepared as the family—as the Prince himself. When the news went forth from the little post-office built in the wall of the Prince's grounds, the American newspapers, profiting by the difference in time, were the only ones in Christendom which acquainted their whole public with the disaster. In Germany Bismarck's personal organ, the Hamburger Nachrichten, got out an "extra," but for the most part the news leaked weakly from the railway telegraph-operators at all the stations in the empire. Bidden by HARPER'S WEEKLY and by a London newspaper editor to attend the formal burial before the Emperor, I hastened to Germany, expecting, as every one did, to see the Emperor assume charge of the affair, and make of it a demonstration in one stroke of the grief and of the majesty of Germania. In all the world there lives no man who could have arranged a more gigantic and impressive spectacle than could William II. with the body of the empire-builder as the basis and his vast army as the superstructure. But he was to be thwarted—at this distance the whole truth should be made clear—and there was to be no grand spectacle, no burial at all.

On Monday night, as the Emperor was on his way from Norway and I was making sixty miles an hour through Germany, there seemed no chance but that at least two days must pass before formal expression could be given to Germany's grief; and yet, when Hamburg was reached on Tuesday morning, I was told, "The funeral takes place to-day; perhaps even now it is over." It did take place that day, but not until evening, when the Emperor was able to reach the side of the closed coffin.

After the stroke of death had fallen, Dr. Schweninger embalmed the body with his own hands, and laid it back upon the death-bed in the position in which he had scores of times seen the Man of Blood and Iron lie when asleep. He put the right arm out, with the hand over the edge of the bed; the face and head inclined toward the right shoulder; the left arm a little apart from the body. In the left hand he put four roses—a white one of his own choice, and three dark ones, such as the great Bismarck loved. "Dark roses suit a man of my years best," he used to say. These, in this case, were the gift of an elderly Austrian noblewoman, who idolized the Prince, and had hastened to Friedrichsruh at the first warning that he was ill. Thus the Prince was seen by her, by Lenbach the famous painter, by Eugen Wolf the traveller, by Mr. Sidney Whitman, and by two or three other close personal friends. Including the family, not twenty-four persons saw the maker of modern Germany after he died. These only saw a plain small wooden bed, a chair, a table upon which rested a slight present sent to the Prince by a foreign monarch, and four bare walls.

On Monday night the body was lifted into a metal coffin fitted into an enormous oaken box, whose sides were blackened and decked with four heavy silver handles. The body was dressed in a linen night-shirt, and around the neck was folded a thin white cloth, such as he always wore in later years. The roses remained in the left hand. Those who were privileged to see the Prince noticed more than ever before how small was the well-rounded head in proportion to the gigantic frame of which it was the capital. The face was thin and aged, but the expression was peaceful. After thirty years' suffering from facial neuralgia, and two decades of familiarity with the gout, no trace of pain or of the agony that he suffered just before death was left upon the rugged, heavily lined face which had inspired his always poetic fellow-countrymen to speak of him as "an oak." At the moment they were everywhere repeating the phrase "the most splendid oak in the German forest has fallen."

The bed, the chair, and the table were taken from the room, and the enormous coffin was moved to where the bed had stood, in order that the Prince's body might lie precisely where death had come upon him. So it lies now, and will until a vault in the foundations of the mausoleum Prince Herbert Bismarck is to build upon the soft round hill in front of the house is ready to receive it. The walls of the room were covered with black cloth, the windows were coated over with the same cloth, and a pall of thin black stuff was flung over the coffin, so that it fell in folds upon the floor. It is so thin that the silver handles gleam through it. On the coffin was put a floral wreath from Prince Herbert, and another whose streamers of silk bore the words, "From Bill and Sybille"—Count William Bismarck and his wife.

On the morning of Tuesday, August 2, the family gathered in the sombre chamber to take the communion, with Pastor Westphal of the near-by village of Brunstorf officiating. Those who attended this simple service were Prince Herbert and the Princess; Count William, the Countess, and their children; the Baroness von Arnim, sister of the ex-Chancellor, and her daughter, the Baroness von Kotze. The heavy lid of the coffin was even then screwed down. Prince Hohenlohe had come the night before, and had been told that, owing to the incomplete effectiveness of the embalming, it had been impossible to leave the casket open any longer.

Already as I passed through Hamburg that morning I found that souvenir post-cards of Prince Bismarck were in all the shop windows, and being offered on the street corners in numbers like the leaves of Vallombrosa. And in the windows of certain fashionable shops were gigantic wreaths of the laurel and palm, with which the Germans love to typify death, or of cypress and palm and roses and lilies. Each had hanging from it a pair of long broad ribbons, white or black, bearing in gold a motto, and the name of some mourning guild or society. I did not dream—no man who had only the past to go by could dream—what a multitude of these wreaths I was to see. There never was in the history of grief such a downpour of symbols of that kind, such a despoiling of the gardens and hot-houses of an empire for the heaping of a nation's tribute upon the bier of its people's idol.

I found Friedrichsruh a mere railway station in a wooded country-side. Despite the lavish generosity of nature, it is not given to man to enjoy in many places a scene so beautiful as this hamlet presents. The country is undulating, and all broken with alternate patches of cool dark green forest and of brilliant sunlit meadows. One might look for a suggestion of the same combination beside Lake Champlain, but our newer country has no farm-land quite so soft and parklike, no forests quite so clean and orderly. There is no house to be seen except the Prince's Schloss as you stand on the railway station platform, but on the day of the funeral ceremony before the Emperor the uttermost quiet and restfulness of the place was slightly jarred by a line of men and women seated on the grassy hill overlooking the Schloss, by a

PRINCE HERBERT BISMARCK.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

knot of idlers before the gates of the Schloss, and by a string of seated figures on a neighboring wall of loose bowlders. The officers and men of the Bismarck Cuirassiers, in uniforms of white flannel braided with yellow, and wearing shining steel helmets, lent added beauty to the place as they strode in and out of the quiet groves. The two privates of the 31st Foot who paced to and fro between the inner and the outer gates of the Schloss fitted the occasion if not the scene.

How strange it seemed to find that Bismarck—the man of force and action, of war and of resistless energy—had been for years resting in this over-peaceful region of forest quiet, with only the sighing trees to strike the plaintive note of the place, except when a three-hundred-ton express to or from Berlin thundered past, not twenty feet from his gates, at the foot of the hill on which he asked to be buried! By the kindness of Prince Herbert I went into the place of death, and found the Schloss to be not at all what the word castle suggests, but a large many-windowed house with stucco walls, which had been built for a watering-place hotel, and now having its conventional garden, its pond and sluggish brook, and its few acres of open field enclosed within a high brick wall. A modern place to the last degree—utilitarian, frail, and not especially pretty.

I looked for the hotels of which I had heard, and so came upon scenes most strange to American eyes. Though no houses were in sight, there were hotels, and they were buried in the woods. They were small wooden taverns, whose activities flowed beyond their walls into acres of forest converted into beer-gardens. And these were crowded by hundreds upon hundreds of people, all drinking beer and eating. They were so orderly that one heard not a sound, until he climbed a knoll or turned a corner, and found himself confronting the rows of tables under the trees, and the groups of men and women plying knives and forks and draining metal-topped glass tankards. To be under the shock of the blow of a gigantic stroke of death, and then to find the mourners all eating and drinking, smoking and idling, in the very presence of the Leveller, was a trial to foreign sensibilities; and yet, an hour later, I wrote in my note-book these words, "They dare any people to question the depth and sincerity of their grief." As a sage has said, "In other lands, other manners."

The Kaiser telegraphed from Kiel that he would reach Friedrichsruh at six o'clock in the evening, and the funeral ceremony was set for that hour. By four o'clock telegrams to the Emperor began to collect in the railway telegraph office, and at the same time the crowds deserted the beer-gardens and reassembled before the Schloss gates, in the narrow space between them and the railway. At half past five o'clock two extra-large locomotives coupled together rushed up to the station, having been sent in advance of the imperial train to feel the way for it, and to take the blow in case the rails had been tampered with by murderous hands. Thus are all monarchs guarded when they travel in these days.

The iron outer gates of the Schloss were flung open, and so were the inner wooden gates. The men of the 31st Foot were formed in a double line to separate the crowd and wall it apart before the gates. Servants in the green forester livery of the dead Prince came pushing a huge roll of red carpet, which, when spread out, reached from the Schloss to the nearest rail of the railroad track. The crowd looked over the shoulders of the infantrymen, between their brass helmets, and saw the yellow front of the Schloss, the broad curving gravel road, the neatly edged lawns, and trees and bronze ornaments, the many windows, and the yellow and white cuirassiers before the front door.

"Where are the big dogs of our Bismarck?" a woman asked.

"The last of them all died two months ago," a soldier replied. "He might have known what was coming."

"Silence!" cried one of the dandified officers with upcurled yellow mustache who walked, clanking his sword, in the clear roadway between the guards.

Presently the Emperor's train came up and stopped, then started and crawled twenty feet to bring the steps of the imperial saloon-car to the end of the red carpet. We Americans have finer cars than his, for the interiors were comfortable rather than ornate; but no American rides, as he rode to Friedrichsruh, in a train of nine such cars. All were alike externally—blue below the windows and white beside them, with a crown of gold on each door, and the Prussian arms on each end of each side. The train was almost 600 feet in length, was drawn by two heavy engines, and was so well built, so heavy, and so well handled that it slipped almost noiselessly up to its halting-place and stopped without a jolt. We all saw the Emperor in cocked naval hat standing behind a plate-glass window of his saloon-carriage, beside his wife, with his left hand resting on the handle of his sword. He looked as a man does who is being photographed.

The crowd began to push against the soldiers. The officers ordered the guard-line kept even and straight. I saw a beaming rosy-faced girl with her chin on the shoulder of the infantryman in front of her, whispering nonsense in his ear, and he was grinning with pleasure and rolling his eyes at her. The crowd kept pushing. "Use force!" shouted one of the officers. Then the soldiers pushed mightily to straighten the line, and I saw the private who had been flirting double his body and dash it against the maiden, not once or twice, but many times, until she cried with pain and fright.

Now there came from the castle Prince Herbert, tall and stalwart and handsome, with the beauty of an uncommon intellectuality; Count William, stout and round and bald; and Count Rantzau, pale and undistinguished-looking. The Prince wore evening dress, without one of his very many decorations. Count William was in the cocked hat and court dress of his office as president of Königsberg. The Empress, all in black, beautiful with the appearance of greater youth than she possesses, and with a matronly glory about her, came down the steps of the car, to be welcomed by Count William Bismarck. The Kaiser followed—a man of medium stature, showing a little stoutness, sunburnt the color of a pale Indian, proud, cold, acutely watchful of all around him. He wore a beaver chapeau with very broad gold braid and the dark blue suit of an admiral. His mustachios were turned toward his eyes. His left hand rested on his sword handle as if it had been stitched to it. He waited until Count William had finished his address to the Kaiserin and had come forward and begun to speak to him. The Count made another short speech, and then the imperial pair were greeted by Prince Herbert, who bowed low before them, and, at the end, shook hands with both. Then all came together in a group for an instant.

"It came suddenly," said the Kaiser.

"Yes; we were unprepared," said the Prince. "We expected it in the autumn, but not at midsummer, like this."

The Prince led the Kaiserin; the Kaiser walked beside Count William. Out of the imperial carriages came many officials and civil functionaries in evening dress, with glittering orders hanging from their collars and sashes across their shoulder to waist. The leader of these was Herr von Bülow, the Foreign Secretary. All passed into the death-chamber. Until that time it had been heaped with wreaths and flowers—littered with them—on the coffin, the floor, and against the walls. Now these had been removed, and twenty-one chairs had been arranged at one side of the chamber opposite the coffin. Only the ladies used the chairs. The men stood throughout the half-hour's service.

The Emperor walked over to the closed coffin, and bending his head, offered silent prayer. The Empress wept. As the Emperor continued to stand after all were in the room, the men followed his example. Pastor Westphal asked that one of Luther's majestic chorals be sung, and this was done by all, without instrumental accompaniment. Then Pastor Westphal delivered a short address, at one part of which, as if unmindful of the Emperor's presence, he spoke of the Iron Chancellor's fearlessness before men. "He was fearless in their presence," he said, "because his belief in the will of God made him firm and unbending once he knew he was right." At the end of the address a hymn was sung, and then the mourners passed out of the presence of death. The Empress was still weeping gently, and Bismarck's old valet, Pillow, was sobbing audibly. The Kaiserin nudged the Emperor's arm. "William," said she, "there is the Prince's aged sister." To her the Kaiser went, and warmly grasped her hand. He then shook hands with Pillow, whom he had known from his boyhood. He asked to be shown the floral tributes, and expressed amazement at their size and cost and numbers as Prince Herbert led him from room to room on the ground-floor, which was literally heaped with these tributes. At the gate the Emperor kissed Prince Herbert on both sides of his face, and shook the hands of the others and of the officer in command of the cuirassiers. We saw Prince Bismarck assisting the Empress into the saloon-carriage, and then for perhaps two minutes we could see the Kaiser standing by her side in the military attitude of one who is saluting. Now and then his right hand went up to the peak of his cocked hat. Then the train moved softly away, and the obsequies of the builder of Imperial Germany were over.

I remained two days at Friedrichsruh, and during all that time, by night as well as day, wreaths kept coming to the station in van-loads. Each one was boxed in a packing-case, and some of these were eight feet long and nearly as wide. One wreath took up the body of a barouche. All day and far into the night these were hauled into the garden of the castle, until it too was burdened with them like the castle itself. They lay all over the lawns, against all the trees and ornaments—everywhere, on every side. There were thousands of them, all huge circlets of palms and flowers or cypress and flowers, and always with long silken ribbons bearing a motto and the names of the senders. They came from sovereigns, princes, parliaments, councils, states, towns, German colonies, clubs, societies, from Li Hung-Chang, even from the Empress Frederick. In-doors the furniture of the great ground-floor rooms was submerged beneath them.

A FIELD FANCY.

The asters in the orchard nod
Serenely to and fro,
As does the flossy golden-rod
Whene'er the breezes blow.

I know that where the zephyrs stray,
They're acting all the time
Along the dreamy meadow-way
A fairy pantomime.

R. K. Munkittrick.

THE HOSPITAL-SHIP "OLIVETTE."

[Special Correspondence of "Harper's Weekly."]

For some days prior to the departure of this vessel from Santiago she lay in that port taking on board sick soldiers. On the afternoon of the 15th of August the last men from the Nautical Hospital were received, and the Olivette started for Hampton Roads, to report from there to Washington, and receive further instructions as to what course to pursue.

To the men who had been on board several days, waiting for the Olivette to leave, the news carried from bunk to bunk that the ship had actually left her dock and was bound to the cooler, life-giving breezes of the North was good news indeed. It revived the spirits of the sick, who through many days of fever in camp and in hospital, in the rain, the mud, and the sun, had looked forward to the day when they would start for home as the beginning of the end of their misery.

It was hard to realize that 200 sick men were on board the Olivette. There was a silence along her almost deserted decks that was broken by moans from the cabin behind you, and as you glanced through the windows that opened at your side, there was a sad sight of wasted forms, gaunt faces, and shrunken arms and feet. Every berth was full. Every room had two occupants, and in corners stood rifles, and on the floor were canteens, clothes, and worn army accoutrements.

The surgeon in charge of the vessel and his three assistants got matters in good running order by the second day out. Their work was hardest in the beginning, and then it was arduous indeed—the patients required unremitting attention, and there was a woful lack of nurses. Some of the few were taken sick, and the available force much cut down thereby. They worked on twelve-hour stretches, and at one time there were but four nurses in attendance on 200 men. As most of the patients had to have their food brought to them during the first days, and as there was a continual dearth of dishes upon which to serve it, some of them suffered in this respect. But as the vessel progressed northward and the majority of patients improved steadily, the dining-room was more crowded day by day, nurses recovered, convalescents were found who were willing and able to help, and the situation became easier.

There were eight deaths on the ship from Santiago to Montauk. They were all buried at sea. At the first burial the men leaned over the rail as the vessel slowed down, wondering what had occurred to stop them in mid-ocean. But the splash of the iron and the flash of the white-shrouded figure from the open port told the tale to the curious who lined the rail. As the screw took the water again there was no comment on deck. Afterward men knew what one bell in the engine-room, and the following quiet from the vibrating machinery, did mean. One boy had a home letter stuck in the pocket of his flannel shirt. It was plainly signed, "Your loving mother." The Episcopal service for burial at sea was read in each case.

At Hampton Roads the Olivette reported by telegraph to Washington, and, anchored in front of the two hotels, we awaited orders. The doctors here requisitioned milk and brandy from shore, two very necessary stimulants, and which were not supplied. This was Friday, the 19th. At six that evening orders, signed Sternberg, to report to the Montauk quarantine station were received, and at daybreak of Sunday, the 21st, the Olivette passed Montauk light and anchored off Camp Wikoff. On this run the men were in better physical condition than at any time on the trip. The cool air invigorated them, the hope of getting ashore buoyed their spirits. The quarantine examiners at Montauk found no contagion on the vessel, complimented the officers in charge on her clean condition throughout, and unofficially said they were through with her. Men on board hopefully scanned the sandy shore and the new tents, and longed for the tug that would bring them landing orders. It was somewhat discouraging to see that ships anchored here several days ahead of us still had their troops on board. But perhaps they held contagion, we argued; our vessel was clean. All day long the convalescents waited on deck. War stories were told again and again to different groups; it was talk of San Juan and Caney, the trenches, the first day's fighting, of what men would do when their sick leave came, and the everlasting subject of things to eat—something to be had in a farm-house one man knew of, or a dish in a Chicago restaurant for twenty cents.

Late that afternoon orders came again from Washington, signed Sternberg, telling the Olivette to nurse her sick on board until such time as Colonel Forwood at Montauk could receive them. This order was followed by word from Colonel Forwood that on the next morning he would send out for thirty of our ship's patients. Monday morning brought no boat to carry these thirty men ashore, but at ten o'clock we were approached by an immaculate quarantine tender, with immaculate officers on board, who inquired, through a megaphone, if we had sufficient coal and provisions to go to Boston. We replied we had enough coal, but lacked certain provisions, which we enumerated. "We will send them out in an hour, with your orders to proceed to Boston," we were answered.

"I wonder why they brought us to Montauk, anyway?" said a lean soldier who could not get his lips over his yellow teeth—fever treats a man's face that way. "I wasn't stuck on looking at their sand hills."

"If we stay by the old Olivette we'll learn the whole Atlantic coast; Portsmouth and Halifax next stops; land what's left of us in Labrador," said another.

All day long we waited for a barrel of potatoes, two quarters of beef, eggs, and a little milk and brandy to give to the dying, who could retain no other nourishment, and which had been requisitioned Sunday morning the instant we made port, and which we had asked for again Monday. At ten minutes of five in the afternoon we had all our stores, excepting the milk, on board, also orders to proceed to Boston and send our sick to the city hospitals. We weighed anchor at five. At eight o'clock on Tuesday morning we were at the Boston quarantine station. We showed a clean bill of health from the Montauk authorities. The Boston men asked us to remain at anchor until final hospital arrangements were completed and it was decided where best to dock our vessel. As we waited, the same familiar condition of waiting, we were saluted with music, cheers, tears from women, and fluttering white from every excursion-boat that knew we were in the harbor. At eleven o'clock we were told everything was ready to receive our sick, and we steamed to Lewis's wharves. Boston had everything prepared—ambulances, doctors, nurses. The vociferous cheering crowds were held properly in check by the police, and the sick of the Olivette can be thankful they did get to Boston, instead of being landed at the improvised hospitals at Montauk Point.

They are getting the best of attention at this city's hospitals, and the wandering voyage is at an end. They are getting proper stimulants and nourishment, good nursing, and quiet. All of which they would have had just forty-eight hours sooner if we had not visited Montauk, which could have been avoided if somebody had known that Montauk could not or would not receive us, and that Boston would and could do so thoroughly well. Likewise, we probably would not have buried a man off Cape Cod, and fewer men would have gone ashore on stretchers, and those who did would have been in a better condition.

Lieutenant William Tiffany, of the First United States Volunteer Cavalry, died in Boston two days after the Olivette arrived there. The cause is stated as fever and starvation. "By starvation, I mean from the medical standpoint. I do not mean to say that he did not have food, but that he did not have food suitable to the condition of a convalescent."

It cannot be stated that the delay caused Mr. Tiffany's death, but it is assuredly a fact that if Mr. Tiffany had received proper food and care forty-eight hours sooner than he did he would have had a better chance for life.

Really there was no reason for our stopping at Montauk. We did get the brandy we had asked for at Hampton Roads, but we did not get the milk we wanted to strengthen dying men, and Boston had both brandy and milk. There was no sense whatever in going to Montauk; it made Boston forty-eight hours later.

Harold Martin.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

ARE YOU WORN OUT?

THEN TRY

VIN MARIANI

MARIANI WINE--The Famous Tonic for Body and Brain.

Mariani Wine gives power to the brain, strength and elasticity to the muscles and richness to the blood. It is a promoter of good health and longevity.

Mariani Wine is endorsed by more than 8,000 American physicians. It is specially indicated for General Debility, Overwork, Profound Depression and Exhaustion, Throat and Lung Diseases, Consumption and Malaria.

General, Sir Evelyn Wood.

"Regarding the infantry marching in the recent manoeuvres, it was the best seen during my command at Aldershot. Many officers availed themselves of the tonic and reconstituent properties of the well-known Mariani Wine, the most certain as well as the most palatable method of inducing resistance to fatigue."
From "The London Sketch."

Mariani Wine is invaluable for overworked men, delicate women and sickly children. It soothes, strengthens and sustains the system, and braces body and brain.

To those who will kindly write to MARIANI & CO., 52 West 15th Street, New York City, will be sent, free, book containing portraits with endorsements of Emperors, Empress, Princes, Cardinals, Archbishops and other interesting matter. Mention this publication.

Paris—41 Boulevard Haussmann; London—83 Mortimer Street; Montreal—28–30 Hospital St.

WONDERFUL TRIËDER BINOCULARS

½ Actual Size.

Have 8 to 10 times the power of the best of the old-style field and opera glasses.

Pocket size—invaluable for Army and Navy, War Correspondents, Race Meets, Regattas, Travel, and the Theatre.

Send for Descriptive Catalogue. For sale by leading jewelers and opticians throughout the United States. Among them:

New York—Theodore B. Starr, F. G. Schmidt, Gall & Lembke.
Brooklyn—J. B. Hoecker, 312 Fulton St.
Chicago—C. D. Peacock, Spaulding & Co., Hyman, Berg & Co., N. Wattry, H. Borsch.
Philadelphia—Queen & Co., Bonschur & Holmes, Williams, Brown & Earle.
Washington—Franklin & Co., Moore & Leding, D. N. Walford.
Boston—Pinkham & Smith.
St. Louis—A. S. Aloe Co., Erker Bros.
San Francisco—Hirsch & Kayser, Henry Kahn & Co., Geo. H. Kahn.

Prices Range from $44.50 to $72.50.

C. P. GOERZ, 52 Union Sq. (East), N. Y. City

What Is It?

Why, the most delicious and exquisite

Natural Champagne

Fermented in the bottle. Excels in health-giving properties. Ask your dealer for it, or address

The New Hammondsport Wine Co.
Hammondsport, N. Y.

To more thoroughly introduce our productions, we will deliver at any point in the United States east of the Rocky Mountains having an express office, one assorted case containing twelve bottles as follows: One pint each of Golden Age, Beef Iron and Wine, and Cognac Process Brandy, and nine quart bottles of assorted Still Wines, making 1 doz. varieties, on receipt of address accompanied with $6.00.

A NEW POCO.
The Folding Gem.

The neatest, smallest, most carefully built of all the low-priced cameras. A marvel of compactness weighing one pound, and only an inch and a-half thick, closed. Automatically locks itself at proper focusing distance. Closes by touching a spring.

TAKES A PICTURE 4 X 5
As perfect at edges as at centre.

COMPLETE, $7.00.
ROCHESTER CAMERA CO.
43 ELIZABETH ST., ROCHESTER, N. Y.

SMITH & WESSON
REVOLVERS.
TWELVE DIFFERENT STYLES.
ONLY ONE QUALITY.
Catalogue free.
Smith & Wesson,
15 Stockbridge St.,
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

Financial

Letters of Credit. Bills of Exchange bought and sold. Cable Transfers to Europe and South Africa. Commercial and Travellers' Letters of Credit. Collections made.

Brown Brothers & Co.,
BANKERS, No. 59 WALL STREET.

GETTYSBURG BATTLEFIELD

Low-Rate Personally-Conducted Tour via Pennsylvania Railroad.

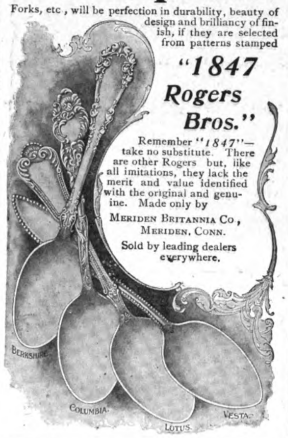
The recent triumphs of our arms by sea and land revives the interest in that greatest of all American battlefields, Gettysburg. In order that the residents of New York, Philadelphia, and neighboring cities may visit this great battlefield in the most satisfactory manner, the Pennsylvania Railroad Company has arranged for a three-day personally conducted tour on Saturday, September 3.

| | | RATE. |
|---|---|---|
| Leave | New York..... 8.50 A.M. | $13 00 |
| " | Trenton.....10.58 " | 11 50 |
| " | Philadelphia..12.20 P.M. | 9 00 |

Proportionate rates from other points.

Rate includes transportation in each direction, dinner at Philadelphia going and returning to passengers from New York and Trenton, one and three-fourths days' hotel accommodations, and carriage drive over the entire battlefield under the direction of Capt. James T. Long, the celebrated guide, who will describe the battle at the prominent points of the field. A tourist agent and chaperon will accompany the party. A Pullman parlor-car will be run through from Philadelphia to Gettysburg and return.



For itineraries, tickets, and full information apply to nearest ticket agent; Tourist Agents, 1196 Broadway, New York, and 789 Broad Street, Newark, N. J.; or address Geo. W. Boyd, Assistant General Passenger Agent, Philadelphia.

"Silver Plate that Wears."

Your Spoons

Forks, etc., will be perfection in durability, beauty of design and brilliancy of finish, if they are selected from patterns stamped

"1847 Rogers Bros."

Remember "1847"—take no substitute. There are other Rogers but, like all imitations, they lack the merit and value identified with the original and genuine. Made only by

MERIDEN BRITANNIA CO.,
MERIDEN, CONN.

Sold by leading dealers everywhere.

CHEW

Beeman's

The Original

Pepsin Gum

Cures Indigestion and Sea-sickness.

All Others Are Imitations.

MAGIC LANTERNS WANTED AND FOR SALE OR EXCHANGE. HARBACH & CO. 809 Filbert St. Phila. Pa.

When you buy

all tobacco cigarettes insist on having the best quality the best made the best value
the best smoke.
you can get all these in the popular

Van Bibber Little Cigars

They are made of the finest quality of imported whole leaf tobacco — are made as perfectly as any cigar in the world — burn evenly — do not bite the tongue, and are always the same.

25c. for 10.

H. ELLIS & Co., Baltimore, Md.
The American Tobacco Co., Successor

There is no Kodak but the Eastman Kodak

Half the charm of a photographic outing is lost if one carries along several pounds of glass plates and holders and has every moment filled with anxiety for their safety.

Kodaks

use non-breakable film cartridges, which weigh ounces where plates weigh pounds.

KODAKS $5.00 to $35.00.

Catalogues free at agencies or by mail.

EASTMAN KODAK CO.
Rochester, N. Y.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS

MAGAZINE, $4 00 a year. BAZAR, - - $4 00 a year.
WEEKLY, 4 00 a year. LITERATURE, 4 00 a year.
ROUND TABLE, $1 00 a year.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

"I had supposed, until yesterday, Doctor, that the days of the bleeding of patients were past."
"And so they are. But what changed your mind?"
"The bill you sent me."

Armour's
Extract of Beef
"has that rich, beefy flavor."
For preparing soups, sauces, gravies, etc. "Culinary Wrinkles" gives many ways of using Extract. It's mailed free for the asking.
ARMOUR & COMPANY, CHICAGO.

Pepsalt...

Indigestion Has No Terrors For Him
That salt-shaker is filled with Pepsalt is the best of table salt, into every grain of which is incorporated digestive substances natural to the stomach. Fill your salt-cellar with Pepsalt and use it in place of salt at your meals. If you have indigestion your stomach does not supply the necessary amount of the dissolving or digestive juices. Pepsalt taken in place of salt at your meals makes good this deficiency, as you take with every mouthful of your food a similar substance to that which is required and at the right time, and your indigestion is a thing of the past. Send for sample in salt-shaker bottle and try it.
Price 25 cents, postpaid.
THE VAUPEL SAMARITAN CO., 45 Sheriff St., Cleveland, Ohio.
PEPSALT CURES AND PREVENTS INDIGESTION

The Best is the Cheapest
Rae's Olive Oil is both the best and cheapest, quality considered.
The Chemical Analysis of S. Rae & Co.'s Finest Sublime Lucca Oil, made Sept. 15th, 1896, by the Ledoux Chemical Laboratory, declares it to be "unadulterated by admixture with any other oil or other substance. It is free from rancidity and all other undesirable qualities, and it is of Superior Quality and Flavor."
S. RAE & CO., Leghorn, Italy.
Established 1836.

"A PERFECT FOOD—as Wholesome as it is Delicious."
Walter Baker & Co.'s
Breakfast
Cocoa

Trade-Mark.
The Standard for Purity and Excellence....
Costs less than one cent a cup.
Our Trade-Mark on Every Package.
Walter Baker & Co. Ltd.
DORCHESTER, MASS.
ESTABLISHED 1780.

Next to floating on a cloud.

For absolute comfort and convenience in CAMPING or YACHTING
"PERFECTION"
AIR MATTRESSES AND CUSHIONS
are important requisites—they are waterproof, light, and convenient—can be deflated and rolled into small compass. Desirable for hospital or home use.
Free illustrated catalogue tells all about them.
MECHANICAL FABRIC CO., Providence, R. I.
Air-Goods Department,

Arnold Constable & Co.
Hosiery.
Plain and Fancy Lisle-Thread, Silk, and Cashmere Hose and Half-Hose.
Ladies' and Gentlemen's Golf and Bicycle Hose.
Summer Underwear.
Cartwright & Warner's
Celebrated Underwear
for Children, Ladies, and Gentlemen.
Broadway & 19th st.
NEW YORK.

Nathan B. Goodnow & Co.,
BANKERS.
ESTABLISHED 1873.
2 Post Office Sq., Boston, Mass.
Transact a General Banking Business, including the Purchase and Sale of Stocks, Bonds, and Grain, for Investment or on Margin.
Dealers in Government and Railroad Bonds.
Books containing Four-Year Range of Prices, Dividends, and Earnings sent free on request.
A Permanently Invested Fund of over TWO HUNDRED AND TWENTY-FOUR THOUSAND DOLLARS is held as a Guaranteed Security for all persons having business with us.
Correspondence solicited.

Joseph Gillott's
STEEL PENS.
GOLD MEDAL, PARIS EXPOSITION, 1889, AND THE CHICAGO EXPOSITION AWARD.
THE MOST PERFECT OF PENS.

TRADE E&W MARK
EARL & WILSON'S
LINEN
COLLARS & CUFFS
BEST IN THE WORLD.

Those Fine English Tobaccos
Capstan
Bird's Eye
Westward Ho
Three Castles
Gold Flake, etc.
Put up by W. D. & H. O. WILLS of Bristol, England, and famous the world over for their superb flavor and exquisite aroma, can be obtained for you by your dealer. If he will not get them, write to us for price-list of the well-known brands.
J. W. SURBRUG, Sole Agent, 159 Fulton Street, NEW YORK.

HARPER'S ROUND TABLE
An Illustrated Monthly Magazine for Youth
THE SEPTEMBER ISSUE CONTAINS
HOW THE POWDER-BOY GAVE US COURAGE. By Lieutenant-Commander Albion V. Wadhams, U. S. N. An account of the Thyatira in 1869 at the time of a former Cuban insurrection, when it was thought that war between the United States and Spain was imminent.
A TIMELY SHOT. By Colonel Henry Inman. An incident in the early career of "Buffalo Bill."
THE COPPER PRINCESS. By Kirk Munroe. (Continued.)
THE KING OF THE PLAINS. A spirited account of a contest between a wild Western steer and a domestic goat.
THE BOY IS FATHER TO THE MAN. An incident of the boyhood of Admiral George Dewey.
THE ADVENTURERS. By H. B. Marriott Watson. (Continued.)
THE LITTLEST CADDIE. By F. H. Spearman. A Golf Story.
THE HINDOO GAME OF TETHER-BALL. By Julian Ralph.
THE LATEST EXPLORER OF ASIA. By Cyrus C. Adams. Tells of the heroism displayed by Dr. Sven Hedin in his perilous trip through the deserts of Central Asia.
SNIPE AND SNIPE-SHOOTING. A timely paper on a seasonable sport. Illustrated by A. B. Frost.
AN EPISODE OF THE WAR OF 1870-71. By Henry W. Fischer. A war-story that treats of the conduct of a boy in peculiarly trying circumstances.
A GENTLEMAN ADVENTURER. By Reginald Gourlay. An interesting account of the life and adventures of Sir William Monson.
THE EDITOR'S TABLE, STAMPS AND COINS, THE CAMERA CLUB, and PROBLEMS AND PUZZLES
10 Cents a Copy. $1 00 a Year.
New York HARPER & BROTHERS London
PUBLISHERS

"AMERICA'S GREAT RESORTS," 48 pages, with map, sent free on receipt of a two-cent stamp by GEORGE H. DANIELS, G. P. A. New York Central, New York.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

HARPER'S WEEKLY

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

Vol. XLII.—No. 2177.

Copyright, 1898, by Harper & Brothers.
All Rights Reserved.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 10, 1898.

TEN CENTS A COPY.
FOUR DOLLARS A YEAR.

WITH OUR TROOPS IN PUERTO RICO.

THE 4TH OHIO VOLUNTEERS, COLONEL COIT, IN A SKIRMISH AT BARRIO DE LAS PALMAS ON THE ROAD TO CAYEY.

Drawn by T. de Thulstrup from a Sketch by T. Dart Walker, Special Artist for "Harper's Weekly" with General Miles's Forces.—[See Page 897.]

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

HARPER'S WEEKLY

(TWENTY-FOUR PAGES)

NEW YORK CITY, SEPTEMBER 10, 1898

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS

New York City: Franklin Square

IT is evident from the statement by Dr. SENN, and from the conclusions reached by the corps of surgeons at the camp, that Montauk ought to be abandoned at once. Both Dr. SENN and Dr. EDSON unite in saying that if the camp remain, there will be an outbreak of typhoid more terrible than the country has ever yet known. The abandonment of this camp is entirely within the power of the War Department.

WE wish to call attention to the letter on Montauk Point which will be found in another column. The charges which have been made against the officers of the Seventy-first Regiment are of so grave a character that they must not be overlooked. The United States government is the only power which can adequately punish men guilty of such offences as have been charged against these officers. In order that punishment may be meted out, if it be deserved, this regiment should not be mustered out until a thorough investigation has been had of all the charges made against its officers. Meantime, of course, the men can remain at home, but the United States should keep control until punishment has been administered, or until it has been proved that punishment is not deserved.

THE new development in the DREYFUS case is a severe blow to the French army and to the French nation. It was already known that DREYFUS was convicted on secret testimony, and now it turns out that part of this secret testimony was forged by Colonel HENRY for the protection of the headquarters staff. HENRY has committed suicide, and General BOISDEFFRE, the head of the staff and the president of the DREYFUS court martial, has resigned. The world knows that DREYFUS has not been proved guilty, and that the army has insisted that the nation should do him the injustice for the protection of the army itself against suspicion of general corruption and even of treason.

WE regret exceedingly that Mr. HOAR does not find the English embassy desirable or practicable. Mr. HAY ought to have a worthy successor, because he himself is a worthy successor to Mr. LOWELL, Mr. PHELPS, and Mr. BAYARD, and Senator HOAR is qualified before almost any one else in the Republican party to take a place in this group of worthy representatives of the republic. But this lesson, at least, we learn from one of the reasons given, whether with truth or not we do not know, for his refusal to consider President MCKINLEY'S offer to him: Must we always find our worthy ambassadors to the Court of St. James among rich men, or will the nation some day pay a sufficient compensation to its representative to enable a poor man to accept its honors and its duties?

WE are glad to learn that Secretary LONG and the Navy Department are intending to do something to reform the grotesque character of the present methods of rewarding officers. As the WEEKLY has pointed out, there is no way at present to promote a naval officer for worthy service except at the expense of his brother officers. We have received several communications on this subject, and the country at large, which is interested in the navy, seems to feel that the government ought itself to pay its heroes, and should not charge their reward upon presumably equally capable officers who have not had an opportunity to distinguish themselves. Mr. LONG, we understand, proposes a roll of honor for the promoted men and an increase of their pay. This is well. Another way would be to group the promoted officer with an officer at the time several numbers ahead of him, both going up together. Some way certainly might be found better than the present way. We are sure that Congress is mistaken in supposing that the country would object to paying the bill of its own gratitude.

GENERAL WOOD is making excellent use of his authority over the district of Santiago. His first aim has been to enforce order and restore confidence, and then to establish an American school system as far as conditions would permit. He has increased the number of the police, and reduced the salaries of a number of officials who were very expensive and little more than ornamental. His reform of the schools is admirable. It was found that functionaries known as school commissioners were getting most of the pay for comparatively little work, while miserably underpaid teachers were giving such defective instruction as their training fitted them for. General WOOD has increased the salaries of the teachers, and provided for the teaching of the English language therein. These changes may be unpalatable at first to Spanish and Cuban prejudice and indolence, but with experience will come a gradual consciousness of what intelligent citizenship means. It has been noticed already that new energy seems to have been diffused among the inhabitants of the city, and that even the daily siesta seems to have been given up INFORMATION given by our consular reports on the character of Eastern markets is especially valuable just now, when American trade interests demand the closest attention if they are to succeed in the international competition going on. Some of these reports give exhaustive analyses of German and French methods, awarding the superiority generally to the former. The German government sends out commissions of experts with the object of examining Chinese and Japanese markets, the peculiarities of taste in fabrics, the manner of packing goods, and the terms of credit most satisfactory to the purchasers. French methods are very similar, though not marked by an equal thoroughness in detail. The lesson most clearly taught by the success of the Germans and the French seems to be the necessity of employing commercial travellers who are thoroughly acquainted with the minutiæ of foreign trade needs, and who are trained adepts in the science of export trade. In Germany there are departments in commercial schools specially devoted to this purpose. It would seem that we must follow in a similar path if the best results are to be obtained.

OUR London letter of this week is of exceptional interest. Lord CHARLES BERESFORD'S mission to China is of great moment to the United States. There is no doubt that China is the most important of the unexplored territories of the earth, so far as commerce is concerned. The civilized world has never lived on very familiar terms with this great empire, but the advantages that have been obtained there have resulted from the skill and enterprise of British and American negotiators and merchants. The equal footing upon which all nations now stand with respect to that part of China opened to trade is threatened by Russia. The dominance of Russia, or the dominance of Germany or of France, wherever these nations make colonies, means an effort to establish exclusive trade with that colony for the mother-country. Our trade and British trade with China mean the trade of the "open door," at least for that part of the country which is controlled by Great Britain or by the United States. It is to promote and foster such interests as ours that Lord CHARLES BERESFORD has gone to China. We have reason to believe that his mission is of far greater importance than appears on the surface. The merchants and the government of the United States ought to watch his effort with great interest, and manifest for it the deepest sympathy.

THE responsibility for the wrongs that have been done our soldiers is widespread. For example, we refer to the report of General H. V. BOYNTON, a most intelligent and courageous officer, and an absolutely trustworthy man. General BOYNTON attributes a good deal of the sickness at Camp Thomas to the ignorance of the volunteer officers, and to their failure to enforce sanitary regulations prescribed by the doctors. The consequences were that the men drank polluted water, that sinks were put dangerously near to camps (in one case a sink being within thirty feet of the kitchen). In another case, that of the Ninth Pennsylvania, the sinks were so constructed that the overflow caused by rain spread over the camp. General BOYNTON also describes what he calls "the unspeakably filthy condition" of the camp of the First Illinois. The advice of the surgeons to pitch tents where they could be moved backward and forward, so that the sun might get at the bedding, was almost absolutely neglected. There was also an inadequate supply of surgeons, the result being cases of apparent cruelty, since it was absolutely impossible for the surgeons to make a thorough examination of the men applying for attention. All these facts are reminders of the still greater fact that when we went into the war we were unprepared for it, and that we did not take the time or the proper precautions to minimize the consequences of our unprepared state. But in view of these facts, why are not charges preferred by General BOYNTON or some one else?

THE other day a regular soldier of the United States army, speaking of the new uniform which he had on, and in reply to a question as to whether the government would charge him for it, his old uniform having been ruined in Cuba, said: "The government hasn't anything to do with this, Miss HELEN GOULD gave me this." We are glad that some one has given the soldiers of the United States army decent clothes and needed food. We spoke last week of the appeal made by General YOUNG in behalf of the regulars. It has been responded to by the merchants of this city, who sent to Camp Wikoff a boat-load of provisions, the boat also having been provided free of expense for the purpose. Large quantities of milk and of other delicacies, or necessaries, are also daily furnished to the soldiers. But nearly all the improvement that has thus far taken place at Camp Wikoff is due to private charity. Let this be remembered when we consider the subject, for it will not be wise to conclude that the government has accomplished many reforms. The government thus far has been an object of charity. Its soldiers are clothed and fed by private generosity. The government is rich and powerful, and ought to do all these things itself. It is just as disgraceful for it to be the object of charity as it is for a private citizen to accept alms. But the trouble is that the government has not intelligence enough to employ efficiently its great resources in the ordinary work of feeding and clothing its servants who have fought for it in the field. It is relieved of this task by good men and good women, who will always have to perform it so long as Congress insists upon controlling and commanding the army.

THE HORRORS OF OUR WAR.

THE country has had its war and its victory, and is now horrified at the consequences of army incompetency and mismanagement. We have had our glory, and are finding out the terrible cost of it. The other day the remnant of the Seventy-first Regiment which was spared by war and disease came home to recover or to die. The men who rode could not have walked from the Battery to their armory without disastrous consequences. The regiment went to the war 1043 strong. It lost 14 killed in battle, and 64 were wounded, and 331 were in line or in the cars. The rest were dead, or on furlough, or in hospital in Cuba and at Camp Wikoff, and those who returned were, most of them, gaunt and yellow images of the men they had been, some of them so weak that they wept because of the kindness of their reception, while others stared at the cheering crowds with the wild strange look of men to whom the things of earth are of little moment. The condition of affairs at Camp Wikoff, and especially in this regiment, may be learned from a private letter and an article which will be found elsewhere in this paper.

A terrible episode has occurred in the history of the country—an episode so criminal that the glory of war and victory has been dimmed by the wrath caused by the wrongs and sufferings of the soldiers who have fought the war and achieved the glory. We are seeing the other side of war, and it is even more terrible than it ought to be. Thirty-three years ago we saw the soldiers coming home after a war that had endured for four years. Many of them had lived in camps and fought over fields from which the skeletons of to-day are carried to the hospital. We saw the veterans of that great conflict march home. Their ranks were thin. Some companies brought back a file or two led by a non-commissioned officer. Some men rode in carriages; but they were wounded men, not men sick with fevers. The men who marched moved with the vigorous stride of health. In that day we did not see such ghastly reminders of the war as we are seeing now in camp and on the return of the men who enlisted for the war, unless we saw the victims of Southern prisons. Then we saw men starved because their captors had nothing for them. Now we see men starved and fever-stricken because their government has not the capacity to take care of them, and even seems indifferent to their suffering.

The sufferings of our soldiers must not be forgotten. If the people of the country permit this scandal to find a grave before some one is punished, they will thereby make themselves accomplices in the crime. What has happened? An army of 250,000 men has been raised. A successful campaign has been fought in Cuba with one corps. A triumphal progress has been made in Puerto

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Rico by General MILES. Manila has been captured by Admiral DEWEY with the aid of troops under General MERRITT. The losses upon the field of battle were almost nothing. The ravages of disease and the hardships of the men by reason of neglect, of lack of food so great that men have died of starvation, of want of proper clothing, of insufficient tentage, are hideous; and the evil is still existing; in some quarters it is even spreading. Moreover, it is not confined to the troops who fought in Cuba. The men who were encamped in Florida and at Chickamauga are the victims of starvation and of disease-breeding conditions that were entirely preventable. If we should say that the government is returning to the people an army rotting with disease, we should not greatly exaggerate. And this is absolutely true, that nothing that we have gained is worth the sacrifice which our men have suffered for it, for nothing which we have gained would have been lost if we had waited to take it until the army in all its branches was prepared for the adventure.

Who is responsible for it all? That is a question much more easily asked than answered. The country is accusing the Secretary of War, and, in its rage against him, is in danger of overlooking criminals more directly responsible, and something of much greater consequence than is the guilt of any individual. Probably Mr. ALGER'S own attitude towards his accusers increases the anger against him. It will not do to deny that exceptional and unnecessary evils of misery have been inflicted upon the soldiers, and that these are the results of incompetency and of lack of preparation. It is not an excuse for the wretched conditions of camps and hospitals, for deaths due to neglect and starvation, that the War Department has actually accomplished a wonderful amount of work. This attitude makes Mr. ALGER appear indifferent to the sufferings of the soldiers, and we do not believe that he is indifferent. He is doubtless suffering more than many of his accusers. But there must be an investigation, and Mr. ALGER should encourage it, although he is perfectly right in refusing to order it. The President must order it, and it should not be conducted by interested persons. The President can appoint a commission of his own. Such a commission, it seems to us, ought to be composed of the best and most experienced officers of the regular army, sanitary experts, and private citizens of marked business and legal ability. It should be a commission on army affairs, and should have authority to go to the bottom of the trouble. Above all, it should not be composed of Congressmen, and a Congressional investigation should be discouraged; for the great criminal in this matter is Congress, and the master-evil—the evil that makes an efficient army in this country absolutely impossible—is the system of army administration which has resulted from Congressional command.

The fact that we have medical, quartermaster, and commissary departments inadequate to the task of emergencies is due to Congressional penuriousness. The fact that the staff corps are filled up with the sons of politicians and with the favorites of politicians is due to the greed of politicians—a greed whose indulgence in time of war is perilously near treason. The fact that red tape so effectually ties up, hampers, and limits the activities of administrative officers of the army is due to Congressional meddling. So petty, so minute, so foolish, is the control over the army exercised by Congress that if a commissary should replace to a soldier the ration thrown away in the heat of a fight, he would do so at his own risk, and very likely would have to go to Congress for an appropriation to reimburse him. This is an example of the character of Congressional administration. Congress commands the land forces of the government, and it is responsible for the system which makes inevitable inefficient staff departments, and which compels the President to employ in war hundreds of inexperienced civilians to do work that requires military training and experience.

Having an army consisting of a line that has shown itself the peer of any fighting line of equal size in the world, with a staff that had no experience in administration of large affairs, and that was deficient in personnel and material; having so little ammunition that, six weeks after the war broke out, there were only five shots in the best furnished fort in New York Harbor; having an artillery force to which it had refused the necessary funds for learning how to fire its guns; having guns without carriages and forts without range-finders; having too little smokeless powder; being unprepared in almost every respect but in the possession of a score of thousand fighting-men, and even refusing to make further provision—Congress plunged the country into war. In this it was helped by the yellow journals; and Congress and the yellow journals, not content with declaring war, insisted that the campaign should be begun without artillery, without proper means for transportation, without a sufficient number of trained medical, quartermaster, and commissary officers; without means for distributing the medical and food supplies, which had been in some places abundantly provided by the authorities at Washington. Without proper clothing or proper food for the tropics, the troops were rushed into Cuba, under a commander incompetent to do what might have been done to remedy the evils, and, after a free fight against a weak enemy, Santiago was taken, and disease and famine entered upon their perfect work. The signs now are that this war will breed more scandal than glory. The WEEKLY, both editorially and in a letter written by Mr. POULTNEY BIGELOW, was the first to warn the government of the direful consequences that would necessarily result from this state of things, and we greatly regret that our own and Mr. BIGELOW'S forebodings have turned out to be true. The responsibility for the crime rests so heavily upon the authors of the war that their delinquencies must be exposed. Punish the guilty administrative officers, of course, but let not the many-headed criminal escape. It has been proved that, as this government is organized, it cannot carry on war. To rush it into war, then, was horrible; but be it borne in mind that, so long as Congress rules the army, the first days of any war into which we may enter will end in such horrors, in such crimes, as those which are to-day filling our hearts with wrath.

POLITICS IN NEW YORK AND CONNECTICUT.

THE Republicans of New York and Connecticut have this year the opportunity of showing what the war has done towards purifying their politics. We have already expressed our opinion concerning the candidacy of Colonel ROOSEVELT in New York State. Sometimes Mr. PLATT seems to be in favor of his nomination, sometimes he seems to be against it. It is disgraceful that he should control it, and that he does control it under existing conditions is well known. Suppose that PLATT finally decides against the nomination of Mr. ROOSEVELT, is there virtue enough in the Republican party of the State of New York to overthrow PLATT and compel his nomination? It is not even necessary in order to accomplish this that the Republicans of the State should control the primaries. If they express their opinion strongly enough, and if they insist that Colonel ROOSEVELT shall be nominated, PLATT will be forced to yield.

There is also an opportunity, as we have already stated, open to the Republicans of Connecticut. An admirable candidate is in the field in the person of Mr. JOHN ADDISON PORTER, private secretary to the President. Mr. PORTER is especially well circumstanced. Party regularity, according to the traditions of the Republicans of Connecticut, demands his nomination. Mr. PORTER has been diligent in honorable party work. He has performed excellent service as a member of the House of Representatives of the State, and in various other positions, including his present honorable office. Above all, he is a man admirably equipped for the office of Governor, and would carry into it high purpose and a resolution to correct abuses and put an end to the corruption that has made the State a byword. But it is just at this point that the opposition begins. The Republican party of the State of Connecticut is under the control of as miserable a set of creatures as ever disgraced modern politics. The bosses are many, and every one of them is infinitely mean. For a number of years the two Senators from the State, Senators HAWLEY and PLATT, have been among the very few thoroughly honorable men connected with Republican party politics. It has been the custom of the Republican politicians of the State to buy nominations and elections, and it is openly charged by some of the best men in the State that if Mr. GEORGE LOUNSBURY this year secures the nomination for Governor instead of Mr. PORTER, it will be by reason of the corrupt use of money. We do not know whether or not this accusation is true, but it is almost universally believed throughout the State. On the other hand, Mr. PORTER, although a man of means, has absolutely refused to make use of money in politics for anything but legitimate expenses; he has declined to promise ex-Governor BULKLEY to remove the present insurance commissioner in case he is elected, the fault of the insurance commissioner apparently having been that he compelled BULKLEY'S company to pay over several hundred thousand dollars to the State. Mr. PORTER has not only refused to make this promise to BULKLEY, but he has declined to make any promises whatever, or, as we have already stated, to expend any money to secure his nomination or election. If he be defeated, it will be because he stands for pure politics, for hostility to the corrupt Republican machine of the State. The Republicans of Connecticut can prevent his defeat and the triumph of the machine if they are virtuous enough to seize their opportunity.

These two opportunities for the Republican voters to show that they have been inspired to better impulses by the war, and by the excitation of their patriotic feelings, come at an opportune time.

"THE ARMED CAMP."

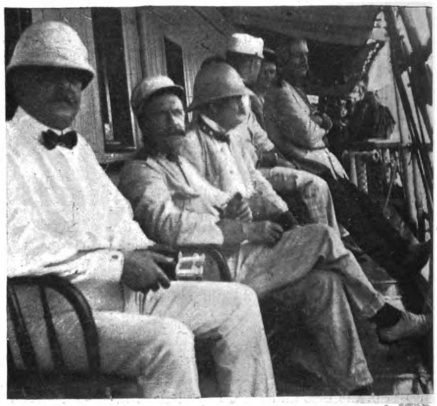
THERE have been many proposals for universal disarmament before now, but never one from such a significant quarter. Peace congresses, philanthropists, philosophers, enthusiasts, poets, have all had their say on the subject, but not until now has a decisive word come from a monarch with the power to advance as well as a temperament to applaud the old ideal. And from no other ruler on this earth to-day could that word have come with half the sobering weight as from the Czar of Russia. Only yesterday it seemed as though the great Slav Empire threatened danger to the peace of the world. Her successes in China were being pushed to the very brink of war with Great Britain; her policy was the object of profoundest suspicion; and nine out of every ten men were saying that the trial of strength was come at last, and that Russia had brought it on. A fortnight ago one would have as soon expected universal suffrage from Hungary as universal peace from Russia. And in the midst of this tumult, the very cause of it comes calmly forward with a plea for an international conference on furling the battle-flags and beating the swords into pruning-hooks! That, if you like, is reformation in a flood.

"It will lead to nothing," says the wise world, which does not much believe in these sudden repentances. "It is only the rhapsody of a sentimental young man, who has probably been reading TOLSTOI on the sly. Russia, which is not the Czar, doesn't really mean it. Obviously it is just a dodge to gain time, and we shall hear no more of it when the railroad reaches Port Arthur. And for the rest, what country is willing to begin the disarmament? Not Germany, till her flag is flying from an Adriatic port. Not France, while Alsace-Lorraine goads her like a poisoned thorn. Not England, while she has still an empire to protect. Who then? Italy perhaps, and possibly Denmark and Belgium; but no one else. And even supposing the really important powers were to agree to forego all their ambitions, and spend no more money on national defence, who would look to it that they kept their pledge? Who would be the general overseer of the nations? What authority could prevent them from building more ships, and adding battalion to battalion? The thing is impossible. Like all your visionary dreams, it cuts pedantically at the strongest passion in human nature, at history, at the elemental facts of life. It can never be realized."

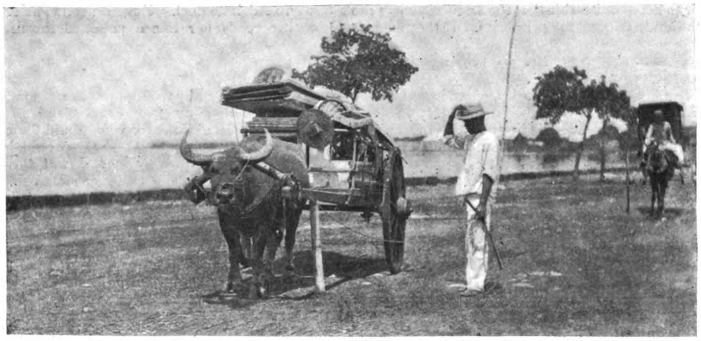
It may be so; the poet's Utopia may not in our time descend upon the world. But this much at least is certain, that during the last eighty years the settlement of national differences otherwise than by the sword has grown more and more in favor. Every year sees a greater unwillingness to let loose the dogs of war. Disputes which a century ago would have made an unquestionable casus belli, are now referred, almost as a matter of course, to the decision of arbitrators. What is the Quebec Conference, now sitting at our very doors, but a sign of this spirit of mercy and good sense? What was the recent Anglo-French West-African Boundary Commission but another triumph for the cause of international reasonableness? The last forty-five years of the world's history have barely known a clear twelve months of peace, yet through them all the sentiment of the times has moved away from the crudeness, and usually futile barbarity, of war towards a quieter and more humane solution.

The Czar's invitation is addressed primarily to Europe, and not to us. Five years ago we should have been the first to respond in sympathy with his note. To-day it is not a little odd that from the country with such a record of aggressiveness as Russia there should come a proposal for universal peace just at the moment when the United States, which has always stood as the very antithesis of Continental militarism, is recklessly plunging into imperialism and its inevitable accompaniments. The country is not in the mood at present to appreciate disarmament. Imperialism has not yet shown its true face.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

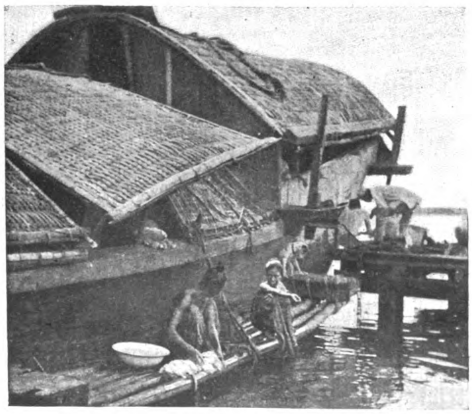


TWO-STORY TENT OF CALIFORNIA TROOPS, CAMP DEWEY.

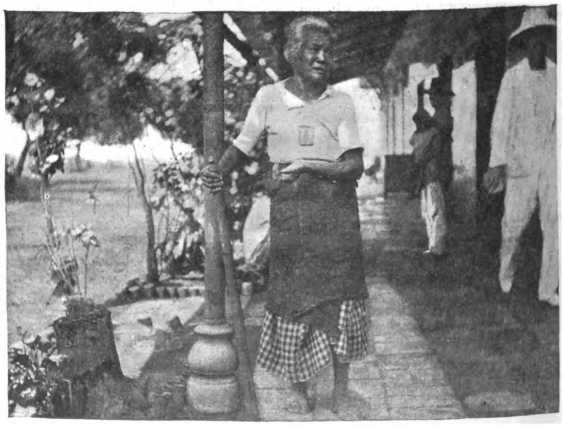


ENCAMPMENT OF COLORADO TROOPS, CAMP DEWEY.

GENERAL MERRITT AND STAFF ON THE BEACH AT TAMBO.



GENERAL MERRITT AND OFFICERS ON TRANSPORT "NEWPORT," APPROACHING MANILA.

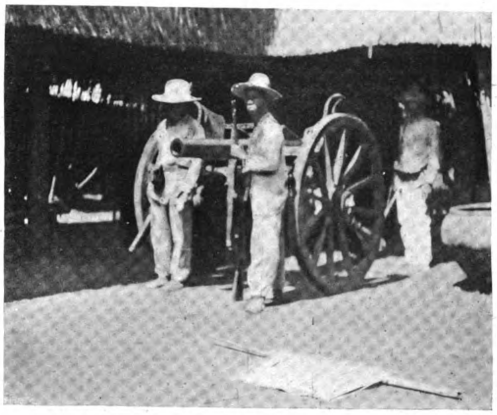


NATIVE BULLOCK-CART LOADED WITH LOOT FROM A SPANISH CHURCH.

TAGALO WATER-CARRIER.

WOMEN OF A CASCO WASHING CLOTHES IN THE BAY.

BEGGAR-WOMAN, CAVITE.



WITH OUR TROOPS IN THE PHILIPPINES.

PHOTOGRAPHS BY MESSRS. MILLET, BASS, AND DAVIS, SPECIAL CORRESPONDENTS FOR "HARPER'S WEEKLY."—[SEE PAGE 898.]

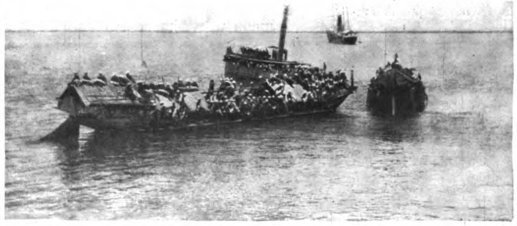
Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

SMOOTH-BORE GUN MOUNTED IN INSURGENT TRENCHES.

SPANISH FIELD-PIECE CAPTURED BY INSURGENTS.

GENERAL F. V. GREENE'S HEADQUARTERS.

IN THE INSURGENT TRENCHES.



UNDER FIRE IN THE INSURGENT TRENCHES.

SEÑOR TORRES, SECRETARY TO AGUINALDO.

TROOPS JUST ARRIVED AT CAMP DEWEY.

"RAPIDO" TOWING CASCOS WITH NEBRASKA TROOPS ASHORE FROM TRANSPORT "SENATOR."

NEBRASKA TROOPS DEBARKING AND MOVING TO CAMP DEWEY.

WITH OUR TROOPS IN THE PHILIPPINES.

Photographs by Messrs. Bass and Davis, Special Correspondents for "Harper's Weekly."—[See Page 898.]

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THIS BUSY WORLD

The anti-vaccination movement in England seems to be enjoying at least a temporary success. A bill lately passed to a third reading in the House of Commons which provides that "no parent or other person shall be liable to any penalty under the vaccination act of 1867 if he satisfies justices in petty sessions that he conscientiously believes vaccination would be prejudicial to the health of the child."

This bill, if it becomes a law, will of course do away with compulsory vaccination. Now compulsory vaccination is a considerable hardship for persons who object to it. It is well known that out of thousands of cases of vaccination there are a very few that result disastrously. Children have been poisoned by vaccination, and have died or suffered from painful diseases. The opponents of vaccination make the most of these cases, and tell extremely terrifying stories about them, maintaining that compulsory vaccination is an outrage on human rights, and a bigoted and cowardly concession to the opinions of doctors.

LIEUT. W. E. SHIPP,
10th U. S. Cavalry—A Victim of the Battle of San Juan.

It is without doubt an infringement upon personal rights, and only one thing can justify it. That thing is small-pox. At present vaccination has driven small-pox out of existence in civilized countries. Ordinarily there is none in sight, and the anti-vaccinationists have only a traditional bugaboo to fight. It seems hardly a matter of very serious concern whether their objections prevail or not. If they defeat compulsory vaccination, and small-pox returns, some lives will be lost and the public health will suffer. But once small-pox makes a little headway again, the inconveniences and risks of vaccination will seem so petty by comparison that compulsory vaccination will come back with a rush.

Every generation inclines to demand that it shall have its own experiences. We all know, as a historical fact, that war is dreadful and disastrous, but in its absence, when protracted, its terrors fade and its incidental glories brighten, so that some folks who have never seen a war begin to feel that they are not getting their due. When the public mind takes that turn, war is apt to ensue. It may be so in some degree with small-pox, though, Heaven knows, there is no glory in small-pox: no sport, no spoils—nothing but scars.

General Merritt and his staff, who are reported to have started for home on their way to Paris, are finding a very large proportion of excursion in their military experience. As far as seeing the world goes, their service seems to be proving a very comprehensive success. They have journeyed across our own continent, tested the interesting features of life in San Francisco, navigated the Pacific, visited Honolulu, and seen all there was on exhibition in Manila, including its surrender. Now, before life in the Philippines has lost any of its novelty, they come hurrying back, cross again a country which will be very greatly interested to see them and hear all they have to tell, and hie them swiftly on to Paris to see how the Europeans compare with the Asiatics. There is no reason to think that General Merritt is at all pleased to be called home, or anticipates any pleasure in helping our peace commissioners higgle over the terms of peace, but there is no question that when he finally gets home he will be like the New Bedford whaler, of familiar memory, in having had a durn fine sail.

The Zionists met again this year, on the last three days of August, at Basle, Switzerland. Not much has been written about them since their first international congress, in August a year ago, and some readers may have forgotten that they are Jews who have at heart the reinstatement of the Jewish people in control of Palestine. Nine delegates went to the congress from this country this year, among them Professor Richard Gottheil, of Columbia University, the Rev. Philip Klein, and Dr. Stephen A. Wise. The work before the convention this year was the organization of an administrative bureau, and, among other things, the promotion of the Zionist bank. The purpose of this bank is to encourage Jewish industries, especially agriculture, in Palestine; to promote colonization, and arrange for the purchase of farm-lands and the disposition of produce. It is reported that large lots of the shares of the bank have been subscribed for at $5 a share, and that companies have been organized in various places for the importation of Palestinian products. The project abounds in romantic interest, and if any considerable practical results come of it, all Christendom will watch them with lively curiosity. It should be possible to distribute the financial burdens of the scheme among so many share-takers that an experiment may have a fair trial without involving any of its supporters in very serious risks.

If the supply of newspapers for our camps is in any way commensurate with what we must suppose the demand to be, Uncle Sam, in his capacity of boarding-housekeeper, is not at all to be envied. The mind of man is too prone anyway to take kindly to complaints about food. With real hardships enough to stimulate their natural tendencies towards fault-finding, our heroes are now egged on to extra-strenuous efforts in that direction by the hourly assurances of nearly all the papers in the country that they are starved, neglected, and miscellaneously mismanaged. It must appear in the camps just now as if a soldier's whole duty was to distrust authority, reject his food, bewail his fate, and demand to be sent home. How discipline holds out under such conditions it will be interesting to observe, and if serious lapses of it should be reported, it will hardly be more (as a respected contemporary would say) than "any educated person would expect." There are those who say that it is impossible to improvise at short notice an organization that is fit to take proper care of armies, and that the complaints we hear now of maladministration were just as prevalent in the first year of the civil war, and abounded with equal venom in the Crimean war. It may be that finally the wise men will tell us that the choice to which we are limited is between maintaining a considerable standing army and having a disastrous experience whenever we try to collect a large army of volunteers.

Mr. Israel Zangwill, British author, has come to this country, and it is understood that his purpose is to lecture here. Persons who come here from Great Britain with that intention may be conveniently divided into those who have edifying information to impart and those who have long hair. Mr. Zangwill's hair is worn comparatively short. Certainly it is not of a spectacular length, and is not catalogued in prospectuses as the mainstay of his attractions. He does not rank yet as a great author, but he is known as a good and substantial story-teller, and the owner of a mind whose operations are of considerable interest. If he does lecture here, he will undoubtedly impart a good many ideas that are worth assimilating.

No doubt the results of the war include many deaths that were as sad as that of Lieutenant William Tiffany, of the Rough Riders, but Mr. Tiffany was so well known "in society," and consequently to newspaper readers, that the untimeliness of his taking off has been especially appreciated and deplored. He was a gallant young fellow, well known in New York, who had progressed to that stage in life where the future seemed full of delights and advantages. He died, after returning from Santiago, on August 25, at the Parker House in Boston, and was buried on August 29 at Newport. Sometimes there are consolations in a funeral, and especially in a military funeral. The accounts that the newspapers give of Lieutenant Tiffany's funeral leave the impression that it was a particularly satisfying and consoling ceremony. His near friends and relatives were present. The Newport Artillery, and the officers of the Forty-seventh New York from Fort Adams, were there; Colonel Roosevelt and Colonel Astor walked ahead of the hearse, and the bearers were Rough Riders under Captain Woodbury Kane. When the interment came, Colonel Roosevelt stood, with sword drawn, at the head of the grave while it was being filled. Then the Rough Riders fired three volleys over it, and the bugler sounded taps. A military funeral is not in itself by any means worth dying for, but it is remarkably effective, and even triumphant, especially when, as in Lieutenant Tiffany's case, it is strongly felt. In his case, too, the conditions were unusual, for he was buried at home by men who had been his comrades in arms in a campaign across the seas that was very memorable and very recent.

It is gratifying to learn from the report of the stated clerk of the Presbyterian General Assembly that, in spite of heretics, church members who sign petitions for liquor licenses, and stiff-necked college presidents who resent interference, the Presbyterian Church in the United States is making steady progress. During the last year it has increased 14,623 in the number of its communicants, 9702 in Sunday-school members, and $185,910 in contributions, and has decreased 272 in the number of candidates for the ministry. These figures must be very satisfactory to the Presbyterians. The falling off in candidates for the ministry seems a little odd, but that may easily be for the good of the church, since every one knows that many of its recent embarrassments have concerned candidates, and their willingness or unwillingness to accept the doctrinal views of the fathers. As long as the contract-labor law does not hinder the importation of ministers from Scotland and Ireland, the falling off in candidates won't matter much.

It was very graceful in Sir Thomas Lipton to send a contribution of $10,000 for the relief of the sick and wounded American soldiers. Funds are not absolutely lacking for that purpose, and it cannot be said that Sir Thomas's gift was needed, but it shows a spirit and a sentiment towards this country which it is very agreeable to observe, and especially agreeable to find in a challenger for the America's cup. There really seems to be a prospect that the next international yacht-race will be a joyous occurrence, and a promoter of good-will and friendly rivalry. Sir Thomas's gift was made through the New York Society of the Sons of the American Revolution.

It may not be generally recalled that Sir Thomas Lipton came to this country last spring on the Campania, and was the chief instigator of the remarkable doings aboard that vessel, when all the first and second cabin passengers joined in an Anglo-American banquet in the main saloon. He has left no corner of room for doubt about the sincerity of his desire to promote the friendliest possible relations between our country and his.

A contemporary citizen who reads the WEEKLY remarks that in his walks abroad and his little journeys about the country he finds himself spontaneously comparing and measuring folks and experiences by war standards. He looks at the stout conductor on the train and wonders whether a man of his weight was too fat to enlist; he looks over his fellow-passengers in the steam-cars or the street cars and wonders if it was the like of them that captured Santiago; he sizes up individual men, wondering how much of a march they could stand, and what effect camp life would have on them. Wherever he sees his fellow-creatures he asks himself how far they are typical Americans, what sort of soldiers the men would make, what sort of fighting-men the sons of the women whom he sees would prove, and how the men and the women probably compare with the general run of folks in England or Germany or France or Spain. If he snatches a hasty meal at a lunch-counter or a railway restaurant, he wonders whether our soldiers in the field really suffer greater hardships than that. When his usual meals exhibit imperfections, his reflection is, "If food prepared under favorable conditions for one or two persons can sustain such maltreatment, what results should one expect in food prepared for whole regiments by green cooks working at a great disadvantage?" Finally, when he sees men in uniform (and they are prevalent everywhere just now) he looks them over with the liveliest interest, his usual unuttered comment being, "How young they are!" or, "How used up they look, poor things!"

The war has made us think of many new things, and has led us to reflections and comparisons and ruminations which we are not used to. Undoubtedly, whatever the final result of it may be, it will result in an enlargement of our minds and ideas which will not be without its meed of profit.

Teetotalers will find a strong argument in favor of their attitude on the drink question in the recent report of James Meikle, actuary, of Birmingham, England, on the comparative value of abstainers and non-abstainers as subjects for life-insurance. The report, according to a summary of it which is given by the New York Evening Post, is very favorable to the abstainers, and indicates that their lives should be insured at lower rates than those of their brethren who imbibe. Out of a large number of lives which Mr. Meikle drew conclusions from, he found that between the ages of twenty-five and thirty-four only a little more than half as many abstainers died as the actuaries' tables gave reason to expect; between thirty-five and forty-four only about a third (34.4 per cent.) as many as was expected; between forty-five and fifty-four only half as many. It is pointed out that the report is not so conclusive as it seems against a moderate use of alcohol, because the class of drinkers includes not only all the truly moderate drinkers, but a good many immoderate ones. What sort of a showing the non-abstainers whose habits are really good would make alongside of the abstainers does not appear, and is not likely to be officially disclosed, because of the obvious difficulty of discriminating between the discreet drinkers and the others. The insurance companies can learn from their patrons whether they are abstainers or not, but not whether they are really moderate in their potations or tend to indiscretion. So far as it goes, however, Mr. Meikle's report certainly indicates that alcohol is not generally useful to sustain and prolong life. That much is pretty generally admitted nowadays by candid contemporaries, whether they drink or not. It is not claimed any longer that John Barleycorn in any of his disguises will benefit persons who are in good health. The most that is said is that stimulants are often exceedingly useful in sickness, and that well persons can drink a good deal first and last without injury, provided they are able to exercise constant discrimination about what they drink, and how much, and when. There used to be very many persons about who sincerely believed that a fair amount of habitual alcohol would "do you good." Persons who are of that opinion are scarcer now. Most drinkers of our day drink because it gives them pleasure, but without any illusion about deriving benefit from it. Either they don't care whether it is good for them or not, or they feel able to determine how much they can drink without serious risk of injury.

The extreme advocates of abstinence fall short in one particular—in that they do not recognize, or at least do not admit, that a very large proportion of the population does its drinking with considerable success. The average intelligent citizen is neither a professed abstainer nor a victim of drink. He drinks when he chooses and what he chooses, but his choice most of the time is to drink tea, coffee, or water. He has work to do every day, and he regulates his potations just as he does his food, with a view to keeping himself in condition to accomplish his daily task with the least inconvenience.

JUDGE W. F. FREAR, OF CALIFORNIA,
One of the five Hawaiian Commissioners appointed by the President.

Tolstoi's seventieth birthday is to be celebrated in New York, on September 8, by a dinner at the Hotel St. Denis. The committee that is responsible for the demonstration includes Dr. Lyman Abbott, Mr. Howells, Mr. Henry M. Alden, Mr. Hamilton Mabie, Mr. R. W. Gilder, and other eminent and discerning gentlemen. Tolstoi is not so much read in this country as he was ten years ago, but that is partly because he was so thoroughly and widely read at that time, when the American translations of his

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148 great books came out in rapid succession, and were new to us. It is probable that some of the gentlemen at the dinner in his honor will speak of him as the greatest of living novelists. His right to that distinction will not be readily disproved. He has written very much on religious and social subjects to which the majority of his admirers in this country by no means subscribe; but about his great novels—War and Peace, Anna Karénina, and the like—there is a pretty general unanimity of opinion that they are surpassingly important additions to the world's literature. It was a happy idea to make this formal recognition upon his birthday of what the readers and the writers of this country owe him.
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

With so much that is of anxious moment going on in our own family, it is hard to pay due attention to the ailments of folks abroad, or the vicissitudes of life elsewhere. We are not disturbed, for example, about the condition of the Pope, although it is well known that his hold on life is no longer strong, and that any sudden flutter may loosen it for all time. Yet careful reports of his condition are published from time to time in our newspapers, and one of them—a recent one—commented on the interesting circumstance that the two latest Popes, both of whom have lived to a greater age than any of their predecessors, lived for years together shut up in the Vatican. Pius IX. was a prisoner in that enclosure for eight years; Leo XIII. has kept the same bounds for twenty years. The Vatican, though a big place, is by no means regarded as a sanatorium, and the earlier Popes used to leave Rome in summer and go to the hills, as all the other Romans who can afford to are used to do. Yet Pius lived to be eighty-five, and Leo, already past that age, is reported to be sound, if not exactly hale, and to be so little encumbered with body or mortal superstructure that there is no telling how long his spirit may animate its frail earthly tenement. Change is doubtless a pretty good thing for the young and hardy, but the cases of these two good old Popes seem to afford a fair basis for arguing that change may not, after all, be quite so indispensable as most well-to-do persons are taught to believe. E. S. MARTIN.

LONDON.

August 20, 1898.

IN April last the readers of the WEEKLY were informed in these columns that the chief administrative post under the crown, that of the Governor-Generalship of India, was about to be filled up, and that Mr. Curzon was one of two alternative nominations contemplated by the government. The appointment has now been made, and is none the less interesting because for the first time in history an American lady becomes the head of society in India, and shares viceregal responsibility in the greatest position held by any subject of the Queen. The Viceroyalty of India is a brilliant and even a dazzling prize. This great post is generally held by elderly men—safe, sagacious, and impartial. Mr. Curzon is young. Not yet forty, he has the defects of his brilliant qualities. He is a capital debater, but is not always conciliatory or discreet. With a greater knowledge of Asiatic politics than any other Parliamentarian, the new Viceroy of India is not unlikely to become his own adviser on technical matters. He has already been everywhere, seen everybody, and knows everything. He is committed to what is known as the "forward" policy. Mr. Curzon has the reputation of Russophobe tendencies. His books are full of aspirations towards the realization of British mastery in Asia. The new Viceroy has, however, already enunciated a doctrine which commands the assent of all serious men. "I believe," he recently said, "that the security of our frontier rests not upon the number of battalions we place there, but on the individual character of the men whom we choose. It is a question not of cannon, but of character." Mr. Curzon is the eldest son of the Rev. Alfred Curzon, fourth Baron Scarsdale. There is little doubt that he will be offered a peerage without delay, but there is reason to believe that he will not accept it. His career has been one series of triumphant successes. He carried off innumerable prizes at Eton. At Oxford he made a great reputation in the schools, and was a first-rate president of the Union. He is a fine speaker, and there is but one drawback to the brilliant prospects before him. His health is bad. The dogged tenacity of his purpose in acquiring first-hand knowledge of Asiatic affairs is revealed by the fact that although he has ridden over the Indian strategic frontier and for thousands of miles in Central Asia and Persia, he never mounts a horse without suffering physical pain the whole time he is in the saddle. The spine trouble from which Mr. Curzon suffers is, however, not unlikely to be improved by a sojourn in Eastern lands. Hitherto Asia has been the best of tonics for him, and since he has youth, the command of wealth, knowledge, ability, and a charming wife, the endowment of health is, humanly speaking, the only thing required to assure success to the new Viceroy's career. The Jewish community is naturally pleased with the stately part to be played by the daughter of Mr. Levi Z. Leiter. She is compared to the Queen of Sheba.

The announcement of Mr. Curzon's appointment to the most splendid position under the crown was made in the course of the debate on the Chinese policy of the government in the House of Commons on the penultimate day of the session. The government was attacked by every speaker but one. All the ministerial declarations upon the subject of the "open door" have been contradicted by the logic of facts. England and Russia have staked their prestige against each other upon whether a Manchurian railway shall be made with English money from Tien-tsin to Niu-chwang. There was no room for compromise. The Chinese gave the concession to an English bank. The Russian acting minister at Peking is virtually Russian Resident at a mediatized court, and his veto on the concession was enough. In rejoinder Lord Salisbury authorized Sir Claude Macdonald, the British ambassador, to assure the Chinese government that England would not tolerate the interference of another power in commercial transactions freely entered into between the Chinese government and British subjects, and pledged itself to repel any attempted aggression in consequence of concessions given to British subjects. M. Pavloff, the Russian diplomat, impervious to words and impregnable to ink, repeated his orders to the Chinese, and reminded the Yamen of the notorious instability of British intentions. "The English," say the Chinese, "only make promises from the teeth outwards." Still, the British government last month announced to Russia that for commercial purposes we do not recognize spheres of influence. But, alas for the intentions of the English government, their objections to spheres of influence have followed their declarations in favor of the "open door." The English government has been promptly and successfully flouted in the test case upon which it publicly staked the prestige of England in Asia. Ministers seem incapable of acting with decision in the Far East. Equality of opportunity and treatment is jettisoned. French, Germans, Belgians, Russians, freely obtain concessions denied to Englishmen. No one really knows what the policy of the government is in China. For the second time this year, Lord Salisbury has gone abroad for his health, "in good spirits," say the newspapers. If he has a policy in China, he conceals it. The public are only able to judge by results. These are visible to the man in the street. England loses ground. Other countries gain it. Our most powerful opponent is alternately flattered and irritated. We have concentrated European suspicion and irritation against us, and the policy of "squeeze" is likely to develop into a new and more ominous phase.

On the other hand, the friends of Lord Salisbury contend that, however desirable it may be to play the strong game with Russia, it is better to suffer a diplomatic defeat of the most public, damaging, and humiliating character than to engage in a European war before the capture of Khartoum is actually achieved. There is a good deal to be said for this aspect of the case. Victory over the Khalifa is certain, so far as it can be insured by careful preparation; but a check on the Nile would require the exertion of England's full military strength, and until the possibility of a check is over it is more prudent, if not more glorious, to suffer M. Pavloff's interference with British interests in Manchuria. Lord Salisbury's government, however, went out of its way to challenge a trial of strength with Russia upon the Niu-chwang railway question. He fixed the attention of the globe upon the issue. The issue is a failure, and the echoes of the blow to English prestige will resound throughout the bazars of Asia. So far as Manchuria is concerned, the "open door" is not only slammed in our faces, but on our fingers. As the supreme sanction of diplomacy is resort to force, Sir Claude Macdonald, however able, is helpless as a village maiden. British ambassadors' weapons are words, and their words are not believed. Lord Salisbury declared months ago that England would not go to war over North China. He assented to the surrender of Port Arthur and Ta-lien-wan. He respected the desire of M. Muravieff that British men-of-war should leave Port Arthur. These acts may be wise or foolish, but the results springing from them are as inevitable as the tinkling of a bell when the knob is pressed. It was impossible to fight a pitched battle on weaker ground. The attempt to reopen the settled question of Manchuria was no less impotent than ostentatious. We have given Russia the opportunity of two triumphs, and have inflicted upon ourselves two humiliations, when one defeat would have sufficed and when none was necessary. The disaster is public, self-inflicted, injurious, and humiliating.

Parliamentary sophistry, petty debating points, and thin logic-chopping are not the weapons with which a great empire is either held or enlarged. The Times's correspondent at Peking during the last six months has virtually replaced the Foreign Office, so far as the affairs in the Far East are concerned. He has kept the people of England well informed. Almost invariably the denials of Mr. Curzon or the deprecations of Mr. Balfour have been followed within twenty-four hours by a clear, incisive telegram from Peking on the subject in dispute, which has always demonstrated that the weakness of the government is only exceeded by its ignorance of passing events. If I enter thus into detail, it is because American interests are directly concerned in the success or failure of British diplomacy on trade in China as much as those of the merchants of London and Manchester. What is unintelligible, now that the session is closed, is why the government should have made a feint of fighting on a line which it knew was untenable. Whining to Russia does not affect her. Like all semi-Oriental races, she understands peace and she understands war. She does not understand the necessity of making any arrangement, except under the conviction that superior forces will be used to constrain her to surrender the point in dispute. Drifting into the Crimean war was an object-lesson which seems to have taught no lessons to our rulers.

Whether the secret history of the time, when revealed, will vindicate Lord Salisbury, no one can tell. England is craving—strongly craving—for a leader. There never was a time since the death of the younger Pitt when a greater opportunity existed for the strong man to come to the front. The people look to the Prime Minister for leading; the minister looks to the people for light. Both are disappointed. There is no ground for complaint in the administration of the finances of the country or its navy—the two elements upon which the issue of the next international struggle in which Britain is engaged will be determined. Almost anybody who came to the front who knew his own mind, and who put his fortunes to the touch, could obtain the commanding position at the present juncture. The Opposition is impossible. The vacillation of the government is to that of their opponents as water is to wine. The nation knows it cannot turn to her Majesty's Opposition for an alternative ministry; for, except Sir Edward Grey, there is no one—unless it be Sir Charles Dilke, who is impossible on other grounds—capable of leading the nation. I recently heard one eminent statesman declare that so eager is the craving of England for a leader, that the nation would turn to a person of the type of Sir Ashmead Bartlett, who, by dint of constant repetition, persuades himself of the truth of his Jingo aspirations, rather than remain unled, humiliated, and subjected to a continued series of galling rebuffs. The issue from the present impasse will, in all probability, proceed from below, not from above, and a prediction made by the late Lord Randolph Churchill in a letter to myself is not unlikely to be accomplished. I venture to transcribe one passage of Lord Randolph's letter, as it is of special interest at the present time.

"Our land laws," he wrote, "were framed by the landed interest for the advantage of the landed interest, and foreign policy was directed by that interest to the same end. Political power passed very considerably from the landed interest to the manufacturing capitalist interest, and our whole fiscal system was shaped by this latter power to its own advantage, foreign policy being also made to coincide. We are now come, or coming fast, to a time when labor laws will be made by the labor interest for the advantage of labor. The regulation of all the conditions of labor by the state, controlled and guided by the labor vote, appears to be the ideal aimed at, and I think it extremely probable that a foreign policy which sought to extend, by tariff reforms over our colonies and even over other friendly states, the area of profitable barter of produce, will strongly commend itself to the mind of the labor interest. Personally I can discern no cause of alarm in this prospect, and I believe that on this point you and I are in perfect agreement. Labor, in this modern movement, has against it the prejudices of property, the resources of capital, and all the numerous forces—social, professional, and journalistic—which those prejudices and resources can influence."

Lord Charles Beresford's mission to China on behalf of the Chambers of Commerce is a more important step in the right direction than appears on the surface. His view is that nothing can be done with China trade, either by English or other capitalists, until due provision is made for law and order within the area in which capital is to be invested. Although this sounds like a truism, there is far more in it than meets the eye. There are two drawbacks to trade in the interior of China. The first is the danger of local disturbances; the second, the Lekin duties imposed by local mandarins for their own benefit, over and above the five-per-cent. import duty charged by the Chinese customs under the supervision of Sir Robert Hart. Lord Charles Beresford proceeds to China with a very strong backing, both financial and commercial. He has a free hand, an excellent staff, and the benevolent interest of her Majesty's government. Russian criticism against Lord Charles's mission is based on the assumption that a British admiral, who presumably knows little or nothing of commerce, is not likely to restrict his activities in China to the collection of trade statistics or the investigation of new markets. It is a fact, however, that the member for York goes to China in his private capacity, and is without any official position whatever. It is possible, of course, that the Chinese may consult Lord Charles Beresford on questions of defence and on the maintenance of law and order in the Yang-tse Valley, as they consulted General Gordon in 1879. Whatever may be the result of his mission, the American public will do well to keep an eye upon it, for in working for British trade Lord Charles Beresford is equally working for American interests. I shall not be indiscreet in mentioning the fact that Lord Charles regards his mission as one undertaken on behalf of the English-speaking race. The political and international possibilities of the Beresford mission are illimitable, and if he should succeed in paving the way to commercial development in the valley of the great Blue River, the history of Egypt may yet be repeated on a greater scale in the Far East.

It is a relief to turn from China to Egypt, where one laborious and silent strategist at the mouth of the Athara—affluent to the Nile—is approaching the day of his supreme triumph, and organizing national revenge for the memory of Gordon. Sir Herbert Kitchener is not a popular general. He keeps aloof from society and cultivates no acquaintances. He exacts from each one of his subordinates the very highest standard of good work. If that standard is not attained, the unfortunate officer is quickly sent back to Cairo or to England. When, however, the general's expectations are fulfilled, staff-officers know that they will receive due reward for energetic and tactful labor. Kitchener exacts from no one as much as from himself. Indefatigable by day and night, with an iron constitution, taciturn, ambitious, and proud, he is truly a man of blood and iron. Few people know him well. Those who have gained his confidence regard him with unbounded enthusiasm. They believe him to be capable of everything. His ambitions are enormous, and he is now marked out as the English generalissimo of the future. His victory at Khartoum will revive the fading reputation of ministers. It stands in need of a tonic. The casualty list is expected to be very heavy in the final battle, and much anxiety is felt as to whether sufficient white troops are provided. Lord Charles Beresford tells me that in his opinion victory is insured, but that the "butcher's bill" may be lamentably high.

With regard to Mr. Curzon's successor at the Foreign Office much interest is felt. The favorite prediction is that Mr. George Wyndham's services will be secured to the government. Mr. George Wyndham is considered to be the handsomest man in the House of Commons. He is member for Dover, on affectionate terms with Mr. Balfour, is married to the Countess of Grosvenor, is a Shakespearian scholar, has made a name in literature by his editorship and introductions upon North's Plutarch and the "Sonnets" of Shakespeare. Mr. Wyndham has maintained the fine traditions that once connected English politics and letters. He is no self-seeker, though no one has rendered greater service to Unionism in its days of struggle. He took no part in the vulgar push for places that occurred when the ministry was formed, and much surprise was expressed in 1895 that he was not included in the ministry. His attitude during the events that followed the Jameson raid, and his championship of Mr. Rhodes upon the commission, were indications of his Imperialistic tendencies. Still, I do not think the appointment would be a good one. Business qualifications—not literary, oratorical, political, or social—are what are chiefly lacking in the Foreign Office to-day, and its representative in the House of Commons should be rather a man in sympathy with and interested in the trade of his country than a fine specimen of the cultivated and sensitive product of literature and society. On this ground Mr. Austen Chamberlain, the son of the Colonial Secretary, who has been specially educated for such a post, and who now holds the position of Civil Lord of the Admiralty, is considered by many a preferable appointment to that of Mr. George Wyndham.

ARNOLD WHITE.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THE SICK IN PARK CARRYALLS.

THE HEAD OF THE SECOND BATTALION.

THE WELCOME AT THE ARMORY, AT THIRTY-FOURTH STREET AND PARK AVENUE—HOME AT LAST!

THE HOME-COMING OF THE 71ST NEW YORK VOLUNTEERS, AUGUST 29, 1898.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

MONTAUK POINT—VISITORS IN CAMP.—Drawn by Max F. Klepper.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

CAMP WIKOFF.

[Special Correspondence of "Harper's Weekly."]

On the Monday after the memorable flood at Johnstown, a man dropped into the press headquarters in the old plaster-mill at the end of the stone bridge over the Conemaugh, who said he had witnessed the whole catastrophe, and would tell us all about it. He said, as we newspaper men crowded around him, that he was a man who did not get excited like other people, he always kept cool, and he would tell us just how it happened. Before he had said a dozen words he went all to pieces, overwhelmed by the vivid memories of that day, and his story was never told.

I have been asked to write my impressions of our army just back from its glorious campaign in Cuba, and after three days spent at Camp Wikoff I am free to confess that the sight of those poor starved boys has put me in pretty much the same condition as that citizen of Johnstown.

When the Secretary of War arrived in camp he was agreeably disappointed, we are told, that things were no worse; but other visitors, not having the same opportunity for knowing the details of official delinquency in his department beforehand, were so shocked that the tears streamed down their cheeks—even the furrowed cheeks of old men hardened to life's blows, and of young men careless ordinarily to the hardships of others.

A big rough lineman, who had been putting up wires for the telegraph company at the camp, told me that he had shared his lunch with some poor famished soldier every day since he had been up there, "and Lord, how glad them poor lads was to git it!"

We all know the kind of men our volunteers are, for they are our neighbors, and we can call them by name often, but very few of us know or appreciate the "regulars." To do so one must see them at a time like this, worn and wasted, yet patient, and doing each one for some more helpless comrade, trying in a way that is most pitiful to see to maintain a soldierly bearing, while their limbs fail them from utter weakness.

I saw the Eighth (regulars) arrive at their camp. They came from the detention camp in army wagons. When the wagons stopped, many of the men fell headlong in attempting to get down, and lay just where they fell. One, a bugler, stood a little while swaying and dazed, and then fell in a heap by the road-side.

You will see in the official report that there are so many thousand sick. You naturally subtract that from the number in camp, and conclude the rest are well. Perhaps they are; but when I was there ten men from one company in a certain regiment were detailed for guard duty; before night seven of these men were in the hands of the doctor.

Of all the men, regulars or volunteers, that I talked with, not one had been anything but hungry for months, excepting one man of the Seventy-first New York volunteers, who told me that the men of that regiment, on the way up from Cuba on the St. Paul, got "hand-outs" from the rations of the big-hearted Jackies.

The soldiers who come up on the ordinary transports usually arrive famished. Upon arriving at the dock, they have to tramp a mile or more in heavy marching order to the detention camp. At the dock it is their good fortune to meet a kind friend. Mrs. Valentine Mott stands, day after day, early and late, with milk, beef extract, and sandwiches, to brace the poor weak fellows for their weary march over the hills.

It is, of course, impossible for the regimental surgeons to talk, except in confidence, about the lack of medicines and food before and after the fight at Santiago, on the voyage home, and here in camp, but it is also just as impossible for them to keep still about it in talking privately. The one cheerful feature of the camp is the black soldier; he, as a general thing, came through but little the worse of the pestilent climate of Cuba, and coming of a race used to privations, stood the starvation rations better than his white brother.

He is looked upon by the white soldier with positive affection and pride.

The gallant conduct of the black man, his hunting out and exterminating the sharp-shooters and guerillas who were picking off the officers and wounded from the trees, is a story that every white soldier will tell you with kindling eyes. To see the colored troopers bringing a hundred horses down to the water, singing and laughing as they swing along at a canter, is a sight pleasant to remember. Not one good word is to be heard in the whole camp for the Cuban. "Cubans! Well, if I have to go back to Cuba, I hope it 'll be to lick those horse-thieves. The Spaniards are all right; I haven't a word to say against them. In fact, we all liked the Spanish boys when we got to know them." This was what you might hear all over the camp.

One of the hardest things to look at in the camp is the meeting of a mother with the poor worn wreck of her boy. I have seen old officers walk off and grit their teeth at these meetings. A sight more bearable to see was a young girl carrying off a weak, gaunt, but happy-looking fellow to the train, trying to take from him his blanket-roll, and actually in possession of his canteen and cartridge-belt.

There is no exaggeration in the current stories of the starvation and utter neglect of these, our returning heroes.

I accompanied the two gentlemen sent up by the Merchants' Association of New York to investigate and report as to the needs of the regulars in the way of proper food for men in their condition. One of them, a newspaper man of experience, a man not to be easily shaken by what he might witness, went before the association on his return to New York, attempted to address the meeting, said a few words, then broke down and cried. It was enough, and no words of description can add to it.

It remains only to say a word of appreciation of the self-sacrificing Red Cross nurses and Sisters of Charity, who are working night and day in the hospitals, and to who are working night and day in the hospitals, and to who are working night and day that the like of the shameful spectacle of hope and pray that the like of the shameful spectacle of those poor famished lads gathered together after all their glory of achievement may never be witnessed in this country again.

W. A. Rogers.

BARBARISM AT MONTAUK.

Here is a moving letter from a young woman, describing what she saw at Montauk in her search for a brother who had enlisted in the Seventy-first New York Regiment. Its strength and sadness are beyond comment. We have not mentioned the name of the captain, but will give it to any one having authority to demand it for a proper purpose.—Ed. Harper's Weekly.

Easthampton, Long Island, August 25, 1898.

My dear Mrs. ——,—I am afraid I shall scare you with a long letter this time, for I have lots to write. I thought you would be interested to hear about Jack, and what I saw at Montauk. Sunday we got a telegram from Jack, saying he was out of detention camp, and we could see him. We went up Monday morning. Mamma and —— and I drove from here—twenty miles—and the rest went by train. We were told for Heaven's sake not to go without taking something, and we loaded up the carriage with bread and hard-boiled eggs and fruit and forty or fifty sandwiches, as well as some dozens of handkerchiefs and socks and towels. We were glad we had done so. When we got within a mile or so of camp we began to meet soldiers, both regulars and volunteers. The first I saw was a young boy—he could not have reached eighteen years—who was leaning against the fence. He was white as death, thin, with dark lines under his eyes.

I called to him, and he came walking over—not walking, shuffling like an old man. "I'm awful hungry," he said, when I asked him. His voice was low and weak, and he steadied himself against the carriage as he spoke. We gave him a good meal to take away with him. He wanted to pay us. . . .

They tell me the suffering in the regulars' camps is as great as or greater than that in the volunteers'; but I can't say myself, for I did not go beyond the lines of the Seventy-first. I saw enough there. Men lying in their tents so weak that they cannot drag their canteens toward them, though they are frantic for water. Men, aching in every bone, who have to lie on the bare ground with nothing but a poncho under them. Many of their blankets were stolen by the Cubans, and they have had no others issued to them. Big six-foot bearded fellows so weakened by illness and starvation that they burst into tears at a kind word or action. Boys sitting outside their tents with a look on their faces it is terrible to see—a fixed blank look that asks nothing, but tells an awful story of suffering and despair. It is fearful.

We passed on, more and more sick at heart, until we reached Jack's company. I asked the first man I saw if he were there, and he said yes, and called his name. From in front of one of the tents a tall, thin, shaky figure got slowly up and came toward us. I thought, "Good heavens, I hope that's not Jack!"

It was Jack.

We rushed up to him, and he caught hold of us as though he would never let go again. Mamma came up just then, and Jack smiled at her, and the next moment rolled over at our feet in a dead faint.

A dozen men were round us at once, and they bathed Jack's head and gave him brandy, and tried to cheer us up. But it was long before we could bring him to. Then the men carried him to the village and told us to drive him up to the hospital and get the major there to give him leave. It was two miles there and a rough drive, but mamma succeeded in getting thirty days' furlough as soon as the surgeon saw him. —— and I staid back, and the rest came up just at that moment. We spent the time doing what we could for some of the sick men. Jack was a well man, and was to go on guard that night. He had almost died of the fever in Cuba, and if it had not been for Dr. Froelich he would have been left behind—forever. He had frightful chills and fever on the boat coming home. Before that he had bloody dysentery. The men told us that he worked so hard nursing his tentmates who fell ill first that he made himself much worse. They said that long after he ought not to have stood up he was working over them night and day, and would not give up. When they were out of danger he collapsed. I told you I felt sure he was ill, you remember.

Well, we got him home, and he fainted four times—though not such a faint as the first—before we could get him into bed. There he has been ever since, and the doctor fears it will be weeks before he can get up. The men's vitality has gone. They are wrecks. And there was no finer, healthier young fellow on earth than Jack four months ago.

Captain —— of Jack's company came up just as Jack fainted.

"That's nothing," he said; "he isn't sick; it's just the excitement. He's perfectly well."

I looked at him. He was stout and rosy and healthy, comfortably buttoned up in a new uniform. Around him stood a group of pale sick fellows, dirty, unshaven, hollow-eyed, and terribly thin—his men.

"We suffered awfully," he remarked, smiling at me.

"Yes, the men have," I answered, and turned my back on him.

He walked off; but one of the men came up and told me not to make the brute angry, or he would find some way to keep Jack back. "And he will take it out on us, anyway," he added.

I can tell you that frightened me, and I was polite enough after that, and left him in a beaming humor. He looked over what we had brought, and said he thought he'd take a watermelon we had there, and also a box of small cakes. These he put under his arm. Afterwards one of the boys came and said he had requisitioned most of the towels and handkerchiefs for himself, saying they were too good for the men.

I left him with mamma, who could keep up the game. I was afraid I should say something true if I staid longer. He wanted me to come up to his tent, but I wouldn't have entered it for anything on earth. Mamma went, and took the paper for him to sign, so that Jack could go. He had a beautiful big tent, board floor, nice cot, with all the trimmings, and at least four blankets, mamma said. Jack lay on the bare ground, as he had given his blanket to his tentmate, who was sicker than he, and had lost his in Cuba. The boys had their winter uniforms all during the campaign there, and were given their present thin ones on the boat. So they nearly freeze at Montauk, which is a very cool place.

Jack and some other men spent Saturday morning—the day they got out of the detention camp—in taking the board floors of the officers up a hill and back again. You can imagine how weak Jack was, and the rest weren't very much better. They were detailed to lug the sections of floor, which are very heavy, up this hill and make the platforms. They finished this, and then received the order to take them back again; that the officers weren't satisfied with that kind. They got them back, and Jack said he went to his tent and fell into it exhausted. In about ten minutes came the order for the detail to fall in and bring those tent floors back up the hill again. This was the morning.

The night before and most of the preceding day Jack had been taking care of one of his tentmates who was dying of exhaustion. On the afternoon of this day Jack feared the boy would die any moment if he couldn't be taken to the hospital, two miles off. There was no ambulance to be had, and so Jack asked the captain if he and some other men could not carry the boy up on a stretcher. This they did, with infinite toil. They came back with almost as heavy a load of medicine, and it was late at night before they got back to camp.

Later.—The doctor tells us that if we had not brought Jack back the day we did, we would probably never have brought him home at all. And to think that there are hundreds and hundreds as badly off as Jack and who cannot get off. They are afraid to muster out the regiments who have been through that Cuban campaign. They are afraid of what the boys are going to say. The horror of some of the men for their officers and the camp amounts almost to mania. Jack says that after the fighting, when they had been a long time without food, the quartermaster at last gave out some hardtack, but very little, so that the famished men were still frantic for more food. There was a lot of hardtack left—they got nothing else—and the men went back and asked for more. The quartermaster refused to give them any.

"Go to the captain if you aren't satisfied—he'll settle you," he remarked.

Jack, his tentmate (the man who is now dying), and some others went to the captain. This was his reply:

You clear out of here —— —— —— quick. If I hear any more of this talk I'll put you all on —— little hardtack and water, and nothing else." So they kept on starving.

Later.—I have been off tending to Jack. He fainted again. His weakness is something terrifying.

WHEN THE GREAT GRAY SHIPS COME IN.

(New York Harbor, August 20, 1898.)

To eastward ringing, to westward winging, o'er mapless miles of sea,
On winds and tides the gospel rides that the furthermost isles are free,
And the furthermost isles make answer, harbor, and height, and hill, Breaker and beach cry each to each, "'Tis the Mother who calls! Be still!"
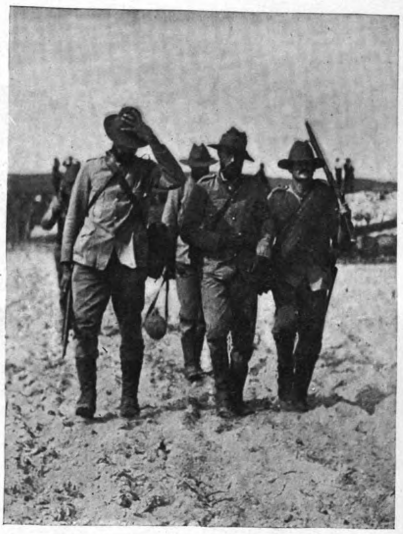
Mother! new-found, beloved, and strong to hold from harm,
Stretching to these across the seas the shield of her sovereign arm,
Who summoned the guns of her sailor sons, who bade her navies roam,
Who calls again to the leagues of main, and who calls them this time home!

And the great gray ships are silent, and the weary watchers rest,
The black cloud dies in the August skies, and deep in the golden west
Invisible hands are limning a glory of crimson bars,
And far above is the wonder of a myriad wakened stars!
Peace! As the tidings silence the strenuous cannonade,
Peace at last! is the bugle-blast the length of the long blockade,
And eyes of vigil weary are lit with the glad release,
From ship to ship and from lip to lip it is "Peace! Thank God for peace!"

Ah, in the sweet hereafter Columbia still shall show
The sons of these who swept the seas how she bade them rise and go,
How, when the stirring summons smote on her children's ear,
South and North at the call stood forth, and the whole land answered "Here!"
For the soul of the soldier's story and the heart of the sailor's song
Are all of those who meet their foes as right should meet with wrong,
Who fight their guns till the foeman runs, and then, on the decks they trod,
Brave faces raise, and give the praise to the grace of their country's God!

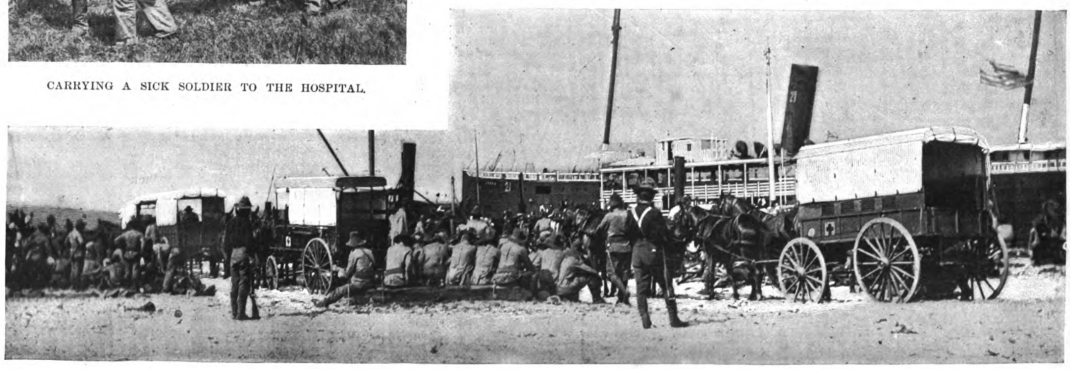


Yes, it is good to battle, and good to be strong and free,
To carry the hearts of a people to the uttermost ends of sea,
To see the day steal up the bay where the enemy lies in wait,
To run your ship to the harbor's lip and sink her across the strait:—
But better the golden evening when the ships round heads for home
And the long gray miles slip swiftly past in a swirl of seething foam,
And the people wait at the haven's gate to greet the men who win!
Thank God for peace! Thank God for peace, when the great gray ships come in!

Guy Wetmore Carryl.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

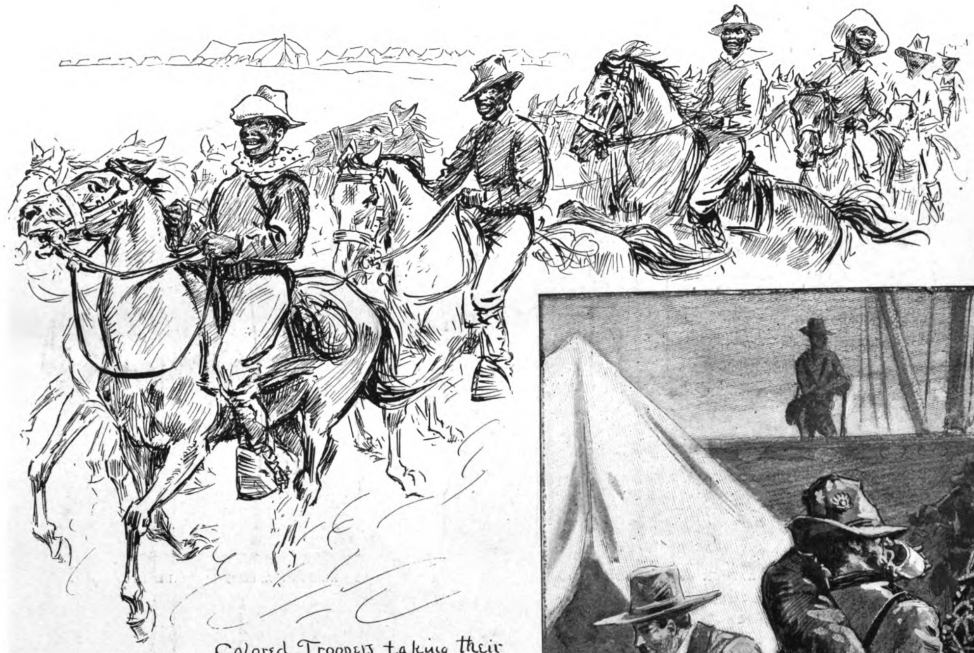
SECRETARY ALGER ON A TOUR OF INSPECTION.



HELPING A SICK COMRADE INTO CAMP.

3D AND 20TH REGULARS LANDING AT QUARANTINE CAMP.

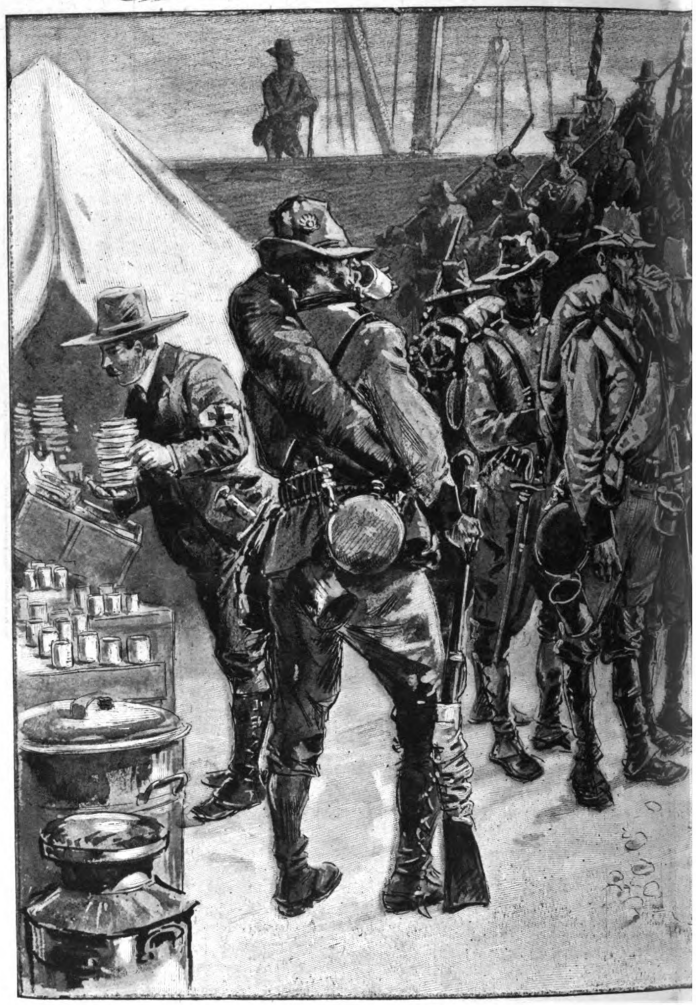
CARRYING A SICK SOLDIER TO THE HOSPITAL.



CONVALESCENTS WAITING TO BE TAKEN TO THE HOSPITAL.

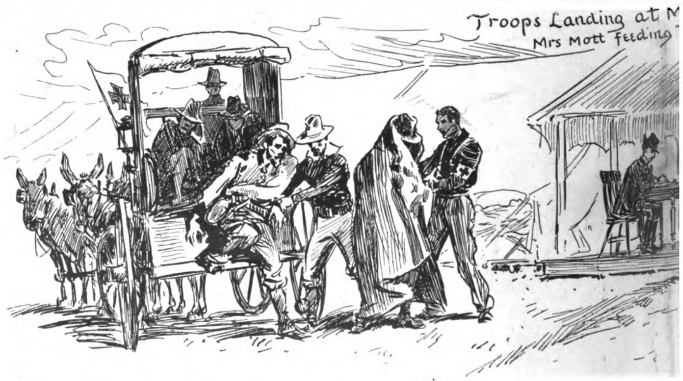
HOSPITAL SCENES AT CAMP WIKOFF.

PHOTOGRAPHS TAKEN ESPECIALLY FOR "HARPER'S WEEKLY."



Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

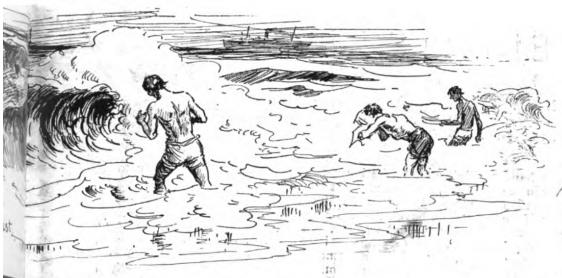
Colored Troopers taking their Horses to Water.



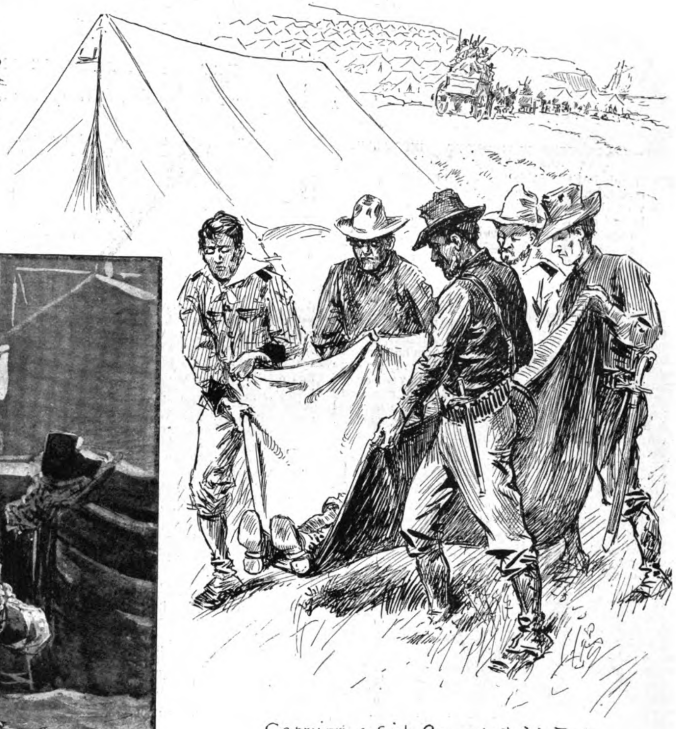
A chance, at last, to get Clean.

A Bugler of the Regulars.

W. A. Rogers.



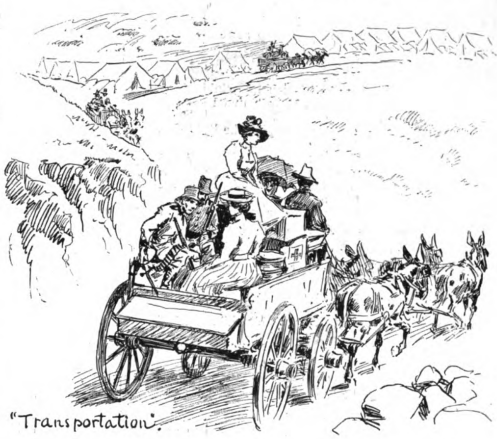
Troops Landing at M
Mrs Mott Feeding



At the General Hospital.

LIFE AT CA

DRAWN BY W. A. ROGERS, SPECIAL ARTIST



Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Carrying a Sick Comrade to his Tent

"Transportation".

ontauk.
he Hungry Soldiers.

At the Lunch Counter.

IP WIKOFF.

R "HARPER'S WEEKLY."—[SEE PAGE 890.]

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THE ASSOCIATE HERMITS.*

BY FRANK R. STOCKTON,

AUTHOR OF "THE GREAT STONE OF SARDIS," ETC.

XXIII.—MRS. PERKENPINE FINDS OUT THINGS ABOUT HERSELF.

THE mind of the guide was comforted and relieved that he had got the better of the bishop in one way, although he could not do it in another. But he did not relinquish his purpose of putting an end to the nonsense which made him do the work of other people, and as soon as he had set his kitchen in order he started out to find Mrs. Perkenpine. A certain amount of nonsense from the people in camp might have to be endured, but nonsense from Mrs. Perkenpine was something about which Peter Sadler would have a word to say.

Matlack was a good hunter. He could follow all sorts of tracks—rabbit tracks, bird tracks, deer tracks, and the tracks of big ungainly shoes—and in less than half an hour he had reached a cluster of moss-covered rocks lying some distance back in the woods, and approached by the bed of a now dry stream. Sitting on one of these rocks, her back against a tree, her straw hat lying beside her, and her dishevelled hair hanging about her shoulders, was Mrs. Perkenpine reading a newspaper. At the sound of his footsteps she looked up.

"Well, I'll be bound!" she said. "If I'd crawl into a fox-hole I expect you'd come and sniff in after me."

Matlack stood and looked at her for a moment. He could not help smiling at the uncomfortable manner in which she was trying to make herself comfortable on those rough rocks.

"I'll tell you what it is, Mrs. Perkenpine," he said, "you'll get yourself into the worst kind of a hole if you go off this way, leavin' everything at sixes and sevens behind you."

"It's my nater," said she. "I'm findin' it out and gittin' it ready to show to other people. You're the fust one that's seed it. How do you like it?"

"I don't like it at all," said the guide, "and I have just come to tell you that if you don't go back to your tent and cook supper to-night and attend to your business, I'll walk over to Sadler's, and tell Peter to send some one in your place. I'm goin' over there anyway, if he don't send a man to take Martin's place."

"Peter Sadler!" ejaculated Mrs. Perkenpine, letting her tumbled newspaper fall into her lap. "He's a man that knows his own nater, and lets other people see it. He lives his own life, if anybody does. He's individdle down to the heels, and just look at him! He's the same as a king. I tell you, Phil Matlack, that the more I knows myself, just me, the more I'm tickled. It seems like scootin' round in the woods, findin' all sorts of funny hoppin' things and flowers that you never seed before. Why, it 'ain't been a whole day since I begun knowin' myself, and I've found out lots. I used to think that I liked to cook and clean up, but I don't; I hate it."

Matlack smiled, and taking out his pipe, he lighted it and sat down on a rock.

"I do believe," he said, "that you are the most out and out hermit of the whole lot; but it won't do, and if you don't get over your objections to cookin' you'll have to walk out of these woods to-morrow."

Mrs. Perkenpine sat and looked at her companion a few moments without giving any apparent heed to his remarks.

"Of course," said she, "it isn't only findin' out what you be yourself, but it's lettin' other people see what you be. If you didn't do that it would be like a pot a-b'ilin' out in the middle of a prairie, with nobody nearer nor a hundred miles."

"It would be the same as if it hadn't b'iled," remarked Matlack.

"That's jest it," said she, "and so I ain't sorry you come along, Phil, so's I can tell you some things I've found out about myself. One of them is that I like to lie flat on my back and look up at the leaves of the trees and think about them."

"What do you think?" asked Matlack.

"I don't think nothin'," said she; "just as soon as I begin to look at them wrigglin' in the wind, and I begin to wonder what it is I think about them, I go slam bang to sleep, and when I wake up and try to think again what it is I think, off I go again. But I like it. If I don't know what it is I think, I ought to know that I don't know it. That's what I call bein' really and truly a hermick."

"What else did you find out?" inquired Matlack.

"I found out," she answered, with animation, "that I admire to read anecdotes. I didn't know I cared a pin for anecdotes until I took to hermickin'. Now here's this paper; it came around the cheese, and it's got a good many anecdotes scattered about in it. Let me read one of them to you. It's about a man who made his will and afterwards was a-drivin' a horse along a road, and the horse got skeered and ran over his executor, who was takin' a walk. Then he sung out, 'Oh, bless my soul!' says he. But I'll read you the rest if I can find it."

"Never mind about the anecdote," said Matlack, who knew very well that it would take Mrs. Perkenpine half an hour to spell out twenty lines in a newspaper. "What I want to know is if you found out anything about yourself that's likely to give you a boost in the direction of that cookin'-stove of yourn."

Mrs. Perkenpine was a woman whose remarks did not depend upon the remarks of others. "Phil Matlack," said she, gazing fixedly at his pipe, "if I had a man I'd let him smoke just as much as he pleased and just where he pleased. He could smoke afore he got up, and he could smoke at his meals, and he could smoke after he went to bed, and, if he fancied that sort of thing, he could smoke at family prayers; it wouldn't make no difference to me, and I wouldn't say a word to him agin' it. If that was his individdiety, I'd say viddle."

"And how about everything else?" asked Matlack. "Would you tell him to cook his own victuals and mend his clothes accordin' to his own nater?"

"No, sir," said she, striking with her expansive hand the newspaper in her lap—"no, sir. I'd get up early in the mornin', and cook and wash and bake and scour. I'd skin the things he shot, and clean his fish, and dig bait if he wanted it. I'd tramp into the woods after him, and carry the gun and the victuals and fishin'-poles, and I'd set traps and row a boat and build fires, and let him go along and work out his own nater smokin' or in any other way he was born to. That's the biggest thing I've found out about myself. I never knowed, until I began this mornin' explorin' of my own nater, what a powerful hard thing it is, when I'm thinkin' of my own individdlety, to keep somebody else's individdlety from poppin' up in front of it, and so says I to myself, 'If I can think of both them individdleties at the same time it will suit me fust rate.' And when you come along I thought I'd let you know what sort of a nater I've got, for it ain't likely you'd ever find it out for yourself. And now that we're in that business—"

"Hello!" cried Matlack, springing to his feet. "There is somebody callin' me. Who's there?" he shouted, stepping out into the bed of the stream.

A call was now heard, and in a few moments the bishop appeared some distance below.

"Mr. Matlack," he said, "there's a man at your camp inquiring for you. He came from Sadler's, and I've been looking high and low for you."

"A man from Sadler's," said Matlack, turning to Mrs. Perkenpine, "and I must be off to see him. Remember what I told you about the supper." And so saying, he walked rapidly away.

Out in the open Matlack found the bishop. "Obliged to you for lookin' me up," he said; "it's a pity to give you so much trouble."

"Oh, don't mention it!" exclaimed the bishop. "You cannot understand, perhaps, not knowing the circumstances, but I assure you I never was more obliged to any one than to that man who wants to see you and couldn't find you. There was no one else to look for you, and I simply had to go."

"You are not goin' to walk back to camp?" inquired Matlack.

"No," replied the bishop; "now that I am here, I think I will go up the lake and try to find a very secluded spot in the shade and take a nap."

The guide smiled as he walked away. "Don't understand?" said he. "You've got the boot on the wrong leg."

Arrived at his tent, Matlack found Bill Hammond, a young man in Sadler's service, who informed him that that burly individual had sent Martin away in the stage-coach, and had ordered him to come and take his place.

"All right," said Matlack. "I guess you're as good as he was, and so you can settle down to work. By-the-way, do you know that we are all hermits here?"

"Hermits?" said the other. "What's that?"

"Why, hermits," said Matlack, "is individ'als who gets up early in the mornin' and attends to their own business just as hard as they can, without lookin' to the right or left, until it's time to go to bed."

The young man looked at him in some surprise. "There's nothing so very uncommon in that," said he.

"No," replied the guide, "perhaps there ain't. But as you might hear them talkin' about hermits here, I thought I'd tell you just what that sort of thing is."

XXIV.—A DISSOLVING AUDIENCE.

WHEN a strange young man assisted Matlack at the supper table that evening, Mr. Archibald asked what had become of Martin.

"Peter Sadler has sent him away," answered the guide. "I don't know where he sent him or what he sent him for. But he's a young man who's above this sort of business, and so I suppose he's gone off to take up something that's more elevated."

"I am sorry," said Mrs. Archibald, "for I liked him."

Mr. Archibald smiled. "This business of insisting upon our own individualities," he said, "seems to have worked very promptly in his case. I suppose he found out he was fitted for something better than a guide, and immediately went off to get that better thing."

"That's about the size of it," said Matlack.

Margery said nothing. Her heart sank. She could not help feeling that what she had said to the young man had been the cause of his sudden departure. Could he have done such a thing, she thought, as really to go and ask Mr. Sadler, and, having found he did not mind, have gone to see her mother? Her appetite for her supper departed, and she soon rose and strolled away, and as she strolled the thought came again to her that it was a truly dreadful thing to be a girl.

Having received no orders to the contrary, Matlack, with his new assistant, built and lighted the camp-fire. Some of the hermits took this as a matter of course, and some were a little surprised; but one by one they approached; the evening air was beginning to be cool, and the vicinity of the fire was undoubtedly the pleasantest place in camp. Soon they were all assembled but one, and Mrs. Archibald breathed freer when she found that Arthur Raybold was not there.

"I am delighted," said Corona, as soon as she took her usual seat, which was a camp-chair, "to see you all gather about the fire. I was afraid that some of you might think that because we are hermits we must keep away from each other all the time. But we must remember that we are associate hermits, and so should come together occasionally. I was going to say something to the effect that some of us may have misunderstood the true manner and intent of the assertions of our individualities, but I do not now believe that this is necessary."

"Do you mean by all that," said Mrs. Perkenpine, "that I cooked the supper?"

"Yes," said Miss Raybold, turning upon her guide with a pleasant smile, "that is what I referred to."

"Well," said Mrs. Perkenpine, "I was told that if I didn't cook I'd be bounced. It isn't my individdlety to cook for outsiders, but it isn't my individdlety to be bounced, nuther, so I cooked. Is that bein' a hermick?"

"You have it," cried Mr. Archibald; "you've not only found out what you are, but what you have to be. Your knowledge of yourself is perfect. And now," he continued, "isn't there somebody who can tell us a story? When we are sitting around a camp fire, there is nothing better than stories. Bishop, I dare say you have heard a good many in the course of your life. Don't you feel like giving us one?"

"I think," said Corona, "that by the aid of stories it is possible to get a very good idea of ourselves. For instance, if some one were to tell a good historical story, and any one of us should find himself or herself greatly interested in it, then that person might discover, on subsequent reflection, some phase of his or her intellect which he or she might not have before noticed. On the other hand, if it should be a love story, and some of us could not bear to hear it, then we might also find out something about ourselves of which we had before been ignorant. But I really think that, before making any tests of this sort, we should continue the discussion of what is at present the main object of our lives—self-knowledge and self-assertion. In other words, the emancipation of the individual. As I have said before, and as we all know, there never was a better opportunity offered a group of people of mature minds to subject themselves, free of outside influences, to a thorough mental inquisition, and to then exhibit the results of their self-examinations to appreciative companions. This last is very important. If we do not announce to others what we are, it is of scarcely any use to be anything. I mean this, of course, in a limited sense."

"Harriet," said Mr. Archibald, abruptly, "do you remember where I left my pipe? I do not like this cigar."

"On the shelf by the door of the cabin," she replied. "I saw it as I came out."

Her husband immediately rose and left the fire. Corona paused in her discourse to wait until Mr. Archibald came back; but then, as if she did not wish to lose the floor, she turned toward the bishop, who sat at a little distance from her, and addressed herself to him, with the idea of making some collateral remarks on what she had already said, in order to fill up the time until Mr. Archibald's return.

Mrs Archibald thought that her husband had been a little uncivil; but almost immediately after he had gone she too jumped up, and, without making any excuse whatever, hurried after him.

"Hector," she said, as soon as she was near enough for him to hear her, "don't go after the pipe; let us take a moonlight walk along the shore. I believe it is full moon to-night, and we have not had a walk of that sort for ever so long."

"Very good," said her husband, turning to her. "I shall be delighted. I don't care for the pipe, and the cigar would have been good enough if it had not been for the sermon. That would spoil any pleasure. I can't stand that young woman, Harriet; I positively cannot."

"Well, then, let us walk away and forget her," said his wife. "I don't wonder she annoys you."

"If it were only the young woman," thought Mrs. Archibald, as the two strolled away beneath the light of the moon, "we might manage it. But her brother!"

The moment before she had left the fire Mrs. Archibald had seen some one approaching from the direction of Camp Roy. She instantly recognized this person as Arthur Raybold, and felt sure that, unwilling to stay longer by himself, he was coming to the camp fire, and if her husband should see him, she knew there would be trouble. What sort of trouble or how far it might extend she did not try to imagine.

At the next indication of a pause in Corona's discourse the bishop suddenly stood on his feet. "I wonder," he said, "if there is anything the matter with Mrs. Archibald? I will step over to her cabin to see."

"Indeed," said Corona, rising with great promptness, "I hope it is nothing serious. I will go with you."

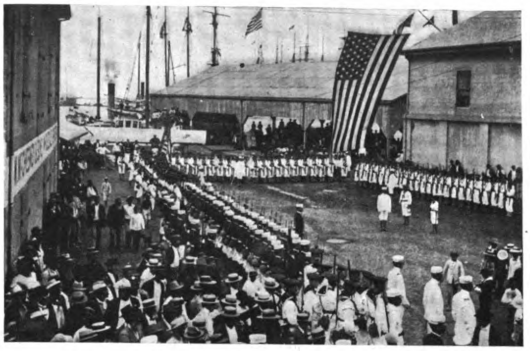
Margery was not a rude girl, but she could not help a little laugh, which she subdued as much as possible; and Mr. Clyde, who was sitting near her, laughed also.

"There is nothing on earth the matter with Aunt Harriet," said Margery. "They didn't go into the cabin; I saw them walking away down the shore."

"How would you like to walk that way?" he asked. "I think their example is a very good one."

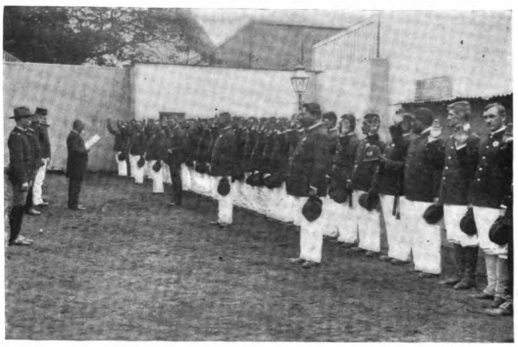
"It is capital," said Margery, jumping up; "and let's get away quickly before she comes back."

They hurried away, but they did not extend their walk down the lake shore even as far as Mr. and Mrs. Archibald had already gone. When they came to the bit of beach behind the clump of trees where the bishop had retired that afternoon to read, they stopped and sat down to watch the moonlight on the water.



Matlack and Mrs. Perkenpine were now the only persons at the camp fire, for Bill Hammond, as was his custom, had promptly gone to bed as soon as his work was done. If Arthur Raybold had intended to come to the camp fire, he had changed his mind, for he now stood near his sister's tent, apparently awaiting the approach of Corona and the bishop, who had not found the Archibalds, and who were now walking together in what might have been supposed, by people who did not know the lady, to be an earnest dialogue.

Mr. Matlack was seated on his log and smoked, and Mrs. Perkenpine sat on the ground, her head thrown back and her arms hugging her knees.



"Phil," said she, "that there moon looks to me like an oyster with a candle behind it, and as smooth and slippery as if I could jest swallow it down. You may think it is queer for me to think such things as that, Phil, but since I've come to know myself jes as I am, me, I've found out feelin's—"

* Begun in HARPER'S WEEKLY No. 2167.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

MARINES FROM UNITED STATES WAR-SHIPS LANDING TO ATTEND CEREMONIES.

HAWAIIAN POLICE SWEARING ALLEGIANCE TO THE UNITED STATES.

"Mrs. Perkenpine," said Matlack, knocking the ashes out of his pipe, "there's a good many things besides moons that I can't swallow, and if it's all the same to you, I'll go to bed."

"Well," she exclaimed, looking after him, "his individdlety is the snapshortess I ever did see! I don't believe he wants to know hisself. If he did, 'm dead-sure I could help him. He never goes out to run a camp without somebody to help him, and yet he's so everlastin' blind he can't see the very best person there is to help him, and she a-plumpin' herself square in front of him every time she gits a chance." And with that reflection she rose and walked away.

"I tell you, Harriet," said Mr. Archibald, when he and his wife had returned from their walk and were about to enter the cabin, "something must be done to enable us to spend the rest of our time here in peace. This is our camp, and we want it for ourselves. If a good companionable fellow like the bishop or that young Clyde happens along, it is all very well, but we do not want all sorts of people forcing themselves upon us, and I will not submit to it."

"Of course we ought not to do that," said she, "but I hope that whatever you do, it will be something as pleasant as possible."

"I will try to avoid any unpleasantness," said he, "and I hope I may do so, but— By-the-way, where is Margery?"

DETACHMENT OF BLUEJACKETS LANDING FROM U.S.S. "PHILADELPHIA."

"I think she must be in bed," said Mrs. Archibald; and then stepping inside, she called, "Margery, are you there?"

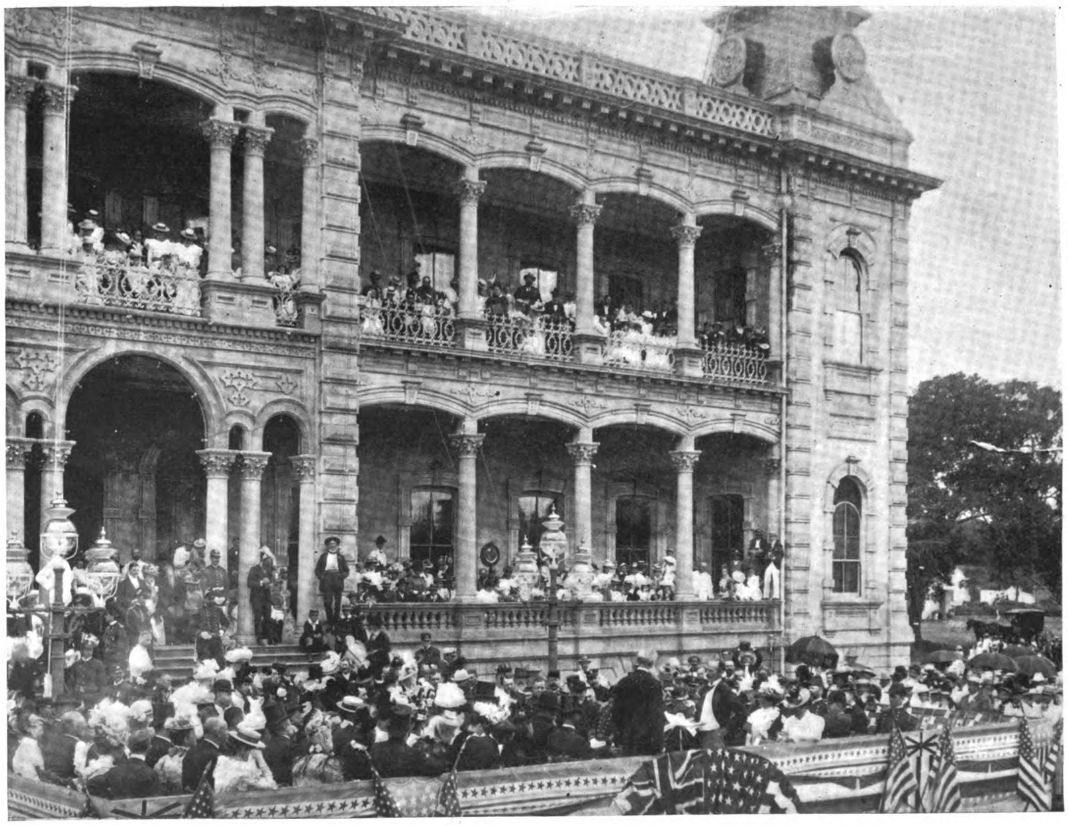
"Yes, Aunt Harriet," replied Margery, "I am here."

"She must have found it dreadfully stupid, poor girl!" said Mr. Archibald.

The lights were all out in the Archibalds' cabin, and still Miss Raybold and the bishop walked up and down the open space at the further end of the camp.

"Corona!" exclaimed her brother, suddenly appearing before them, "I have told you over and over again that I wish to speak to you. Are you never going to stop that everlasting preaching and give me a chance to talk to you?"

"Arthur!" she exclaimed, sharply, "I wish you would not interrupt me in this way. I had just begun to say—"

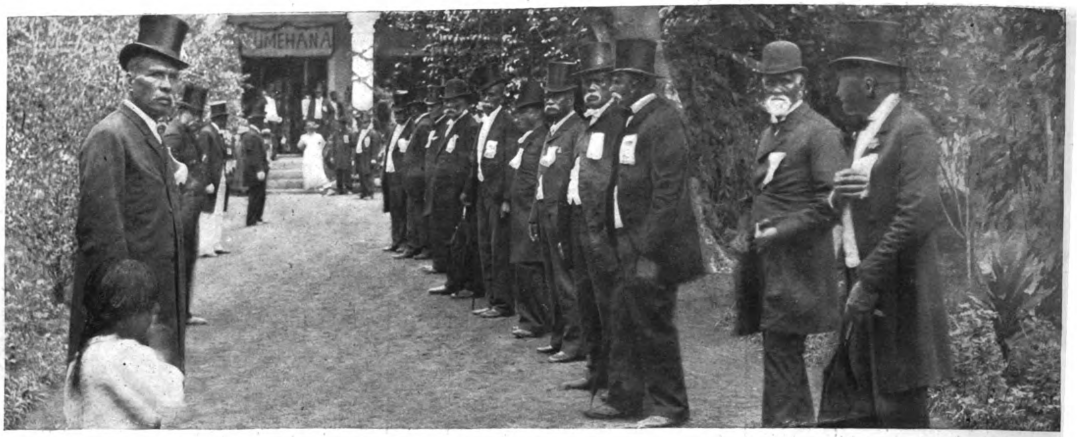


"Oh, my dear Miss Raybold," cried the bishop, "do not let me prevent you from speaking to your brother. Indeed, it is growing late, and I will not trespass longer on your time. Good-night," and with a bow he was gone.

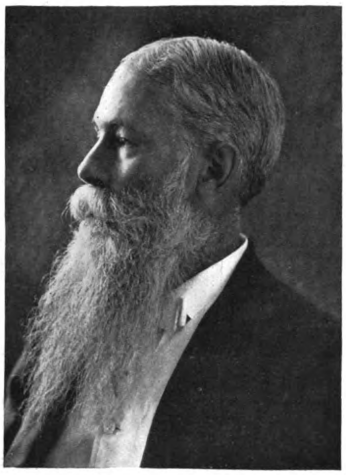
"Now just see what you have done!" said Corona, her eye-glasses brighter than the moon.

"Well, it is time he was going," said her brother. "I have something very important to say to you. I want your good offices in an affair more worthy of your thoughts than anything else at this moment."

"Whatever it is," she said, turning away from him, "I do not want to hear it now—not a word of it. You have displeased me, Arthur, and I am going to my tent."



[TO BE CONTINUED.]



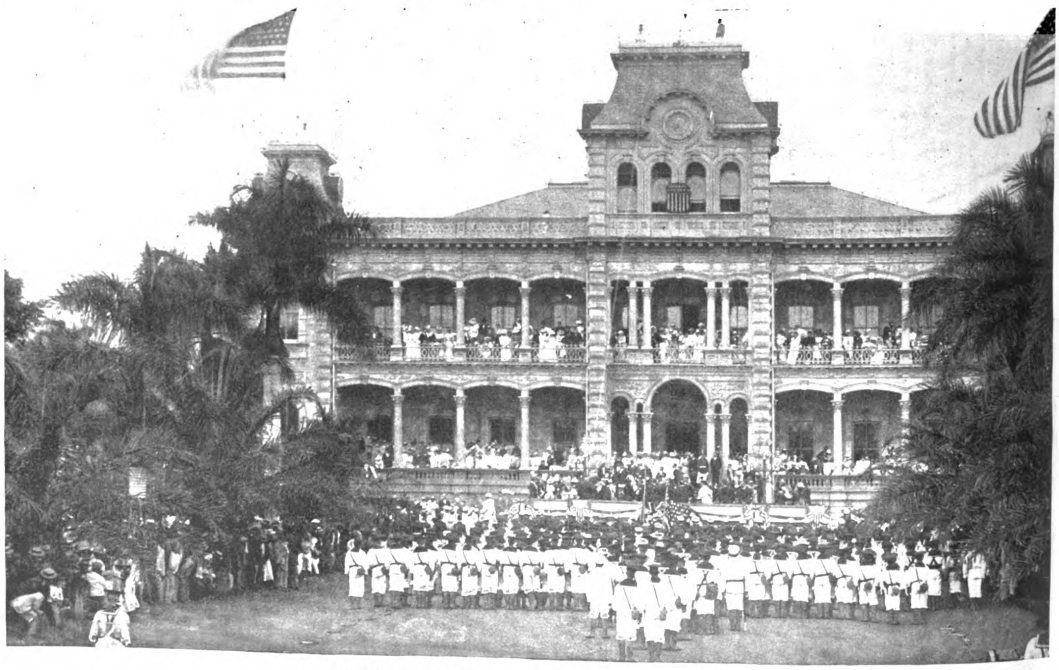
UNITED STATES MINISTER SEWALL PRESENTING THE RESOLUTION OF ANNEXATION TO PRESIDENT DOLE.

RAISING THE FLAG OVER HAWAII, AUGUST 12, 1898.—PHOTOGRAPHS BY J. MARTIN MILLER.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

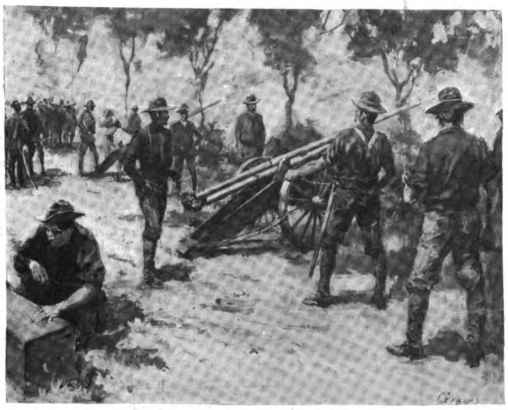
ATTENDANTS WAITING TO RECEIVE GUESTS AT THE EXECUTIVE PALACE—THE LEGEND OVER THE DOOR MEANS "WARM WELCOME."
Photograph, Copyrighted, 1898, by Davey.

SANFORD B. DOLE, LATE PRESIDENT OF HAWAII.
Photograph by Davey.



ADMIRAL MILLER, U.S.N., REPRESENTING THE UNITED STATES.
Photograph by Davey.

BRINGING OUR FLAG TO THE PALACE.
Photograph by J. Martin Miller.



SCENE JUST AFTER THE FLAG WENT UP OVER THE PALACE.
Photograph by J. Martin Miller.

THE USHERING IN OF THE NEW RÉGIME IN HAWAII, AUGUST 12, 1898.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

ARROYO—BURIAL OF THE FIRST VICTIM OF THE CAMPAIGN.

PALMAS—DYNAMITE-GUNS IN ACTION.

WITH OUR TROOPS IN PUERTO RICO.

FROM SKETCHES BY T. DART WALKER, SPECIAL ARTIST FOR "HARPER'S WEEKLY."

DYNAMITE-GUNS IN PUERTO RICO.

SPECIAL CORRESPONDENCE OF "HARPER'S WEEKLY."

GUAYAMA, PUERTO RICO, August 10.

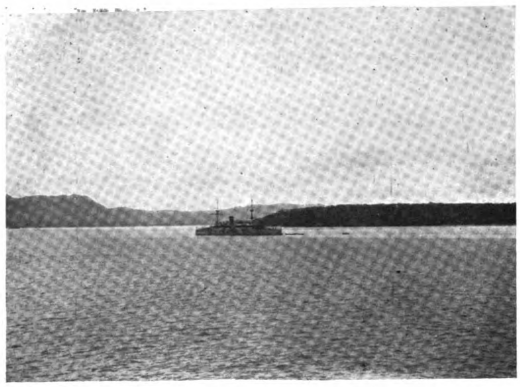
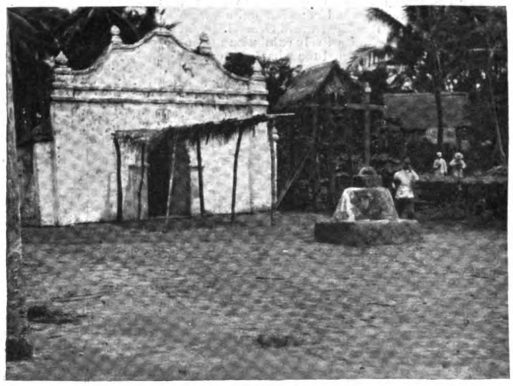
THE efficacy of dynamite-guns for artillery purposes had a striking illustration here day before yesterday. Under orders of General Brooke, the engineering corps was sent forward on the road to Cayey, supported by a battalion of the Fourth Ohio volunteers under command of Colonel Coit, to examine an important bridge on the main road to San Juan. It was reported that the bridge was mined, and that it was to be blown up to check our advance.



Our forces marched slowly, with only an advance-guard thrown out. It was impossible to deploy skirmishers, because of the nature of the country. A high mountain embankment ran along our left, and a sudden descent of nearly 500 feet was on the right of the road. The soldiers had gone about three miles along the steadily ascending road, and were within half a mile of the bridge, to reach which was the object of the expedition. There was a sharp turn in the road, and when the troops were about three hundred yards beyond it, in the most exposed place met thus far, there was a shrill whistling of bullets. The Spanish force was in ambush and knew the range.

The spot in the road was visible from all of the surrounding hills. Our men could not tell where the bullets came from. Fortunately there was a small ditch three feet wide and two feet deep on the side of the road, and the troops threw themselves pellmell into it. It was impossible to fix the stronghold of the Spaniards. After a few minutes our men crawled back to the turn in the road and awaited developments. The enemy kept up an incessant fire for an hour, the United States forces during that time not firing a shot.



Soon Colonel Coit found an opening in the hills to the left. He sent some troops toward it, and formed a firing line up the steep ascent. Meantime messengers had been sent to the rear to bring up the dynamite-guns of the command. The men on the firing line did some shooting, but it was not of serious effect. The ambush of the Spaniards was found after a time, and the dynamite-guns arrived within two hours. They were quickly placed in position on the edge of the road. Almost at once the Spaniards ceased firing. Evidently they saw the "earthquake-hurlers." Three shots were fired at the enemy. The explosions that followed were most destructive, and the Spaniards disappeared. Our small advance was checked. The dynamite-guns had such a moral effect, however, that we practically won the day. There seems to be no doubt that hereafter their place in warfare will be recognized as established.

It is like taking one's life in his hands to go out after dark. More than one person has been wounded or killed by our own outposts. An outpost of the Third Illinois was killed by an outpost of the Fourth Pennsylvania recently. The unfortunate man was buried in the Protestant cemetery here. There are many fever-stricken soldiers in our camps. The Red Cross Society of Guayama has provided splendidly for some of them. The food furnished by that society is excellent, and the hospital is well appointed.

T. DART WALKER.

U.S.S. "CHARLESTON" AT THE ENTRANCE TO HARBOR OF AGAÑA.

CHURCH IN AGAÑA.

WAITING TO SEE "LOS AMERICANOS."

NATIVE FAMILY AND HOUSE.

SCENES ON THE ISLAND OF GUAM, OUR NEW ACQUISITION IN THE LADRONES.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

WITH GENERAL MERRITT.

[Special Correspondence of "Harper's Weekly."]

Headquarters of the Expedition to the Philippines, S.S. "Newport," Manila Harbor, July 25, 1898.

The five other steamers of our fleet were already nearly all coaled when we reached Honolulu on the 7th, and in the evening they were, with one exception, sent outside the reef, to free the little harbor, already much overcrowded, there to await the Newport, and to start on the long voyage together. We were ordered to be on board at eleven o'clock the next morning—an hour which promised to come far too quickly for even the most unemotional amongst us, and the brief period which was allowed us on shore was improved with almost hysterical activity. General Merritt was met, on landing, by Consul-General Haywood, who proved to be a most efficient and energetic guide; the courtesies of the Pacific Club were tendered to the general and his staff, and the forenoon was spent in a pleasant visit to Minister Sewall, in a call upon President Dole and his cabinet, and in other formalities. The chief embarrassment to both officers and men was the lavishness, and withal the kindly urgency, of the hospitality. Nothing could be too good for a soldier; almost every man was decorated with wreaths of pinks and fragrant tropical blossoms—twined around his hat and hung around his neck and across his shoulders.

Every one wore a badge with eagle and crossed flags, and the motto, "Aloha nui to our Boys in Blue"—an expression of loving welcome suggesting in its phraseology a kinship of sentiment, if not of blood, anticipating, indeed, a union of interests which the long-desired annexation would confirm and establish. The spectacle of great, brown, hardy soldiers from the Northwest running about the town like so many children on a picnic, with wreaths and flowers and tropical fruits, sometimes accompanied by happy natives, sometimes driving with the ladies of society in sumptuous equipages, sometimes lounging on the shady lawns of the bungalows under palm and pepper trees, sometimes dashing along on bicycles, all as careless as schoolboys—this spectacle, forsooth, is not to be described, can never be forgotten. Reluctantly the soldiers boarded the crowded transports again; still more reluctantly did those whose foresight secured for them the enjoyment of a clean airy room in the hotel, and who were able to enjoy something of the unique Hawaiian hospitality, break away from the fascinating place, whose irresistible delights were only beginning to unfold themselves when the cruel moment of departure arrived.

A rumor that the Cadiz fleet had passed through the Suez Canal reached Honolulu by our boat, and was partly confirmed by newspapers brought by a quick steamer which left Victoria two days after we sailed from San Francisco. This rumor caused a certain anxiety at Honolulu, for the story of the Spanish occupation of Ponapi in the Carolines, in 1888, and the consequent interruption of successful mission-work, was still vividly remembered there; and, besides, the citizens were hyperconscious of their position as avowed friends of the United States at the present crisis, and naturally considered the voyage of Spanish cruisers for revenge and conquest quite within the range of possibility. The departure of General Merritt and his fleet caused, therefore, a lively exhibition of sentimental and patriotic interest, and the wharf was crowded with our new-found friends long before the hour of sailing. Officers and men on the Newport were adorned as for a carnival festivity, some of them, in fact, almost smothered with flowers.

No salutes from the idle Monitor Monadnock honored the occasion, but the citizens sent as an escort the fine Hawaiian band, which played patriotic airs as we slowly steamed along the narrow channel in the reef toward the distant group of steamers awaiting our arrival before starting on the long voyage. It was found, on reaching them, that one of the vessels was slightly disabled, and therefore, after an hour of busy signal-work, General Merritt, to the satisfaction of every one on the Newport, decided to lay the course of his transport straight to the Philippines by way of Farallon de Pájaros, the most northerly island of the Ladrones, and to leave the rest of the fleet to follow the plan originally decided upon, namely, to make first for the island of Guam in the Ladrones, where, it was believed, the Monitor Monterey would be overtaken, and then to steer for the general line of rendezvous, beginning at a point 600 miles due east from Cape Engaño, the northeastern point of the island of Luzon. Farallon de Pájaros is 450 miles north of Guam, and the route to Manila taken by the Newport would be about 4970 miles, as against almost 5100 miles on the course followed by the other vessels. The convoy of the Monitor was certainly desirable, but the delay caused by the increased mileage and the reduction of speed necessary to keep in sight of the other ships would have caused the Newport to lose three days at least. Somewhere on the line of rendezvous it was expected that a vessel sent by Admiral Dewey would meet us to escort us into port, or at least to give us news of the situation there for our guidance.

For ten whole days we ran at an average of about 310 miles, in weather absolutely perfect, and with a thermometer standing between 80° and 85° day and night. A following trade-wind of about the same speed we were making made the heat seem much more oppressive than these figures indicate; but an occasional shower apparently cooled the air, although the mercury scarcely ever fell a degree.

For ten days not an object broke the horizon, and the monotony of its sharp line was only varied by the slanting dashes of small showers as they slowly moved across the water. For ten days we saw nothing on the ocean more interesting than great schools of flying-fish and an occasional gull or albatross. The busy teeming life on the steamer was a continuous entertainment, and the ten days, which would otherwise have been deadly monotonous, passed with extraordinary rapidity. The men's quarters were cramped enough below, but the ventilation was good, the temperature at least a degree and a half lower than in the saloon, and the troop-deck was kept scrupulously clean. The bunks were, however, fixed and stationary, and, unlike the hammocks and folding-bunks in use on the English troop-ships, could not be removed to make room for mess tables. They accommodated more men in a given area, but the system compelled the occupants to eat their food and perform the manifold minor duties of soldier life wherever and whenever they could find a place on the crowded boat. It was therefore necessary to allow the men free run of all the decks, except a small space reserved for the officers between the deck houses.

The Astor Battery pre-empted the roof of the saloon-deck house, and many of them bivouacked there among the life-rafts and spars, and the sound of music and merriment was often heard above the awnings until late at night. K Battery, of the Third Regular Heavy Artillery, swarmed all over the bow; H Battery gathered on the stern, and stragglers from all three batteries were found in every part of the vessel. The hurricane-deck. After leaving Honolulu a system of squad drills in calisthenics and the manual of arms was carried on with great regularity, for the weather seldom interfered with these exercises, and there was no seasickness. There was no deck-room for parade, and the regulations about dress were not strictly enforced. Indeed, there was almost full liberty given to the men in this respect, and some of the officers themselves wore tennis suits and other civilian clothes for a larger part of the voyage. As for occupations and pastimes, they were so numerous that the days were all too short to exhaust the programme. Officers and men spent a great deal of time in the study of Spanish, and little groups busy over the same book occupied every retired corner at certain times of the day. Perhaps there was some indifference to the music of pure Castilian, and surely a wide ignorance of it prevailed, but a useful vocabulary was rapidly acquired, and even some fluency in speaking the language might be credited to some earnest students. Boxing was indulged in by the men every evening, and impromptu conversaziones were organized by the officers, and at twilight nearly every evening some officer related an interesting experience. Colonel Brainard's story of the Greely expedition will long remain in the memory of those who gathered around him in the warm evening air, and, dressed in the lightest possible garments, listened to the dramatic tale of life in the ice and snow of the far North. General Merritt gave a vivid but brief picture of an incident in the civil war; Major Thompson of the signal corps told of the Custer massacre; Surgeon Woodruff turned our thoughts to the disturbing theories of degeneracy; the Astor Battery furnished a well-equipped variety troupe on more than one occasion, and so the evenings succeeded each other with pleasant entertainment.

We ran into Spanish waters on the evening of the tenth day from the Hawaiian Islands, and then the real object of our voyage, lost sight of but not forgotten in the diversions of the trip, came strongly to our minds again, and the fertile imaginations pictured all sorts of adventures to be in store for us before we should reach Manila, if, indeed, we got there at all. It was with a sense of appreciation of the possible uncertainties of the situation in these waters that we had gayly sailed away from Honolulu, but all anxiety was soothed away as we quietly went along, and no one seemed to think very much about anything. But at four o'clock on the afternoon of the 19th (we had lost a day at the 180th meridian, it must be remembered) the great pyramid of the island volcano Assumption was discovered looming up boldly to the southwest. A few moments later, on the distant horizon, directly in our path, a tiny white wreath of smoke made a bright spot against the gray of the low clouds, and we rapidly ran up in the mirage the symmetrical cone of the Farallon de Pájaros, with its immense plume of sulphur steam drifting far away to the northeast, puffing up in huge rounded masses many hundreds of feet above the summit. A most gorgeous and dramatic sunset, with the great active volcano and its cloud of steam strong in contrast against a kaleidoscopic sky, kept every one watching its rapid transformations, until all the light went out of the west and Venus blazed brightly in our path. The volcano is over a thousand feet in height, and rises directly out of the ocean in the form of a slightly depressed cone, with a small rugged promontory jutting out to the southward. The crater is apparently about two hundred and fifty feet across, and, judging from the strong reflection on the steam-cloud, it is full of molten lava. We had the mountain abeam and about four miles distant at a quarter past eight, only six minutes later than Captain Saunders had promised ten days before. Our course was slightly changed to the southward, and in an hour the red light of the crater had disappeared astern.

Time now began to drag a little, as it always does toward the end of a long voyage, and the soldiers no longer talked of their present discomforts, but of the probable future operations. The wise words of the veterans were listened to with earnestness and attention, and discussions on the field operations, the new system of formation, the use of the weapons, and on kindred topics were heard on all sides. The non-coms., too, began to have a more paternal authority over the men, and even to a casual observer there were signs of awakened interest in the soldier's trade. The six-hundred-mile point was passed at one o'clock on the morning of the 22d, and we began to look for signs of vessels to the westward. The sea was almost without a ripple, for the trade-wind had died away altogether, and the horizon-line was clean and sharp. The heat rose gradually to 87°, where it remained without perceptible variation day and night, and threatening clouds hung over the western sky. Late in the afternoon of the 24th we saw through the veil of mist and between the distant showers of rain the headlands of Cape Engaño, and before midnight were well in the middle of the narrow strait between that point and the Babuyan Islands. At daybreak Sunday morning we entered the China Sea, and shortly after, passing a large steamer a dozen miles to the northward, which went on its course without so much as showing a flag, we stood away to the southward, toward the entrance to Manila Bay, less than three hundred miles distant.

Heavy rains and wind squalls made our last night disagreeable and very uncomfortable for everybody. At ten o'clock on the morning of Monday, the 26th, we passed the beautiful, luxuriantly wooded islands at the entrance of the harbor, and in a few moments saw in the distance the towering masts of a man-of-war off Cavité and a forest of smaller spars beyond. Shortly after eleven o'clock the Concord steamed out to meet us, and an officer came aboard, bringing the news of the fall of Santiago, the destruction of the Spanish fleet in Cuban waters, and the annexation of Hawaii.

Headquarters of General Greene, Tambo, near Manila, July 26.

General Merritt and several officers came ashore to-day to inspect the position of the forces under General Greene's command, and visited the picket-line. The trip from the Newport is not an easy one, for there are no facilities for landing on the beach. A ship's boat brings the visitors from the steam-launch to within a hundred feet or so of the shore, and then they are carried through the surf on the backs of soldiers, who are always in the water—not only for pleasure, but to assist in landing operations. The camp is on a low, flat, sandy strip just behind a thick border of bamboo and other trees, which everywhere line the shore, and which at frequent intervals hide a cluster of palm-thatched fishing-huts. The camp is not only well laid out, but is very picturesque. Recognizing the importance of raising the bed above the ground, the soldiers have built platforms of bamboo, which they cover with their shelters. All around the camp is a Midway Plaisance of natives, and along the road, beyond which is the camino real from Cavité to Manila, there are huts every few yards. Indeed, the whole tract appears to be densely populated. The natives are exceedingly clean in dress and quiet in manners, and apparently feel already perfectly at home with the soldiers, for scarcely a hut but has some Western giant in or near it. General Greene has picketed a line about three-quarters of a mile east from the beach, near Malate, where the insurgent and the Spanish lines come to within 200 yards of each other. At this point there is an attack, if aimless firing can be called attack, every evening, and our pickets are so close to the rear of the insurgents that they are well within the danger zone. However, the peasants live there with their flocks and herds and children, and cultivate their rice quite unconcernedly, as if there was no danger. Indeed, I find it hard to believe there is any serious conflict on here, for the roads and the villages have quite a festive air. Bands and couples of insurgents are always going and coming, and they are all clean and neat, and have quite a holiday appearance. There is no system about their movements that I can find out, and they certainly do not look as if they were at serious work. It is an incongruous sight to see a picket of our own troops right in the midst of these people, giants in stature beside them, and looking quite out of keeping with the surroundings in their tan-colored uniforms and slouch-hats. We are now anxiously awaiting the arrival of the rest of our expedition, which is probably making slow progress on account of the convoy, the Monterey. Admiral Dewey visited General Merritt a few moments after the steamer dropped anchor yesterday. The Astor Battery and Batteries H and K of the Third Heavy Artillery were landed from the Newport to-day.

F. D. Millet.

A NIGHT IN THE INSURGENTS' TRENCHES.

[Special Correspondence of "Harper's Weekly."]

Hospital, Cavité, July 29, 1898.

To get through the American lines and into the insurgents' trenches it is necessary to have two passes. One is easily obtained at General Anderson's headquarters; the other is a matter of long diplomatic negotiations at the headquarters of General Aguinaldo, President of the revolutionary government of the Philippines.

We made our way along the wharves of the arsenal, past the machine-shop—left intact by the Spaniards, and now noisily worked by the American workmen—down the long walk shaded with luxuriant trees and lined with low flat barracks, where the American soldier sleeps, cooks, and hangs out his washing. Everywhere the grounds were crowded with ragged, stolid, silent natives, some working, some standing about, some begging, their whole attitude that of indifference. An occasional leper drags himself along. Down in one corner of the wharves have settled a regular colony of dark-skinned Filipinos, employed in transporting troops and stores on their long bamboo-covered casco-boats. Their emaciated little children play about, and their women appear to be constantly employed in washing their rags and scouring their primitive pots and kettles. A very cleanly lot they seem, considering their resources.

Well in the middle of the grounds stands General Anderson's headquarters. As we went up the steps a tall man rather shabbily dressed preceded us. We noticed his military bearing, and were told that he was the captain of one of the Spanish men-of-war which lies with projecting spars at the bottom of Cavité Harbor. Following his footsteps, we of necessity overheard what he said to the general's aide:

"Señor, I borrowed, some time ago, two hundred dollars from Admiral Dewey to pay off my men. I have come to repay the debt."

He turned his profile towards us, and we noticed how thin he looked. He must have starved himself to collect the money. With a very straight back, he counted out the Spanish bills, and turned to go.

"Will you not take a receipt?" asked the aide of General Anderson.

"Never from an officer," answered the gray-haired old gentleman, with a courtly old-fashioned bow.

Here at least is a true Spanish caballero.

Leaving the arsenal, we walked through the narrow streets of Cavité, crowded with nut-brown natives in loose garments of bright colors.

In some of the low-lying houses the insurgents keep over a thousand Spanish prisoners starving, to the great shame of the American flag, which is supposed to float over Cavité.

At the wharf outside the town we get into our long dugout, dignified by the name of Harper's Weekly Despatch-boat, which, under the steady strokes of our four silent boatmen, takes us to Bakor, to which place General Aguinaldo moved from Cavité, probably to get further away from the strong hand of American authority.

Near by the seat of the revolutionary government is an improvised chapel, where, some days ago, Aguinaldo took oath as President of the new republic. Grotesque pictures of the "Holy Family" and tinsel ornaments still decorate the interior. At the government building lounge Aguinaldo's body-guard in natty white suits, with knife strapped

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google on side, and the Philippine cockade jauntily stuck in their hat-bands.

We have a strapping Yorkshire man along, and he looks a giant striding along among this dainty little people.

We have friends at court, and are immediately ushered into the waiting-room; but it must not be supposed, from this promptness of attention, that we are to see the august "Presidente." He is, as usual, "very busy and somewhat indisposed."

It seems that Aguinaldo, while ostensibly helping our quartermaster to get means for transporting the troops, had secretly forbidden the natives to let their horses or buffaloes to the Americanos. At the moment of our entry Aguinaldo has just been informed with Anglo-Saxon brutality that unless transportation is furnished on demand the quartermaster of the American army would seize all the horses in the country.

We were entertained by the secretary of Aguinaldo, who, in the reflected grandeur of his master, is also a very great man. He is very polite, but never allows himself to show anything like interest in what is going on about him. With inscrutable face he discusses the political situation, after the fashion of a man of the world who is rather bored. For all his society airs, he puts us some rather difficult questions. "The Americans have, of course, come to give independence to the Philippines?" "Do we not find the people as worthy of self-government as the Cubans?" "Why will General Anderson not recognize the government of President Aguinaldo?" To all these questions we made answer as best we could, and after an hour's delay in getting our passes we rose to go, with a feeling that it was really we who had been interviewed. A very clever young man, this secretary of the President. One thing, however, we were given to understand—that only so long as the Americans favored the independence of the islands might they expect friendly treatment from the insurgents.

An hour's row brought us to Camp Dewey, where, wishing to see the fighting in the insurgents' trenches after dark, we waited. At nightfall four of us started on the muddy road which leads direct to Manila; our fat interpreter, the quondam-keeper of a sailors' boarding-house in the capital, showed symptoms of turning tail.

"It is very dangerous," he ventured, after an animated conversation with some natives.

"Very well; you go ahead, Ruis, and ward off danger." This plan did not seem to please Ruis, for he very soon dropped behind, saying that he would see that no one took us by surprise from the rear.

About a mile out we came to our own outposts; the men were having a good time, singing "Marching through Georgia."

"Not much like the English army in the field," remarked our Yorkshire man, who has seen twelve years of British service. "No man on outpost duty is even allowed to light a cigarette."

A short distance ahead we ran upon the last American picket.

"Where is the sentinel?" shouted the Lieutenant with us. "Why doesn't he challenge?"

At last the sentinel appeared from somewhere, but was so confused that he allowed us to go by without examining our passes. Our outpost duty is so wretched that a regiment of Spaniards might be smuggled through the lines and no one be the wiser. This is the kind of picket duty our National Guard learned in time of peace.

The road became more muddy and rough. It might be possible to get cannon along these paths, but, once at the front, it would be impossible to move them back again in a hurry. We floundered about in the blackness, and, to add to our discomforts, it began to rain. Not as it rains in America, but as if some one were throwing buckets of water on the particular spot where you happened to be. Two miles from camp we stumbled over the first insurgent barricade, a rude structure of bamboo and dirt thrown across the road. Passing this, we finally reached the fighting-line of the insurgents. Here two muzzle-loading cannon threatened the Spanish lines, some 200 yards ahead in the darkness. In the insurgents' trenches along the road ragged Filipinos, rifle in hand, lay stretched in the rain, watching for the enemy. On our right a desultory firing began, and we asked to be taken to the place where they were fighting. Ruis consulted with the leaders, and after many protests that it would be most dangerous, a guide was given us, who led us through swamps and bogs towards the firing-line. For some reason, tramp as we would, we did not seem to get there. At last we reached another barricade, only a short distance from the fighting. The comandante of this position informed us that the insurgent lines at this point were so scattered that the soldiers had orders to fire on any one approaching during the night. They were evidently afraid of a flank movement on the part of the Spaniards. Much against our will we were obliged to accept the hospitality of the comandante, and spend the night in an improvised hut fifteen feet square, where we were crowded with twenty-five insurgents and a large population of vermin.

During the night the Spaniards evidently made an attack on our position, for the firing approached, and the bullets began to whistle among the trees about us. The comandante made us lie up close to the barricade; and there, seeing nothing, and hearing only the crackling of musketry and the whistling of bullets, we spent the rest of the night, drenched to our skins.

With the first light we went into the insurgents' trenches, and were much impressed with the strength of the Spanish earthworks. With block-houses at regular intervals, only about 200 yards separated the insurgent and Spanish lines. While we were in the trenches a fusillade was opened on both sides, apparently for our benefit. Much ammunition was wasted and no harm done. Farther on we ran across a Krupp gun which the insurgents had taken from the arsenal and brought into position. So far as we could judge, both sides confined themselves to lying behind their earth-works and firing at each other—a method of campaign likely to be dragged on indefinitely without any result. The underbrush, trees, and hedges are so thick and the swamps so numerous that it would seem as if our advance must be confined to roads alone. Covering these the Spaniards have strong artillery, so that our advance would be made with great sacrifice of men.

J. F. BASS.

DIARY OF THE WAR.

Thursday, August 25.—General Miles has been directed to send home from Puerto Rico all troops not actually needed for service.

General Merritt cabled that the Rio de Janeiro and Pennsylvania had arrived out.

General Shafter formally relinquished the command at Santiago de Cuba to General Lawton, boarded the steamer Mexico with the members of his staff, and sailed for Montauk.

A despatch from La Coruña, Spain, states that the Spanish troops brought from Santiago de Cuba on the Alicante are being landed. Their condition is pitiable—eight died to-day. The government is hiring all the places in La Coruña which are available for their accommodation—a disused sardine-factory, the bull-ring, etc.—and will send them to their homes, after paying for their services in the lost colony during the past nine months. Private subscriptions in aid of the sick are also being received.

Friday, August 26.—A serious street fight, which occurred on Wednesday, is reported from Manila. One member of the Utah Artillery, Battery B, was killed, and one mortally wounded, and four troopers of the Fourth Cavalry were wounded. The natives attacked the soldiers through a misunderstanding. Their loss was four killed and several wounded.

Saturday, August 27.—Preparations for the embarkation of our troops are being made at Ponce, Puerto Rico. . . . General Miles had occasion to-day to assert his authority in the island. The mayor of Aguado had been imprisoned by the Spaniards, and later removed to San Juan, where, it was thought, there was danger of his being put to death on the charge of aiding the Americans. General Miles telegraphed to Captain-General Macias forbidding him to proceed with the execution of any sentence of capital punishment against the mayor, or to punish other political offenders.

An appeal for the removal of the ashes of Columbus from Havana to Spain was made by the Diario de la Marina.

Sunday, August 28.—Secretary Alger, in an interview on the conduct of the War Department, declared that there would be no investigation of any branch of the service, and that no investigation was necessary. "Out of the 250,000 men in camp in different localities in the United States and elsewhere," he said, "there have been possibly 1200 deaths from sickness. This is hardly more than a city of this number of inhabitants would have in the same period, and perhaps not as many if the city was subject to an epidemic of typhoid or yellow fever." It was asserted that food, clothing, and medicines had been everywhere provided in abundance; the officers, however, at the points of distribution had sometimes failed to make their requisitions in good season, not realizing the immense amount that would be needed. He added, "The Quartermaster-General is now distributing 400 tons of food a day to soldiers scattered over the earth from Puerto Rico to Manila." The necessity of a searching examination of the conduct of the various military departments is urged in communications from all parts of the country.

The condition of the Spanish troops at Guantanamo is reported to be so wretched that not more than two-thirds of those who start for Spain are expected to reach their destination alive.

Monday, August 29.—New York extended a greeting to those members of the Seventy-first Regiment who returned to-day and marched from the Battery to their armory in Thirty-fourth Street that has perhaps never been surpassed as a display of the city's enthusiasm and patriotism.

Tuesday, August 30.—The transport China left Manila, having on board Major-General Merritt and his staff. It is said that the general will go to Paris to take part in the Spanish-American peace conference. General Otis is Acting-Governor of Manila.

Major-General Garcia has been relieved by the Cuban government from the command of the Cuban troops in the eastern part of the island.

Wednesday, August 31.—Rear-Admiral Schley and General Gordon of the Puerto Rico military commission, together with representatives of every branch of the post-office service, several army paymasters and surgeons, and twenty-two trained nurses, sailed from Brooklyn for San Juan and Ponce.

By direction of the President, orders were issued to the commandants of the Naval Academy, Annapolis, and of the navy-yard of Portsmouth, New Hampshire, to release the Spanish prisoners in their charge. The Spanish government has cabled Admiral Cervera $50,000, to be expended in providing for the transportation of the sailors and officers under his command who have been held prisoners of war.

A despatch from Madrid says that Señor Silvela, Conservative leader, had a conference with Sagasta. Silvela declined to accept a place on the Spanish Peace Commission, saying that it was the duty of the Liberals to make peace.

Thursday, September 1.—The plans of the Red Cross Society for carrying throughout Cuba the relief-work which was begun at Siboney and continued at Santiago are given in a letter from Miss Clara Barton. The steamship San Antonio has been chartered by the Central Cuban Relief Committee, and will sail from New York with one thousand tons of supplies for Havana.

MARRION WILCOX.

ADVICE TO MOTHERS.—MRS. WINSLOW'S SOOTHING SYRUP should always be used for children teething. It soothes the child, softens the gums, allays all pain, cures wind colic, and is the best remedy for diarrhœa. —[Adv.]

FOOD FOR INFANTS.

THE Gail Borden Eagle Brand Condensed Milk as a baby food from the hour of birth, stands without a competitor, presenting as it does the most perfect preparation of milk for the use of infants.—[Adv.]

INACTIVE liver, depressed spirits—make both right with ABBOTT'S—THE ORIGINAL ANGOSTURA BITTERS. The genuine ABBOTT'S will revolutionize the system. —[Adv.]

LADIES are greatly benefited by Dr. SIEGERT'S ANGOSTURA BITTERS, the South American Tonic. —[Adv.]

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Pears'

Pretty boxes and odors are used to sell such soaps as no one would touch if he saw them undisguised. Beware of a soap that depends on something outside of it.

Pears', the finest soap in the world is scented or not, as you wish; and the money is in the merchandise, not in the box.

All sorts of stores sell it, especially druggists; all sorts of people are using it.

VICI Leather Dressing

The best Shoe Dressing in the world. The genuine is made only by Robert H. Foerderer, Philadelphia, manufacturer of the famous

VICI KID

Ask your dealer for Vici Leather Dressing, and be sure the trade-mark with the name of the maker, is on each box or bottle. Imitations may ruin your shoes.

A book about buying, wearing and caring for shoes, mailed free. Address ROBERT H. FOERDERER, Philada., Pa.

STATEMENT OF THE TRAVELERS

Life and Accident Insurance Company,

OF HARTFORD, CONN.

Chartered 1863. [Stock.] Life and Accident Insurance.

JAMES G. BATTERSON, Pres't.

Hartford, Conn., January 1, 1898.

PAID-UP CAPITAL, - $1,000,000.00

| | |
|---|---|
| Assets (Accident Premiums in the hands of Agents not included.) | $22,868,994.16 |
| Liabilities, | 19,146,359.04 |
| Excess Security to Policy-holders, | $3,722,635.12 |

July 1, 1898.

| | |
|---|---|
| Total Assets (Accident Premiums in the hands of Agents not included.) | $24,103,986.67 |
| Total Liabilities, | 19,859,291.43 |
| Excess Security to Policy-holders, | $4,244,695.24 |

| | |
|---|---|
| Paid to Policy-holders since 1864, | $35,660,940.19 |
| Paid to Policy-holders January–July, '98, | 1,300,493.68 |
| Loaned to Policy-holders on Policies (Life), | 1,161,705.00 |
| Life Insurance in Force, | 94,646,669.00 |

GAINS.

6 Months—January to July, 1898.

| | |
|---|---|
| In Assets, | $1,234,992.51 |
| In Surplus (to Policy-holders), | 522,060.12 |
| In Insurance in Force (Life Department only), | 2,764,459.00 |
| Increase in Reserves, | 705,642.18 |
| Premiums Received, 6 Months, | 2,937,432.77 |

JOHN E. MORRIS, Secretary.
EDWARD V. PRESTON, Sup't of Agencies.
J. B. LEWIS, M.D. Medical Director and Adjuster.
SYLVESTER C. DUNHAM, Counsel.
NEW YORK OFFICE, 31 Nassau St.

Arnold Constable & Co.

Hosiery.

Plain and Fancy Lisle-Thread, Silk, and Cashmere Hose and Half-Hose.
Ladies' and Gentlemen's Golf and Bicycle Hose.

Summer Underwear.

Cartwright & Warner's

Celebrated Underwear

for Children, Ladies, and Gentlemen.

Broadway & 19th St.

NEW YORK.

Harper's Periodicals

| | |
|---|---|
| MAGAZINE | - $4 00 a Year |
| WEEKLY | - - 4 00 a Year |
| BAZAR | - - 4 00 a Year |
| LITERATURE | - 4 00 a Year |
| ROUND TABLE | 1 00 a Year |

THE CELEBRATED SOHMER

Heads the List of the Highest-Grade Pianos.

Caution.—The buying public will please not confound the genuine SOHMER Piano with one of a similar-sounding name of a cheap grade. Our name spells—

S—O—H—M—E—R

New York Warerooms — SOHMER BUILDING, Fifth Ave., cor 22d St.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

WALTER J. TRAVIS.

H. J. WHIGHAM.

JAMES A. TYNG.

F. S. DOUGLAS.

THE MORRIS COUNTY GOLF-COURSE.

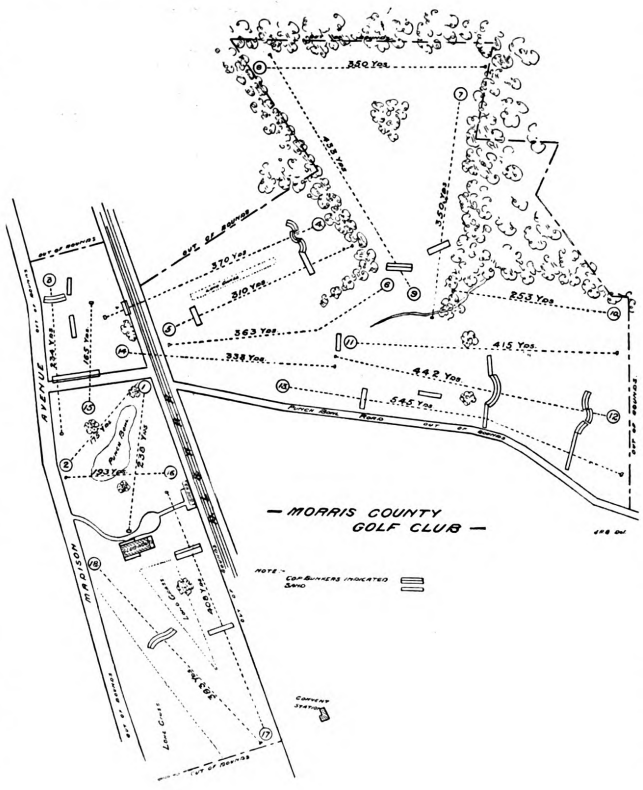
THE mere laying out of a golf-course is one thing; its development into conformity with championship conditions is quite another. The one may be the work of a day; the other is generally the result of years experimenting and rearrangement. All of the famous Old World courses have been perfected after this fashion, and our American links are now passing through a similar process of change and evolution.

It is only by the test of actual play that the golfing character of any piece of ground can be developed to the best advantage. What may look feasible in theory is often impossible in practice, and, contrariwise, a radical departure from orthodox canons may be amply justified by its practical outcome. It is a problem that may have many answers but only one solution. It is only after successive trials that we can be sure that we have found it.

The U. S. G. A. has selected the course of the Morris County Golf Club as the scene for the amateur championship meeting of 1898, and the choice is a wise one. The club's location is central, the accommodation for visitors is excellent, and the playing conditions are of the first order. The length and arrangement of the holes and the character of the turf and hazards make the course a fair proving-ground for the best of golf, and it will be the best man who shall win out in the championship meeting.



But golf at Morristown is a very different thing from what it was at the organization of the club four years ago. Not a link remains of the original course, for even the holes in and around the well-known "punch-bowl" have been changed, both in location and in the playing direction. The first hole was orginally situated upon the left-hand edge of the "punch-bowl"; now it is in the far right-hand corner. The home hole has been changed twice, and now occupies the old croquet-ground. The old seven-hole course covered some fifteen acres and aggregated about 1300 yards in playing distance; the present eighteen-hole round runs over ninety acres and foots up 5960 yards.

Of course it was the "punch-bowl" that first suggested the idea of golf to the Morristown pioneers. Its steep hollows and long grassy swales gave it a sporty appearance, and promised infinite possibilities. It is still an interesting feature of the course, but custom and the growth in golfing skill have robbed it of its old-time terrors. The three holes within its borders are now accounted as easy.

The original seven-hole round was ridiculously short—hardly more than a putting course. Most of the holes could be reached by a moderately good drive, and there was not a true second shot in the round. This weakness soon became apparent, and in 1895 the club acquired the lease of sixty-five acres of outlying land, and proceeded to install the full number of eighteen holes. This addition brought the playing distance up to two and three-quarter miles, and two of the holes were well over four hundred yards. This was a decided step in advance, but the playing qualities of the course were very far from perfection. The artificial hazards were badly arranged, with unfair traps in the way of trees and fencing; the fair green was rough and stony, and the putting-greens were small and far from true.

In 1896 the course was radically rearranged. Some of the flat meadow-land was abandoned and new ground was taken in. The club having been organized as a stock company, the whole tract was purchased, and solemnly consecrated to the interest of golf, and of golf alone. The green committee had many difficulties with which to contend, but at the close of the season (when the first woman's championship meeting was held upon it) the course was in very fair condition, and afforded a good test of golfing ability.

In 1897 it was determined that still further changes were necessary if the course were to conform to championship conditions. The club secured written opinions from Mr. Whigham and from several professionals upon the best possible utilization of the playing area, and these several suggestions were carefully sifted down and weighed against each other. The result is the course as it exists to-day, and in practice the various changes have been more than justified. Moreover, when the club decided to apply for the amateur championship meeting, the resolution carried with it the expensive necessity of laying water-pipes to every separate green, and the thorough overhauling of the mid-course. This has involved an immense amount of work, but it has been done, and done well. A forest of trees has been cut down and tons of stones have been carted off. Not a fence remains to bar the player's progress, and the big grass tees are a welcome innovation upon the ridiculous elevations of stone-hard clay, which were once considered the only proper thing. The putting-greens are all of the largest size, and most of them are upon the natural lay of the land—true, smooth, and beautifully undulating. The fair green is as good as it can ever be upon an inland course, and the playing distance is very nearly three and one-half miles. As the arena of the forth-coming national contest, it will be interesting to examine it in detail.

Going to the first hole (238 yards), the play is over the right slope of the "punch-bowl." A pulled ball may be buried in long grass at the bottom of the hollow, and a badly sliced one may go out of bounds to the right. The only other chance of trouble is in an overplayed approach, and the green is large and level. Bogey is four.

The second hole (175 yards) calls for careful consideration. The line runs across a corner of the "punch-bowl," and the edge of the plateau is about one hundred and sixty-five yards from the tee. A strong driver is not unlikely to play his ball into Madison Avenue, which is out of bounds, and consequently unplayable. The natural remedy would be to take a brassey or a cleek, but it is a long shot to safety, if we play directly on the flag. Anything short of 160 yards will leave the ball on the steep hillside, and very possibly in an impracticable cup. If we play well to the right the ball may strike in the branches of a wide-spreading oak-tree (one of the few that the axe has spared) and rebound into the depths of the "punch-bowl." The problem is one that every player must work out for himself. Colonel Bogey does the hole in three.

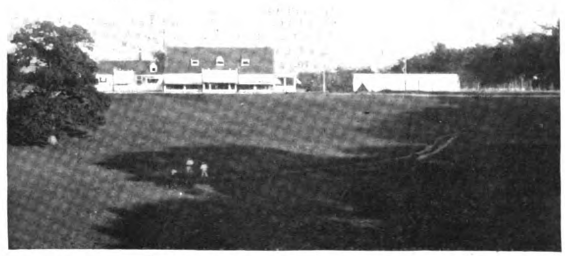
Going to the third hole (234 yards) an earth bunker must be carried from the tee, and a pulled ball is out of bounds. An open sand-pit may trap a sliced ball, but there is plenty of room if we drive even moderately straight. The hole is guarded by a cop-bunker, and the field beyond is out of bounds and unplayable. Bogey is four, and the hole is generally done in that figure.

The railway and a cop-bunker are the initial hazards for the fourth hole (370 yards). The danger limit is not over fifty yards or so, but a ball lying within the white stakes that define the railway embankment is unplayable. In this (as in all other cases of balls in unplayable ground) the local rules provide that the player must immediately drop and play another ball from the place of the original stroke, and lose only distance. A ball striking a telegraph pole or wire may be teed or dropped (according to whether the interrupted stroke was a tee or field shot), and replayed without penalty.

Safely over the railway, the line runs gently upward to the green, and the brassey lies are excellent. The hole is protected by a cop-bunker, and unplayable woodland punishes an over-approach. Bogey is five.

The fifth hole (310 yards) presents no especial features. An open sand ditch lies in wait for a topped tee shot, and there is a second hazard of the same variety to guard the green. Bogey is four.

It is possible to reach the sixth hole (363 yards) in two strokes, but both drive and brassey must be first-class play. The line is slightly deflected by a point of woods (as shown upon the map), and the average playing distance is consequently a trifle over the official figure. The woods being unplayable ground, it will not do to shave the danger point too closely, and we consequently drive slightly to the right of the true line. The green is one of the largest and finest on the course, and is unprotected. Bogey is five.



Open sand-pits, directly in front and on the left, punish a weak or wild drive to the seventh hole (350 yards). Unplayable woodland bounds the course upon the right,

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

but otherwise the way is clear to the hole. The green itself is a grassy hollow, not unlike the "saucer" at Ardsley, and affords a fine chance for scientific putting. Bogey is five.

It is a beautiful view from the high tee of the eighth hole, but the golfer will probably have no eyes except for the splendid chance afforded him for getting in a "screamer." The course is of generous width, and it is all downhill to the hole. The ball gets a fine run, and although the distance is 350 yards, the second shot may be generally brought off with a cleek, for the green lies at the bottom of a steep slope. Beyond is unplayable ground, and to the right of the green is a lot of stone that means endless trouble to the slicer. Colonel Bogey is credited with a four.

A drive, a brassey, and an iron may bring us to the turn at the ninth green (433 yards), but it is an excellent hole in the Bogey figure of five. The lies are only fair, and the green is guarded by a high cop-bunker. The total Bogey for the outward journey foots up thirty-nine, and it is good golfing that can score within four strokes of that figure.

CLUB-HOUSE.

Beginning the homeward journey, a good drive and an iron approach bring us to the tenth hole (253 yards). An overplayed approach is out of bounds in the woodland, but the Bogey of four is generally equalled in steady play.

The eleventh hole (415 yards) and the twelfth hole (442 yards) call for no especial notice. A sand-pit punishes an over-approach to the tenth green, and there are two cop-bunkers to cross in going to the twelfth. The first of these bunkers is intended as the hazard for the second shot, but it lies so far from the tee that it is often skirted, on either side, without material loss in distance. Bogey is five for each hole.

JAMES F. CURTIS.

The thirteenth hole (545 yards) is the longest on the course, and open sand-pits are the hazards for the first, second, and third shots. The road to the left is out of bounds and unplayable. The lies are good, but the golfer's driving must be first class if the hole is to be halved with Colonel Bogey in six.

The fourteenth (333 yards) is the crux of the course. If the drive is a good one, the ball will have a good lie on gently rising ground, and the green may be reached with an iron. But the green is protected by formidable hazards to both right and left, and the way in is comparatively narrow. Moreover, the unplayable railway is again to be crossed, and there are therefore three chances of trouble to one of safety. Colonel Bogey regularly does the hole in four, and his competitors may either do as well or be hopelessly distanced. It is to be remembered that a ball on the track must be dropped and played again from the same place, and if the player's nerve chances to desert him at this critical moment, the process may be repeated indefinitely.

The fifteenth hole (165 yards) may be reached in one, but the earth bunker and road are full 135 yards from the tee, and there is therefore plenty of room for error. There is no sand-pit in front of the bunker, but the road and ditches beyond are full of bad lies. As the distance to safety is a little beyond the range of a cleek, most players use the brassey, and an over-drive does but little harm. Bogey is three.

The drive to the sixteenth hole (193 yards) is over the widest stretch of the "punch-bowl," and it is about one hundred and eighty yards to level ground. But the slope is well turfed, and a tee shot of anything over 125 yards will not be punished. Bogey is four.

Going to the seventeenth hole (408 yards) there is a high cop-bunker, 100 yards away, to be carried from the tee, and a sand-pit for the second shot. Both this and the home hole are laid out over the flat, and the lies are excellent. A strong over-approach to the green may be out of bounds, and over the fence to the left is unplayable ground, Bogey is five.

A high cop-bunker is the hazard for the second shot on the eighteenth hole (383 yards), but this is the only difficulty on the way to the green, except for some long grass on the left. Colonel Bogey is credited with a five.

Bogey foots up 39 for going out and 41 for coming in, or 80 in all. I append the amateur record up to date (September 2), as made by Mr. Winthrop Rutherfurd on July 22, and since tied by Mr. W. J. Travis:

| | | | | | | | | | | |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| Out | 4 | 4 | 4 | 5 | 5 | 4 | 6 | 6 | 5 | —43 |
| In | 5 | 4 | 5 | 7 | 3 | 4 | 4 | 5 | 4 | —41 = 84 |

The good points of the course are its length, the excellent condition of the fair green, the judgment shown in the situation of the hazards, and the large and true greens. The absence of a water hazard is to be regretted, and another weakness is the lack of a genuine short hole. As already pointed out, a cleek may be used at the second hole, but it is hardly possible to reach the green with it. The two other "punch-bowl" holes (the fifteenth and sixteenth) may be reached in one, but a wooden club is necessary.

It will be noted that the strict application of the local rule relating to a ball out of bounds virtually eliminates the contingency of a lost ball, with its accompanying penalty of lost hole. The rule comes into operation the instant that the ball goes into unplayable ground, and it makes no difference whether or not the ball is recovered. This rule was originally introduced at the amateur championship meeting on the Chicago Club course a year ago. It worked very well in practice, but it must be remembered that the Wheaton course is laid out in a peculiar way. Seven successive holes are bounded by a fence at a short distance to the left, and a pulled ball is consequently sure to get into trouble. At Morristown the conditions are much more varied, and the factor of safety is larger. But the rule is nevertheless made to apply not only to balls outside of the club property, but also to wild shots within it. For example, a ball sliced into the woods at the seventh hole is unplayable if it lie outside of the wire that marks the limit of the course, and despite the fact that it could easily be played out. The Wheaton rule deals only with balls that are distinctly outside of club property; the Morristown amendment applies its operation to wild shots within its own territory. The rule declares that a ball is out of bounds (i. e., unplayable)—

THE EIGHTH HOLE.

(a) When outside of fences or other boundaries of club property, except when in the public road running through club property—viz., from Madison Avenue to Railroad (holes 3 and 15), thence westerly, parallel with track, to point indicated by red stake (holes 4 and 14).

(b) When within twenty feet of the centre of the railway track, as indicated by white stakes.

(c) When in the woods outside a line marked by wires.

Paragraph c is certainly a far-reaching innovation upon the accepted code of the game, and directly conflicts with the fundamental principles of match play, that a ball must be played or the hole given up, and that lost ball is lost hole. A ball outside of club property may properly be declared unplayable (vide the rule relating to the station-master's garden at St. Andrews), but it is against all the traditions of the match game that a ball anywhere on the course should not be played from where it lies, with the single exception of water. The utmost concession would be to substitute the word may for must in the case of balls lying within six inches of a water-hydrant or similar obstruction or in a gopher-hole. It does not seem that the Morristown rule of loss of distance only is sufficient penalty for a wild drive that is hopelessly lost in the woodland; and, again, a player should not be forced to lose the advantage of an extra-long shot simply because his ball may lie an inch or so beyond the wire, plainly visible, easily played out, and distinctly upon club property.

THE TENTH PUTTING-GREEN.

As to the prospects of the meeting, it seems likely that the entry list will be over the hundred mark. It is fortunate that Mr. Whigham is safely through with his war correspondence in Cuba, as otherwise his absence would deprive the event of its chief interest.

Judging from the results of the several open tournaments up to date, a list of the leading players would include the names of W. J. Travis (Oakland), F. S. Douglas (Fairfield), H. C. Leeds (Myopia), H. P. Toler (Baltusrol), G. C. Clark, Jr. (Harvard), A. M. Robbins (St. Andrews), H. B. Hollins, Jr. (Westbrook), C. B. Macdonald (Chicago), J. A. Tyng (Morris County), J. F. Curtis (Harvard), H. M. Harriman (Oakland), G. McC. Sargent (Harvard), W. D. Vanderpool (Morris County), J. G. Thorp (Brookline), and J. I. Blair (Princeton).

Travis has the top record for the season so far, and is credited with no fewer than five gold medals for the best scores in qualifying rounds and at medal play. He has also won the match-play cups at Dyker Meadows, Knollwood, and Oakland. Harriman won two gold medals at Oakland for the lowest returns in the qualifying and handicap rounds. H. P. Toler took the cup at the Baltusrol meeting, and also the gold medal for the best qualifying score. Douglas captured the Lakewood cup, and Hollins won the Shinnecock cup, and also the gold medal in the handicap. Leeds won the cup at Aiken during the winter, and made an excellent showing at the open tournament held on the Myopia Club course. J. F. Curtis is the intercollegiate champion, and Clark has been playing a very strong game in the handicap events at Shinnecock. Last season J. A. Tyng was the leading player in the Metropolitan circuit, but this year he has not put a single win to his credit, and was beaten in the finals at Seabright by Hugh K. Toler, a player who has never been thought to be in the same class with the Morris County championship. However, Tyng will certainly be among the thirty-two elect, and, once in his game, he is notoriously a hard man to beat.

The younger set, represented by Curtis and Clark, have been coming on with a rush of late, and may furnish some surprises at Morristown. But it must be remembered that the match-play rounds this year are at thirty-six instead of eighteen holes, and physical endurance may be a large factor in the final result. It is understood that this will prevent young Hollins from competing. He is hardly more than a boy, and his father thinks it best that he should wait another year.

Whigham and Douglas are undoubtedly at the top of the golfing tree, and if they come together the match should be the event of the meeting. Whigham beat Douglas at Chicago last September, but Douglas more than evened matters at Lakewood. Moreover, Douglas has been practising all summer, while Whigham has hardly had a chance to touch his clubs. It looks like Douglas's year, barring the dark horse.

The Bogey of 80 has already been given in detail, but it may be interesting to work out the par score, with particular reference to the kind of stroke-play required at the several holes. According to Mr. A. H. Doleman, the inventor of the system, the average first-class drive is put down at 170 yards, and of course two putts are allowed on every green.

| Hole. | Strokes. | Par. | Yards. |
|---|---|---|---|
| 1 | Drive and quarter iron | 4 | 288 |
| 2 | Drive or brassey | 3 | 175 |
| 3 | Drive and quarter iron | 4 | 234 |
| 4 | Two drives and short pitch | 5 | 370 |
| 5 | Drive and full cleek | 4 | 310 |
| 6 | Two drives and short pitch | 5 | 363 |
| 7 | Two drives and short pitch | 5 | 350 |
| 8 | Drive and brassey | 4 | 350 |
| 9 | Two drives and half iron | 5 | 433 |
| 10 | Drive and full iron | 4 | 253 |
| 11 | Two drives and half iron | 5 | 415 |
| 12 | Two drives and full iron | 5 | 442 |
| 13 | Three drives and short pitch | 6 | 545 |
| 14 | Drive and full cleek | 4 | 333 |
| 15 | Drive or brassey | 3 | 165 |
| 16 | Drive and short pitch | 4 | 193 |
| 17 | Two drives and quarter iron | 5 | 406 |
| 18 | Two drives and short pitch | 5 | 383 |

W. G. VAN T. SUTPHEN.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

HAWAII.

THE RAISING OF THE STARS AND STRIPES.

[Special Correspondence of "Harper's Weekly."]

The morning of the 12th of August, 1898, dawned upon the little city of Honolulu cloudy and showery, but advancing day brought promise of fair weather, and by eleven o'clock there was nothing to fear from passing clouds. There was a holiday air about the town; stores and shops were closed everywhere, Chinese and Japanese joining unanimously in the general suspension of business; for it is a great day in the annals of this people—at noon to-day the little republic of Hawaii will become a part of the great republic of the United States of America.

Before eleven o'clock the people began to flock to the spacious grounds which surround the Executive Building. Over the front steps a long platform was built, on which were seats for the chief actors in the day's events, while on either side of this platform and in the broad verandas were seats where spectators gathered—a quiet, expectant crowd.

It is a holiday, but the faces are serious and thoughtful. There are men and women here who have labored for this hour, looking forward to it with anxious longing, and now that it has come they realize that it is a solemn occasion, not a time for noisy demonstration, and in their thankfulness for the fulfilment of their earnest desire they feel a sympathetic thrill for the kindly people whose place among the nations is soon to become vacant.

The military bodies begin to come in—first the Citizen's Guard, who take up their position on the left; next to them the Sharp-shooters; then the small band of veterans who form the George de Long Post, G.A.R. The police, under Captain Kanae, form on the right. A battalion of 319 men from the U. S. Flag-ship Philadelphia and the U. S. S. Mohican were met at the boat-landing by the National Guard of Hawaii and escorted to the grounds, where they took their station in the driveway directly in front of the official platform. The First Battalion, First Regiment of the National Guard, formed in the driveway to the left, the Second Battalion in the driveway to the right.

The diplomatic corps, government and naval officials, and distinguished guests began to take their places on the platform at 11.30. President Dole, his staff and cabinet, came about fifteen minutes later, followed by Minister Sewall, Admiral Miller and staff, Consul Haywood, Vice-Consul Boyd, Colonel Barber, commanding the First New York volunteers, to be stationed in Honolulu, and other American naval and military officers.

All stood while the Rev. G. L. Pearson, of the Methodist Church, chaplain of the last Senate of the Hawaiian Republic, offered the invocation.

The prayer was over. The soldiers changed from "rest" to "attention." Minister Sewall and President Dole arose, and as they faced each other, Minister Sewall said:

"Mr. President, I present you a certified copy of a joint resolution of the Congress of the United States, approved by the President on July 7, 1898, entitled, 'Joint resolution to provide for annexing of the Hawaiian Islands to the United States.'

"This joint resolution accepts, ratifies, and confirms on the part of the United States the cession formally consented to and approved by the republic of Hawaii."

President Dole said: "A treaty of political union having been made, and the cession formally consented to by the republic of Hawaii having been accepted by the United States of America, I now, in the interest of the Hawaiian body-politic, and with full confidence in the honor, justice, and friendship of the American people, yield up to you, representing the government of the United States, the sovereignty and public property of the Hawaiian Islands."

The signal was given, and a salute of twenty-one guns was fired in honor of the Hawaiian flag from the battery on the grounds and the flag-ship; the bands played the national anthem, "Hawaii Ponoii." There was a moment of oppressive silence—even the trade-wind held its breath; the halyards quivered, and as the "retreat" sounded, slowly the standard of Hawaii came down, clinging timidly at first to the cord, as if fearful of falling, then dropping in limp tired folds. Not a word was spoken, but not many eyes were dry, and tears rolled down the cheeks of men and women, old and young. They believed it was right and best for Hawaii and her people, but they remembered happy years under the old banner, and their hearts whispered "Aloha" as it was tenderly and reverently folded away.

Captain Berger, the band-master, with kindly consideration, had excused the Hawaiian members of the band from this duty; indeed, he would gladly have yielded his own place for a moment; but he stood his ground like a veteran, as he is, and with streaming eyes directed, for the last time officially, the playing of the hymn he had himself composed twenty-five years ago, and which he had played thousands of times.

Minister Sewall now said: "In the name of the United States of America I accept the transfer of the sovereignty and property of the Hawaiian government.

"The admiral commanding the United States naval forces in these waters will proceed to perform the duty intrusted to him."

The order is given. The bugle sounds "to colors," the bands strike up the stirring notes of the "Star-spangled Banner," and steadily and majestically rises the American flag. Higher and higher it goes; the sun, whose face has been hidden in sympathetic clouds, breaks out in brightest smile; the trade-wind's breath has come back, and as the beautiful bright banner clears the tower it is caught and flung out in broad brave folds, while the people greet it with cheers. Shore battery and ships make the air tremble with twenty-one guns, and under the waves of "Old Glory" little Hawaii claims her part in the "land of the free and the home of the brave."

Minister Sewall then read a proclamation to the government of the Hawaiian Islands, in which it was stated that, in the exercise of the power conferred on him by the joint resolution, the President of the United States directs that the civil, judicial, and military powers in question shall be exercised by the officers of the republic of Hawaii as it existed just prior to the transfer of sovereignty, subject to his power to remove such officers and to fill vacancies.

All such officers and all military forces will be required at once to take the oath of allegiance to the United States, and all bonded officers to renew their bonds to the government of the United States. The municipal legislation of Hawaii, except such as relates to treaties with foreign countries, or is inconsistent with the joint resolution, or contrary to the Constitution of the United States and the present customs relations of Hawaii with the United States and other countries, remains unchanged till Congress shall have extended the customs laws and regulations of the United States to the islands.

On hearing this, people exchanged looks of satisfaction; it was reassuring to hear that no sudden or violent change was to be made in the management of affairs. It is gratifying to the native people to know that Mr. Dole is not to be immediately suspended by some total stranger who could have no interest in them. Many even of his political opponents have confidence in his affection for the Hawaiian people. He is ka-ma-aina, that is, an old resident, or a son of the soil. He has grown up with them and knows their manner of thought; of course he is better to them than a stranger could be.

Minister Sewall made a short but eloquent speech, in which he addressed the assembly as "Fellow-countrymen," congratulated them on the consummation of the day's record, commended their loyalty to the father-land, and urged them to help maintain the free institutions extended to them in the spirit in which they had sought them. He closed with these words: "Advance to the uplifting and upbuilding of this land, to prove it worthy to share the destiny of the great republic.

"Empire may wait, indeed, but no hand save His who holds in the hollow of His hand the fate of nations can stay that destiny.

"God bless you, my countrymen!

"God bless the United States of America!"

And the hearts of the people answered, "Amen!"

Chief-Justice Judd then administered the oath of allegiance to President Dole and his cabinet officers, and the simple but impressive ceremonies were over.

The scene now changes to the parade-ground in the rear of the Executive Building, where a hollow square is formed, three sides being composed by the police force and the National Guard, the fourth by the battalion from the war-ships. President Dole and staff, Minister Cooper, Chief-Justice Judd, Mrs. Dole, and others cross the open space, Staff-Captain Pratt bearing a silk American flag. This flag has a history. It was the personal property of Lieutenant-Commander (now Commander) Swinburne, and was carried by the Boston battalion while on shore duty under his command during the American protectorate of 1893.

When the Boston left Honolulu, Lieutenant-Commander Swinburne presented the flag to President and Mrs. Dole. Mr. Dole, in acknowledging the gift, expressed the hope that the flag would be carried by the Hawaiian forces on the consummation of annexation. The time had come for the fulfilment of this hope. President Dole presented the flag to Colonel Fisher, who tendered the thanks of the regiment. D. L. Naone, color-sergeant, received it and unfurled it in line.

Colonel Fisher and his officers then took the oath, and the regiment was sworn in by companies, those who did not wish to do so stepping aside; almost all remained. D. L. Naone is a pure Hawaiian, who has been a stanch annexationist from the beginning. He is intelligent, industrious, and conscientious. In 1896 he was Speaker of the House, and filled the position acceptably. He speaks English, and is quite capable of making his own decisions.

Another historic flag figured in the ceremonies of the day; it was the identical flag which, on the 1st of April, 1893, was hauled down by order of Mr. Blount. Lieutenant Lucien Young carried it at that time on board the Boston, and, having exchanged it for another, has kept it carefully during the intervening years. Before he sailed for Cuba in May he gave it to Hon. Lorrin Thurston, requesting him, if possible, to have it raised to its old place on the staff on the Judiciary Building when annexation should be accomplished. The plan was approved, and, as the new flag was raised upon the Executive Building, this old flag was drawn up to its former place, and stretching itself out in glad waves of red, white, and blue, seemed to sing aloud, "This time I have come to stay."

In the evening there were fireworks, followed by a reception and ball. It was an ideal night for such a display, clear and dark. The large grounds were literally filled with people, and the glow of the different-colored fires which were lighted from time to time among the trees made a vision of fairy-land. At nine o'clock the mimic bombardment ceased, and hundreds of incandescent lights flashed out upon the façade of the building, the central object being a great shield glowing with the national colors.

In the reception-room tasteful ladies had been busy, and ferns and palms brightened with American flags filled one end of the room, while the gorgeous scarlet and yellow blossoms of the "ponciana regia" and the graceful cluster of the "golden shower" (yellow cathartic-pus) were heaped under the great mirrors. Nobody seemed to care that the Spanish colors were in evidence; the flowers were beautiful, if they were red and yellow.

But it was time for the receiving party to approach, and the people thronged the hall to watch them as they descended the broad stairway. President and Mrs. Dole came first, then Minister and Mrs. Sewall, Mrs. Damon, Admiral Miller, and Colonel Barber.

The crowd gave way to let them pass, and entering the room, they took their places in front of the great bank of ferns and palms. Long lines of people now filed in, bowed and shook hands in true democratic style, and passing on, filled the room and overflowed upon the verandas.

There have been large assemblies in this place before, but surely none so large as this, and never such a variety of peoples—Hawaiians, Chinese, Japanese, Portuguese, English, Germans, Americans, high and low, rich and poor, anybody, everybody—was welcome. It was as democratic an assembly as the most exacting could demand, yet it was dignified enough to suit the most fastidious.

The dancers seemed to enjoy themselves in spite of the crowd; indeed, every one seemed to be in a great good-humor.

Perfect order was a marked characteristic of the day, notwithstanding the cosmopolitan character of the population, which is so often spoken of as an objectionable feature; no extra police or soldiers were employed, and only a single policeman had charge of the station-house.

Among the Hawaiians these events have doubtless caused some bewilderment. There are plenty of unscrupulous men who play upon their childish credulity with wild tales of slavery and robbery under American rule. When a better-informed man tells them otherwise, if he is a Hawaiian they wonder if he knows as much about it as white men who know white men's ways; if he is a white man they wonder which to believe. So it comes to pass that they are led to distrust their truest friends. Like all childlike people, it is easy to arouse their suspicions, and there are always those who are cruel enough to take advantage of their weakness.

Natives all over the islands show a readiness to take the oath of allegiance to the United States. The reluctance of the band boys to play at the lowering of the flag should not be construed as antagonism to America; it was partly sentiment, and maybe partly fear of the Kahunas—medicine-men—who oppose the advance of civilization for the same reason which influenced Demetrius the silversmith of Ephesus in the days of the Apostle Paul, because it interferes with their gains.

They are kindly, peaceable people, teachable and law-abiding. Under the just administration of the laws of the United States there is nothing to fear from them, as there is nothing for them to fear—for He who "has made of one blood all the nations of the earth," and who "taketh up the isles as a little thing," has been leading this people out of darkness into light, out of weakness into the strong protecting care of the greater republic.

Elizabeth Van Cleve Hall.

THE WOOD-LILY.

Within the forest's meadow-bordered hem,
Poising, light-tilted, on a single stem;
In lonely beauty; seldom seen with more
Than three companions at the forest door;
I hail thee as a messenger of grace
Sent to enliven sunless wold and space.

Slim-petaled wonder of a race too few;
Shy cousin of that tossing retinue
Which top with splendor the tall meadow grass:
Jocund are they with all the sprites that pass
—Bee, bird, and zephyr. But thou shinest alone
To brighten here the wood's umbrageous zone.

Looking the dense-roofed forest up and down,
Nothing seems more imperial than thy crown;
'Tis never far from knoll, or meadow-side,
Never uplifted with cool, flaunting pride;
But comes, in all its glorious garb arrayed,
Beauty's evangel to the gloom and shade.

Joel Benton.

PATERNALISM ON THE CONTINENT.*

Put broadly, but none too strongly, the vital difference between English-speaking countries and Continental Europe is that in the former the state exists for the benefit of the people, and in the latter the people for the benefit of the state. In the one it is the object of government to make itself felt as little as possible, and leave to the individual citizen the widest latitude of conduct in commerce, politics, and private life; in the other the theory obtains that without state supervision the individual citizen cannot be restrained from an extreme and variegated anarchy. England has long outgrown her own ideal of a paternal state, which, in Macaulay's words, "would regulate the cut of a man's coat and the number of dishes on his table," and in outgrowing it has sown half the world with the fruitful seed of Anglo-Saxon liberty. The nations of Europe, starting from the same form of commonwealth, have developed on exactly opposite lines. Instead of extending the powers of the feudal nobles to the people, they absorbed those powers into the state and made it omnipotent. While England was widening the area of authority, till each man came to look upon himself as in some way directly responsible for the well-being of his country, France and Germany gathered all power in the hands of the king and his advisers, and taught the people to look to them for guidance in everything.

The processes of these two movements and their results are set forth by Mr. Gaullieur in a series of vivid and emphatic sketches, which seem to owe some of their dramatic intensity to a study of Carlyle's literary methods. He explains that the theory of a paternal state once admitted in France has never been abandoned, and in this he finds the source of France's failure to colonize, and of the ominous growth of militarism within her borders. Under whatever form of government, Frenchmen still cling to the idea that light and leading and inventive enterprise must flow from the state alone; and so long as that doctrine is accepted, it matters not whether France is ruled by a monarchy, an empire, or a republic, for each in its turn must be absolute and despotic. Most of the troubles of modern France are due to the attempt to graft English constitutionalism on feudal ideas, to hedge round mediæval principles with a glittering fence of liberalism. The revolutions of the last hundred years have been merely a change from one form of absolutism to another and back again. They have left untouched the "ground ideas" of the French people in their relation to the state. Paternalism is still the key-note of the system, inquisitorial, blighting, repressive, and nothing but a revolution in the French character can alter it.

With Germany the case is not so very different. Mr. Gaullieur shows, in a very interesting chapter on modern Germany, how the swaddling-clothes of paternalism harass the citizen in every step he takes, and how entirely opposed to everything we understand by the word liberty are the methods by which the authority and dignity of the Kaiser and his agents are maintained. The supreme insult to the civilized world of the Dreyfus trial is equalled, if not surpassed, year after year in the German army, and in numberless trials for lèse-majesté, of which Mr. Gaullieur produces some remarkable instances. His book is a very impressive testimony to the soundness of Anglo-Saxon ideas of government, as well as a clear and cleverly written review of the principles on which the Continental nations have been reared. The right understanding of those principles is the key to much that is dark and almost unintelligible in the political condition of France and Germany to-day.

* The Paternal State in France and Germany. By Henry Gaullieur. New York and London: Harper & Brothers.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Are You Weak, Tired, Worn Out, Depressed?

THEN TRY

VIN MARIANI

MARIANI WINE--The Famous Tonic for Body and Brain

MARIANI WINE gives strength to the nervous system, firmness and elasticity to the muscles and richness to the blood. It braces body and brain. It has been endorsed by the medical faculty all over the world.

JULES CLARETIE,
The World-Famous Author and General Administrator of the Comedie Francaise, Writes:

Vin Mariani gives to the body and brain renewed vitality. It is a supreme remedy for artists and brain-workers. Schopenhauer, whose greatness of mind is not disputed, would certainly have been even more brilliant and less bitter if he had had in his Frankfort abode an ample supply of this delicious wine.

JULES CLARETIE.

FOR OVERWORKED MEN, DELICATE WOMEN, SICKLY CHILDREN, MARIANI WINE WORKS WONDERS.

MALARIA: Mariani Wine is a sovereign remedy for Malaria.

SPECIAL OFFER:—To those who will kindly write to MARIANI & CO., mentioning this paper, will be sent, free, book containing portraits and autographs of Emperors, Empress, Princes, Cardinals, Archbishops and other distinguished personages, giving interesting details regarding VIN MARIANI.

MARIANI & CO., 52 West 15th Street, New York.

Paris—41 Boulevard Haussmann;
London—83 Mortimer Street;
Montreal—28-30 Hospital Street.

Its Quality Wins.

HUNTER BALTIMORE RYE.

7,000 Guns in Stock

WE SELL GUNS of every reputable American and foreign make, and give wholesale prices to everybody. We carry in stock

Fishing Tackle and Sporting Goods amounting to a quarter of a million dollars. We can please the fancy of millionaires, or meet the demands of the poorest sportsman and angler. Write for prices, or ask us to send you our Sporting Goods Catalogue. We load and sell over

1,000,000 Hand Loaded Shells a Year Ask us to send you our price card of hand and machine loaded shells. We have

The largest Gun Repair Shop in America We make guns, re-bore, re-stock, repair—in fact, alter a gun to suit the owner, and guarantee satisfaction. Write for prices.

MONTGOMERY WARD & CO.

Originators of the Catalogue Business 111 to 120 Michigan Ave. cor. Madison St., Chicago

MENTION THIS PUBLICATION WHEN WRITING

"An art worthy the knowledge and practice of a wise man."—WALTON.

When you smoke a pipe, you smoke economically! When you smoke a pipe: —smoke

Yale Mixture

A Gentleman's Smoke

in it and you will have a cool, sweet, wholesome smoke.

For Sale Everywhere.

IF YOU'RE A PIPE SMOKER A TRIAL WILL CONVINCE THAT GOLDEN SCEPTRE IS PERFECTION

SEND 10cts FOR SAMPLE PACKAGE — PRICES 1lb 130; ¼lb 40cts POSTAGE PAID. CATALOGUE FREE.

SURBRUG, 159 FULTON ST., N.Y. CITY.

EDUCATION BY MAIL

Thousands have been helped to better pay & positions through our system of instruction

Buildings erected expressly for this purpose at a cost of $225,000

Courses of Steam, Electrical, Mechanical or Civil Engineering; Chemistry; Mining; Mechanical and Architectural Drawing; Surveying; Plumbing; Architecture; Metal Pattern Drafting; Prospecting; Bookkeeping; Shorthand; English Branches.

$2 A MONTH pays for a College Education at Home. 40,000 Students and Graduates.

Circular FREE. State subject you wish to study.

THE INTERNATIONAL CORRESPONDENCE SCHOOLS
Box 1159, Scranton, Pa., U. S. A.

PENS

THE BEST PENS ARE ESTERBROOK & CO. PROFESSIONAL PEN

ESTERBROOK'S

LEADING NUMBERS: 048, 14, 130, 239, 313, AI, 556.

PENS IN ALL STYLES, FOR EVERY PURPOSE.

FOR SALE BY ALL STATIONERS.

The Esterbrook Steel Pen Co.
26 John St., N. Y. Works, Camden, N. J.

All modern cyclometers are efforts to copy the

Veeder CYCLOMETER

DUST PROOF WATER PROOF
POSITIVE ACTION
CATALOGUE FREE.

VEEDER MFG. CO. HARTFORD CONN.

THIS AUTOGRAPH IS NEVER ON A POOR SHADE-ROLLER AND NEVER ABSENT FROM A GOOD ONE.

Stewart Hartshorn

GET THE GENUINE HARTSHORN

Financial

Letters of Credit.

Bills of Exchange bought and sold. Cable Transfers to Europe and South Africa. Commercial and Travellers' Letters of Credit. Collections made.

Brown Brothers & Co.,

BANKERS, No. 59 WALL STREET.

BRASS BAND

Instruments, Drums, Uniforms, Equipments for Bands and Drum Corps. Lowest prices ever quoted. Fine Catalog, 400 Illustrations, mailed free; it gives Band Music & Instructions for Amateur Bands.

LYON & HEALY. 17 Adams St., Chicago.

HARPER & BROTHERS'

New Books

A STUDY OF A CHILD. By LOUISE E. HOGAN. With a Colored Frontispiece and Many Illustrations by the Child. Crown 8vo, Cloth, Ornamental, $2 50.

In this work Mrs. Hogan tells the story of the growth of the mental faculties in a child, in a natural way, without any of the ordinary hot-house methods so often producing a hybrid. Although we have all noticed and been impressed—almost startled—by unexpected bursts of intelligence in the little ones about us, few have ever made such a study of the development of the human soul, and given us such patient, loving data.

THE GOLFER'S ALPHABET. Pictures by A. B. FROST. Verses by W. G. VAN T. SUTPHEN. Small 4to, Illuminated Boards. Price, $1 50.

The humors of golf are apparently inexhaustible, and Mr. Frost, himself a keen player, has worked con amore in illustrating the harmless foibles of his fellow-enthusiasts. The verses of the alphabet are by Mr. Sutphen, and have the agreeable lightness of touch that characterized the half-dozen stories contained within the covers of "The Golficide."

A CONSTITUTIONAL HISTORY OF THE AMERICAN PEOPLE. 1776-1850. By FRANCIS NEWTON THORPE. Illustrated with Maps. Two Volumes. Crown 8vo, Cloth, Uncut Edges and Gilt Tops, $5 00.

Mr. Thorpe's work is an original study in the history of politics in this country. To quote from the Preface: "It contains the evidences of changes—and, it is believed, of progress—in the ideas and opinions which the American people have held respecting the principles, the organization, and the administration of their civil institutions. It is a record of the evolution of government in this country since the Revolution, and it rests upon authorities hitherto almost entirely disregarded."

New York HARPER & BROTHERS London
Publishers

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

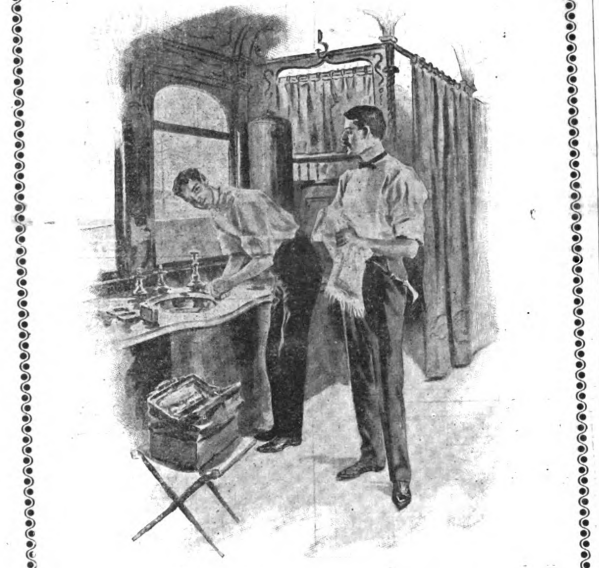
GOLFER (who has engaged a room at a seaside hotel on the strength of its advertisement of a golf links among its other attractions). "I've been out looking for the golf links; where are they?"

HOTEL CLERK. "Golf links! Why, certainly; we've got them right here in the office, and I'll have them put out for you in half an hour." [A fact.]

A delicious drink and a piquant relish.

Vigoral

"Concentrated Beef"



Represents all the nutriment and flavor of prime roast beef in a condensed form. It builds up the invalid. Strengthens the convalescent.
Our Chafing Dish Recipe Book sent upon request. It gives fifty ways of using Vigoral.
ARMOUR & COMPANY, CHICAGO.

No. 4711 ESSENCE OF Rhine Violets No. 4711

The highest degree of refinement.—Wonderfully delicate and lasting.—Absolutely true odor of the living flower.—Be sure to get the "No. 4711."

Sole U. S. Agents
MÜLHENS & KROPFF
NEW YORK

The quality of the soap at even the best hotels and on sleeping cars is not usually in keeping with the luxury of modern travel.

The man who does not wish to use for his toilet and bath, a soap of poor quality and detestable odor, will carry Ivory Soap in his toilet case.

Copyright, 1897, by The Procter & Gamble Co., Cincinnati.

Campers and Yachtsmen

can have home comforts by providing themselves with our "PERFECTION" AIR MATTRESSES and CUSHIONS. Waterproof—Light—Convenient. Made in any shape or size desired.

Illustrated catalogue sent free on application.

MECHANICAL FABRIC CO.,
Air-Goods Department. PROVIDENCE, R. I.

STEVENS

FAVORITE APART.

"STEVENS FAVORITE" RIFLE.

"Take Down" model, 22-inch barrel, weight 4½ pounds. Carefully bored and tested. For .22, .25, and .32 rim-fire cartridges.

17, Plain open sights, $6.00
18, Target sights, $8.50
19, Lyman sights, $9.00

Ask your dealer for the "FAVORITE." If he doesn't keep it, we will send, prepaid, on receipt of price.

Send stamp for our complete catalogue.

J. Stevens Arms & Tool Co.,
POST-OFFICE BOX 210,
Chicopee Falls, Mass.

CHINA IN TRANSFORMATION

By Archibald R. Colquhoun

Gold Medallist, Royal Geographical Society; Formerly Deputy Commissioner, Burma, Administrator of Mashonaland, and Special Correspondent of the "Times" in the Far East, etc.

With Frontispiece, Maps, and Diagrams. 8vo, Cloth, $3 00.

SOME PRESS OPINIONS

"This remarkable work . . . gives, compacted into a single volume, more than most readers would gather from many volumes—a more complete view of the country and the people, and the problems of its politics and its commerce, and the whole brought down to date. It is a mass of information, but an ordered and marshalled mass, so directed by practical sagacity and purpose as to serve alike the merchant and the statesman."—Leeds Mercury.

"Mr. Colquhoun possesses excellent qualifications and is in every respect well equipped for the task he has undertaken. . . . Small wonder, then, that in the result we are provided with a volume which coming at the present moment supplies what is a decided desideratum, a book which makes clear to the most ordinary understanding the status quo existing in the Celestial Empire to-day."—Pall Mall Gazette.

"Mr. Colquhoun has given us an excellent survey of the China question, compiled with great industry, and entertainingly and lucidly written."—Daily Graphic.

"Concise and yet lucid, of small compass and yet wonderfully comprehensive, containing all that the practical inquirer needs to know, with hints for those of more recondite taste. . . . Running through the book will be found a number of good stories illustrating traits of the Chinese character, into which Mr. Colquhoun possesses a singular insight."—The Graphic.

"We know nothing more interesting in English books upon China than Mr. Colquhoun's discussion of the Chinese mind and character, the Chinese moral point of view, Chinese social institutions, and, above all, the Chinese Native Press. . . . Certainly the best all-round book upon the practical questions which the Western nations have now to face in the Far East."—Daily News.

"This is emphatically one of the books of the year. Its admirable maps and diagrams deserve special attention. Mr. Colquhoun's volume is of the first importance, but, unlike many works of its kind, it is thoroughly interesting from first to last."—Glasgow Herald.

NEW YORK HARPER & BROTHERS LONDON
Publishers

Nathan B. Goodnow & Co.,
BANKERS.
ESTABLISHED 1873.
2 Post Office Sq., Boston, Mass.

Transact a General Banking Business, including the Purchase and Sale of Stocks, Bonds, and Grain, for Investment or on Margin.
Dealers in Government and Railroad Bonds.
Books containing Four-Year Range of Prices, Dividends, and Earnings sent free on request.
A Permanently Invested Fund of over TWO HUNDRED AND TWENTY-FOUR THOUSAND DOLLARS is held as a Guaranteed Security for all persons having business with us.
Correspondence solicited.

TRADE E&W MARK
EARL & WILSON'S
LINEN
COLLARS & CUFFS
BEST IN THE WORLD.

See that Hole?

WHAT IS IT FOR?

To insert a pointed instrument and eject the pen from the holder. Prevents the ink from flowing back into the holder and soiling the fingers.

Samples on receipt of return postage. Ask for Vertical No. 37.

The perfection of pens, slightly stiff, smooth points, durable, and uniform.

SPENCERIAN PEN CO.
450 Broome St., New York, N. Y.

"AMERICA'S GREAT RESORTS," 48 pages, with map, sent free on receipt of a two-cent stamp by GEORGE H. DANIELS, G. P. A. New York Central, New York.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE

HARPER'S WEEKLY

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. XLII.—No. 2178.

Copyright, 1898, by HARPER & BROTHERS.
All Rights Reserved.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 17, 1898.

TEN CENTS A COPY.
FOUR DOLLARS A YEAR.

OUR ARMY AND NAVY IN THE PHILIPPINES.

ADMIRAL DEWEY AND GENERAL MERRITT IN ADMIRAL DEWEY'S CABIN ON THE FLAG-SHIP "OLYMPIA."

DRAWN BY T. DE THULSTRUP FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY F. D. MILLET, SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT FOR "HARPER'S WEEKLY" WITH GENERAL MERRITT'S FORCES.

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

HARPER'S WEEKLY

(TWENTY-FOUR PAGES)

NEW YORK CITY, SEPTEMBER 17, 1898

Terms: 10 Cents a Copy—$4 00 a Year, in Advance

Postage free to all Subscribers in the United States, Canada, and Mexico

Subscriptions may begin with any Number

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS

New York City: Franklin Square

London: 45 Albemarle Street, W.

Also for sale at Brentano's, 37 Avenue de l'Opéra, Paris

ALREADY the capitalists are beginning to form corporations for the exploitation of our West Indian possessions. There is no doubt that money is to be made in Cuba and Puerto Rico. But money-making and inefficient, even dishonest, government are not always incompatible.

GENERAL MILES is evidently intent on a controversy with the Secretary of War. It is greatly to be regretted if any occasion for such a controversy exists. General MILES is naturally jealous of his reputation as a soldier; he is also desirous of avoiding an undeserved responsibility for any evils that may have attended the campaign in Cuba, and is rightfully insistent upon his privileges as major-general commanding the army. In the present state of public opinion we are inclined to think that General MILES will have the sympathy of the country; but sympathy should not govern in such a matter as this, and before reaching a final judgment every one should be certain of being in possession of all the facts and having heard all sides.

GENERAL SIR HERBERT KITCHENER'S victory over the Khalifa is righteous vengeance long deferred. Whether it means permanent occupancy of Egypt or not, this country will sympathize with England in whatever conclusion she reaches. For ourselves, we think that under existing conditions, and in view of what England has already done in Egypt, the longer she remains in Egypt the better for the Egyptians, the better for Europe, and much the better for Africa. Sir HERBERT KITCHENER has shown himself to be one of the great soldiers of the time, and the English troops who fought under him have made their usual exhibition of splendid bravery. We are glad that our own soldiers have shown themselves worthy comrades of the men who fought at Omdurman. Another interesting and important thing in connection with the battle was the good work done by the Egyptian troops. This shows what white leadership can do for the Egyptian peasant. In a word, to paraphrase what an English naval attaché said at San Juan, this has been a great year for the Anglo-Saxon race.

OUR consul at Valencia, Spain, has made a report setting forth the valuable opportunities which are offered just now to various lines of enterprise in that country, and inviting the careful attention of American merchants and investors. It is gratifying to note that our consuls in Spain have resumed their duties energetically, and that their investigations into the conditions of Spanish-American trade are at present more important than they have ever been. The country's business, as well as its politics, has been badly shaken up, and new openings for the reconstruction of business interests which have been weakened or destroyed offer rich returns to those who are prompt to take advantage of them. Foreign capital, especially French, is being largely invested in this way. Our consular reports, which will be forthcoming very soon, are sure to contain statements of very important facts and conditions. The larger question of Spain's present industrial opportunity is suggested. Now that she is relieved of her colonies, whose systematic exploitation and misgovernment have almost ruined her, will she turn her attention to the development of her splendid domestic resources? Or will she cling to the false ideals and antiquated methods which have impoverished the national estate?

SURGEON-GENERAL STERNBERG announces that the camp at Montauk is not only well situated, but is in admirable condition. He does not think the water can be contaminated so as to become a breeder of typhoid, and he finds the men very comfortable. We wish that the country might properly believe this to be true; but in view of the reports of Dr. SENN, Dr. EDSON, and Dr. STIMSON, and the conclusions of the board of surgeons, who have examined the conditions at Montauk apparently with more thoroughness than Dr. STERNBERG—at least they have had an opportunity to devote more time to the work—nothing but the future can possibly vindicate the Surgeon-General of the army. We trust that it will be found that the surgeons who have declared that a typhoid epidemic will break forth if the camp is maintained will prove to be mistaken. There is no doubt that conditions are improving at Montauk, largely because so many ill men have been removed, and that there is less likelihood now of an epidemic than there was when Dr. SENN first spoke. The military authorities have not been idle; large numbers of the volunteers have been furloughed, and many of the regulars have been ordered to different military posts, chiefly in the East. No one wants horrible and foul conditions to prevail, and every one will be glad if the measures already taken by the government will result in bettering conditions at the camp, and in saving lives that were undoubtedly threatened a week or ten days ago by causes which would not have existed if some one had not been incompetent or indifferent.

THE commissioners of the United States, Great Britain, and Canada have thus far spent ten days in deliberating upon the questions submitted to them, after which an adjournment was made for more than two weeks. The results of the discussions were not given in detail to the press, though certain facts reported have not since been contradicted. The time of our commissioners has partly been taken up in receiving deputations from the lumber, sealing, and New England fishing interests, as well as others from chambers of commerce and manufacturing interests. With regard to the tariff, our commissioners are believed to be undecided as yet whether to insist upon Canada's abandonment of her preferential tariff in favor of Great Britain as a prerequisite to reciprocity with this country, or whether, allowing it to stand, to arrange for the reciprocal lowering of certain duties independently of it. The Canadian commissioners have larger powers at the present conference than ever before. They are practically independent, while on previous occasions of this kind their opinions and preferences have been subordinated to those of the British commissioners. It is noteworthy that only two questions—the seal-fisheries and the proposed revision of the treaty of 1817 regarding naval vessels on the Great Lakes—immediately affect British interests, the remaining questions directly concerning this country and Canada. The representation of Newfoundland at the conference has complicated the Atlantic fisheries and other questions by a possible divergence between that island and the Dominion, the former asserting the right to independent negotiations with the United States if terms are not satisfactory. In other words, another treaty similar to the BOND-BLAINE agreement of a few years ago may be entered into, though at considerable risk of a veto by the imperial government.

THE DREYFUS case comes up again before the French tribunals, in a manner that is peculiarly humiliating not only to the French army, but to the French Republic. The English-speaking world, whose methods of justice are very different from those of France, has always believed that the conviction of DREYFUS was a public scandal. At first this opinion was held because the trial took place in secret, and no information was given to the public as to the reason for the verdict against this unfortunate Alsacian Jew. Then it was discovered that the only piece of evidence against the accused was a memorandum, as to the authorship of which there was a striking difference of opinion among experts in handwriting. A conviction upon such evidence was so opposed to every natural sense of justice, that the insistence of the army chiefs upon standing by the action of the court martial raised a presumption that DREYFUS was made a scapegoat, for the purpose of relieving the whole military establishment of the onus of having a traitor concealed among its officers who was selling military secrets to a foreign government. To bolster up the general staff of the army, and to show that the only traitor in the list had been discovered and was punished, Minister-of-War CAVAIGNAC, speaking for the army, at last confessed that the conviction was based upon three documents which, as events showed, had never been seen by DREYFUS or his counsel. ZOLA'S accusations and his farcical trial, and now Lieutenant-Colonel HENRY'S confession and suicide, and the resignation of General BOISDEFFRE and of CAVAIGNAC, show conclusively that the presumption was well founded. More than this, the whole case shows that the government of France and its justice are in the hands of the soldiers, and the soldiers have been proved to be entirely unworthy of the trust, and to have, in this case at least, been unjust and cruel tyrants. Under such government there can be but little real personal liberty in France, for every private citizen is at the mercy of the military chiefs, if the latter happen to have any object to gain by his incarceration, his banishment, or his death. Slighter causes than this have led to revolution in France, whose political outlook is full of menace and of interest.

GREAT BRITAIN AND RUSSIA IN CHINA.

INVOLVED in our own problems—problems that make us, for the time, the most interesting country in the world—is the great new Eastern question, which seems to be hastening the drift of Russia and Great Britain towards war, unless it be true, as is reported, that an agreement between the two has been reached. Thirteen years ago Mr. ARCHIBALD R. COLQUHOUN, the special correspondent of the London Times, wrote as follows: "It is inevitable that the question of supremacy in Asia will be shortly decided in favor of one or the other of the powers, Russia or Britain. In the coming strife England must, in spite of herself, play a leading part, since the material interests of the British Empire are by far the heaviest stake in the game. It is even probable that the fate of the empire itself may be eventually decided in the Eastern seas." Mr. COLQUHOUN is the best informed Englishman in China on contemporaneous politics of the rulers at Peking. He is apparently in closer touch with the Chinese authorities, and especially with the Tsung-li-Yamên, than is Sir CLAUDE MACDONALD, the British ambassador. He is acquainted with the designs of Russia; he is familiar with the feeling of China towards her encroaching neighbor; he understands the strength of the Russian and the weakness of the Manchu dynasty. He realizes keenly the inefficiency of British diplomacy in dealing with the Tsar and his ministers; he probably shares with many of his countrymen the opinion that Sir CLAUDE MACDONALD is too soft and too polite, too little insistent on British rights and claims, in his intercourse with the trembling barbarian, who for forty years has been yielding up territory to his northern neighbor, and he knows and protests against the peaceful attitude of Lord SALISBURY, who, it is true, is inspired by the Queen, but who, in the end, will be held responsible.

Mr. COLQUHOUN has now written a book on China in Transformation, which Messrs. HARPER & BROTHERS have just published, which is full of information on China, and from which, better than from any other book, one may learn the vast importance of this new Eastern question, and the character, the resources, the capabilities, of China and the Chinese, and their possibilities under the rule of white men of Europe. The question must be settled between the approaching powers, either by war or treaty. It is too early to comment on the probable effect of the Tsar's invitation to the nations to disarm; but it is not unfair to point out that disarmament would be much more dangerous to Great Britain than to Russia; that a navy cannot be rebuilt as quickly as an army can be reformed; and that, in China, Russia would be at a great advantage over her rival, being nearer to the common objective by reason of her Siberian railway, if the contentions of the two powers should again reach the acute stage at which they seem to be at present, when a rearmament would be inevitable.

China is not only an enormous empire, but it is one of the richest countries of the world, and it lies temptingly between the two greatest Asiatic powers—for both Great Britain and Russia, judged by extent of territory, are more Asiatic than European. Measured by population, England is also more Asiatic than European; but while there are more of the Tsar's subjects in Europe than in Asia, in mind, in spirit, and in political methods, Russia is much more Asiatic than England, and therein, perhaps, the latter has been greatly at a disadvantage in the diplomatic game which has been in progress for years, and which has been especially active since the Franco-Chinese war. Mr. COLQUHOUN gives the area of England's European possessions as 121,000 square miles, and of her Asiatic possessions as 1,617,000 square miles. While her population in Europe is 38,000,000, her Asiatic population numbers 292,000,000. Russian territory in Europe covers an area of 2,095,000 square miles, and her Asiatic territory 6,575,000 square miles. Her population in Europe is 106,000,000, while her population in Asia is only 23,000,000. In other words,

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Russia, with more than four times as much Asiatic territory as England has, rules over not quite one-thirteenth as many Asiatics as live under the rule of the Queen. Lying to the south of the lands which MURAVIEFF and IGNATIEFF obtained from China for the Tsar in 1858 and 1860, respectively, are Mongolia and Manchuria, which, as Mr. COLQUHOUN says, are the Tsar's whenever he wants them—practically the Tsar's at present. The remainder is China proper, with its eighteen provinces and 350,000,000 people, mostly rich, but discordant, rebellious against the central authority at Peking, and a tempting prey to the Russian, who wants many things in Asia, but above all else, perhaps, millions of people and millions of wealth to add to his millions of barren acres in the dreary North; tempting also to Great Britain, who must not only meet Russian approaches towards India by a bold front and an advancing and aggressive policy, but whose principal motive is explained by an extract from Mr. CURZON'S book on the Problems of the Far East, which is quoted by Mr. COLQUHOUN in support of the proposition that "it is to China alone that we can look in the future.... for any great expansion of our commerce." This is what Mr. CURZON says: "How vital is its [British power in China] maintenance, not merely for the sake of our empire, but for the sustenance of our people, no arguments are needed to prove. It is only in the East, and especially in the Far East, that we may still hope to keep and to create open markets for British manufactures. Every port, every town, and every village that passes into French or Russian hands is an outlet lost to Manchester, Bradford, or Bombay."

Here is the core of the situation in the East, so far as these two great Asiatic powers are concerned: China with her vast mineral and agricultural resources, her coal, her iron, her various other metals, her rice and tea, her silk and cotton, is likely to be the theatre of a great war in behalf of commerce. It may be, of course, that the Tsar's movement for peace will become an accomplished fact, and that nineteenth-century civilization, with its growing conviction that war is inexcusable barbarism, will become logical, and will return its soldiers and sailors to the ranks of producers; but, whether the knotty problem be solved by war or by mutual concessions, the fact remains that the Chinese are doomed to come under the control of Europeans. This will be of enormous benefit to China. It will develop her riches. Her skilful population will be set at work. The dexterous and intelligent Chinaman will become the competitor of the wage-earners of Europe and America. His goods will come into the markets of the world, and, in turn, his own markets will be open to the products of the West. Commerce will flourish. Capital, which, as Mr. CHARLES A. CONANT clearly shows in the current number of the North American Review, is begging for a chance of employment, and is earning smaller and smaller dividends as the years go round and as savings are piled up, will once more rejoice, for a time at least, in bigger dividends and in higher rates of interest. Prices will go down, of course, and we are therefore likely to hear again from the silver gentlemen who believe that high prices are blessings; but, they to the contrary notwithstanding, the world will be the better for the additions to its wealth that will result from European control of China, and from the consequential increase of the comfort of all classes. Accompanying the increase of economic blessings will inevitably be political and socialistic problems, difficult to solve, impossible of solution, indeed, without enormous expense, by such a democracy as our own. Think, for example, of the trouble we shall have at home if we share in the government of the East, when our voting wage-earners discover that their non-voting subjects in Asia are competing in the labor markets of the world, and are driving down the wages of their political masters. Although this is not the whole of our problem by any means, it is an important consideration. Our manufacturers, our merchants, and our wage-earners are to feel the competition of Europe-governed China. That the competition will be good for them in the end goes without saying; that the world, including the United States, will be the richer for the exploitation of China is certain; but do we want to pay for the competition in taxes for armed occupation of the Far East? Do we want to take upon ourselves the burdens of Oriental politics for a gain that shall be ours in any event? For improved, or transformed, China will make for our profit whether we govern in the East or remain at home, and the question is whether we shall take the advantage peacefully or pay for it unnecessarily. Shall we accept the gifts that must be bestowed upon us, or shall we assume unnecessary burdens of government and wars in return for them? Our own interest, of course, will be greatly advantaged by the success of Great Britain, and yet the advantage to be gained by her triumph in a war against Russia would not warrant us in participating in such a war. Probably we could help her to a peaceable solution of her burdens, and that would be to the gain of all.

"THE CONSENT OF THE GOVERNED."

NOTHING is more bewildering, in the present bewildering state of a public feeling which cannot be said to have crystallized into public opinion, than the fact that the authors of our political failures at home should be the chief advocates of "expansion" abroad. The Jingoes are the incompetents. "We have been unfaithful over a few things," they say; "make us rulers over many things."

Now nothing is clearer than that the agencies of government we have are ill adapted to their present limited uses, and that, if we mean to undertake larger problems, we must have a very different set of tools. The House of Representatives, we have to admit, whether we like it or not, is a house of representatives—that is to say, it is composed of average American citizens who know no less than the average of their constituencies about trade, finance, currency, foreign politics, and all the other subjects upon which they are called to legislate, and whose pride it is to know no more. The Senate is not even a house of representatives—and that for a manifest reason. The House of Representatives is immediately responsible to the people. Every member of it is aware that his course must meet the approval of his district, or of his party in his district. He is constantly held in check by the necessity of obtaining the consent of the governed. A Senator feels no such responsibility. It is only when his term is drawing to its close that he inquires how the people of his State will regard his official course. Even if he is aware that it is disapproved, he hopes, by the favor of the boss, unless he himself is the boss, to circumvent public disapproval. Unless his misbehavior has been so scandalous as to "lose the State," as in GORMAN'S case, he is very apt to succeed. Now in governing distant territories, in which "the consent of the governed" is not required, the member of the Lower House is freed from the one influence that steadies him. The representative will be as bad as the Senator. Since the Constitution puts the whole matter in the charge of Congress, have we the least guarantee that our government of colonies will be honest or intelligent? Our solution of our Indian problem by extermination, our solution of our negro problem by lynching, our solution of our Alaskan problem by apathy—these achievements scarcely indicate that we are prepared to shine in an "Imperial" capacity.

"Imperialism" seems likely to become the watchword of the Republican party. That party asks the people to intrust it with the destinies of some millions of foreigners of whose needs it knows nothing, and by whose desires it does not even profess to be guided. The answer of the people to this demand ought to be an insistence that the party should purge itself of its abuses, and set its own house in order, before reaching out after new dominion; that it should show itself much more faithful over a few things before asking to be intrusted with rule over many things. The Republican party does at least profess to be guided by public opinion in domestic politics, and to "derive its just powers from the consent of the governed." But it is perfectly well known that in those States which are governed by bosses not even this condition is fulfilled. The boss is not guided by the opinion, we will not say of the voters, but of the voters even of his own party. His machine enables him to defy their will, up to the point where their exasperation will induce them to turn on him and defeat him at the polls.

We have already pointed out instances in which the Republican party might vindicate itself by showing that "the consent of the governed" was an integral part of its rule, that the opinion of the voters was, in fact, taken and not defied in the selection of candidates for the governorship of American States. In our newly acquired dependencies nobody pretends that "the consent of the governed" will be requisite to our government. But what the most unbridled Jingo theoretically admits is that our government ought to be satisfactory to the people of the United States. It is the one responsibility that all the Imperialists admit. Our government of Hawaii may not be, and in fact we know it is not, satisfactory to the Hawaiians. Our government of the Philippines may not be satisfactory to the Filipinos. It remains to be seen whether the Puerto-Ricans will like our way of governing after they have had a fair trial of it, while as for the Cubans, we no longer pretend to care whether they are satisfied with our proceedings preliminary to the condition in which we shall acknowledge that their own government is "stable," and evacuate the island, leaving them to their own devices. But we do pretend that the governments we establish, whatever may be the opinion entertained of them by "the governed," will meet the views of the people of the United States, who are not to live under them. The only way of making that pretence good is to make sure that the people of the United States are governed in accordance with their own desires; that here, at least, governments "derive their powers from the consent of the governed." But in boss-ridden States even this is notoriously untrue. Before the boss can decently appear as an "Imperialist" he must abdicate as a boss, and give the people of New York and Pennsylvania and Connecticut some evidence that they are governed in accordance with their own opinions, before he presumes to assure them that Hawaii and Puerto Rico and Cuba and Luzon will be governed in accordance with their opinions.

THE DEFEAT OF CECIL RHODES.

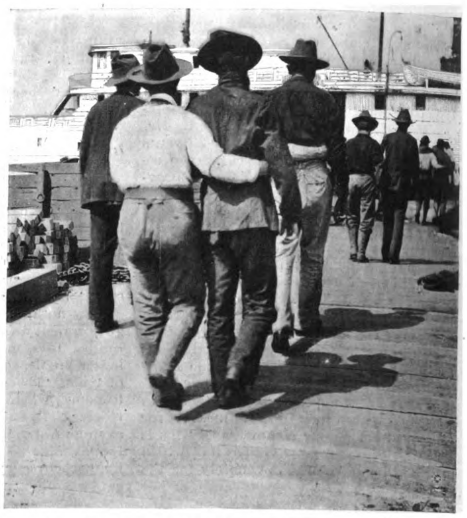
THE Cape Colony elections have ended, after an exciting two months' struggle, in a narrow victory for the Africander Bond, the political league of the Dutch colonists. The result is chiefly of a personal interest. The campaign turned on an issue which was not mentioned in any of the official platforms. Electoral reform, educational reform, tariff reform, and improved irrigation were merely subsidiary to the great question of RHODES supremacy at the Cape. The elections gave to the Dutch settlers their first chance of passing judgment on the prime mover in the JAMESON raid. Their verdict is that Mr. RHODES would be better employed in making good his abundant promises of the wealth to be found in "golden Rhodesia," and that, so long as they can prevent it, Cape politics shall be free from his domination. The Dutch have long memories, and are slow to give back a confidence that has once been forfeited. For nearly ten years they trusted in CECIL RHODES and kept him in office by their votes, supported his policy even when it went against Krugerism, and were nearly as enthusiastic in their praise as the English themselves. On that period of good feeling the door was closed with a bang at the end of 1895, and the Dutch—small blame to them—have not yet been won over to risk a second betrayal. If the result of the elections convinces Mr. RHODES of the wisdom of confining himself to his work in the north, there will be a feeling of relief all over South Africa. For some time to come his return to Cape politics can only be a signal for racial violence and antagonism.



There is a large RHODES faction in England which cannot conceive of any one being loyal to the empire and at the same time hostile to their impeccable idol. This faction did its best during the last two months to make out that British rule in South Africa depended on the re-election of the Progressives. All sorts of traitorous designs were charged against the leaders of the Bond by the wiseacres of the London press, who must be regretting now that they were ever so foolish as to put all their patriotic eggs in one basket. The truth is that Mr. HOFMEYR, Mr. ROSE INNES, and Mr. SCHREINER are about as "disloyal" as Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Nobody questioned their Imperialism so long as they followed Mr. RHODES, and there is no need to question it now that they have very properly broken away from him. The first item on the Bond platform was "a substantial contribution to the Imperial navy." If that may be taken as a sample of "anti-British intrigues," the empire could well do with a few more traitors with similar convictions.

The first effects of the Bond victory may be to encourage President KRUGER in his fascinating obstinacy to modern ideas, and to turn his thoughts to the chances of a successful repudiation of the London convention; but before long the President will find that more is expected of him in the way of tariff reductions than he is quite ready to yield even to his southern kinsmen. The Bond, above all else, wants peace in South Africa, and a readier market in the neighboring republics for agricultural produce. Its influence has always been on the side of moderation in the President's dealings with the Uitlanders, for the reason that his present policy not only hinders the trade of Cape Colony with the Transvaal, but spreads uncertainty and commercial depression over the whole of South Africa. If any concessions at all can be extracted from the obdurate old gentleman, they are much more likely to come under the friendly pressure of the Bond than from his personal conviction of their propriety, or at the solicitations of Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The thing to regret is not that the Bond has won, but that the smallness of its majority does not promise a very long lease of life.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

OPERATING TABLE, FIELD SURGICAL WARD, GENERAL HOSPITAL.

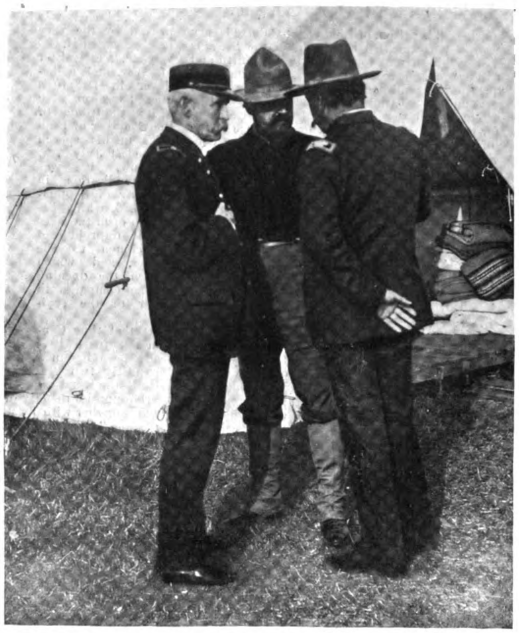
HELPING COMRADES ON THE WAY TO BOSTON HOSPITALS.

RED CROSS NURSE HELPING A SICK SOLDIER AT RAILROAD STATION.

MISS WHEELER, DAUGHTER OF GENERAL WHEELER, A NURSE IN THE GENERAL HOSPITAL.

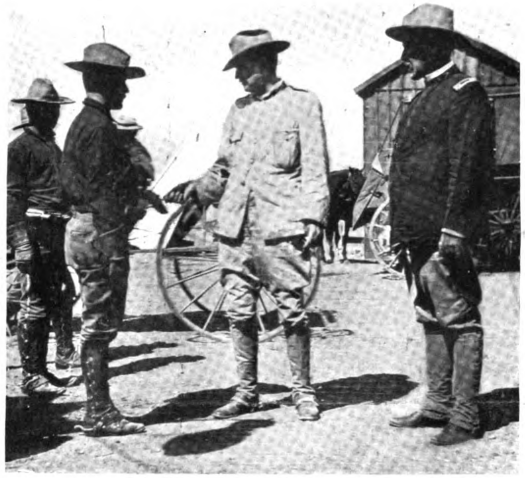
GENERAL WHEELER AND SURGEON-GENERAL STERNBERG GOING TO INSPECT THE HOSPITAL.

SISTERS OF CHARITY ON THEIR WAY TO CAMP TO ACT AS NURSES.



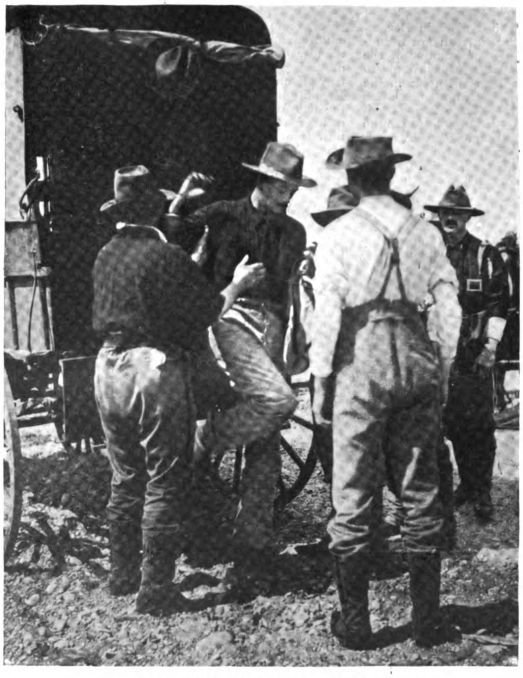
SCENES AT CAMP WIKOFF.

PHOTOGRAPHS TAKEN ESPECIALLY FOR "HARPER'S WEEKLY."



Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

COLONEL WESTON, IN CHARGE OF COMMISSARY DEPARTMENT.



SURGEON-GENERAL STERNBERG AND COLONEL FORWOOD, CHIEF SURGEON.

CAPTAIN CHASE, PROVOST-MARSHAL.

COLONEL STUART, BACTERIOLOGIST, WHO IS TESTING THE CAMP WATER.

A SICK SOLDIER ARRIVING AT THE HOSPITAL.

CARRYING SICK SOLDIER TO THE STEAMER FOR BOSTON.

SCENES AT CAMP WIKOFF.

PHOTOGRAPHS TAKEN ESPECIALLY FOR "HARPER'S WEEKLY."

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THE DREYFUS CASE.

THE suicide, in his prison, of Lieutenant-Colonel Henry is the latest act performed in the drama of the Dreyfus case, and everything seems to indicate that the fifth and last act will end, as in classical tragedies, by virtue being rewarded and crime punished. That is to say, a revision of the secret and illegal trial of Captain Dreyfus will be granted. This is all that is wanted by universal conscience, for the question of the guilt or innocence of the prisoner of Devil's Island is a secondary one when contrasted with that of the supreme right of any man in a civilized nation to be judged not within closed doors, and not without being shown the documents which have led to his indictment, sentence, and degradation. It is this aspect of the Dreyfus question which has made it a subject of interest throughout the world.

CAPTAIN DREYFUS.

For the last two years a tremendous fight has been kept on in France in favor of a revision of the Dreyfus case, by the lovers of justice and fair dealings in the courts. Émile Zola, Clémenceau, Jaurès, Pressensé, and a host of other celebrated men have fought in vain for the revision. The French people refused to listen to any accusation against the General Military Staff, the only accusers of Captain Dreyfus, who practically hypnotized the nation, to which they represented themselves as the immaculate chiefs of the army, upon which the French confidently relied for obtaining the recovery of the two lost provinces, Alsace and Lorraine. But the suicide of Lieutenant-Colonel Henry, the factotum of the General Staff, and his avowal that he had forged one of the secret documents used against Dreyfus, have opened the eyes of the French people.

Thus it has suddenly been shown that not only had the captain been condemned without being allowed to see and discuss the documents which influenced the opinion of his judges, but that one of these documents, at least, was a forgery, confessed by the forger himself. The first illegality was admitted by a Paris paper, L'Éclair, the recognized organ of the General Staff, in its number of September 15, 1896, just two years ago, when it said: "The truth is that Dreyfus had not been condemned only for the 'bordereau' [memorandum in which he revealed to a foreign power the secrets of the mobilization of the French army]. A letter written by a German military attaché to an Italian attaché had been seized and photographed, and that letter contained these words: 'Cette canaille de Dreyfus devient bien exigeant' [This scoundrel Dreyfus becomes very exacting]. That letter had not been shown either to Dreyfus or to his counsel. It had not been submitted to the judges during the legal trial. But when they were in the Council Chamber, out of the presence of the accused, that document was communicated to them, and it decided the condemnation." There was a lie already in that admission of the organ of the General Staff. The document did not contain the name of Dreyfus, and only had an initial letter. It said: "Ce canaille de D. . . .," as it was proved by the very reading which M. Cavaignac, late Minister of War, and a believer in Dreyfus's alleged treason, gave of it at the tribune of the Chamber of Deputies in his speech of the last July 7th. Anyhow, it was the publication in L'Éclair of September, 1896, which began to open the eyes of the unprejudiced Frenchmen to the matter, and which caused the opening of the campaign in favor of the revision.

GODEFROY CAVAIGNAC, Late Minister of War.

At that time Captain Dreyfus had already been confined for nearly two years in his awful prison of Devil's Island—the worst spot on the coast of French Guiana, nearly opposite the city of Cayenne—which was denominated, together with its neighbor Sinndendria, the "dry guillotine," when it was chosen as a place of deportation for the Terrorists and anti-Imperialists sentenced by the Directory and by Napoleon I. But it appears, according to the latest despatches, that Dreyfus, whose death was often reported, is thoroughly acclimated, and physically in good health. He will be able, therefore, to answer any charges which may be brought against him, and to discuss the value of the real or the forged documents which were not communicated to him or his advocate at the time of his trial, which took place in December, 1894. Two months before, a "bordereau," or memorandum, revealing, as said above, the programme of the mobilization of the French corps d'armée, was brought to Colonel Sandherr, chief of the Intelligence Bureau of the General Staff, who died soon after, and whose place was filled by Lieutenant-Colonel Henry, the too famous suicide and forger. The "bordereau" had been found in the waste-basket of the German ambassador at Paris by a servant, who acted as a spy in the interest of the French Intelligence Bureau. At least such was the explanation given at Dreyfus's trial, though it is more than strange that documents of such importance should be carelessly thrown by a diplomat in his waste-basket. As to this document, it was asserted by the accused captain that it was not in the handwriting of Dreyfus. On the other hand, some papers circulated a story according to which the captain, having been summoned to the General Staff and required to write a few lines dictated from the "bordereau," threw himself at the feet of Colonel Du Paty de Clam, and admitted that it was he who wrote the treacherous document. Since then it has been discovered that the real author was probably Commandant Esterhazy, who was twice acquitted by two courts martial, but who is reported in the latest despatches from Paris to have disappeared as soon as it was stated that the government had decided to grant a revision of the trial of 1894.

GENERAL ZURLINDEN.

This trial resulted, as is well known, in a sentence condemning Dreyfus to imprisonment for life and degradation from all military rank and honors. It has been already said in former articles of the WEEKLY that Alfred Dreyfus was a Hebrew, from the city of Mülhausen, in Alsace, who had elected French nationality after his native place had been annexed to the German Empire.

LIEUTENANT-COLONEL HENRY.

COLONEL DU PATY DE CLAM.

LIEUTENANT-COLONEL PICQUART.

He was an artillery officer, a married man, father of two children, and possessor of a fortune sufficient to exclude the idea that he would resort to treason in order to make money. After his sentence he was taken from the military prison of the Cherche Midi to the square of the École Militaire in Paris, where troops were assembled to witness the painful ceremony of the degradation. The insignia of his rank as captain, the badges of his profession, were torn from his coat and cap; even the stripes were torn from his trousers by the adjutant, and his sword was broken. He was then led along the front of the troops; and during this awful funeral march he did not cease to cry that he was innocent. The captain was embarked at the Ile de Ré, in February, 1895, for the Devil's Island, where he remains under the guard of twelve men, in a cabin or hut, enclosed recently by a high board fence which cuts off a view of the sea.

He has said repeatedly that within three years after his condemnation his innocence would be recognized. It has not been proved yet, and it may never be proved. But he did not err in foreseeing that a tremendous movement would be made in favor of the revision of his trial as soon as it would be known that it had not been conducted according to the rules of justice and equity to the application of which all accused persons are entitled in France, as well as in any other civilized country. The personality of the accused, his guilt or innocence, become a matter of secondary importance, in the opinion of those who think that the security of all is compromised whenever the constitutional and judicial forms are not observed toward a single individual. In order to counteract the threatening uprising of public opinion and to maintain their supremacy over the French nation, the military chiefs, assisted by the reactionary Catholic clericals, tried to displace the purely judicial ques-

EMILE ZOLA.

COMMANDANT ESTERHAZY.

GENERAL DE BOISDEFFRE.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

tion, and raised the cry that if a revision of Dreyfus's trial was demanded, it was only because he was a Jew and by his coreligionists. They succeeded in raising in France and in Algeria a spirit of anti-Semitism, which did not exist even after the rabid publications, of fifteen years ago, of Édouard Drumont and other Catholic sectarians. They even dared to incite people against the Protestant minority of the French people.

Undaunted by these menaces, and indifferent to sectarian religious questions, many of the most celebrated citizens of France opened the campaign for the revision as soon as they discovered by the admission of the General Staff itself that the equitable rules of justice had been violated in the Dreyfus case; and they have won their cause, after all. Their fight was begun by M. Scheurer-Kestner, vice-president of the Senate, at the beginning of 1896. Then it was taken up by Émile Zola, the world-known novelist, in his famous open letter to President Faure, "J'accuse." Commandant Esterhazy had been charged with being the real author of the "bordereau" upon which Dreyfus had been sentenced. The General Staff had sent him before a court martial, in the hope of quieting public opinion, and the commandant had been acquitted. Then Zola wrote, "I accuse the first court martial [that which sentenced Dreyfus] of having condemned a man on a document which was not shown to him, and I accuse the second court martial [that which acquitted Esterhazy] of having covered this illegality, by order, and committing in its turn the judicial crime of knowingly acquitting a guilty person." Then it was Zola's turn to be made the scapegoat of the General Staff. He was indicted as guilty of having libelled the members of the courts-martial, and, together with the administrator of Clémenceau's paper L'Aurore, in which the letter "J'accuse" had been published, he was sentenced to one year's imprisonment and a fine of 3000 francs. Zola appealed from that judgment of the Paris court, and he was sent back before the Versailles court, which reaffirmed the sentence, and the novelist fled to Switzerland to avoid a useless stay in prison, pending the new appeal he intended to make in the fall, on the re-opening of the courts. Soon afterwards there was a change of cabinet in France, and M. Cavaignac, the new Minister of War, proclaimed in the Chamber that, while believing that Dreyfus was guilty, he would institute a rigid inquiry into the whole affair. Esterhazy was arrested anew, and again acquitted; but Colonel Picquart, who was also arrested, succeeded in having placed under the eyes of the ministers the proof that one of the documents triumphantly read in the Chamber by M. Cavaignac, as proving the guilt of Dreyfus, was a forgery perpetrated by Lieutenant-Colonel Henry, the agent, or rather the devoted tool, of the General Staff. Colonel Henry wanted to save his chiefs, whose honor was sure to be compromised in the revision trial, and he forged the document above mentioned. But he and his inspirers had forgotten that M. Cavaignac was a man of stern honesty, incapable of using foul means to obtain a justifiable end. He ordered the arrest of Colonel Henry, who committed suicide in his prison. The Minister of War resigned soon after, and it is almost certain that the cabinet will order a revision of the trial of Dreyfus, since there are reasons to believe that the other secret documents which were not submitted to him or his counsel are also forgeries, like the one written by Colonel Henry. The latter's avowal and suicide have suddenly produced a radical change in public opinion in France. Newspapers and people who formerly proclaimed that Dreyfus was guilty, and that his partisans, called the Dreyfusists, wanted to surrender France to the practical domination of Germany and the German Jew financiers, have given up that criminal and stupid theory. They are clamoring now for a prompt revision of the trial of 1894, understanding at last that this is the only means to restore to the country the interior peace which has been so violently disturbed, especially during the last two years.

FELIX AUCAIGNE.

THIS BUSY WORLD

THE League for Social Service, which was incorporated at Albany the other day, has for its general purpose to educate public opinion, defeat or procure legislation affecting morals, and procure the enforcement of laws relating to public morals by distributing information about what the law is, what it should be, and what is going on that needs attention from reformers. Among the incorporators are Dr. Josiah Strong, Mr. Albert Shaw, of the Review of the Reviews, Mr. Spencer Trask, and Mrs. Margaret E. Sangster. The Advisory Council includes Bishop Huntington, Bishop Potter, Dr. Parkhurst, Messrs. R. F. Cutting, R. W. Gilder, Bishop Vincent, Dr. E. E. Hall, Dr. R. S. Storrs, Mrs. Alice Freeman Palmer, Miss Jane Addams, Dr. Washington Gladden, and others.

Mr. James S. T. Stranahan, who died at Saratoga on September 3, has been popularly known for twenty-five years past as "the first citizen of Brooklyn." His greatest distinction is that he was the father of Prospect Park. He began to work for it in 1860, and from that time until 1882 he was president of the Brooklyn Park Commission. A bronze statue of him, by Frederick Macmonnies, was erected in Prospect Park in 1891, the cost being met by popular subscription.

Mr. Stranahan was born ninety years ago in Peterboro, Madison County, New York. He grew up a farmer's boy, got what education he could, and presently taught school. Gerrit Smith was the magnate of Peterboro, and a capitalist, and helped Stranahan in an enterprise to develop the town of Florence. The scheme succeeded, and one result of it was that Mr. Stranahan represented the town from 1838 to 1840 in the Assembly.

After spending four years in Newark, he came, in 1844, to Brooklyn, where he began activities as a railroad contractor, but presently bent himself to the development of the water-front, and founded the system of what is now the Atlantic Dock Company. He took hold hard in Brooklyn. Four years after he came there he was elected alderman. In 1854 he went to Congress, and served one term. In 1858 he became a police commissioner, and in 1860 and 1864 he was a delegate to the Republican conventions that nominated Lincoln. For ten years from 1875 he was a Brooklyn Bridge trustee, and, generally speaking, whatever greatly concerned Brooklyn concerned him also.

An unusual tribute, and one to be commended, is the bronze tablet which is to be set up at Fort Thomas, Cincinnati, in honor of the gallant behavior of the Sixth United States regular infantry at San Juan. The regulars go from post to post, and belong neither to State nor city, but the Sixth Infantry, which went to the war from Cincinnati, had been stationed for six years near that city, and was well known and much liked there. When it marched away, all Cincinnati cheered; and after it had gone, Cincinnati followed its record. The Sixth's loss in the assault of San Juan hill was greater than that of any regiment except the Sixteenth. Cincinnati lamented, but was proud of its regulars, and the memorial tablet being suggested, the money for it was promptly raised by the Chamber of Commerce. The action taken has few precedents, if any, and is all the better for that.

The camp news in the papers is very entertaining. It abounds in gossip, for one thing, and gossip of a lively quality. It abounds also in short stories of individual soldiers and officers; of good behavior and bad behavior, kindness, efficiency, and their contraries. It includes daily, without much doubt, a considerable number of edifying libels. It is handier to report than the war news was, and a great many clever reporters and correspondents are busy with it. The newspapers as a whole cover the ground exceedingly well, and some of the more enterprising and able journals offer every day columns of really remarkable camp literature. To be sure, it has too large an element of tragedy, but that does not lessen its attractiveness as literature.

The chief topics just now are the condition of the sick and the movements of the regiments that are being mustered out. Undoubtedly the sick are getting much better care than a fortnight ago, and conditions everywhere are improving. If we could only keep up a great army long enough, we should learn in time how to do it. But there, or thereabouts, is the great trouble about war. To be really good at it, it is necessary to keep in practice, yet the chief end of war is peace, and in time of peace practice is difficult, and to keep the war machinery from rusting is almost impossible. Truly war as a national industry is very perplexing. No country seems satisfied with its cultivation of it. The working-man who plays golf wants, when he begins, to be enough of a golfer to keep in the best condition for work. But if he really becomes interested in golf it presently comes home to him, as matter for cogitation, whether it is really more profitable to be just enough of a golfer to work well, or just enough of a worker to golf well. There must be moderation in one employment if there is to be due efficiency in the other. The attitude of modern nations towards war is somewhat similar. A nation determines to maintain such a degree of military efficiency as shall enable it to do business safely and to advantage, and to hold its own and get rich. Gradually its war preparations tend to absorb the time of its laborers and the profits of its industries, and folks begin to ask whether the army exists for the protection of life and property, or life and property for the maintenance of the army. If any evidence was needed that that point had been reached in Europe, the Czar's invitation to a conference for the regulation of military rivalry would furnish it. No great country on earth is so well situated as ours to work out for itself the problem of the precise degree of military efficiency that it is worth while to maintain in time of peace. So far we have never done it. Every war we have undertaken has seemed to find us more unready than was profitable.

The military man who, next to Colonel Roosevelt, has been fortunate in the reputation he has made out of the war seems to be General Wheeler. He has filled conspicuous places both at Santiago, when General Shafter was sick, and more lately at Camp Wikoff. Being an older man than Colonel Roosevelt, and not put together with the same quality of rivets, he had the bad luck, which Roosevelt escaped, to catch the fever inopportunely at Santiago. Every one knows how resolutely he minimized that disadvantage. All that we heard of him in Cuba, and all we have heard of his labors and reports and observations at Camp Wikoff, have tended to make folks think of him as a truly valuable citizen, wise, active, efficient, a very able soldier, and possessed of an admirable spirit. Wherever we hear of him, he is doing good. Whenever we hear from him, it is something worth attention. It is matter for thankfulness that he is a member of Congress, and that when military and other important measures come up there next winter his voice will be heard and will carry weight. The sympathy of the whole country goes out to him in the loss of his son, Naval Cadet Wheeler, whose death by drowning, while bathing at Camp Wikoff, has just been announced.

The reports of the grave illness of Mr. Bayard have been read with very general concern and regret. Mr. Bayard is not an old man, and it is matter for surprise that his physicians should take so serious a view of his condition. It is not unlikely that the change from an exceedingly active life in London to comparative retirement and lack of occupation at Wilmington has proved unwholesome for him. If that is the case, it is the more to be regretted that his health should have broken down when an able Democrat of diplomatic experience is in special request as a member of the Peace Commission.

Naval officers rarely get into political life in this country. In England they go into Parliament naturally enough if occasion offers and circumstances are favorable, but here they seem to stick to the navy until they are retired. A great military reputation is a recognized qualification for political preferment. Washington, Jackson, Taylor, and Grant became Presidents, and McClellan, Hancock, and other generals were candidates, but was there ever an admiral who got votes in a presidential convention? Dewey has gathered, by all odds, the biggest reputation our latest war has yielded. He not only attended to his professional business with efficiency and despatch, but the temper and discretion of his subsequent behavior have brought him prodigious credit. Still, no one seems to be talking of Dewey for President. After all, though, for a man of his distinction it would have to be that or nothing. There is no other office in the gift of the American people which would be likely to tempt an officer of high rank and mature years in the army or navy to resign, unless he had a private fortune.

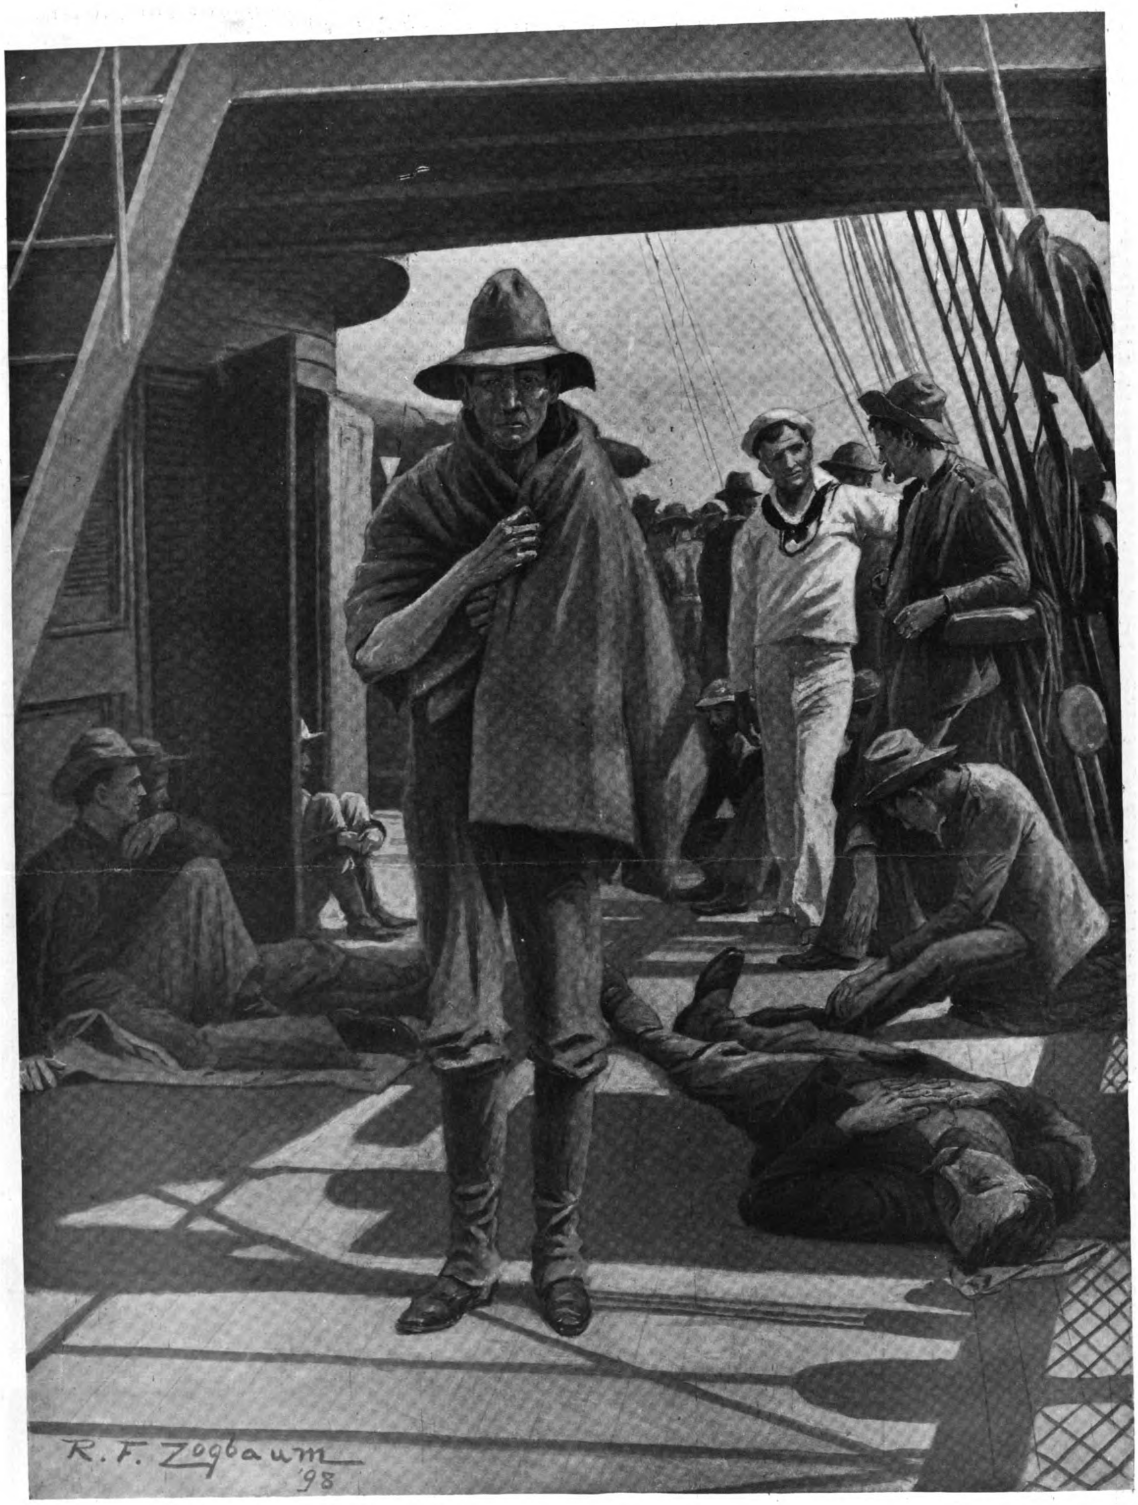
It is a pleasure to commend to the attention of all sensible and discerning persons the society called Scapa, which has its headquarters in London. Scapa is the contracted form of its title, which in full is the Society for the Correction of the Abuse of Public Advertising. It has honorary members in most civilized countries, and some in the United States. There is one in Utica—Dr. Blumer, the Superintendent of the State Hospital—and the Utica Press tells of his successful efforts to get rid of signs that border the road-side between Utica and his summer home at Harts Hill. His testimony is that it was not difficult; that the owners of the fences and other property which the signs occupied had usually not been consulted by the sign-painters, and were glad to have their belongings freed from defacement. Dr. Blumer's method is to substitute for the signs removed a tin placard forbidding the posting of any more advertisements.

It is worth pointing out that the disfigurement of the rural districts by signs and offensive advertisements is not done by persons who live in the country, but by, or at the instance of, city people, tradesmen and others, who apparently consider that farmers are dull folk anyway, and either won't know that they have been imposed upon, or will be too inert to show resentment. There is no excuse or justification for landscape advertising. It simply represents commercial impudence. The men who promote it are under no restraint of taste or propriety. They will paint or affix any sort of a sign anywhere they dare. It is troublesome to undo their work. It takes time, and the reasonable indignation their outrages excite is wearing to the temper. This vandal industry is particularly active just now. The present paragrapher found advertisements last summer painted in the sheds back of the country church where he has worshipped off and on for nearly half a century, and this year the outside of the high board fence which surrounds the trolley-car company's baseball-ground had by was smeared with huge advertisements painted in violent colors, to the most direful prejudice of a lovely landscape.

Scapa is a good society. Good luck and many active members to it!

There is urgent need of some method of rewarding naval officers who have won special distinction which shall not incidentally punish their fellow-officers who have been less lucky. At present, when a Clark, a Philip, or an Evans has a chance and makes the most of it, and is advanced several numbers, all that these worthy gentlemen gain is lost by their fellows over whom they are promoted, and whose only fault probably is that the fortunes of war denied them an opportunity equal to their merits. If the men who were passed kept their places there might be no cause for complaint. But they don't. They are put back just as much as their luckier brethren are put forward, their chances of getting high rank before retirement are proportionately lessened, and the rewards that the government orders are given at their expense.

The case of Captain Chester of the Cincinnati has been cited in illustration of this evil. He served on the blockade with leaky boilers as long as he dared, until finally, seeing no prospect of a fight, he slipped off to Norfolk for repairs. In his absence Cervera came out. The result is that his reward for faithful and arduous war service is likely to be the loss of five numbers, which probably means that he will be retired with the rank of captain instead of commodore, as would have happened if there had been no war. Officers who have this sort of luck don't like it. Officers whose promotion involves this sort of punishment for their fellows don't like it either, as witness the recent grumblings of Captain Philip at the injustice involved by his own advancement. The Navy Department is dissatisfied too, and it seems likely that when Congress comes to take action on the war promotions some way will be found of curing, or at least alleviating, these hardships.



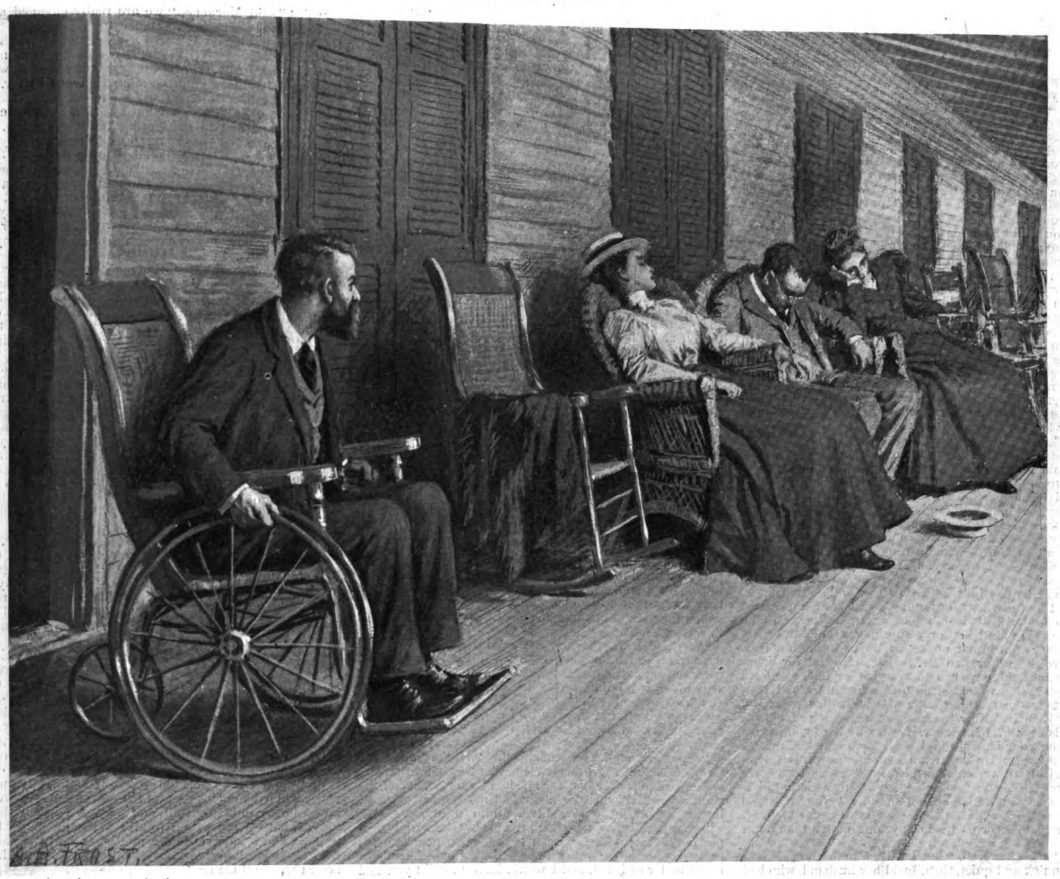
Mr. Hall Caine has come among us, doubtless for the excellent general reason that it is good to be here, but with some special errands besides. It is reported that he will speak in New York and Washington on the necessity of an Anglo-American alliance. Judging from the number of readers Mr. Caine has in this country, there are many Americans who will be glad to hear his views on that subject. He regards the suggested alliance as a factor of the greatest possible importance in promoting the world's peace. Mr. Joseph Chamberlain, who is also in this country, is also interested in this subject, but though he is very competent to give information about it to hesitating Americans, it is not known that he will make it a subject of public discourse while he is here. He is very frank, however, in expressing his sentiments to the representatives of American newspapers.

Report says, though not very positively, that the new president of Brown University will be the Rev. Edward Judson, of the Judson Memorial Church, in Washington Square, New York. Dr. Judson is the son of Adoniram Judson, the famous Baptist missionary, and was born in Burmah about fifty-four years ago. He was graduated from Brown in 1865, and for a number of years was professor of Latin and modern languages in Madison University, at Hamilton, New York. Since 1875 he has been pastor of churches in or near New York.

Every Baptist college that wants a president nowadays seems disposed to arrange its bait so as to attract the favorable attention of Professor Benjamin Ide Wheeler, of Cornell. The University of Rochester is supposed to have angled pretty hard for him, and his name has often been mentioned in connection with Brown. But Professor Wheeler is difficult, and is apparently indisposed to form new relations unless he is quite sure that they will be satisfactory. We are told that he "holds views of educational matters which are at variance with those accepted at Brown," and is therefore not under consideration by the powers of that institution. That may mean that, although himself a Baptist, he prefers colleges which are not too closely allied with any sect, though it is quite as likely that his belief in coeducation makes him unwilling to cast in his lot with any college which has not a saving infusion of girls.

E. S. MARTIN.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google



ON A HOMEWARD-BOUND TRANSPORT FROM CUBA.

Drawn by Rufus Fairchild Zogbaum,

Special Artist for "Harper's Weekly" with the Fleet.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THE ASSOCIATE HERMITS.*

BY FRANK R. STOCKTON.—ILLUSTRATED BY A. B. FROST.

XXV.—A MOONLIGHT INTERVIEW.

MRS. ARCHIBALD retired to her cabin, but she did not feel in the least like going to bed. Her husband had long been asleep in his cot, and she still sat by the side of the little window looking out upon the moon-lighted scene; but the beauty of the night, if she noticed it at all, gave her no pleasure. Her mind was harassed and troubled by many things, chief among which was her husband's unfinished sentence in which he had said that he would try to avoid any unpleasantness, but at the same time had intimated that if the unpleasant thing were forced upon him he was ready to meet it.

Now, reason as she would, Mrs. Archibald could not banish from her mind the belief that Arthur Raybold would come to their camp sometime during the next day. In fact, not having heard otherwise, she supposed he had come to the camp fire that night. She was filled with anger and contempt for the young man who was determined to force himself on their party in this outrageous manner, and considered it shameful that their peaceful life in these woods had been so wickedly disturbed. No wonder she did not want to sleep, no wonder she sat at the window thinking and thinking.

Presently she saw some one walking over the open space toward the cabin, and she could not fail to recognize the figure with the long stride, the folded arms, and the bowed head. He passed the window and then he turned and repassed it, then he turned and walked by again, this time a little nearer than before.

"This is too much!" said Mrs. Archibald. "The next thing he will be tapping at her window. I will go out and speak my mind to him."

Opening the door very softly, and without even stopping to throw a shawl over her head and shoulders, Mrs. Archibald stepped outside into the night. Raybold was now at a little distance from the cabin, in the direction of Camp Roy, and was just about to turn when she hurried up to him.

"Mr. Raybold," she said, speaking low and rapidly, "if you possessed a spark of gentlemanly feeling you would be ashamed to come into this camp when you have been ordered out of it. My husband has told you he does not want you here, and now I tell you that I do not want you here. It pains me to be obliged to speak to any one in this manner, but it is plain that no other sort of speech will affect you. Now, sir, I know your object, and I will not have you wandering up and down here in front of our cabin. I wish you to go to your own camp, and that immediately."

Raybold stood and listened to her without a word until she had finished, and then he said:

"Madam, there has been a good deal of talk about knowing ourselves and showing ourselves to others. Now I know myself very well indeed, and I will show myself to you by saying that when my heart is interested I obey no orders, I pay no attention to mandates of any sort. Until I can say what I have to say I will watch and I will wait, but I shall not draw back."

For the first time in fifteen years Mrs. Archibald lost her temper. She turned pale with anger. "You contemptible scoundrel! Go! Leave this camp instantly!"

He stood with arms folded and smiled at her, saying nothing. She trembled, she was so angry. But what could she do? If she called Mr. Archibald, or if he should be awakened by any outcry, she feared there would be bloodshed, and if she went to call Matlack, Mr. Archibald would be sure to be awakened. But at this moment some one stepped up quickly behind Raybold, and with a hand upon his shoulder, partly turned him around.

"I think," said the bishop, "that I heard this lady tell you to go. If so, go."

"I did say it," said Mrs. Archibald, hurriedly. "Please be as quiet as you can, but make him go."

"Do you hear what Mrs. Archibald says?" asked the bishop, sternly. "Depart, or—"

"Do you mean to threaten me?" asked Raybold.

The bishop stepped close to him. "Will you go of your own accord," he said, "or do you wish me to take you away?"

He spoke quietly, but with an earnestness that impressed itself upon Raybold, who made a quick step backward. He felt a natural repugnance, especially in the presence of a lady, to be taken away by this big man, who, in the moonlight, seemed to be bigger than ever.

"I will speak to you," said he, "when there are no ladies present." And with this he retired.

"I am so much obliged to you," said Mrs. Archibald; "it was a wonderful piece of good fortune that you should have come at this minute."

The bishop smiled. "I am delighted that I happened here," he said. "I heard so much talking this evening that I thought I would tranquillize my mind by a quiet walk by myself before I went to bed, and so I happened to see you and Raybold. Of course I had no idea of intruding upon you, but when I saw you stretch out your arm and say 'Go!' I thought it was time for me to come."

"I feel bound to say to you," said Mrs. Archibald, "that that impertinent fellow is persisting in his attentions to Miss Dearborn, and that Mr. Archibald and I will not have it."

"I imagined that the discussion was on that subject," said the bishop, "for Mr. Clyde has intimated to me that Raybold has been making himself disagreeable to the young lady."

"I do not know what we are going to do," said Mrs. Archibald, reflectively; "there seems to be no way of making an impression upon him. He is like his sister—he will have his own way."

"Yes," said the bishop, with a sigh, "he is like his sister. But then one might thrash him, but what can be done with her? I tell you, Mrs. Archibald," he said, turning to her earnestly, "it is getting to be unbearable. This whole evening, ever since you left the camp fire, she has been talking to me on the subject of mental assimilation—that is, the treatment of our ideas and thoughts as if they were articles of food—intellectual soda biscuit, or plum pudding, for instance—in order to find out whether our minds can digest these things and produce from them the mental chyme and chyle necessary to our intellectual development. The discourse was fortunately broken off for to-night, but there is more of it for to-morrow. But I really cannot stand it."

"I wouldn't stand it," said Mrs. Archibald. "Can't you simply go away and leave her when she begins in that way?"

The bishop shook his head. "No," he said, "that is impossible. When those beautiful eyes are fixed upon me I cannot go away. They charm me and they hold me. Unless there is an interruption, I must stay and listen. The only safety for me is to fly from this camp. At last," he said, smiling a little sadly, "I am going to go. I did not want to do this until your camp broke up, but I must."

"And you are really going to-morrow?" she asked.

"Yes," he said. "I have positively decided upon that."

"I am sorry to hear it," she said. "Good-night."

When Mrs. Archibald entered her cabin she found her husband sleeping soundly, and she again sat down by the window. There was no such thing as sleep for her; her mind was more tossed and troubled than it had been before she went out. The fact that the bishop was going away made the matter worse, for just as she had found out that he was willing to help her, and that he might be able to keep Raybold away from them without actual violence—for she saw that the young boaster was afraid of him—he had told her he must leave; and in her heart she did not blame him. With great fear and anxiety she looked forward to the morrow.

It was about two o'clock when Mrs. Archibald suddenly arose from her seat by the window and lighted a candle. Then she pulled down the shades of the windows, front and back, after which she went to her husband's cot and put her hand upon his shoulder.

"Hector," said she, "wake up."

In a moment Mr. Archibald was staring at her. "What is the matter?" he exclaimed. "Are you sick?"

"No," said she, "but I have something very important to say to you. I want you to get up and go away with me, and take Margery."

Mr. Archibald sat up in bed. He was now in full pos-

* Begun in HARPER'S WEEKLY No. 2167.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google session of his senses. "What!" said he, "elope? And where to?"

"Yes," said she, "that is exactly what I mean, and we will go to Sadler's first, and then home."

"Do you mean now?" said he.

"Yes—that is, as soon as it is light," she replied.

"Are you positively sure you are awake, Harriet?" asked Mr. Archibald.

"Awake!" she said. "I have not been asleep to-night. Don't you see I am dressed?" And she drew a chair to the bedside and sat down. "I know more about what is going on than you do, Hector," she said, "and I tell you if we stay any longer in this camp, there is going to be great trouble. That young Raybold pays no attention to what you said about keeping away from us. He comes here when he pleases, and he says he intends to come. I asked you to take a walk with me this evening because I saw him coming to the camp fire and I knew that you would resent it. To-night I saw him walking up and down in front of our cabin, and I believe he intended to try to speak to Margery. I went out to him myself, and he was positively insulting. If the bishop had not happened to come up, I believe he would have staid here and defied me. But he made him go. And now that you know this, Hector, there is bound to be trouble between you and that young man, and I do not want that. And, besides that, there is his sister; she is as determined to preach as he is to speak to Margery. The bishop says he can't stand her any longer, and he is going away to-morrow, and that will make it all the worse for us—especially for you, Hector. I cannot endure this state of things; it has made me so nervous I cannot get to sleep; and, besides, it is not right for us to keep Margery where she must be continually guarded from such a man. Now it may seem foolish to run away, but I have thought over the matter for hours and hours, and it is the only thing to do; and what is more, it is very easy to do. If we announce that we are going, we will all go, and the chief cause of quarrels and danger will go with us. I know you, Hector; you will not stand his impertinence.

"It will be daylight between three and four o'clock, and we three can start out quietly and have a pleasant walk to Sadler's. It is only four miles, and we can take our time. We need not carry anything with us but what we choose to put in our pockets. We can pack our bags and leave them here, and Mr. Sadler will send for them. When we get there we can go to bed if we like, and have time enough for a good sleep before breakfast, and then we can take the morning stage and leave this place and everybody in it. Now please don't be hasty and tell me all this is foolish. Remember, if you stay here you have a quarrel on your hands, and I shall have hours of misery until that quarrel is settled; and no matter how it is settled, things will be disagreeable afterwards."

"Harriet," said Mr. Archibald, suddenly twisting himself so that he sat on the side of the bed, "your idea is a most admirable one. It suits me exactly. Let us run away. It is impossible for us to do anything better than that. Have you told Margery?"

"No," she answered, "but I will go to her now."

"Be quick and quiet, then," said her husband, who had now entered fully into the spirit of the adventure; "nobody must hear us. I will dress, and then we will pack."

"Margery," said Mrs. Archibald, after three times shaking the sleeping girl, "you must get up. Your uncle and I are going away, and you must go with us."

Margery turned her great eyes on Mrs. Archibald, but asked no questions.

"Yes," said Mrs. Archibald; "we cannot stay in this camp any longer, on account of Mr. Raybold and various other things. Matters have come to a crisis, and we must go; and more than that, we must slip away so that the others may not go with us."

"When?" asked Margery, now speaking for the first time.

"As soon as it is daylight."

"So soon as that?" said the girl, a shadow on her brow which was very plain in the light of the candle which Mrs. Archibald had brought with her. "Surely not before breakfast?"

"Margery," said Mrs. Archibald, a little sharply, "you do not seem to understand—you are not awake; we must start as soon as it is light. But we cannot discuss it now. We are going, and you must go with us. You must get up and pack your things in your bag, which we shall send for."

Suddenly a light came into Margery's eyes and she sat up. "All right," said she; "I will be ready as soon as you are. It will be jolly to run away, especially so early in the morning," and with that she jumped out of bed.

XXVI.—AN ELOPEMENT.

A LITTLE more than an hour after Mrs. Archibald had made known her project to her husband the three inhabitants of the cabin stole softly out into the delicate light of the early dawn.

Mr. Archibald had thought of leaving a note for Matlack, but his wife had dissuaded him. She was afraid that the wrong person might get hold of it.

"When we are safely at Sadler's," she said, "we can send for our bags, with a note to Matlack. It will not matter then who knows." She had a firm belief in the power of the burly keeper of the inn to prevent trouble on his premises.

With careful but rapid steps the little party passed along the open portion of the camp, keeping as far as possible from the tent wherein reposed Corona and Mrs. Perkenpine, and soon reached the entrance of the wood road. Here it was not quite so light as in the open, but still they could make their way without much trouble, and after a few minutes' walking they felt perfectly safe from observation, and slackening their pace, they sauntered along at their ease.

The experience was a novel one to all of them; even Mr. Archibald had never been in the woods so early in the morning. In fact, under these great trees it could scarcely be said to be morning. The young light which made its uncertain way through the foliage was hardly strong enough to cast a shadow, and although these woodland wanderers knew that there was a roadway in which they were walking, that great trees stood by on each side of them, with the branches thrust out over their heads, and that there were bushes and vines and here and there a moss-covered rock or a fallen tree, they saw these things not clearly and distinctly, but as through a veil. But there was nothing uncertain about the air they breathed; full of the moist aroma of the woods, it was altogether different from the noonday odors of the forest.

Stronger and stronger grew the morning light, and more and more clearly perceptible became the greens, the browns, and the grays about them. Now the birds began to chatter and chirp, and squirrels ran along the branches of the trees, while a young rabbit bounced out from some bushes and went bounding along the road. This early morning life was something they had not seen in their camp, for it was all over before they began their day. There was a spring by the road-side, which they had noticed when they had come that way before, and when they reached it they sat down and ate some biscuit which Mrs. Archibald had brought with her, and drank cool water from Mr. Archibald's folding pocket-cup.

The loveliness of the scene, the novelty of the experience, the feeling that they were getting away from unpleasant circumstances, and in a perfectly original and independent fashion, gave them all high spirits. Even Mrs. Archibald, whose sleepless night might have been supposed to interfere with this morning walk, declared herself as fresh as a lark, and stated that she knew now why a lark or any other thing that got up early in the morning should be fresh.

They had not left the spring far behind them when they heard a rustling in the woods to the right of the road, and the next moment there sprang out into the open, not fifty feet in front of them, a full-grown red deer. They were so startled by this apparition that they all stopped as if the beautiful creature had been a lion in their path. For an instant it turned its great brown eyes upon them, and then with two bounds it plunged into the underbrush on the other side of the road. Mrs. Archibald and Margery had never before seen a deer in the woods.

The young girl clapped her hands. "It all reminds me of my first night at the opera," she cried.

Two or three times they rested, and they never walked rapidly, so that it was after five o'clock when the little party emerged into the open country and approached the inn. Not a soul was visible about the premises, but as they knew that some one would soon be stirring, they seated themselves in three arm-chairs on the wide piazza to rest and wait.

Peter Sadler was an early riser, and when the front hall door was open he appeared thereat, rolling his wheeled chair out upon the piazza with a bump—though not with very much of a bump, for the house was built to suit him and his chair. He did not take his usual morning roll upon the piazza, for, turning his head, he beheld a gentleman and two ladies fast asleep in three great wicker chairs.

"Upon my soul!" he exclaimed. "If they ain't the Camp Robbers!" At this exclamation they all awoke.

Ten minutes after that the tale had been told, and if the right arm of Mr. Sadler's chair had not been strong and heavy it would have been shivered into splinters.

"As usual," cried the stalwart Peter, "the wrong people run away. If I had seen that bicycle man and his party come running out of the woods, I should have been much better satisfied, and I would have thought you had more spirit in you, sir, than I gave you credit for."

"Oh, you mistake my husband altogether," cried Mrs. Archibald. "The trouble with him is that he has too much spirit, and that is the reason I brought him away."

"And there is another thing," exclaimed Margery. "You should not say Mr. Raybold and his party. He was the only one of them who behaved badly."

"That is true," said Mrs. Archibald. "His sister is somewhat obtrusive, but she is a lady, gentle and polite, and it would have been very painful to her and as painful to us had it been necessary to forcibly eject her brother from our camp. It was to avoid all this that we—"

"Eloped," interjected Mr. Archibald.

The good Peter laughed. "Perhaps you are right," said he. "But I shall have a word with that bicycle fellow when he comes this way. You are an original party, if there ever was one. First you go on somebody else's wedding-journey, and then you elope in the middle of the night, and now the best thing you can do is to go to bed. You can have a good sleep and a nine-o'clock breakfast, and I do not see why you should leave here for two or three days."

"Oh, we must go this morning," said Mrs. Archibald, quickly. "We must go. We really cannot wait until any of those people come here. It makes me nervous to think about it."

"Very good, then," said Peter. "The coach starts for the train at eleven."

Mrs. Archibald was a systematic woman, and was in the habit of rising at half past seven, and when that hour arrived she awoke as if she had been asleep all night. Going to the window to see what sort of a day it was, which was also her custom, she looked out upon the lawn in front of the house, and her jaw dropped and her eyes opened. There she beheld Margery and Mr. Clyde strolling along in close converse. For a moment she was utterly stupefied.

"What can this mean?" she thought. "How could they have missed us so soon? We are seldom out of our cabin before eight o'clock. I cannot comprehend it!" And then a thought came to her which made her face grow pale. "Is it possible," she said to herself, "that any of the others have come? I must go immediately and find out."

In ten minutes she had dressed and quietly left the room.

When Margery saw Mrs. Archibald descending the piazza steps, she left Mr. Clyde and came running to meet her.

"I expect you are surprised to see him here," she said, "but I intended to tell you and Uncle Archibald as soon as you came down. You see, I did not at all want to go away and not let Mr. Clyde know what had become of me, and so, after I had packed my bag, I wrote a little note to him and put it in a biscuit-box under a stone not far from my window, which we had arranged for a post-office just the day before."

"A post-office!" cried Mrs. Archibald.

"Yes," said Margery. "Of course there wasn't any need for one—at least we did not suppose there would be—but we thought it would be nice; for, you know, we are engaged."

"What!" cried Mrs. Archibald. "Engaged? Impossible! What are you talking about?"

"Yes," said Margery, "we are really engaged, and it was absolutely necessary. Under ordinary circumstances this would not have happened so soon, but as things were it could not be delayed. Mr. Clyde thought the matter over very carefully, and he decided that the only way to keep me from being annoyed and frightened by Mr. Raybold was for him to have the right to defend me. If he would put an end to that young man's attentions. We were only engaged yesterday, so we haven't had any time to tell anybody, but we intended to do it to-day, beginning with you and Uncle Archibald. Harrison came over early to the post-office, hoping to find some sort of a note, and he was wonderfully astonished when he read what was in the one I put there. I told him not to say anything to anybody, and he didn't, but started off for Sadler's immediately, and came almost on a run, he says, he was so afraid I might go away before he saw me."

"Margery," exclaimed the elder lady, tears coming into her eyes as she spoke, "I am grieved and shocked beyond expression. What can I say to my husband? What can I say to your mother? From the bottom of my heart I wish we had not brought you with us; but how could I dream that all this trouble would come of it?"

"It is indeed a very great pity," said Margery, "that Mr. Clyde and I could not have been engaged before we went into camp; then Mr. Raybold would have had no reason to bother me, and I should have had no trouble with Martin."

"Martin!" cried Mrs. Archibald. "What of him?"

"Oh, he was in love with me too," replied the young girl, "and we had talks about it, and I sent him away. He was really a young man far above his station, and was doing the things he did simply because he wanted to study nature; but of course I could not consider him at all."

"And that was the reason he left us!" exclaimed Mrs. Archibald. "Upon my word, it is amazing!"

"Yes," said Margery; "and now don't you see, Aunt Harriet, how many reasons there were why Mr. Clyde and I should settle things definitely and become engaged? Now there need be no further trouble with anybody."

Distressed as she was, Mrs. Archibald could not refrain from smiling. "No further trouble!" she said. "I think you would better wait until Mr. Archibald and your mother have heard this story before you say that."

Mr. Archibald was dressing for breakfast when his wife told him of Margery's engagement, and the announcement caused him to twirl around so suddenly that he came very near breaking a looking-glass with his hair-brush. He made a dash for his coat. "I will see him," he said, and his eyes sparkled in a way which indicated that they could discover a malefactor without the aid of spectacles.

"Stop!" said his wife, standing in his way. "Don't go to them when you are angry. We have just got out of trouble, and don't let us jump into it again. If they are really and truly engaged—and I am sure they are—we have no authority to break it off, and the less you say the better. What we must do is to take her immediately to her mother, and let her settle the matter as best she can. If she knows her daughter as well as I do, I am sure she will acquit us of all blame."

Mr. Archibald was very indignant and said a great deal, but his wife was firm in her counsel to avoid any hard words or bad feeling in a matter over which they had now no control.

"Well," said he at last, "I will pass over the whole affair to Mrs. Dearborn, but I hope I may eat my breakfast without seeing them. Whatever happens, I need a good meal."

When Mr. Archibald came out of the breakfast-room, his mind considerably composed by hot rolls and coffee, he met Margery in the hall.

"Dear Uncle Archibald," she exclaimed, "I have been waiting and waiting for you. I hope you are not angry. Please be as kind to us as you can, and remember, it was just the same with us as it was with you and Aunt Harriet. You would not have run away from the camp in the middle of the night if you could have helped it, and we should not have been engaged so suddenly if we could have helped it. But we all had to do what we did on account of the conduct of others; and as it is settled now, I think we ought all try to be as happy as we can, and forget our troubles. Here is Harrison, and he and I both pray from the bottom of our hearts that you will shake hands with him. I know you always liked him, for you have said so. And now we are both going to mother to tell her all about it."

"Both?" said Mr. Archibald.

"Yes," said Margery; "we must go together, otherwise mother would know nothing about him, and I should be talking to no purpose. But we are going to do everything frankly and openly and go straight to her, and put our happiness in her hands."

Mr. Archibald looked at her steadfastly. "Such ingenuousness," he said, presently, "is overpowering. Mr. Clyde, how do you do? Do you think it is going to be a fine day?"

The young man smiled. "I think it is going to be a fine lifetime," said he.

The party was gathered together on the piazza, ready to take the coach. The baggage had arrived from the camp in a cart; but Phil Matlack had not come with it, as he remained to take down his tent and settle affairs generally. They were all sorry not to see him again, for he had proved himself a good man and a good guide; but when grown-up married people elope before daybreak something must be expected to go wrong. Hearty and substantial remembrances were left for him, and kind words of farewell for the bishop, and even for Miss Corona when she should appear.

Peter Sadler was loath to part with his guests. "You are more interesting now than ever you were," he said; "and I want to hear all about that hermit business; you've just barely mentioned it."

"My dear sir," said Mr. Archibald, with a solemn visage, "sooner or later Miss Corona Raybold will present herself at this inn on her way home. If you want to know anything about her plan to assist human beings to assert their individualities, it will only be necessary to mention the fact to her."

"Good-by, then," said Peter, shaking hands with Mr. and Mrs. Archibald. "I don't know what out-of-the-way thing you two will do next, but, whatever it is, I hope it will bring you here."

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

HOW WE TOOK WAKE ISLAND.

[SPECIAL CORRESPONDENCE OF "HARPER'S WEEKLY."]

ON BOARD THE "CHINA" IN MANILA HARBOR, July 17.

On the deck beneath the awning
I dozing lay and yawning;
It was the gray of dawning
Ere yet the sun arose.

IT was so hot below that the mattress burned, and we shouldered our bedding and went on deck, where, side by side, we lay, covering the deck like mounds in a graveyard, and watched the lazy swell of the polished sea as the sun came up through muslin puffs of clouds. Slowly the days dragged out their dull monotony. Even drills and sanitary inspections became monotonous in the long run, and yet how many interesting things there are on board! Go down into the sticky hold, where boxes of the commissary lie. There is everything from tin basins and tooth-brushes to bacon and beans—provisions for 3500 men for six months, each day's rations for one man weighing about four pounds, a total of 2,520,000 pounds of regular rations alone in our four ships; one thousand rounds of ammunition per man, or 3,500,000 rounds in all. And then up on deck again to watch the men—"my men," says the old gray-haired captain of regulars, who has been a lieutenant for twenty-one years and knows his tactics and army regulations by heart, and, when any doubtful point comes up, is always consulted. "The boys," says the beardless young captain who is out on an adventurous lark, and has made up his mind to fight when the time comes and let the rest slide. He volunteered to fight for his country, and not to be ordered about, he thinks. Oh, my son, what is order and discipline for but to hold men together when the bullets whistle and the bravest man thinks of home? The old gray-haired captain seems to you cold and unpatriotic, but he has had his baptism of fire in the war of the rebellion. He knows what it means, and he will give his orders in the same cool tone when fire chills the heart of all. After days of observation the conclusion forces itself upon one that these particular volunteers of the rank

RAISING THE AMERICAN FLAG ON WAKE ISLAND.
General F. V. Greene and Part of Landing Party, July 4, 1898.
Photograph by John F. Bass.

and file are particularly fine volunteers, that their officers are particularly good fellows among good fellows, but that the National Guard system has spoiled them for many months for soldiers.

It is easier to teach a man who knows nothing about the subject how to play the violin than to teach a man who has learned the wrong way, and so it is a mighty hard job to make the social officer of peace-times into a military officer of war-times. It is rather a sad state of things to contemplate, for if we are going into the war business, many a good fellow will pay with his life for the faults of our system! But this is looking into the future, and does not immediately concern our jovial party. All that can be said is that if we ever fight a man of our own size, we will change our methods.

The Fourth of July brought a change, and with the peep of dawn we, nearest of all Americans to the 190th degree of longitude, had the honor, in all probability, of beginning the celebration. Where they came from I do not know, but a few fire-crackers were fired before the officer of the day put an end to this innocent but dangerous amusement.

Down on the horizon a long white line pops up, and the shouts of "Land! land!" break from our ship-weary hearts.

"Wake Island, a coral atoll 19° 11' north, by 166° 33' east," shouts down the captain from the bridge. As we draw near, two open boats are lowered, and General Greene celebrates the Fourth in earnest by raising the American flag on the island. A dreary sun-beaten spot we find it, glistening with white coral and shells, and covered with a sickly growth of low shrubs. This barren waste stretches along for twenty miles. An oblong lagoon, cut from the sea by shallow reefs, over which the waves constantly break, eats its way into the heart of the island. Perhaps this heretofore unclaimed island may some day be used as a telegraph post, or even a coaling station. It lies well on the way to Manila, and therefore has been visited only by a few exploring expeditions and unfortunate castaways. Leaving the stars and stripes to be torn to pieces by indignant gulls, who in flocks fearlessly swept down upon us and pecked at our hats, we returned to the China.

We are off again, and as the island gradually fades from sight we examine the queer fish of variegated colors and the six-foot shark the soldiers caught from the ship's side while they waited. Then we turn in to our holiday dinner, and in the afternoon we assemble, and General Greene tells us the soldier's duty in the great and new enterprise into which the United States is entering for the first time—"discipline and obedience, without which an army is only a mob rushing to its own destruction."

ADDRESS BY GENERAL F. V. GREENE
ON STEAMSHIP "CHINA," SECOND PHILIPPINE EXPEDITION.

PACIFIC OCEAN, LONGITUDE 166° EAST, LATITUDE 19° NORTH.
JULY 4, 1898.

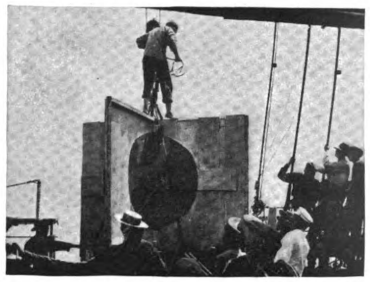
Fellow-Soldiers and Comrades,—When Thomas Jefferson wrote the immortal words which you have just heard read, he little dreamed that one hundred and twenty-two years later they would be read in the middle of the Pacific Ocean to an expedition of American soldiers bound to the conquest of a group of islands off the coast of China. Yet the vigor with which Jefferson acted in acquiring Louisiana proves that, were he alive to-day, he would be the first to seize the opportunities which Admiral Dewey's glorious victory in Manila Bay has placed within our grasp; in Jefferson's mind there would be no hesitation as to our duty to hold the Philippines and accept the destiny which has been suddenly thrust upon us.

The Declaration of Independence was a declaration of human rights which at that time were not acknowledged by any government in the world. We gained those rights by our success in the war of the Revolution, and we have enjoyed them for so many generations that we have come to look upon them as a mere matter of course—like the air we breathe or the water we drink. But there are on the earth to-day people to whom such rights as life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness are unknown. They dream of them as the hope of the future. And it would seem as if it were to be the destiny of the United States, under the guidance of Providence, to bestow upon these less-favored people some measure of those blessings which we have so long enjoyed; to use the vast wealth and power and resources which we have created during four generations of freedom in putting an end to cruelty, oppression, and misgovernment. Some people call this quixotic, and say it is a needless meddling in other people's affairs. But that which buildeth up a nation is not money nor power, but self-sacrifice, devotion to duty, righteousness. And the time has indeed come for us Americans to turn our thoughts from mere material gain to those higher conceptions by which alone man is ennobled and nations are made permanently great.

It was natural and inevitable that in thus righting wrong we should be brought into controversy with Spain, which is the most cruel, vindictive, and treacherous among civilized nations. Some of the colonies which she lost in years gone by, and some which until now she has retained, lie close to our own land, and we were thus familiar with what took place upon them. We remonstrated in vain with her concerning their misgovernment, until nothing remained but to employ force to put a stop to her misdeeds. Upon this mission we are now engaged.

These are the principles upon which this war is waged. It was our privilege as American citizens to consider and pass judgment upon them. Having done so, and having decided to engage as soldiers and thus become the instruments by which these great ends are to be accomplished, it is now incumbent upon us to give our whole thought to our military duties. And the first of these is obedience. The oath which we have taken is to serve the United States and obey the orders of the officers placed over us. This oath is equally binding upon every one in the military service, from the highest major-general to the newest recruit. Each in turn, according to his rank, receives orders from those over him and gives orders to those under him; and upon all rests the same obligation of obedience without question and without hesitation. And upon those who give orders rests the further obligation to see to it that the orders which they give are judicious and proper.

I say then to you, officers, study carefully the needs and requirements of your men; watch constantly everything that concerns their health and welfare—their food, their clothing, their sleeping, their amusements. Do everything that circumstances permit to diminish their hardships and add to their comfort and happiness. And having done this, exact from them at all times prompt and willing obedience.



And to you, men, I say, trust your officers, confide in their judgment, and not only obey their orders, but follow their advice and suggestions. In that way only can be established that bond of mutual confidence and support between officers and men without which an army is merely a mob rushing blindly to its own destruction.

War is a serious business. Only those who have seen it can realize what it will be like when we get really into the midst of it. But it brings forth the noblest qualities with which man is endowed—courage, devotion, self-sacrifice. To those who survive, the memory of its hardships and dangers will ever bring a feeling of pride which no other acts of a man's life can produce. And those who fall will have the eternal satisfaction of knowing that by their death they have contributed to the accomplishment of a great result.

Let us go onward, then, to our duty, come what may, in a just cause, confidently relying on the gratitude of our fellow-men, the approval of our own consciences, and the blessing of Almighty God.

On the 5th of July our merry party was saddened by the first and only death on the China.

A Spanish gunboat loose about somewhere in the Pacific was seen by the captain of the Belgic, and reported to us at Honolulu. Then it did not seem serious to us, but now that we approach the region of supposed danger, every one begins to feel uneasy. General Greene decides that we need some practice in self-defence. We tie our field-pieces to the deck, and Captain Grant, at the head of the Utah battery, the best trained volunteer troops on board, goes at it. The shells pound the water about the little floating target at a three-mile range down to fifteen hundred yards. Nearly every shot goes near enough to hit the side of a gunboat, if the target were one. Next in turn come the infantry, and as the good ship China turns and twists to give everybody a chance, the cracking of rifle-fire runs fore and aft. It was a good day's work, though somewhat noisy; and considering the bob of the ship, the marksmanship was excellent. At last, with the long shrill whistle of the China, the firing was stopped.

HOISTING TARGET OVERBOARD FROM TRANSPORT "CHINA."
Photograph by John F. Bass.

Some of the interesting things on board are the schools where one may learn the art of soldiery. Among the engineers one learns how to draw a map, but principally about United States tactics. A study of the latter under the tutorship of an experienced officer in regular service leads one to remember the remark of a veteran Irish captain, who, when asked by his colonel some catch question out of the "tactics," remarked, "Sir, I am neither a monkey or a poll-parrot, but when me leg is in the saddle me brain is pregnant with ideas."

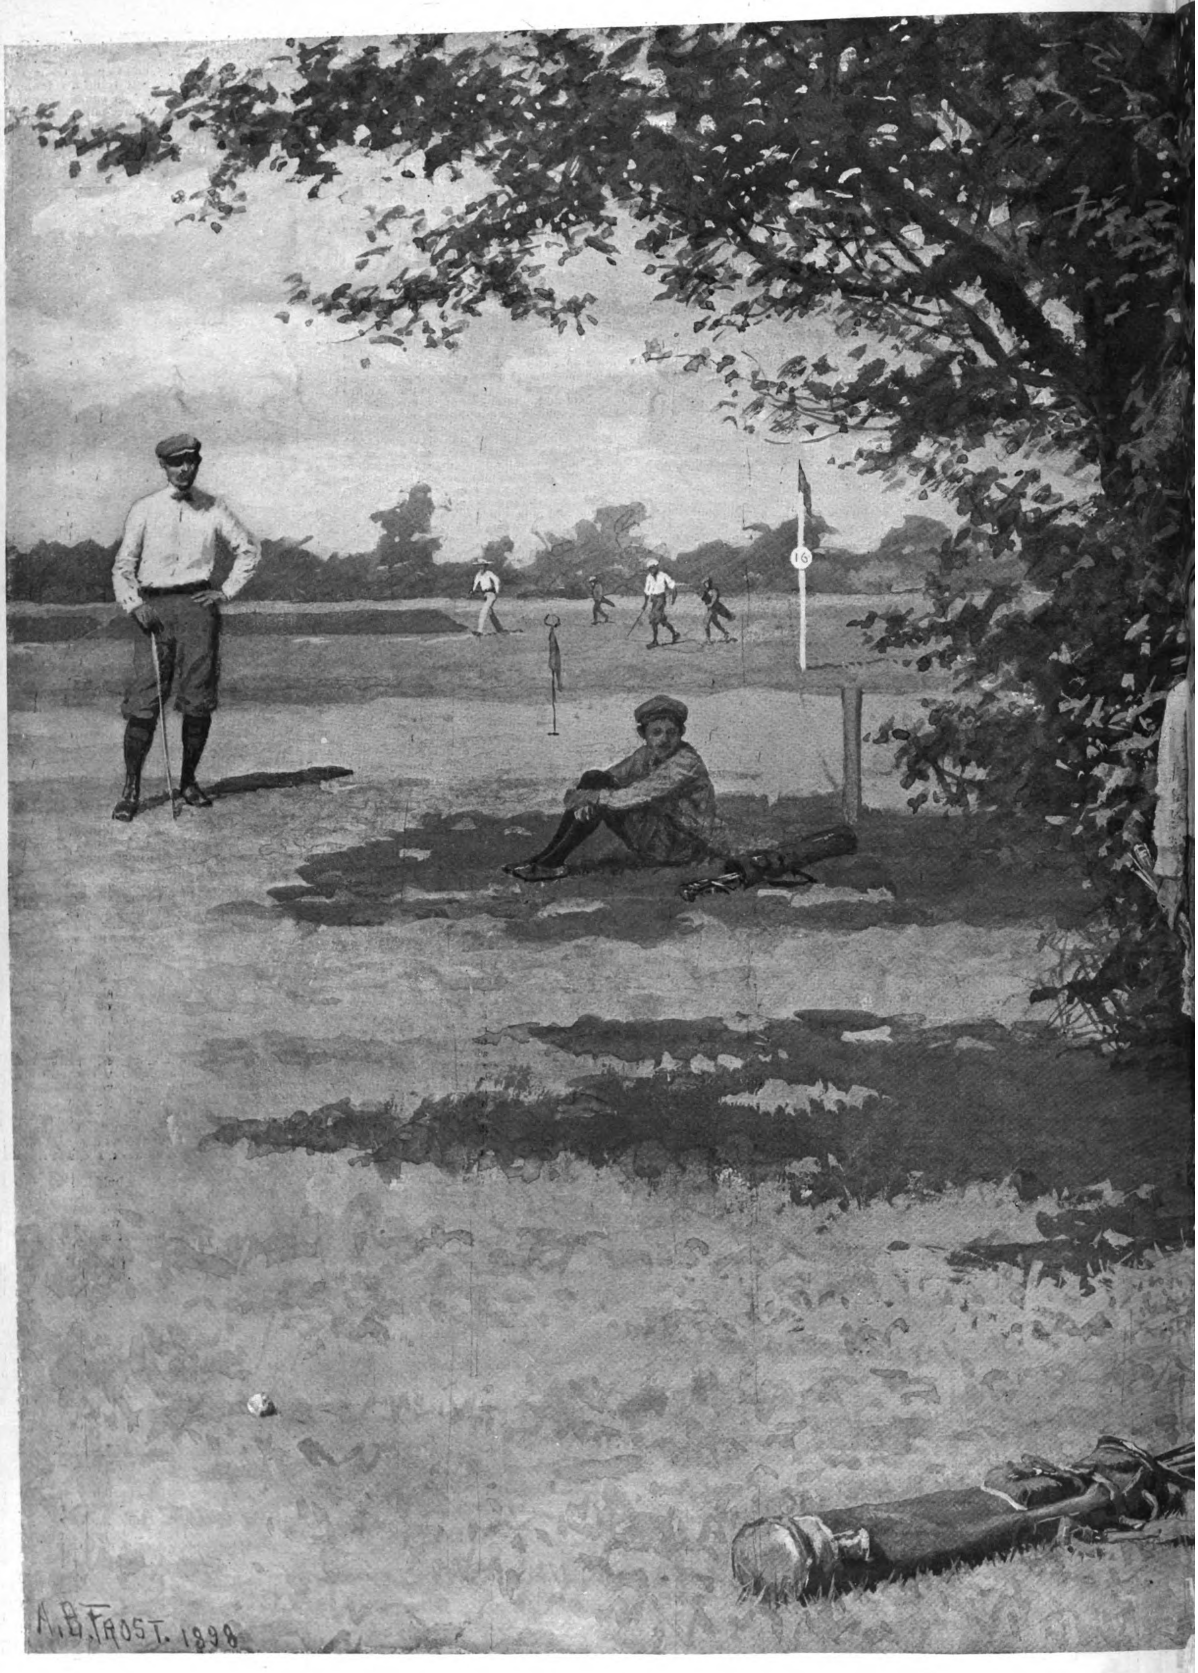
Our tactics have nothing to do with the actual experience of modern warfare, but remain unchanged, regardless of the fact that all the great powers of Europe change their tactics as the experiments of their officers develop the theory of war. So it happens that our soldiers will go into a fight with the same battle formation as that of Persia.

At Guam Island we expected to meet one of the American gunboats sent out to join us. The absence of our expected convoy caused uneasiness, which finally ended about midnight in a scare. Like the rush of water through an open lock the rumor spread through the ship that a Spanish gunboat was sighted off our starboard bow. I rushed up the companionway, and as I passed between the decks a tall lanky volunteer stuck his head through a door and called out in a hoarse whisper, "Cheese it, we're pinched!" Could it be that I was not on the Pacific, but really on the Bowery? However, we met no Spanish gunboat, and steamed safely and jubilantly into the Bay of Manila and up alongside of our brave little fleet at Cavité. The tars gave us a roaring cheer, which we answered with a will, and a few of us who did not wear uniforms jumped into boats and put for the shore.

Cavité seemed to us a paradise indeed, with its great shade trees, its quaint buildings, and the very little natives, with very little clothing, who crowded curiously about. It would take about five able-bodied Filipinos to make one Jimmy Green, of Troy, New York; and yet the quartermaster assures me that five of these thin dwarfs will do as much work as twenty-five of our brawny soldiers. From what I have seen of them, I should say that the native, when he does work, keeps at it with remarkable persistence.

There are many South Sea bubbles, in the shape of imaginary evils that have been told about this place, that need exploding. Mothers at home need not fear for the health of their sons, for the weather is not unbearably hot, and the health of the first expedition is excellent so far.

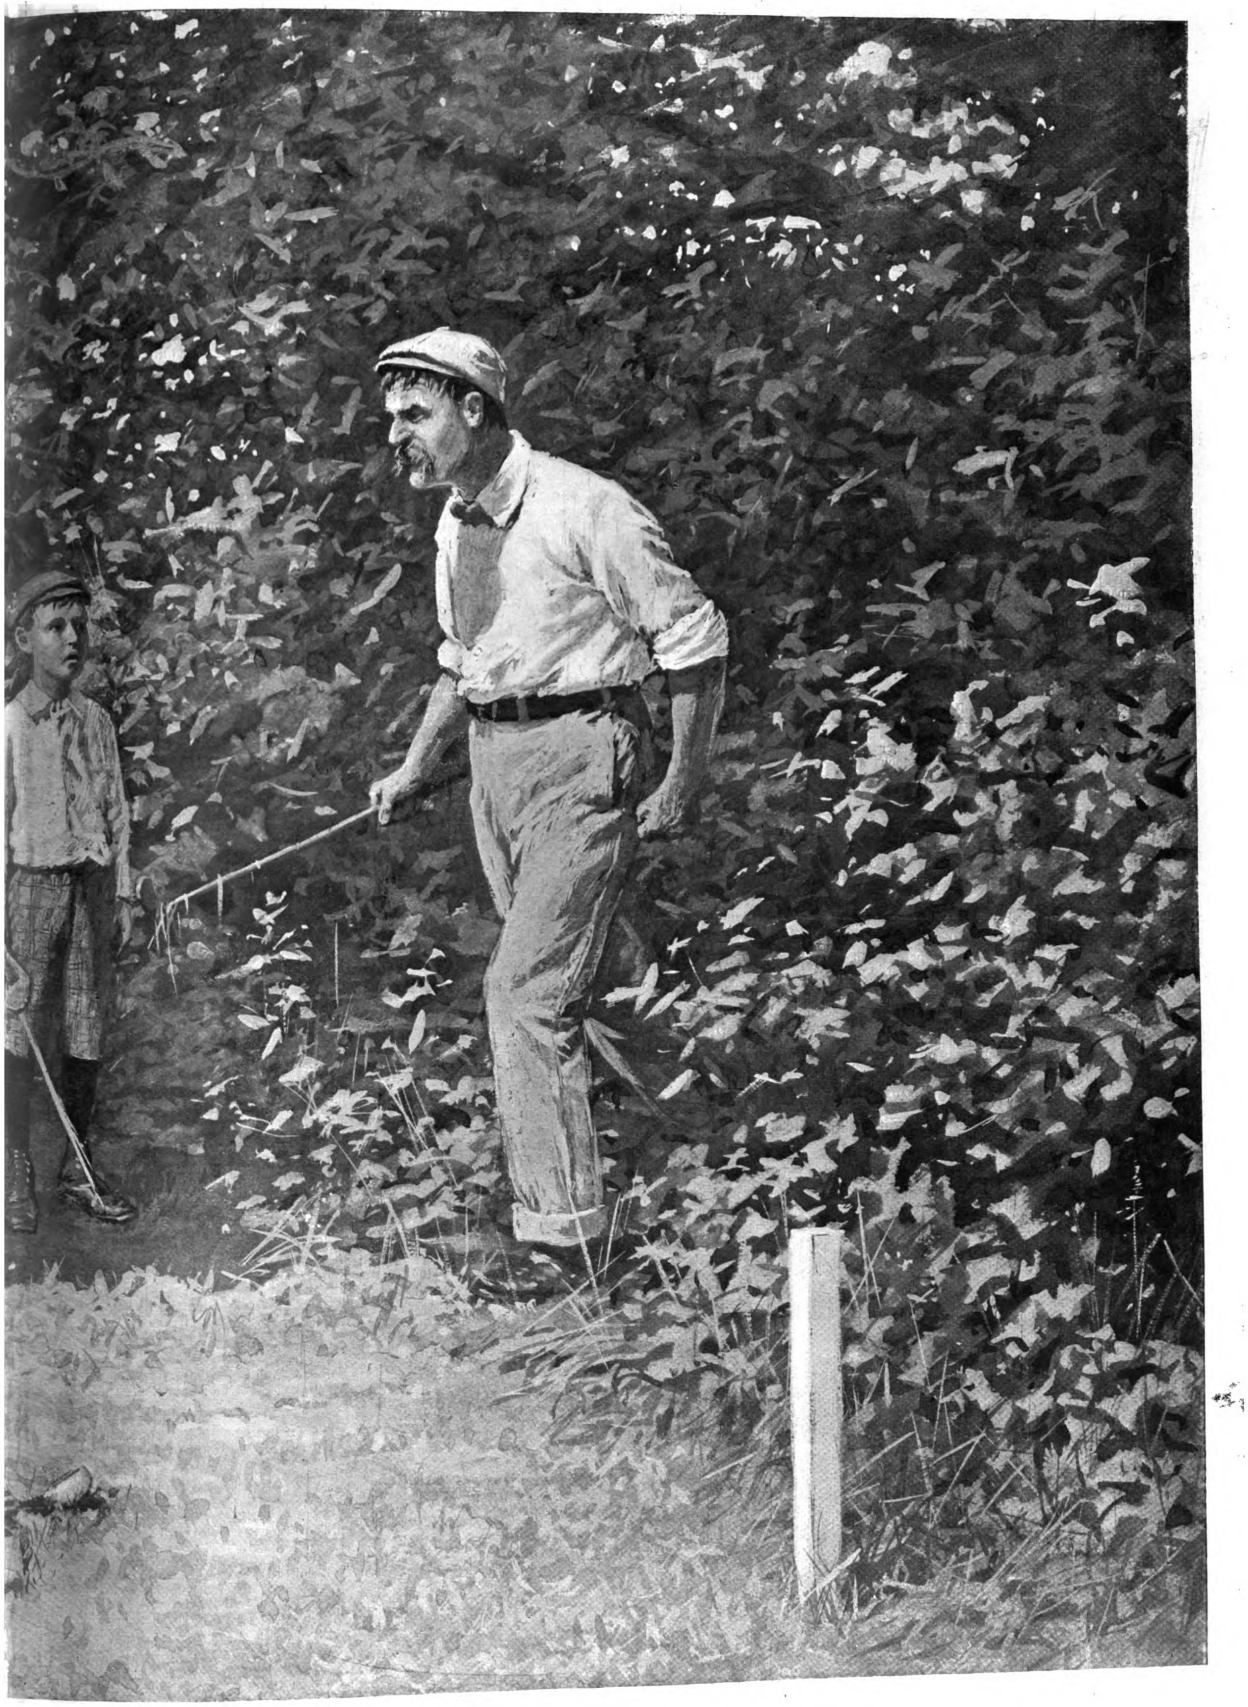
Yesterday Lieutenant Lazelle of the Eighteenth Infantry, who died on the Colon, was buried in the old fort. A more appropriate grave for a soldier could not well be imagined. Overlooking the sea, in a space one hundred yards square, surrounded with ancient battered walls, with old dismounted guns and cannon-balls lying about, the grave was dug. Native men, women, and children in rags of variegated hues crowded the walls. Slowly, with muffled beat of drums, the funeral passed in through the old stone gate. The officers crowded close about the grave, feeling, over their first dead among these strange surroundings, the strong need of standing side by side. Three volleys, and then the trumpeter steps to the open grave and blows for the last time "taps" for his officer.



Tight about the city of Manila binds the line of insurgents, burrowing forward from trench to trench with antlike perseverance. The fighting is said to be at long range, neither side taking any chances, and both sides generally firing wide of the mark, although yesterday I saw a number of insurgents brought in fatally wounded. I have been told that the Spaniards fire their big eight-inch guns at the insurgents' pickets. At any rate, from the little effect produced and the incessant rattle of musketry, I should judge there was an enormous waste of good ammunition.

JOHN F. BASS.

LANDING PARTY UNDER GENERAL GREENE WHICH HOISTED THE AMERICAN FLAG ON WAKE ISLAND JULY 4, 1898.
Photograph by John F. Bass.

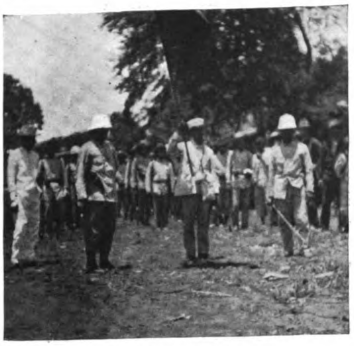


Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

"I'VE PLAYE

Drawn by

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google



) THIRTEEN!"

A. B. Frost.

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

INSURGENT COLORS.
Photograph by John F. Bass.

FIGHTING IN THE PHILIPPINES.

[Special Correspondence of "Harper's Weekly."]

Cavité, Philippine Islands, July 16.

For two or three days the firing along the Spanish lines south of Manila had been more than usually heavy. The big guns had been roaring all day as well as most of the night, and reports of all sorts filled the air of the successes of the insurgents. It seemed certain that the Filipinos were driving the Spaniards back constantly, and most of the special correspondents here cabled that as a fact to their newspapers. Then one morning several of us started out together to go to the front and find out just what had been done.

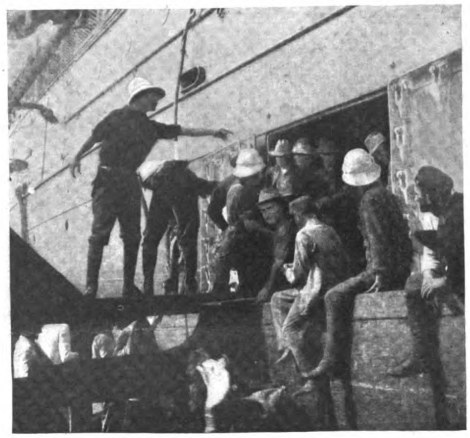
The first obstacle in the way of going to the front is young Mr. Legardo, secretary to General Aguinaldo. Mr. Legardo is a very soft-voiced young man, with a tired blasé air, which makes one doubt that he would look around if some one fired a gun just behind his back. Colonel Legardo's principal business seems to be keeping persons from getting what they want. He speaks English very well, with a delicate ladylike manner, and he contrives very skilfully to convey the impression that if his caller only would go away he would begin to catch up his much needed sleep at once. But Colonel Legardo is not sleepy, and somewhere behind the expressionless mask of his face he carries a very lively wit. The information one gets from him is likely to be less than that given in return. They say that an American Indian is never surprised. But no American Indian ever saw Legardo. We went to Legardo for passes to the front. Legardo was curious about the American operations in Cuba. We said 27,000 soldiers had been landed at Santiago de Cuba. "When did you take it?" asked Legardo, with the air of one who regretted that politeness forced him to ask the question. However, at the last we prevailed, and acquired some letters written in the native language, and signed by Don Emilio himself. These letters commanded his faithful followers to permit us to go where we pleased, to guard us well from harm, and, if we were hungry, to feed us.

It was at Parañaque, five or six miles south of Manila, that we presented the passes to General Mariano Noriel, in command of the Primera Zona de Manila. Noriel is a bullet-headed young man, with more stolidity and solidity than energy. He is a believer in the philosophy of making the "most of what we yet may spend before we too into the dust descend." Lieutenant-Colonel Juan Cailles, Secundo Gabo in the first zone, who was with Noriel, is the active leader in the zone. A slender serious-eyed young man of great energy, with an air of businesslike determination about him, and a tremendous conviction of the wrongs of his people, and an all-absorbing hatred of the Spanish. Noriel and Cailles offered at once to go to the front with us and we were in great good-humor at the prospect. But we found out that there are other methods of delay than those employed by Legardo. Hospitality is a terrible time-consumer. General Noriel could not think of letting us start to the front without some refreshment, so away we went through half of Parañaque, to the house of a friend of the commander, where soup, it was announced, would be served at once. We sat down to wait, and passed the time by exhibiting our revolvers to the Filipinos. Noriel examined them curiously and with a laugh. Cailles would have taken them to pieces. He wanted to know their make, their cost, and their effectiveness. The new hammerless revolver made his black eyes sparkle with delight. He showed his own old horse-pistol, loaded with cartridges of four different makes, and if hospitality had permitted he would have offered to trade or buy. Little as these fellows have, they would give $50 for one of our revolvers and think themselves fortunate in the bargain.

Soup was served at last; the men sat down at the table, and the women stood around the room and looked on. Noriel made jokes about the rain and took a lesson in English. Cailles was silent or talked of the fighting capabilities of his people and the Spaniards. It made one wonder why Cailles was not the general, and Noriel the commissary; but the Filipinos have no commissariat, and need one.

Soup exhausted the bill of fare, but Noriel had a means of delay in reserve. As we buckled on our revolvers and canteens again, he announced that we must see a cock-fight before we went on. Every Filipino keeps a game-cock, and he sent out at once for several. They came at last, and the battle was fought in the street beneath the windows. They called one cock a Filipino, and offered fabulous bets on him, and laughed and cheered when he killed the antagonist they had dubbed Spanish, in less than half a minute. Noriel cheered the winner. Cailles showed us how the Filipinos fight with sword and bolo, using the long blade right-handed for guard, and the short one left-handed for killing.

Then the carromattas came, loose-jointed, tough-springed, stout-axled two-wheeled carts—a cross between a liver-regulator and a jaunting-car. Little scraps of ponies, eight hands high and half a thousand pounds in weight, dragged us, two in each crazy cart, at a bone-cracking speed over roads full of mud and ruts, three miles and a half to Priseda, Noriel's headquarters in the field. The ride had restored Noriel's appetite, and he must have dinner before we could proceed. So, while we questioned a Spanish deserter who had come in the day before, Noriel sent an aide to warn some friend to prepare a feast. The Spaniard told a long story, the burden of which was that Manila was in desperate straits, and that the Germans were helping the Spaniards in many ways. But all that we knew.



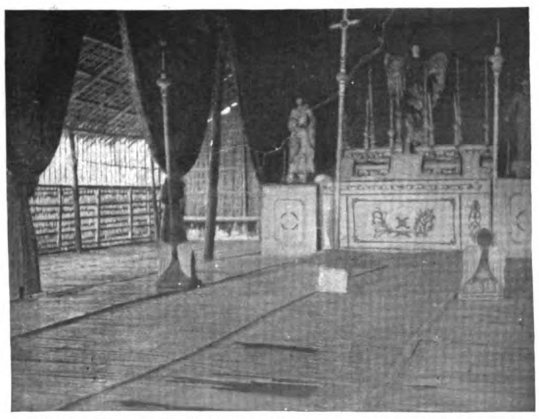
At last dinner was announced, and we hurried to the house, for the afternoon was drawing on toward its half-way mark, and the front was yet a long way in the front. This time it was a full meal—meat with garlic, garlic with chickens, liver and garlic, and rice with cocoanut oil, all scooped out on our plates by the deft fingers of a woman who served the meal. It came to an end at last, and we got back to headquarters. Then Noriel announced that, after all, it was too dangerous to go to the front. The Americans might get hurt, and that would lead to unpleasant complications. To give weight to his argument, a boy came in from somewhere near the trenches shot through the left hand. We insisted that the risk was ours, and finally Noriel yielded.

Carromattas again, and a mile more of dreadful shaking up. Then a cross-roads hamlet, a dozen native huts, and across our road a barricade with two old 8-inch smooth-bores, dragged from Cavité with infinite labor and pains by man-power. These guns were destined for the trench which now we could see seven or eight hundred yards beyond. Here Noriel stopped: we could go no farther. Up the road to the trench marched the Filipino soldiers, singly or in little groups, walking along in perfect unconcern, bolt upright. Others were coming out, no one giving the least apparent attention to the possibility of danger from the Spanish fire.

If they could do it we could, and we started on. Noriel protested, but we went. The tops of the bamboos along the road were cut and broken by the Spanish fire, but there were no shot-marks near the ground. Across the road beside the trench there was another barricade. Half-way to it we heard the whistle of bullets above our heads. Then came the roar of a Spanish volley; a second volley followed, and then a third. We listened for the insurgent reply, but there was none. When we got to the barricade the Filipinos were strolling up and down behind their trenches, smoking cigarettes and taking life easy. The trench was three and a half feet wide, and about as deep. The dirt from it had been thrown out in front, making a very respectable breastwork. At intervals pieces of roof thatch had been slung across the trench, one edge resting on the breastwork, the other supported by bamboo poles a foot or so high. Under these make-shift roofs the Filipinos sat on benches or stools, sheltered from the rain, and ate rice or sugar-cane, smoked cigarettes, and whiled away the time. The trench ran two hundred yards west from the road to the beach. Thirty-five yards in front of it a line of bamboos paralleled it. At the beach a cluster of huts stood at its end, and a heavy line of bamboos crossed it at right angles parallel with the beach. This line ran to the Spanish trench, two hundred yards away. For the rest the field was open, with a fine hard turf. The Spanish work was similar to that of the Filipinos, but higher. It was in plain sight all along, except for the one line of bamboos in the insurgent front. Why the insurgents had not thrown up their trench at that line no one could explain. Nor did it appear why they did not advance to it any night, as they could have done with perfect ease. Either side could have used it for an advance, for it was fine cover. But the Spaniards were retreating, not advancing, and Aguinaldo's men were waiting Don Emilio's pleasure.

At the beach the insurgent trench moved forward a little. The beach gave a clean, unobstructed sweep to the fire of both sides. The Filipinos crouched down, and bade us do likewise, and we crouched down to the water's edge. Presently a squad of Spaniards let go at us. The bullets cut through the tree-tops, and whistled by harmlessly. The insurgents grinned, and said, "Alto, alto." More Spanish fire. I looked around, and saw two or three Filipinos standing up with their guns. They were looking for Spanish heads to show above their breastwork. I watched the Spanish line with my glasses, but there was no sign of movement. Several squads fired, but they use smokeless powder, and I could not locate them. The Filipinos said the Spaniards never showed themselves, rising up when they fired only as far as they could without exposure, and letting the rifles go as nearly level as possible, but absolutely without aim. Their contempt for the Spaniards and for Spanish fire was superb. Apparently they had not the slightest thought of danger.

So we got to the front, and saw the Spanish lines, but not the Spaniards, although we heard them. That night we slept at Noriel's Parañaque house, on the floor, with the general snoring beside us; but he gave us dulce de cocoa for supper, and we forgave him for everything. Two days later, with Assistant Adjutant-General McCain and Lieutenant Calkins, navigator of the Olympia, I went to the front again. This time we went straight out, without seeing Noriel, and lost no time. The smooth-bores were going into position behind the trench that day, and they promised us a great fight "mañana." It came four days later, and when the Spaniards heard the roar of the smooth-bores they ran. Now they are under the guns of Malate, the last fortified outpost of Manila. The insurgents have driven them back over nearly twenty miles of country practically impossible for our men. It is covered with a thick jungle of thorny bamboo and heavy scrub, or filled with paddy-fields, canebrakes, and bean-patches. Whatever the outcome of the insurgent problem here, Aguinaldo has saved our troops a lot of desperately hard campaigning. If now we have to drive the Filipinos back, it will be work that will remind our men of the Modoc war.



ASTOR BATTERY GOING ASHORE.
Photograph by F. D. Millet.

On this second trip we went back from the beach more than two miles. The insurgents have barricaded every road and foot-path, and every barricade faces a Spanish outwork. The barricades are from a quarter to a half mile apart, but not more than three hundred yards separates the opposing forces at any point. The insurgent works extend clear around Manila, and the Spaniards are completely hemmed in. There is no hope for them but surrender.

The last outpost we saw faced down an open road. The Spanish were in plain view about two hundred and fifty yards away. A dozen of them stood behind their breastwork smoking. Our glasses clearly revealed the little puffs of blue smoke that rose from their cigarettes or cigars. Twenty yards in the left front of our barricade there was the ruin of an old stone house. It was partly concealed by thick undergrowth. As we stood up behind the breastwork to look at the Spanish work, some Spaniard who had crawled into this stone pile let go at us with a Mauser. The first intimation we had that a man was behind the stones was the crack of his rifle. We ducked. We lost no time about it, and used no ceremony. Then we laughed, for of course the bullet was far beyond us before we heard the report. That is the ridiculous part of being shot at. After the bullet is half a mile down the road looking for somebody else you dodge. Fifty or sixty Filipinos set a watch for this fellow, but he got another shot at us without being seen. It was the old Spanish way—up in the air, without exposing the body. But you can dodge just as well for a bad shot as for a good one—better most of the time.

Oscar King Davis.

CHURCH WHERE AGUINALDO TOOK OATH OF OFFICE AS PRESIDENT OF REVOLUTION.
Photograph by John F. Bass.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

DEWEY AND VON DIEDERICHS.

[SPECIAL CORRESPONDENCE OF "HARPER'S WEEKLY."]

CAVITE, PHILIPPINE ISLANDS, July 18.

SINCE the Subig Bay business and his interviews with the admirals of the other foreign fleets here, Admiral von Diederichs has had little to say to Admiral Dewey, and they say on the Olympia that the German "incident is closed." It is time it were closed; and if it is truly ended, no one will be happier for the satisfactory conclusion than the American admiral whom it has annoyed so much. You have no doubt heard more or less about it for a month, for it has been an "incident" since the German ships first arrived in Manila Bay in May for purposes of "observation." The mid-June papers brought us by the transports of the second expedition, which got in on Saturday, talk gingerly about the attitude of Germany, and seem inclined to think that the actions of a few individuals and merchants should not be taken as representative of official thinking. But in Manila Bay the annoying and discourteous performances have been by officers of the most imperial K. und K. navy, who have been so much interested in their work that they have regretted the fact that the "Prince" is on the Deutschland, for it keeps that formidable ship out of the possibly dangerous zone. Prince Henry must be protected, whatever else happens.

The "incident" has been almost as much of manner as of act, and more of omission than of commission. It was conducted with a swagger on the German side that brought up vivid pictures of the young war lord putting half a million of men, more or less, through their paces in the grand manœuvres. On the American side it was managed with a directness and a bluntness characteristic of Admiral Dewey, and cheering to the hearts of the other Americans here. At the first, and for the most part, it has consisted simply of petty violations of Admiral Dewey's blockade regulations, discourteous failure to comply with his requests, lack of punctilious regard for the naval proprieties of the situation. But once or twice—perhaps on more occasions—it has gone further, and then it has met plain language from Admiral Dewey. At last came the Subig Bay affair, and that seems to have been close enough to war to satisfy the Germans, at least temporarily.

It is the American right, as the blockading power, to know the identity and business of every ship that enters Manila Bay. The fact that a ship is a war-vessel and flies the German flag is not proof that she is German, for it is recognized by international law as legitimate to fly what colors one chooses until cleared for action. When the American ships went in at Guam, they were ordered by Captain Glass to fly the Japanese colors or none. In pursuance of his custom with regard to incoming vessels, Admiral Dewey had occasion to speak or signal to the German war-ships somewhat frequently. They have moved about the bay more than all the other foreigners combined. Every ship of the seven Germans on the China station, except the Deutschland, has been here, most of them for the greater part of the time. They have divided their stay between the anchorage, just off Manila, occupied by all the foreign war-ships and the refugee vessels, and Mariveles Bay, on the mainland of Luzon, just opposite Corregidor Island. There has been much more going back and forth between the two places than was necessary for the mere purposes of "observation," though it facilitated one bit of observation which was little less than impertinence, to say the least. That was when the troop-ships of the first brigade came in. The big cruiser Kaiserin Augusta got her anchor as the transports passed Mariveles Bay, and followed them in so closely that her name could be read from the troop-ships. As they drew up to the fleet, she broke out the colors and saluted, although she had already saluted with twenty-one guns on her first arrival.

There had been some correspondence between the two admirals with reference to the actions of both, and von Diederichs protested against what he intimated was interference with his boats. He had been moving launches about the bay after sundown, in spite of Admiral Dewey's regulation prohibiting movement of boats after dark. Lights are out on the American ships soon after dark, and a very strict watch and patrol are kept. One German launch was held up by a search-light, and kept in its glare for more than an hour before it was permitted to proceed. Another was shot at from one of our ships. Our patrol-boats, in enforcing the blockade regulations, do not waste much time in questions when they hail a boat at night. If the hail is not answered promptly and satisfactorily, a shot follows it. The only satisfaction von Diederichs got from his protest to the American admiral was the information, in effect, that if German launches or ships violated blockade regulations they must take the consequences.

Stories kept coming to Admiral Dewey all the time that the Germans were landing supplies in Manila. It was reported to both the land and naval commanders here that flour, particularly, had been landed with German connivance. Other stories, from less reliable sources, were to the effect that guns had been landed, and that German officers had helped the Spanish in their preparations for the defence of Manila. No credence was given these latter stories, but there was more than smoke in the reports about supplies. The German consul in Manila was accused openly in the club of knowing that Germans were taking flour into the city. It had been possible to do this because there was no American ship near the foreign anchorage, and the most vigilant search-light practice is ineffective at such distance. Finally the steamer Petrarch came in with supplies for the German fleet, and one morning von Diederichs reported that, the night before, a lighter-load of flour had been seized as it was being prepared for landing. Whether any had got away or not did not appear. Both the Petrarch and the German merchant in Manila to whom this flour was consigned declared that the German naval officers had had no cognizance of the effort to land supplies.

Matters were not improved by this business, nor were the actions of the Germans modified. It became necessary for Admiral Dewey on one occasion to intimate to the German admiral that apparently he thought Germany was the blockading power here, and not the United States. Von Diederichs made general disclaimer of intention to interfere or to violate neutrality, and the "incident" went on progressing slowly. Then came the Subig Bay affair. The Filipinos had chased the Spaniards out of Subig and Port Olongapo, and they had taken refuge on Grande Island, a little hill about half a mile through, in the entrance of the bay. The insurgents had thrown up a trench on Point Kanayan, a mile away, and were potting at the Spaniards with Mausers. At last the insurgent crew of a coasting steamer up north killed their Spanish officers and turned the ship over to Aguinaldo. He fitted her out with two pieces of boiler pipe to look like guns, and sent her down to Subig Bay with a few hundred soldiers to take Grande Island. The German cruiser Irene was lying in Subig Bay. Of what happened when the Filipinos got there, there are two versions. The insurgents came back and reported to Admiral Dewey that the Germans had prevented them from attacking the Spaniards, and forced them to take down their flag and hoist a white one. The admiral sent the Raleigh and the Concord to Subig Bay that night, with instructions to take Grande Island, whomever they had to fight to do it. They went in the next morning, soon after eight o'clock, and met the Irene coming out at full steam. They took the island without a shot from the Spanish, and got nearly 600 Spanish soldiers as prisoners, with Mauser rifles and a great quantity of ammunition. Guns and cartridges were turned over to the insurgents, and they undertook to guard the prisoners for the admiral.

This performance brought from Admiral Dewey a message to von Diederichs to this effect: "Is there peace or war between our countries? If there is war, I want to know it. If there is peace, I want you to change your course." At the same time that he sent this message Admiral Dewey said to the German flag-lieutenant that the Americans were the blockading power, and had the right to make regulations for the enforcement of the blockade. "Violation of these regulations," he said, "means war, and the Americans will so accept it." Then he informed the Germans that if they wanted war they could have it, here and now, or at any time and any place, and the way to make war is to clear ship and go at it. Von Diederichs sent a fairly apologetic reply to the admiral's message and talk. He disavowed any intention of slighting the proprieties, and would accede to the admiral's request for sharper regulations in the German fleet. That was the most friendly note von Diederichs had written, and after he had thought it over awhile he apparently repented, for he sent another, which took a decidedly different tone. In this he made vigorous protest against the "right of search"—le droit de visite, he called it. Dewey had never set up claim to such a right; he did claim, and will maintain it, the right of call. That is any blockader's privilege. But von Diederichs twisted this into the right of search, and said he would lay the matter before the other senior officers. He kept his word, and the satisfaction he got has kept him wondering ever since what he had better do next. That is why he is so quiet, and why the "incident is closed."

The closing of the incident must be a relief to some of the younger German officers. One of von Diederichs's pet amusements seemed to be sending them in command of launches to make requests of the American admiral, or report to him, after dark. Several times they were turned back without being able to reach the flag-ship, and once one was stopped by the flag-ship's search-light and held bobbing up and down for an hour and a half before she was permitted to go on. That is both tedious and irksome.

All the time that this German business has been going on Admiral Dewey has been facing the problem of what he will do if the Spanish re-enforcing squadron does happen to come along. He has a lot of soldiers to look out for and transports to guard or convoy, and he has no armor-clads. The Navy Department promised him the Oregon before he started out here, and is fulfilling that promise by sending him the Monterey and Monadnock. It will be a great relief to see the two "flat-irons" come in. With them here, the German incident will be closed indeed, and as for the Spaniards, it will be May day over again.

OSCAR KING DAVIS.

THE ASTOR BATTERY ARRIVES OUT.

[SPECIAL CORRESPONDENCE OF "HARPER'S WEEKLY."]

CAVITE, July 30.

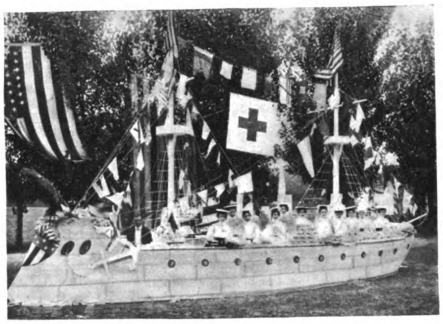
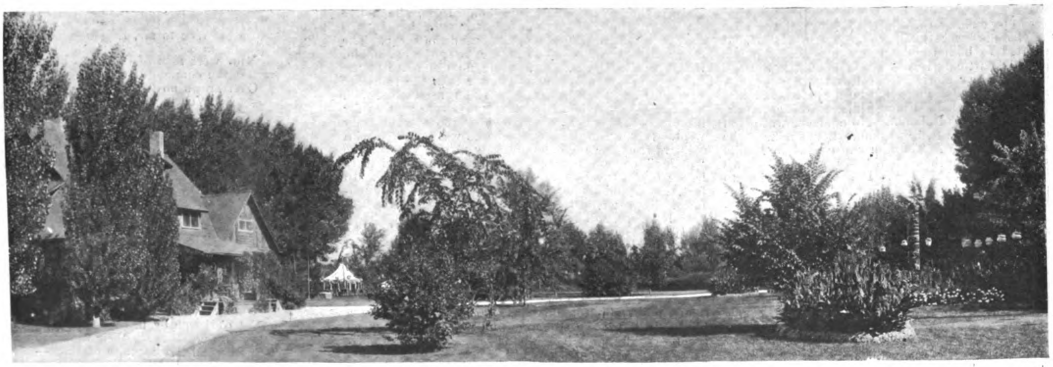
THE Astor got a first-class initiation into the beauties of Philippine weather. The new artillerymen arrived in Manila Bay in a tremendous rain, and have hardly had a sunlit breath since. They were ordered at once into Camp Dewey, and were taken ashore with the rain falling as if all the reservoirs in the heavens had given way together. It is a slow process landing troops at Camp Dewey. They are loaded first on cascos, the native lighters, at the ship, and towed across the bay by the slow-going Rapido, to a point opposite the camp. The cascos draw too much water to get near the beach, and it is a case of wade. That made no difference to the Astors: the sea-water was no wetter than the rain that soaked them through already. The three cascos, with soaked them through already. The three cascos, with some of the New-Yorkers and their six guns, were sent as far as the New-Yorkers and their six guns, were sent as far



WOLHURST LAKE.



THE MILKMAIDS

THE CIGAR-BOOTH.

CANDY BATTLE-SHIP "COLORADO."

WOLHURST, LOOKING NORTH.

COLORADO REMEMBERS THE SICK SOLDIERS.

FÊTE IN AID OF THE RED CROSS AT WOLHURST, THE HOME OF U. S. SENATOR WOLCOTT.—PHOTOGRAPHS TAKEN ESPECIALLY FOR "HARPER'S WEEKLY."

[SEE PAGE 919.]

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Miss Mabelle Gillman. Mr. James Powers.

"ARE YOU THE ONLY GIRL I EVER LOVED, OR ARE YOU AIN'T?" FROM "A RUNAWAY GIRL," AT DALY'S.—PHOTOGRAPH BY ZAIDA BEN-YÛSUF.

Mr. Stuart Robson. Miss Marie Burroughs. Mr. John E. Kellerd.

THE DIFFICULTY OF HELPING ONE'S FRIENDS OUT OF TROUBLE.—FROM "THE MEDDLER," BY MR. AUGUSTUS THOMAS, AT WALLACK'S.

OPENING OF THE DRAMATIC SEASON IN NEW YORK—SCENES FROM CURRENT PLAYS.

SANTIAGO.

THE AMERICAN OCCUPATION.

LETTER AND ILLUSTRATIONS BY HAROLD MARTIN, SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT OF "HARPER'S WEEKLY."

SINCE mid-day on the 17th of last July Santiago has been practically an American city. Since our troops entered on that day the fighting has been at an end, and certain officers of the American army have had upon their shoulders the task of governing Santiago as military occupants. Several interesting conditions have arisen consequent upon this new order of affairs, and time and a future historian will show wherein we have done well and wherein we have blundered. It must be remembered that this conquered province and city are not part and parcel of the United States, nor will they so become until we formally and officially declare our intention of annexing the island. Until this time arrives—and the Cuban question will have to be settled before it does—our position in Cuba will be that of military occupants, and distinct and different from the position our country holds in Puerto Rico.

One of the noticeable features of the occupation is the dignified and quiet behavior of both American and Spanish soldiers. Some ten thousand Spaniards surrendered with the city and laid down their arms; about as many more did the same in various parts of the province. One regiment of regular American infantry was quartered in Santiago on the 17th, acting as a city guard. There was practically no disorderly conduct on the one side or the other, no street fighting, and none of the abuses that are sometimes expected when a victorious army occupies a vanquished city.

As the Fifth Army Corps was gradually removed from the province the regiment doing guard duty was replaced by a regiment of volunteers, mostly recruited from Louisiana and Texas, who were supposed to be immune to the climate. That raw recruits should act with the dignity and thoroughness of our regulars could not be reasonably expected. Unfortunately for the splendid record of the men who fought, this new regiment, under Colonel Hood, provoked more disorder than their predecessors ever had to quell, and until such time as General Wood took them strongly in hand, and sent them out of the city, street brawls and drunkenness, disorder and unsoldierly conduct were only too noticeable.

CARRYING SICK SPANISH PRISONERS TO TRANSPORTS IN UNITED STATES ARMY AMBULANCES.

After the surrender the Spanish prisoners were at once moved to a camp north of the city, between the outskirts of Santiago and the first American lines. For two or three days following the 17th they filed over the dusty road and turned into the green fields allotted to them. Their camping facilities were wretched. They were hungry and sick, tired of the weary days in the trenches, tired of living on rice, weary of the long Cuban campaign, for many of them had not seen the Peninsula in several years, and they were one and all inexpressibly glad at the near prospect of returning home. We were besieged with questions: Was it true that we had bought the province of Santiago? So it had been represented to them. Were we really going to pay them all their back salary? Was there any chance for them to enlist in the American army, and were our men really fed on potatoes? An occasional sullen face was seen and an occasional bitter word was overheard from the captives, but a friendly smile and a cheerful

UNITED STATES POST-OFFICE AT SANTIAGO.

SPANISH PRISONERS MARCHING TO TRANSPORTS.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

word were repaid in kind whenever offered by the soldiers. This Spanish camp looked more like a vast horde of forlorn men driven to live in the open air than like the encampment of a military body even in stress of actual war-time. Many had no tents, many were without blankets. Food was scarce, drinking-water had to be conveyed from the river in all sorts of inadequate contrivances, and nothing was more sought after than an American canteen. The size of our American horses and their prime condition, as compared with their own, and the strength of our army mules, were unending sources of admiration to the Spaniards, who also vehemently declared it would be impossible for them to campaign for one week in the heavy flannel clothes worn by our men. Measures taken by the Spaniards to procure food for their men were inadequate, and soldiers had to forage for whatever the country would produce — mangoes, small birds, and a few little fish. Rice was here their staple, as it had been in town. The rains were daily, the place was inches deep in mud and filth of all kinds, the odors, as one passed by the camp along the road to Caney, were unbearable, and it is small wonder that General Toral sent a letter to General Shafter in which he reviewed the deplorable condition of his men, and begged that something be done to relieve their growing distress. They were victims of the same malarial fever and dysentery that were among our own troops, but they were without proper medicine and medical attendance. From the time these Spaniards began to receive food from our commissary department their condition was better than it had been for weeks past.

By August 15 the steamers to take these men back to Spain had already begun the work of transportation. It was a good thing when they had all gone; it removed a menace to the city's health and doubtless saved the lives of many of the troops themselves, and no one was more glad for the end than the fever-stricken, half-clothed, half-starved, and vanquished Spanish soldier. For several days these men passed through the city streets to their transports in the bay; then we learned that among themselves their camp north of the city was called the Graveyard. We learned that forty men died there a day, that the bodies were laid out in piles of twenty each, soaked in oil, and burned to ashes because there were too many dead to bury. We heard stories of their suffering, and when we looked at them as they tottered down the streets towards the dock we could believe all we heard. Their sick were carried on improvised litters, the well men—it seemed cruelly cynical to call them so—the well men walked with staffs, and leaning on one another, looking furtively on all sides, afraid of the plunging mules that drew our army wagons through the city—acting as broken men who can do no more. But these are familiar stories; we have seen the Seventy-first on our city streets, we have heard and read much of the sufferings of our own men at sea and ashore. We will probably never hear of the sufferings and fearful agony on those Spanish troop-ships; they will rival the horrors of the worst of the old slavers. It is not intended in any way to make light of what our men suffered on Cuban soil after Santiago surrendered — the writer is too familiar with what occurred there to think of so doing—but it is a fact that the condition of the Spanish troops was far more pitiful than that of our own men. Down one street, one afternoon, slunk the Spaniards; down the next street at the same time was passing a regiment of our colored soldiers, stepping along bravely to their own singing of that war song, "There'll be a hot time in the old town to-night." One had only to walk a short block to see the difference.

During the first days of our occupation the common people treated every American in the city, were he private or commanding officer, with a cringing courtesy that seemed born of a fear of overbearing and ill-used power. Those of the Americans who got into the city accepted this treatment indifferently, and were more engrossed by the curious houses, hilly streets, and prevailing strangeness of Santiago. Every nook and corner that is accessible to a man has seen its American soldier, and the amount spent by our men for relics and souvenirs of Santiago has surely been large. Spanish machetes, revolvers, and knives, old coins, and golden chains from the pawnshops—the men spent freely—mantillas and lace handkerchiefs for the women, and much else besides. They were in from a hard campaign, and thousands of dollars were expended for clothing, boots, and hats. It was remarkable how many Americans developed a working knowledge of Spanish, and how quickly others learned necessary words. As a result of this free spending, and the ignorance of our men in the beginning as to the value of our money over the Spanish silver, storekeepers advanced prices exorbitantly, insisted on payment in gold instead of silver, and reaped a rich harvest as a result. Santiago had not seen such ready spending and so much money in a long time. American bills were plentiful all over town, and they were taken as gold. Some merchants noticed that many of the bills were silver certificates, and these men were a little doubtful as to their value, but upon assurance that American silver was as good as American gold, no distinction was made between the two moneys. In vain did some few of the Americans protest against the open robbery by the stores; the sellers could always find buyers, if not among our soldiers, then among the towns-people, for merchandise of all kinds was scarce and the demands of the city were growing. Food was very dear, and in the beginning not plentiful. There were but few restaurants in operation, and no hotel to afford accommodations to the new arrivals.

The attitude of the better classes towards the Americans was one of indifferent apathy. Many of the richer families had left town, notably for Jamaica, and it will be some time before they return to their native city. The windows of the residences of people of refinement are closed. There is no longer music in the plaza on Sunday evenings, and no gatherings of women and girls to listen and talk. Sunday morning, ladies go to early mass, for then they are not subject to the stares and comments of our soldiers; this is their only venture on the streets during the week. There are many women living in town whom Americans will never see, who will not come out until we have taken ourselves away, but who probably look slyly through drawn lattices as sunburnt and bearded officers ride past their windows, and admit in confidence to a sister that if we were not Americans, we would not be half bad.

The bay of Santiago has been full of our transports. As soon as the harbor was cleared of mines and obstructions, these vessels steamed in from Siboney, Guantanamo, and Baiquiri, three ports to the east, where we had made landings. One day there were thirty of them to be seen, and never before had the inhabitants of Santiago seen so many steamers anchored at the same time in their landlocked bay.

As soon as Santiago fell two things were immediately done — the Americans troops encamped behind our trenches were moved to better camps among the foothills of the mountains to the north, and Santiago was made the base of supplies. All provisions were landed there, and conveyed through the city to the camps beyond. Every day the army pack-trains and the army wagons rattled and banged down the hilly and ill-paved streets on their way to the docks. The air was filled with American oaths as the drivers worked their mules out of confusion apparently hopeless. The docks where the transports unloaded were scenes of great activity. A broad well-paved street, lined by warehouses and iron-roofed sheds, fringes the wharves. Crowds of stevedores, working for rations, unloaded the transports, and piled their cargoes of food into warehouses, from which the wagons were supplied. The street was filled with mules and carts, soldiers on guard, and mounted officers. The Red Cross headquarters and soup-kitchen are here, and the poor and hungry came in droves to be fed.

AN IMPORTANT RESULT OF THE UNITED STATES OCCUPATION OF SANTIAGO—THE NEW STREET-CLEANING DEPARTMENT AT WORK.

The Red Cross Society has done excellent work in Santiago, and has been effective and well managed. Its system has been good; it has had former experience in this matter of food distribution to Cubans, from which it has benefited, and it rapidly fed the poor and relieved the sharpest suffering. There has been complaint that its supplies went to people who were not actually in want and who were able to buy for themselves. It should be recognized that it is impossible to immediately distribute relief to a half-starved city and not make mistakes of this kind. During the first days, when there were many actually starving, it was most difficult to ascertain who could or could not afford to buy. These precautions can only be taken when the wire edge of the suffering is relieved, and they were taken by the Red Cross as soon as this was accomplished. It has also been said that the people would not work as long as they could obtain free food from this society. There is more truth in this contention than in the former one. Difficulty has been experienced in getting stevedores and men to work on the streets, yet there are hundreds of idle men in town who will not work as long as they can get their bellies filled for nothing. As opportunities for work increase—and they will be many as soon as the iron-mines resume operations in the near future—the Red Cross should, and doubtless will, largely cut down its contributions. The society has also opened a free dispensary, which is largely patronized, and which is an excellent charity, as there is a vast amount of sickness in Santiago.

When in July the American army promised to bombard Santiago at any moment, all people who were non-combatants went out to the country, the greater part of them to the near-by village of Caney. They expected to stay two days, and took provisions for that length of time; they remained outside for twelve days, and suffered greatly. Caney was crowded in a manner hard to comprehend—twenty in a small room, three hundred in a house built for twenty. There was no food, there were incessant rains and no shelter, and there was, consequently, much sickness. These unfortunate refugees walked wearily back to their homes when the city surrendered, bearing little else with them than the germs of illness that developed rapidly in their filthy city. Compared with former times, the death-rate for July was appalling. It used be three or four a day; then it was forty. The hospitals, where some four hundred and fifty wounded Spanish soldiers were installed, were overcrowded, the authorities had to watch that the dead were properly buried, and there was not a house in town where several sick persons could not be found. Malarial fever prevailed everywhere; there were dysentery, lung trouble, and complications brought about by exposure, as well as numberless maladies that were the result of insufficient nutrition.

One good promise for improvement in Santiago's health lies in what is being done in the way of cleaning the city. A street-cleaning department has been organized, and rules for the observance of householders have been issued. Herein they are instructed to clean their premises thoroughly every morning and deposit all sweepings in boxes before their doors, whence they will be removed by the department and cremated. Some three hundred men were employed as street-sweepers, and the work has only been begun. There are to be proper system and proper inspection and proper enforcement of rules. Lime is to be liberally used as a disinfectant, and supplied free to householders. Santiago is on the eve of an era of clean streets and houses such as she has never known, and it is pleasing to note that the measures to this end have received the earnest commendation of the more intelligent, and from the beginning an unexpected observation from the poorer classes.

The commercial situation there is serious, and there is no immediate improvement in sight. During the last three years much Santiago capital has gone back to Spain for safe-keeping during the unsettling time of the revolution. Some men thought that the raising of the American flag over the city would be followed by a speedy commercial revival. That this has not been the case is due to one clear fact—until the merchants are satisfactorily assured that the United States will retain final possession of Cuba, until they know that the control and government will not eventually pass to Cubans, there will be no resumption of business on a large scale. For a permanent American government means an equable, just, and proper administration of public affairs and a return of business confidence. It is feared and openly asserted that Cuban control will bring in its wake incompetence and internal turmoil, persecution and unstability, that will be worse than the worst of Spanish rule. The merchants and planters of Santiago have suffered much in recent years, and they wisely prefer to await the time when they can see more clearly, "cuando veamos mas claro," before risking their money in any business undertaking. And there seems to be no doubt but that Santiago will wait until this point is determined. If the United States gave assurances of its protection of and responsibility for the lives and properties of the inhabitants of the island during a trial of Cuban self-government, confidence would be partially restored. By many it is thought that there will be such a trial, but its failure seems a popular belief, and there are few, outside of certain Cubans, who think that this trial could bring other than a disastrous result.

Several cargoes of American provisions arrived after the capitulation sent out by some enterprising men who hoped to make quick sales because of the besieged city's extremity. These merchants were forced to store their goods in city warehouses, in some cases at heavy expense, because the city did not buy more than was necessary for its daily wants, and this also by reason of the prevailing uncertainty of the future. There has not been, until recently, any communication with the interior or with any other coast towns. Farms and plantations have not produced for a year, consequently there is no money up-country. There are not more than 30,000 people in the city, and not more than 5000 that consume other than the most rudimentary food. The mango season is on, the sweet-potato will grow in sixty days and support a poor man's family, and the Red Cross Society is liberal; these three points are in favor of the 25,000 who have little money to spend on food. So Santiago buys from the enterprising American merchants only what a small proportion of its inhabitants will consume daily. "When we know we are to remain American, and when traffic with the interior is resumed, then business will boom as it never boomed before."

Another fact that has discomfited the most far-seeing of the residents of our newly acquired city is an edict from the Palace, issued by the military governor, concerning the value of Spanish gold and silver. The Spanish gold piece of twenty-five pesetas, or francs, is called a centen; in Spain it is worth five dollars gold; in Cuba it has been given an additional value of six per cent., with the idea of keeping it in the island. The United States declared, through the Palace at Santiago, that it would accept the centen for the payment of all customs duties at five dollars gold, and not at the rate of five dollars and thirty cents formerly prevailing. Men in Santiago recognized our right to take their money at whatever price we thought fit; there was war, we were the military occupants, and this ruling was considered a war measure. The merchant paying six per cent. more customs than formerly made up his loss by charging the consumer of his goods a higher price. But when it was learned that this ruling applied to commercial transactions between individuals, in which our government had no interest or part, it was then declared by people of the city that we were overstepping our rights and power as military occupants of the province. According to Fiore's International law, the military occupant of a conquered territory has no right to interfere with or reverse an existing legislative act of the occupied territory, unless forced thereto by military necessity. It would then appear, according to the Italian Fiore, that we had gone too far in this matter. The men of Santiago could not see the reason or fairness of a measure that reduced by six per cent. the value of Cuba's capital, nor could they understand why this was done when neither the United States government nor any individual connected therewith would make a penny by the act. If the six per cent. went into some

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google one's pocket, the action would be comprehensible.

We have also increased the discount on Spanish silver in Cuba from 40 per cent. to 50 per cent. This has resulted in the immediate hoarding of Spanish silver, for the discount on the Peninsula is much less than 50 per cent., and one can do good business by shipping Spanish silver to Spain. Consequently, retail business is hampered by lack of small coins, and some men are getting rich on exchange. American money must come in very rapidly to prevent complications that will greatly hamper minor business transactions.

As has been already stated, the American soldiers, with the exception of the newly arrived regiment of immunes from Louisiana, who relieved the Ninth Infantry as a city guard, were moved to the low hills north of the city. Here they were camped, waiting definite orders to go home. Vast numbers of the men were sick and unfit for even light duty. Malarial fever held the army. They were exposed by day to a fierce sun and drenching tropical rains, by night to heavy dews, and at all times the camps were deep in mud. Breaking of the ground brought out malarial fever—the whole army was used up and weakened. March the well members of any regiment two miles, and not one-half the number that started could finish the walk. A striking example of this statement occurred when the men were moved from their camps behind the trenches to where they waited orders to go home. This extreme weakness and exhaustion were also shown as the men marched through the city to board the transports. They had the inspiration of music. "Home, Sweet Home" brought the tears to their eyes, for many of them knew they would never reach home. But the music inspired them, and there were the hope of the return and the knowledge that the work was done, and well done, too. Yet they dropped and staggered and gazed with lack-lustre eyes from the ambulances.

After the surrender of Santiago, the American soldiers had an experience far more trying to nerves and courage than the first three glorious days of July. They had long days of idleness in wet and unhealthy camps, there was increasing sickness on all sides, uncertainty as to future movements. The work was all over. There was none of the stimulus leading to the fight; there was none of the fierce desire for battle; there was a complete let down. With an open harbor in plain view, with good roads from the camps to the wharves, with the bay full of transports coming and going, there was not enough food, nor proper food, and medicines were scarce. Many a man owes his life to the Red Cross Society; his government did not do for him what the society could, and willingly and gladly did.

Men talked, until the peace news came, of the Havana campaign next winter, and hoped that our government would learn by that time how to take care of its soldiers in the field. Now, with peace, the Havana idea is dismissed, and soldiers are wondering how long before they will be sent down again, but this time to fight the Cubans.

LONDON.

FROM the communications cabled from New York it seems as though the echoes of the unpleasantness associated with the last struggle for the America Cup had not yet died down. The desire and resolve of Sir Thomas Lipton, who challenges on behalf of the Ulster Club, to bring the America Cup back to this side of the Atlantic in his yacht the Shamrock are certainly as keen as, if not probably keener than, those of any former contestant in the race. I venture to think that in the coming struggle (being an episode of international importance) the spirit in which the challenger enters upon and conducts the enterprise is highly material to the issue. An uneasy feeling exists in this country that the American public was badly treated by the English representative on the last occasion of the race for the cup, and unusual anxiety is felt that the champion of British—or perhaps I should say Irish—yachtsmen should so bear himself that sportsmen and the public on the other side of the Atlantic may recognize the chivalry and good faith characteristic of English sport. Under these circumstances, notes of a conversation between Sir Thomas Lipton and a few friends assembled at dinner at the Reform Club, at which I happened to be present, will interest the American public. I may preface what I have to say by mentioning the fact that Sir Thomas Lipton was unaware that his remarks would ever travel outside the four walls of the room. I was, however, so much struck with the tone and spirit of his conversation that I asked and obtained his permission to give the gist to the readers of HARPER'S, since unpremeditated utterances give a juster impression of the spirit of the man than elaborated statements deliberately prepared for publication. In the first place, Sir Thomas Lipton was insistent in expressing his conviction that the best boat has always won the America Cup, and always will do so; and, secondly, that his confidence in the gentlemen responsible for the arrangements of the race was absolute; so much so that he would not consider that there was a pin's point of advantage in having the race on the Clyde or in the Solent. He laughed to scorn the idea that the voyage across the Atlantic constitutes any disadvantage to the challenger from this side of the water, and Sir Thomas Lipton looks upon all such reasons for former defeats as mere excuses for design or workmanship that was, if not faulty, at least unsuited for the task taken in hand by former challengers. It was pleasant to hear the warmth and obvious sincerity with which Sir Thomas Lipton reiterated his complete trust in the fairness and good-will of American yachtsmen. Indeed, he feels certain that if either side is exposed to a fractional disadvantage in consequence of the arrangements being framed without conditions put forward on this side, that disadvantage will belong to the American competitor. It is, I believe, no secret that Sir Thomas Lipton has had placed upon him severe compulsion to insist on conditions. Rather than give way on this point he was prepared to resign his membership of any yacht club that made that a stipulation. The American public, therefore, may be quite certain that whatever the issue of the struggle may be, the spirit under which it is conducted will present a vivid contrast to the unfortunate episode of 1895.

If, however, Sir Thomas Lipton has gladly placed himself in the hands of the New York Club, it must not be thought that there will be any want of energy in organizing victory. If the cup is to be lifted, the Shamrock will do it. A more extraordinary combination of brain power, business capacity, and technical ability has never been brought together for the production of a racing-yacht. Messrs. Harland & Wolff have staked their reputation upon the issue. No money will be spared by Sir Thomas Lipton, though he is aware that if he were to spend $500,000 his opponents' outlay would probably double that amount. Speaking in the intimacy of private conversation, it was interesting to remark that the quiet modesty displayed by Sir Thomas Lipton in regard to his management and conduct of the enterprise was accompanied by a deep-seated conviction that his yacht, the Shamrock, will lift the America Cup, and it must not be forgotten that he is a man who has succeeded in everything he has undertaken. Sir Thomas, in order to save correspondence, has arranged for three representatives of the Royal Ulster Yacht Club, in addition to the designer, to leave Liverpool by the Britannic, sailing on the 24th for New York, and no doubt all arrangements will be completed satisfactorily to both parties soon after her arrival. The Hon. Charles Russell, who is Sir Thomas's factotum in this matter, will also be present at the meeting in New York. The reputation of this gentleman for geniality and straightforwardness is of the highest.

ARNOLD WHITE.

NATURE'S CATHOLICITY.

NATURE at heart is catholic indeed—
With the same care she tenderly bestows
Her perfect art upon the meanest weed
As on the carving of the choicest rose.

R. K. MUNKITTRICK.

ADVICE TO MOTHERS.—MRS. WINSLOW'S SOOTHING SYRUP should always be used for children teething. It soothes the child, softens the gums, allays all pain, cures wind colic, and is the best remedy for diarrhœa. —[Adv.]

RIGID RULES ENFORCED.

VETERINARIES of the N. Y. Condensed Milk Co. examine cows supplying milk for the Gail Borden Eagle Brand Condensed Milk, to guard against any contamination. Send for "Infant Health." Information valuable to every mother.—[Adv.]

NOTHING contributes more towards a sound digestion than DR. SIEGERT'S ANGOSTURA BITTERS.—[Adv.]

CAN keep up the "daily grind" with head or hands when ABBOTT'S—The Original Angostura Bitters—help. —[Adv.]

USE BROWN'S Camphorated Saponaceous DENTIFRICE for the TEETH. 25 cents a jar.—[Adv.]

ADVERTISEMENTS.

The Favorite.

As a specialty of Cafe and Club Stocks of fine supplies

Hunter Baltimore Rye

Is the Favorite.

The Purest Type of the Purest Whiskey.

WILLIAMS' SHAVING STICK

Easy Shaving

can only be possible when the beard is thoroughly softened, so that the razor can cut easily and without "pulling."

Luxurious Shaving

is only possible when the lather is rich, cream-like, soothing and does not dry on the face, and when you know that the soap is absolutely pure. Ease, Luxury and Safety are all attained when Williams' Soaps Are Used. They have been the Favorites with generations of Shavers.

They are the "ONLY REAL" SHAVING SOAPS.

WILLIAMS' SOAPS—in principal forms—Sold by Dealers everywhere.

Luxury Shaving Tablet. 25c.

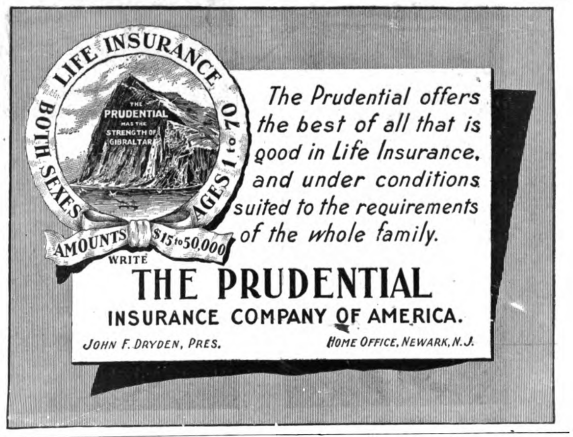
Round—Just fits the cup. Delicate perfume.

"Genuine Yankee" Soap. 10c.

Oldest and most famous shaving soap in the world.

Williams' Shaving Stick. 25c.

Williams' Shaving Soap. (Barbers.)



This is the kind your barber should use. Exquisite also for Toilet and Bath. Used in thousands of the best families. Sure cure for "chapped hands." Six cakes in a package, 40c. Trial sample for 2c. stamp.

If your dealer fails to supply you—we mail these soaps to any address, post-paid, on receipt of price.

Address The J. B. Williams Co., Glastonbury, Ct., U.S.A.

London: 64 Great Russell St., W. C. Sydney, Australia: 161 Clarence St.

Williams' Glycerated Tar Soap, 15c.

The Prudential offers the best of all that is good in Life Insurance, and under conditions suited to the requirements of the whole family.

THE PRUDENTIAL

INSURANCE COMPANY OF AMERICA.

JOHN F. DRYDEN, PRES. HOME OFFICE, NEWARK, N.J.

MAGIC LANTERNS WANTED AND FOR SALE OR EXCHANGE HARBACH & CO. 809 Filbert St. Phila. Pa.

Financial

Letters of Credit.

Bills of Exchange bought and sold. Cable Transfers to Europe and South Africa. Commercial and Travellers' Letters of Credit. Collections made.

Brown Brothers & Co.,

BANKERS, No. 59 WALL STREET.

BOKER'S BITTERS

The oldest and best Specific against dyspepsia; an appetizer and a promoter of digestion.

Ask your Grocer, Liquor Dealer, or Druggist.

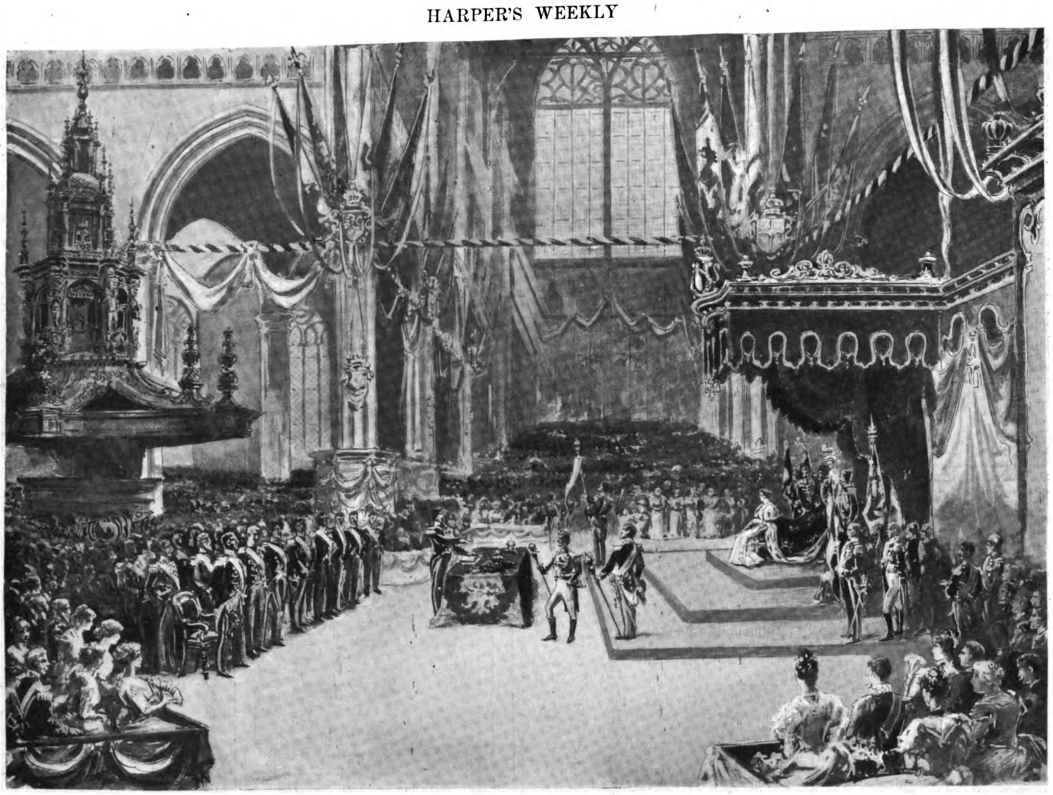
THE CELEBRATED

SOHMER

Heads the List of the Highest-Grade Pianos.



Caution.—The buying public will please not confound the genuine SOHMER Piano with one of a similar-sounding name of a cheap grade.

Our name spells—

S—O—H—M—E—R

New York Warerooms SOHMER BUILDING Fifth Ave., cor 22d St.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

CEREMONY IN THE NEW CHURCH, AMSTERDAM, SEPTEMBER 6, 1898.

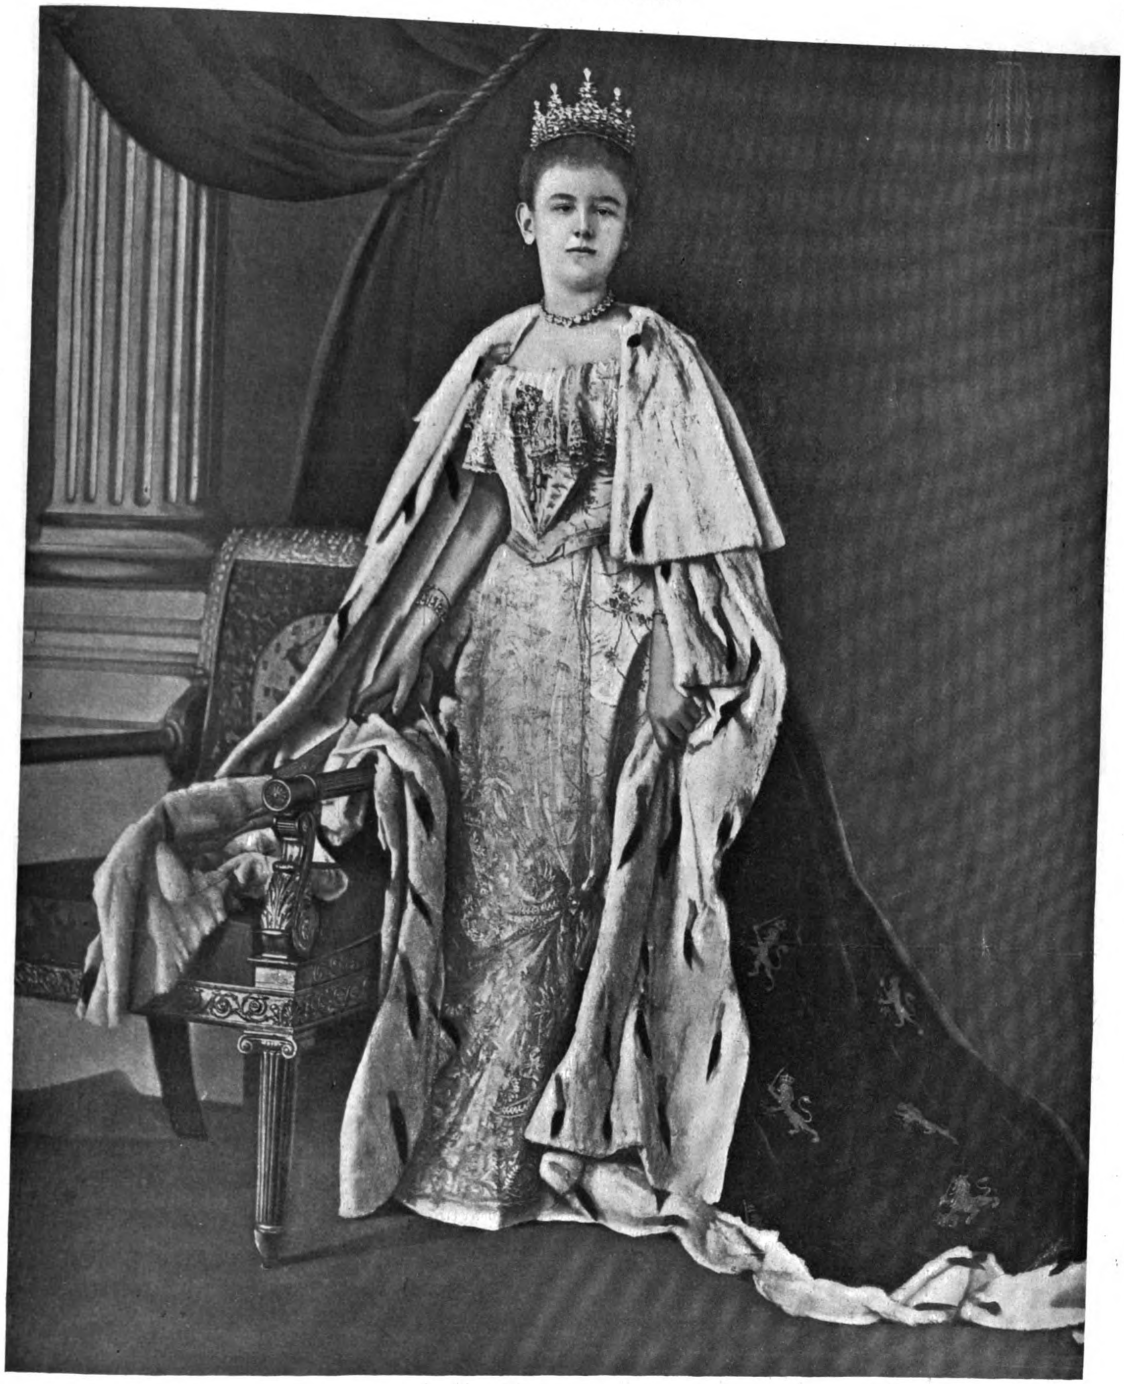
THE ENTHRONEMENT OF THE QUEEN OF THE NETHERLANDS.
FROM DESCRIPTIONS FURNISHED BY V. GRIBAYÉDOFF, SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT OF "HARPER'S WEEKLY."

ADMIRAL PIETER PIETERSE HEIJN.

GROUP OF FAMOUS DUTCH ARTISTS—OSTADE, VAN DER MEER, AND DE HOOGH.

ADMIRAL VAN TROMP.

BODY-GUARD OF THE PRINCE OF ORANGE.



Lord High Executioner.

THE LORD HIGH EXECUTIONER, HALBERDIERS, PAGES, AND LANSQUENETS.

CHARACTERS IN THE HISTORICAL PAGEANT AT THE ENTHRONING OF QUEEN WILHELMINA.
PHOTOGRAPHS TAKEN BY V. GRIBAYÉDOFF ESPECIALLY FOR "HARPER'S WEEKLY" AT A PRIVATE REHEARSAL.—[SEE PAGE 926.]

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

WILHELMINA, QUEEN OF HOLLAND, IN HER INAUGURATION ROBES.

After the only authorized Photograph.—By Courtesy of Messrs. Volkema and Warendorf.

QUEEN WILHELMINA'S ENTHRONEMENT.

The investiture of the young Queen of Holland with the prerogatives of royalty was not strictly a coronation, as the act of crowning formed no part of the ceremony that took place on the 6th inst. in the "New Church" of Amsterdam. That edifice, which retains its name, though 1100 years old, was richly draped and decorated for the occasion. A throne of crimson and gold was placed in front of the chancel, with the emblems of sovereignty—the crown, orb, sceptre, and sword—upon velvet-covered stools by its side. The church was filled with a distinguished assembly of richly dressed ladies, uniformed officers of the military, naval, and civil administrators of the kingdom, members of the diplomatic corps, and eminent guests and visitors, including the Grand-Duke of Saxe-Weimar and the Prince and Princess Von Wied. Members of the royal families were on the right of the throne, and on the left were the princes of the Dutch possessions in the Indies.

A great throng had gathered about the Damplatz, through which the Queen was to pass in going from the palace to the church. The centre was kept clear, the crowd being held back by lines of troops. A brilliant awning, decorated with streamers, was stretched from the palace gate to the church entrance, with a velvet carpet over the space to be traversed by the royal procession, and on either side was formed a line of naval cadets. The day opened with a salute of 101 guns, and an impressive choral performed by trumpeters from the towers of the five great churches of the city. Shortly after ten o'clock the royal guests drove to the church, escorted by cavalry, while the drums beat, the bands played martial airs, and the troops presented arms. They were immediately followed by the Queen-Mother in a state coach bearing a gilt crown on a crimson cushion. She was greeted with plaudits, and shouts of "Long live the Queen-Mother!"

In the church, attended by her maids-in-waiting and ladies of honor, she took her place at the left of the throne, standing to await the coming of her daughter and the royal procession. She was richly dressed in light mauve decorated with lace and pearls, and wore on her head a splendid tiara, and on her breast the insignia of the Dutch orders.

Shortly the sound of trumpets and drums proclaimed that Queen Wilhelmina had left the palace; and at that moment the sun is said to have broken from the clouds with full effulgence, having been obscured all the morning. The procession was headed by the king-at-arms and heralds in gorgeous array, their long trumpets adorned with bright-colored pendants. Behind them came the young Queen, on foot, in a robe of white silk with a long train, and with a rich diadem on her head. She had over the white robe a mantle of red velvet bordered with ermine and bearing the lions of Nassau in gold embroidery, and wore the crown-jewels of the Netherlands. The short passage to the church door was attended by enthusiastic acclamations from the populace, and her arrival was heralded by the king-at-arms; and an escort of generals, each bearing a banner, attended her to the foot of the throne, while a choir of the finest singers in Hol-

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Vol. XLII., No. 2178.

ıe national anthem, "Wilhelmus von Nası received her greetings with a gracious bow, sent upon the throne for a moment, and then a clear voice, that reached every part of the ered this address:

MEN OF THE STATES-GENERAL.—Since the ever-lamented father, and until I have comghteenth year, the government has been in the mother. I have now assumed the govern-ıave issued a proclamation to my well-beloved e hour has now arrived when, amid the faith-eneral and invoking the holy name of God, I myself to the people of the Netherlands to ir rights and privileges. On this day I draw the solemn tie existing between myself and
The very ancient union of the Netherlands ouse of Orange is confirmed afresh. ıl is my vocation! Beautiful is my task! I nd grateful to be able to govern the Nether-
—a nation small in number, but great in virtue ıh of character. I esteem it a privilege and a y to devote all my strength to the prosperity of our father-land.
se of Orange can never—yea, never—do enough ierlands. I need your support and co-operaım convinced you will lend me these in order be able to work together for the honor and f our Netherlands people. May this be the ife, and may God bless you and my labors for ı of the father-land!"

Van Eamnes of the First Chamber of the ral then advanced to the throne, and said:
ive and invest you in the name of the Nether-and in virtue of the constitution as Queen.
will maintain your inviolability and the rights wn, we swear to do all that good and faithful ral should do, so help us Almighty God!"
of each member of the Chambers was called ıe usher, and he responded, "So help me Al-
!" except that the Baptist members used the promise it." After a short pause the Queen and in a clear voice repeated the oath to up-ıstitution, defend the independence of the naotect the liberty of her subjects, using to that ıl means, "as a good king should." After a mpressive silence a great shout of "Long live
" was three times repeated, and the heralds the investiture of her Majesty Queen Wilhel-Netherlands.
en then left the church with her escort, followıother, and returned to the palace amidst the clamations of the people. After the royal ntered, four heralds appeared upon the balcony ce, a trumpet invoked silence, and the senior ounced in a loud voice to the throng that ı had been duly invested as Queen of the
s. This was followed by a salute of guns, ıng sovereign appeared upon the balcony in people, wearing her full regalia, and was foler mother. The two joined hands and bowed to the plaudits of the throng. They after-e around the city to view the decorations in a wn by six horses, and attended by a guard of the evening there was a general illumination, l features of unusual splendor, and the Queen ther drove through the streets in an open car-
; everywhere greeted with great enthusiasm by

RING FOR THE CEREMONIES.

AMSTERDAM, August 25, 1898.

rledge of the Dutch language is necessary for ize that something unusual is in the air in this quiet if not precisely humdrum little country.
i the something already at the first station in-frontier, when, immediately after the release of gers from the custom-house inspection-room, ſviduals of the peasant class came forward to various knickknacks and mementos for sale.
articles, brooches, badges, scarf-pins, booklets, some reference to the young Queen of the ls, and her "Inhuldijung," or inauguration, as eptember 6.
he train stopped at the Hague railroad station ll upon several large posters relating to sundry ations organized in honor of the same event, ne of Rembrandt's works. As I wandered into m perceived that the coming ceremony, with its ying festivities, was the one all-absorbing topic
ir. At every important street corner workmen ly engaged erecting scaffoldings for triumphal bunes, and other temporary constructions.
lague impresses the stranger as being in a state less subdued excitement, what must be said of sh activity visible on all sides in the capital ite whole town is virtually in the hands of carainters, and decorators, who are slowly but surerming it into a counterpart of fairyland. As, in o the royal procession to the church on Septem-re is to be an imposing historical pageant on the an illuminated water-parade at night, and proba torch-light procession on the 9th, the demand accommodations and seats at the tribunes and at situated windows and balconies is something as.
of all these great preparations, the inauguration
ake in many respects of the character of a family
The Queen-Regent, who is a German Princess of old-fashioned school, does not believe in subject-ng girl of eighteen to more fatiguing duties than ion strictly calls for. A short while ago, there-ircular was sent to the Dutch ministers at all ourts, describing the inauguration as an event of tely national and private character," and expresslesire that no special envoys, nor even persons of od, be sent to attend the ceremonies. Both Presi-Kinley and Faure subsequently expressed a dee specially represented—the former by a military probably one of the heroes of our late war), the a member of his household; but both requests were courteously refused by the Queen-Mother, who feared that their acceptance might lead to further applications of the kind. Not any better, said to relate, has been the fate of a petition from the president of a society of Daughters of Holland Dames in America to participate in the ceremonials on a more or less official footing. This was all the more cruel, as the young Queen had just been elected the society's vice-president.

It was my good fortune to be brought into touch with the organizers of the historical and allegorical pageant, by all odds the most interesting feature of the entire programme, the actual inauguration itself excepted. I had often heard of Dutch thoroughness and conscientiousness, but had never quite realized what this meant, until the other day, when I set foot in an old public building, long fallen into disuse, rejoicing in the name of the Oude Buiten Gasthuis. This place had been turned into the headquarters of the pageant committee, but, unless otherwise informed, one might have imagined one's self transplanted to a corner of the sixteenth century. The spacious court-yard, shaded with hoary trees, whose boughs extended over the surrounding roofs, was filled at the time with as gaudy an assemblage of courtiers, noble men, halberdiers, and musketeers as has ever gladdened the eye of a modern theatre-goer—with this difference, however, that the stage hero has more often something tinselled and unreal about his get-up, whereas these people were arrayed in costumes so perfect, both as to material and make, so accurate in their design, that they looked for all the world as if they might just have stepped out of one of those great paintings by Rembrandt or Frans Hals in the Rijksmuseum near by.

It was while lost in contemplation of this scene that I presently noticed a florid individual in a modern gray suit take his post in the centre of the yard, and at his command all these gorgeous celebrities and their retainers and body-guards suddenly formed in line on the shady side of the quadrangle. It was Captain Fabius, the drill-instructor.

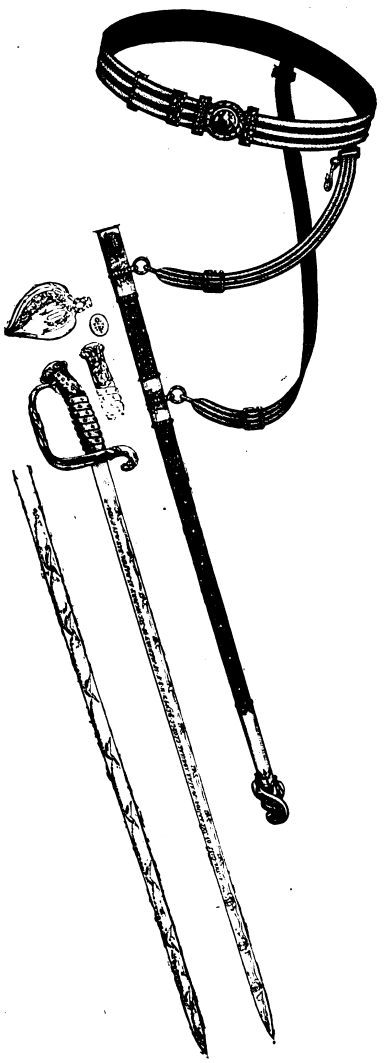
"Alle gereed houden, silentium; march, march, march!"

These were the words next spoken in stentorian tones, and, with the drum beating time, there began a brisk march around the yard. I afterwards learned that this sentence was the old formula in use in the days of Prince Maurice of Nassau, the victor of Nieuport, and that it means, "Make ready, silence, march."

After half an hour's drill the imposing company broke up, and prince and courtier, provost gevaeldiger (lord high executioner), page, body-guard, halberdier, down to the little drummer, all intermingled, without regard to difference in rank. The illusion was past. We were on the threshold of the twentieth century once more.

All these men were members of different local working-men's societies, who had offered to participate in the pageant without pecuniary remuneration, merely as an expression of their loyalty and affection for their young Queen. Most interesting it was to watch the proceedings after the drill had ended, and the trying on of the costumes of a batch of fresh candidates began. As a large number of historical personages were to figure in the pageant, it became necessary in selecting the paraders to keep account of physical resemblances. A candidate would often have to submit to a prolonged scrutiny of his face and figure, and a comparison of the same with some lithographic reproductions of the historical paintings by the old Dutch masters, which are being followed with almost painful accuracy.

"Here is a man who resembles Pieter Hein to a T," remarks one of the committee-men, pointing to a strongly built individual who looks as if he might be a longshoreman or a freight-handler.



"Yes, but Piet did not wear side whiskers, and this man does," objects another committee-man.

"Oh, don't let that interfere, mynheer," exclaims the candidate. "I have worn these whiskers twenty years, but off they come if they stand in the way of my marching with the rest."

Upon these conditions the good man is awarded the part, and he dons his gorgeous costume of blue and velvet, with red and gold trimmings, with becoming dignity, and allows the writer to transfer the picture upon the sensitized plate of his travelling camera. Many of these men are old soldiers and sailors, and hence there has been little difficulty in whipping them into line. Most of them belong to the small employee or day-laborer class, and it is really surprising how very much loose who impersonate historical personages resemble their originals. The Dutch type has certainly undergone but little change during the past three centuries. Take the group who represent the artists Ostade, Van der Meer, and Peter de Hoogh. One might almost think the originals had come to life again. The Prince of Orange, De Ruyter, Tromp, Von Galen, the Stadhauder William, afterwards King of England—all these great men of the early republic have found almost perfect counterparts in this great historical procession of the 7th of September.

Before leaving the Oude Buiten Gasthuis I was afforded an opportunity to visit the extensive wardrobe and arsenal of the historical pageant, and it was then I reached a true comprehension of the artistically conscientious spirit of the organizers. Not a single article of wear or accoutrement but was finished in every detail, even to the flintlocks and antique powder-belts—everything in working order, and in perfect condition to do effective and immediate service in the year of our Lord 1598.

V. GRIBAYÉDOFF.

THE ADMIRAL DEWEY SWORD.

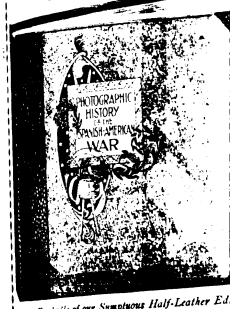
THE sword of honor to be presented to Rear-Admiral Dewey was authorized by the joint resolution of Congress approved June 3, 1898, and in response to the publication of the resolution a great many designs were submitted. The committee consisted of Assistant Secretary-of-the-Navy Charles H. Allen; United States Senator Henry Cabot Lodge, of Massachusetts, who introduced the joint resolution; and Professor Marshal Oliver, of the United States Naval Academy, Annapolis, Maryland. The design chosen was that of Mr. Paulding Farnham, of the house of Tiffany & Co., and a member of the National Sculpture Society.

The sword, with the exception of the steel blade and the body metal of the scabbard, will be made entirely of pure gold, 22-karat fine; the grip will be covered with fine shark-skin, bound with gold wire and inlaid with gold stars. Above the shark-skin the handle terminates in a richly carved and enamelled gold collar and pommel; a narrow band of oak leaves unites the shark-skin to the collar; then come the arms of the Admiral's native State, Vermont, with the motto, "Freedom and Unity"; and above this, and spreading toward the top, is the Great Seal of the United States, with the blue field of the shield in enamel. The shield in the arms of Vermont is also enamelled. The collar is surmounted with a closely woven wreath of oak leaves, the standard decoration for rank, and the intervening spaces between the decorations are studded with stars. On the pommel is carved the name of the battle-ship Olympia and the zodiacal sign for the month of December, when Dewey was born.

The guard is composed of a conventional eagle, terminating in a claw clasping the top, the outspread wings forming the guard proper. The eagle bears a laurel wreath in its beak.



The scabbard will be of thin steel, damaskeened in gold with sprays of Ros marinus, signifying fidelity, constancy, and remembrance. The sprays are interlaced in the form of a series of cartouches, with a star in the centre of each, while dolphins fill the outer spaces. Sprays of oak leaves and acorns secure the rings and trappings of the scabbard; above these, on the front of the scabbard, is a raised monogram in brilliants (diamonds) entwining the letters "G. D.," and immediately under them are the letters "U. S. N.," surrounded by sprays of Ros marinus. The ferrule, or lower end of scabbard, terminates in entwined gold dolphins.

The sword-blade is damaskeened with the inscription:

> The Gift of the Nation to Rear-Admiral George Dewey, U.S.N., in memory of the Victory at Manila Bay, May 1st, 1898.

The Phœnician galley, representing the first craft of the world's navies, supplies the rest of the ornament on this side of the blade. On the other side of the blade is shown the flight of the eagles of victory bearing festoons of laurel.

The mounting of the belt and the trappings will be the regulation buckles, pierced slide-rings and swivels—all of 22-karat gold, and ornamented with the oak leaves and acorns. The bullion tassel and embroidered belting are especially made, and will be much superior to those usually employed.

NOW PHO
READY W
A
At the very beginning of the struggle, the publishers ...
Work, which has cost over $100,000 to produce. ... the Army and Navy, and arrangements were also ... photographers from our London office were sent to ...
Commissioners from our United States Government ... able to be touched by war. Nearly 400 magnificent and ... very valiant descriptive text written by military and ...
Narrative History, which actually takes you
THROUGH THE WAR
356 PAGES, 11 X 14 INCHES

Facsimile of our Sumptuous Half-Leather Ed...
JUST CONSIDER WHAT YOU ( THIS GREAT LARGE, FINE PHOTOGRAPHS OF ALL THE LE... or tinted text. (A magnificent portrait gallery.)
PHOTOGRAPHS OF OUR TROOPS, Naval and Militar... of these views are nearly 6 feet in length.)
PHOTOGRAPHS OF PLACES MADE FAMOUS ...
WAR. (A long list of lasting interest.)
PHOTOGRAPHS OF THE PEOPLE LIVING IN ...
PLACES. Wouldn't you like to know more about ...
PHOTOGRAPHS OF BATTLES ON LAND AND S... history of no other war was ever so brilliantly illu...
INTERESTING AND INSTRUCTIVE DESCR...
TEXT, written by military and naval experts. (The text ... the photographs; the photographs make you rem...
text.
A GRAPHIC AND INTERESTING HISTORY ...
EVENTS. Gives you the whole story in connect...
MAGNIFICENT NEW MAPS IN COLOR, made exp... ever, showing the West Indies, Cuba, Hawaii, the Philip... sively Map of the World, showing the Greater United States ... is acquired territory. (Enables you to locate every w...
HOW TO GET THE HI... exclusive property of the publishers. The views cannot ...
can never be taken again and can never be enjoyed ...
(2) wonderfully interesting, but will be invaluable fo...
cents become known, is certain to have a remarkably ...
See also the favorable advertisement, sure to follow, th...
September only a portion of the first edition at ONE-HALF THE REGULAR ...
as also concede easy monthly payments in order ...
first edition sets need be excluded. In order to secure ...
heavy style of binding, and the work will be forwarded ...
monthly instalments, viz., 50 cents monthly for th...
half-leather (which we highly recommend as a d...
$1.00 monthly for the crushed levant (present ... satisfactory it may be returned at once ...
refunded. Remember: These first-edition volu...
the fresh, new plates, thus dinging out the engrav...
cost, this offer positively closes October 1st.
London: C. Arthur Pearson, Ltd., Henrietta St.)
PEARSON PUB...

Uncle Sam's hat was never waved above ... a American product of which more ...
Americans are proud than in this picture. ...
"Great Western" Champagne has no equal. ...
Pleasant Valley Wine Co., Rheims, N. Y.
Harper's Catalogue
Descriptive list of their publica... tions, with portraits of author... will be sent by mail to any ad... dress on receipt of ten cents.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

NOW READY

THE ONLY PHOTOGRAPHIC HISTORY OF OUR WAR WITH SPAIN

A $100,000 BOOK

At the very beginning of the struggle, the publishers made active preparations for this Great National Work, which has cost over $100,000 to produce. Photographic experts were sent to the front with both the Army and Navy, and arrangements were also made to secure duplicate views taken by the official photographers of the United States Government to be deposited in the Archives at Washington. Commissioners from our London office were sent to Spain, the Philippines, and other distant points likely to be touched by war. Nearly 400 magnificent views were secured, and these are accompanied by brilliant descriptive text written by Military and Naval experts, constituting a Magnificent Photographic History, which actually takes you

THROUGH THE WAR BY CAMERA

356 PAGES, 11 X 14 INCHES

Facsimile of our Sumptuous Half-Leather Edition

50 cents

Secures Immediate Possession of the Work

Balance in Small Monthly Amounts

JUST CONSIDER WHAT YOU GET IN THIS GREAT WORK

LARGE, FINE PHOTOGRAPHS OF ALL THE LEADERS on land and sea. (A magnificent portrait gallery.)

PHOTOGRAPHS OF OUR TROOPS, Naval and Military. (Some of these views are nearly 2 feet in length.)

PHOTOGRAPHS OF PLACES MADE FAMOUS BY THE WAR. (A long list of lasting interest.)

PHOTOGRAPHS OF THE PEOPLE LIVING IN THESE PLACES. (Wouldn't you like to know more about them?)

PHOTOGRAPHS OF BATTLES ON LAND AND SEA. (The history of no other war was ever so brilliantly illustrated.)

INTERESTING AND INSTRUCTIVE DESCRIPTIVE TEXT, written by military and naval experts. (The text explains the photographs; the photographs make you remember the text.

A GRAPHIC AND INTERESTING HISTORY OF WAR EVENTS. (Gives you the whole story in connected form.)

MAGNIFICENT NEW MAPS IN COLOR, made expressly for this work, showing the West Indies, Cuba, Hawaii, the Philippines and also a superb Map of the World, showing the Greater United States and our newly acquired territory. (Enables you to locate every war point.)

Read these Words of Praise from Distinguished Americans about the History.

A FEW FROM MANY:

HON. JOHN WANAMAKER, Ex-Postmaster-General, says: "You could hardly have done a more desirable thing for the people, and you have done it well."

HON. JOHN D. LONG, Secretary of the Navy, says: "I have found the views extremely interesting."

HON. LYMAN J. GAGE, Secretary of the Treasury, says: "They are extremely interesting and very instructive."

HON. GROVER CLEVELAND says: "The work cannot fail to impart useful information in a most entertaining way."

ADJ.-GEN. H. C. CORBIN says: "The collection is very complete and the views remarkably fine."

REAR-ADMIRAL S. B. LUCE says: "Admirable for educational purposes and, as a record, of great historical value."

SENATOR H. C. LODGE says: "The work is very interesting, and I have looked it over with much pleasure."

HOW TO GET THE HISTORY. This magnificent work has cost a fortune to produce. The photographs are the exclusive property of the publishers. The views cannot be purchased elsewhere. The scenes they picture can never be taken again and can never be enjoyed save in this work. The historical portion is not only wonderfully interesting, but will be invaluable for reference and study. The work, when once its merits become known, is certain to have a remarkably large sale. In order to secure a proper introduction and the favorable advertisement sure to follow, the publishers have decided to distribute during September only a portion of the first edition at and also concede easy monthly payments in order that no one earnestly desiring one of these choice first-edition sets need be excluded. In order to secure the History it is only necessary to send 50 cents for any style of binding, and the work will be forwarded at once. The balance is payable in seven equal monthly instalments, viz., 50 cents monthly for the cloth binding; 75 cents monthly for the half-leather (which we highly recommend as a durable and proportionately cheaper edition); and $1.00 monthly for the crushed levant (presentation edition). If the work is not entirely satisfactory it may be returned at once and your remittance will be promptly refunded. Remember: These first-edition volumes are specially desirable because printed from the fresh, new plates, thus bringing out the engravings with singular delicacy and beauty. Bear in mind, this offer positively closes October 1st. Address

ONE-HALF THE REGULAR SUBSCRIPTION PRICE

(London: C. Arthur Pearson, Ltd., Henrietta St.)

PEARSON PUBLISHING CO., 114 Fifth Ave., New York

Uncle Sam's hat was never waved above an American product of which more Americans are proud than in this picture. "Great Western" Champagne has no equal.

Pleasant Valley Wine Co., Rheims, N. Y.

Harper's Catalogue

Descriptive list of their publications, with portraits of authors, will be sent by mail to any address on receipt of ten cents.

A NEW POCO.

The Folding Gem.

The neatest, smallest, most carefully built of all the low-priced cameras. A marvel of compactness weighing one pound and only an inch and a-half thick, closed. Automatically locks itself at proper focusing distance. Closes by touching a spring.

TAKES A PICTURE 4 X 5

As perfect at edges as at centre.

COMPLETE, $7.00.

ROCHESTER CAMERA CO.

43 ELIZABETH ST., ROCHESTER, N. Y.

A better Cocktail at home than is served over any bar in the World.

THE CLUB COCKTAILS

MANHATTAN, MARTINI, WHISKEY, HOLLAND GIN, TOM GIN, VERMOUTH and YORK.

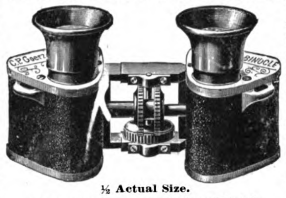
We guarantee these Cocktails to be made of absolutely pure and well matured liquors and the mixing equal to the best cocktails served over any bar in the world. Being compounded in accurate proportions, they will always be found of uniform quality.

Connoisseurs agree that of two cocktails made of the same material and proportions the one which is aged must be the better.

Try our YORK Cocktail made without any sweetening—dry and delicious.

For Sale on the Dining and Buffet Cars of the principal railroads of the U. S.

AVOID IMITATIONS.



For Sale by all Druggists and Dealers.

G. F. HEUBLEIN & BRO., Sole Props.,

39 Broadway, N. Y., Hartford, Conn. 20 Piccadilly, W. London, Eng.

WONDERFUL TRIËDER BINOCULARS

½ Actual Size.

Prices Range from $44.50 to $72.50.

C. P. GOERZ, 52 Union Sq. (East), N. Y. City

Have 8 to 10 times the power of the best of the old-style field and opera glasses.

Pocket size—invaluable for Army and Navy, War Correspondents, Race Meets, Regattas, Travel, and the Theatre.

Send for Descriptive Catalogue. For sale by leading jewelers and opticians throughout the United States. Among them:

New York—Theodore B. Starr, F. G. Schmidt, Gall & Lemke, Queen & Co., Ga Nun & Parsons.
Brooklyn—J. B. Hoecker, 312 Fulton St.
Chicago—C. D. Peacock, Spaulding & Co., Hyman, Berg & Co., N. Watry, H. Borsch.
Philadelphia—Queen & Co., Bonschur & Holmes, Williams, Brown & Earle.
Washington—Franklin & Co., Moore & Leding, D. N. Walford.
Boston—Pinkham & Smith.
St. Louis—A. S. Aloe Co., Erker Bros.
San Francisco—Hirsch & Kayser, Henry Kahn & Co., Geo. H. Kahn.

Gold Seal

Champagne

Best Natural Sparkling Wine produced in America.

Pronounced by Connoisseurs as a Superior Article for Household Consumption.

For Sale by all leading wine dealers and grocers, or at the cellars,

URBANA WINE CO., Urbana, N.Y.

Also a full line of well-ripened and pure Sweet Catawba, Dry Catawba, Pure Sherry, Clarets, and Brandies.

There is no Kodak but the Eastman Kodak

Half the charm of a photographic outing is lost if one carries along several pounds of glass plates and holders and has every moment filled with anxiety for their safety.

Kodaks

use non-breakable film cartridges, which weigh ounces where plates weigh pounds.

KODAKS $5.00 to $35.00.

Catalogues free at agencies or by mail.

EASTMAN KODAK CO.
Rochester, N. Y.

Trade No 4711 Mark

Capitol

(REGISTERED)

The Unrivaled Hair Tonic

The Only Dandruff Cure

A Sure Preventive of Baldness

Invented by the well-known authority on diseases of the scalp, Dr. P. J. Eichhoff, Professor of Dermatology, Elberfeld, Germany.

Experience has shown that all other specifics recommended for these purposes have proved failures.

Send for circular.

SOLE U. S. AGENTS,

MÜLHENS & KROPFF, . . NEW YORK.

HARPER'S thoroughly revised and classified, will be sent by mail to any address on receipt of ten cents. CATALOGUE

A Safety Revolver

will GO OFF ONLY at the critical moment.

A powerful shooting weapon; 32 calibre. Very short barrel. Therefore specially desirable for bicyclists, as it may be carried in the pocket without inconvenience.

Descriptive catalogue free.

SMITH & WESSON,

15 Stockbridge Street, - Springfield, Mass.

CHICKEN

NOVEL MEXICAN DELICACY.

Minced chicken, highly seasoned with Mexican spices, and wrapped in corn husks. Unique, delightful.

At grocers, or 8 pound can mailed for 10 cts in stamps. Booklet sent on request.

TAMALE

ARMOUR PACKING CO.
DEPARTMENT H
KANSAS CITY, MO. U.S.A.

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google
Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE

KNEW HE DESERVED IT.

AUNT. "What's the reason you didn't get tanned more, while you were up at the farm, Tommy?"

TOMMY. "I 'spect it was becoz grandpa was took down with rheumatism the second day after I got there."

Soup by Mail Free

Upon receipt of your name, address, a 2 ct. stamp and your dealer's name Armour & Company will send, free, three tablets of Actual size of Tablets.

Armour's Concentrated tablets of Beef Extract and Vegetables.

A full sized box sent postpaid on receipt of 25 cts.

Three of these Tablets sent for 2c stamp.

The nutrient part of beef and vegetables compressed into tablet form. One Tablet a Meal. Cooked ready to eat. Will keep in any climate any length of time. Good to eat dry, or can be dissolved in hot or cold water at pleasure, making a relishable bouillon, broth, soup, for the home and for Soldiers, Sailors, Explorers, Hunters, Fishermen, Campers, Outing Parties, Prospectors, and Travelers by Land or Sea.

Used by United States Army.

ARMOUR & COMPANY, CHICAGO.

Pepsalt...

is the best of table salt, into every grain of which is incorporated digestive substances natural to the stomach. Fill your salt-cellar with Pepsalt and use it in place of salt at your meals. If you have indigestion your stomach does not supply the necessary amount of the dissolving or digestive juices. Pepsalt taken in place of salt at your meals makes good this deficiency, as you take with every mouthful of your food a similar substance to that which is required and at the right time, and your indigestion is a thing of the past.

Send for sample in salt-shaker bottle and try it.

Price 25 cents, postpaid.

THE VAUPEL SAMARITAN CO., 45 Sheriff St., Cleveland, Ohio.

Indigestion Has No Terrors For Him

That salt-shaker is filled with Pepsalt

PEPSALT CURES AND PREVENTS INDIGESTION

CHEW

Beeman's

The Original

Pepsin Gum

Cures Indigestion and Sea-sickness.

All Others Are Imitations.

Send 25 cents in stamps to-day

if it is more convenient for you — than to try to remember to ask your dealer: — and you will receive by return mail — wherever you live — 10 little cigars in souvenir pocket pouch. They are the popular made of the finest quality whole leaf imported tobacco.

Van Bibber Little Cigars

Don't hesitate to try them because they are small. You want a short smoke oftener than a long one.

H. ELLIS & Co., Baltimore, Md.

The American Tobacco Co., Successo

"A PERFECT FOOD — as Wholesome as it is Delicious."

Walter Baker & Co.'s Breakfast Cocoa

Trade-Mark.

The Standard for Purity and Excellence....

Costs less than one cent a cup.

Our Trade-Mark on Every Package.

Walter Baker & Co. Ltd.

DORCHESTER, MASS.

ESTABLISHED 1780.

IT ONLY WEIGHS 10 POUNDS

Makes a small package when deflated, and can be carried anywhere by anybody.

"PERFECTION" Air Mattresses

are a modern invention for Campers and Yachtsmen — they are waterproof, never become musty — and make a most comfortable and luxurious bed. Made to fit any irregular shape of bunks or cockpits.

Send for our illustrated catalogue.

MECHANICAL FABRIC CO.

Air-Goods Department. Providence, R. I.

WALLINGFORD, CONNECTICUT.

ROSEMARY HALL, a Country School for Girls.

MISS RUNTZ-REES, Principal.

Ninth year begins Oct. 1, 1898.

Arnold Constable & Co.

Upholstery.

Velour Glacé,

Tapestry Silk Damask,
for Curtains and Furniture Covering.

Real Lace Curtains.

Arabian, Marie Antoinette, Brussels, and Renaissance.

Tamboured Lace and Muslin
for Sash Curtains.

Broadway & 19th st.

NEW YORK.

Nathan B. Goodnow & Co.,

BANKERS.

ESTABLISHED 1873.

2 Post Office Sq., Boston, Mass.

Transact a General Banking Business, including the Purchase and Sale of Stocks, Bonds, and Grain, for Investment or on Margin.

Dealers in Government and Railroad Bonds.

Books containing Four-Year Range of Prices, Dividends, and Earnings sent free on request.

A Permanently Invested Fund of over TWO HUNDRED AND TWENTY-FOUR THOUSAND DOLLARS is held as a Guaranteed Security for all persons having business with us.

Correspondence solicited.

Joseph Gillott's STEEL PENS.

GOLD MEDAL, PARIS EXPOSITION, 1889, AND THE CHICAGO EXPOSITION AWARD.

THE MOST PERFECT OF PENS.

TRADE E & W MARK

EARL & WILSON'S LINEN COLLARS & CUFFS BEST IN THE WORLD

BOOKS FOR GOLFERS

The humors of golf are apparently inexhaustible, and Mr. Frost, himself a keen player, has worked con amore in illustrating the harmless foibles of his fellow-enthusiasts. The verses of the alphabet are by Mr. Sutphen, and have the agreeable lightness of touch that characterized the half-dozen stories contained within the covers of "The Golficide."

The Golfer's Alphabet

Pictures by A. B. FROST. Verses by W. G. VAN TASSEL SUTPHEN.

Small 4to, Illuminated Boards, $1 50.

The Golficide

And Other Tales of the Fair Green. By W. G. VAN TASSEL SUTPHEN. Illustrated. 16mo, Half Cloth, Colored Top, $1 00.

In these half-dozen stories of the golf-links the reader will recognize some familiar types; he may even see himself, although he may not choose to acknowledge the likeness outside of the kindly seclusion of the family circle.

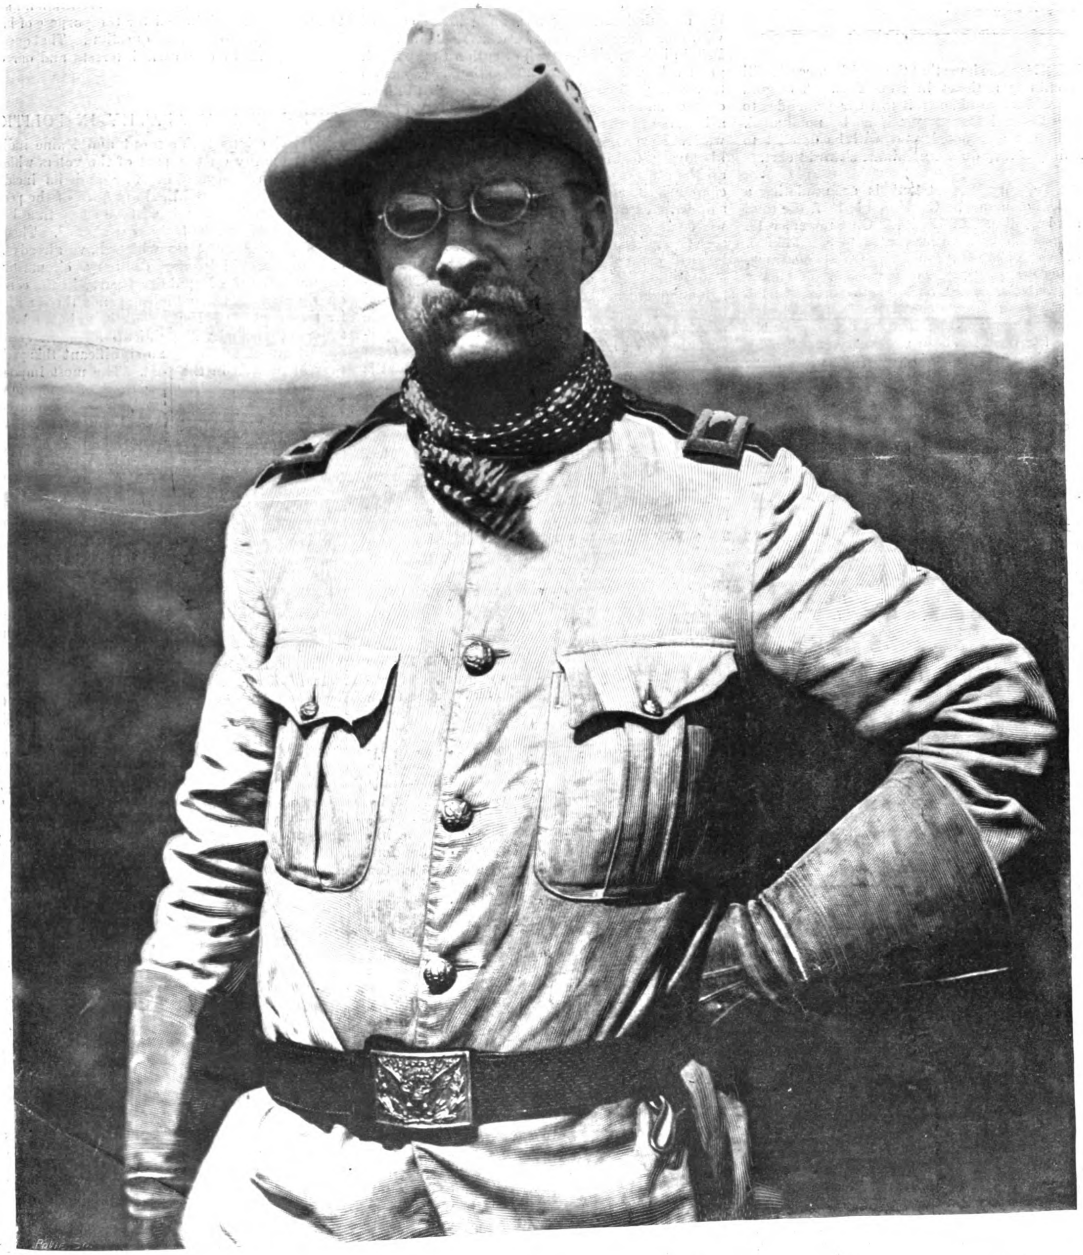
New York HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers London

"AMERICA'S GREAT RESORTS." 48 pages, with map, sent free on receipt of a two-cent sta... by GEORGE H. DANIELS, G. P. A. New York Central, New Yo...

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google



Pa. State College.

HARPER'S WEEKLY

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. XLII.—No. 2179. NEW YORK, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 24, 1898. TEN CENTS A COPY. FOUR DOLLARS A YEAR.

Copyright, 1898, by HARPER & BROTHERS. All Rights Reserved.

COLONEL THEODORE ROOSEVELT, U.S.V.

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

HARPER'S WEEKLY

(TWENTY-FOUR PAGES)

NEW YORK CITY, SEPTEMBER 24, 1898

Terms: 10 Cents a Copy—$4 00 a Year, in Advance

Postage free to all Subscribers in the United States, Canada, and Mexico

Subscriptions may begin with any Number

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS

New York City: Franklin Square

London: 45 Albemarle Street, W.

Also for sale at Brentano's, 37 Avenue de l'Opéra, Paris

In the next number of the WEEKLY will begin a charming story by MR. HENRY JAMES, called

"THE AWKWARD AGE."

It is a story of strikingly interesting and peculiar characteristics of London society.

THERE is some hope that the gold Democrats will nominate a ticket in New York. The gold Democrats, we think, owe it to their principles to support Colonel ROOSEVELT if he be nominated. If he be not nominated, they will be derelict to their duty if they do not nominate a third ticket.

THE Treasury Department is accumulating a great deal of money. On March 5, 1897, the total cash balance was $212,725,207. On September 13, 1898, the cash balance amounted to $316,316,983. This is not a healthful showing. On the contrary, it means the withdrawal of large sums of money from circulation, and a consequent increase in the rates of discount. We have not yet reached a point where money difficulties are acute, probably because the West has been so greatly enriched by the abundant crops of two years; but while there is no currency famine as yet, it may come; and, at any rate, we have in this enormous accumulation of money in the Treasury, and in its withdrawal from circulation, a reminder that the money question is still with us, and that we have not yet established that elastic currency that good bankers and sound financiers know to be absolutely essential to a safe and stable monetary system.

WE do not sympathize with the prevailing criticism of President MCKINLEY'S effort to investigate army abuses. It is true that the commissioners will be hampered by want of public money, and by lack of power to compel the attendance and testimony of witnesses. It is not quite true that the President's limitation of their powers to an investigation of the quartermaster, commissary, and medical departments prevents the doing of justice. In the first place, these departments are what the President and the Secretary of War and Congress have made them. The commissioners can find out all that is essential to a just decision by the examination of officers who may be ordered to appear before them, and by careful study of the reports of the War Department, and of the statutes of the United States. In examining the history of this war, the commissioners cannot fail to discover where the Secretary of War has been at fault. If they proceed intelligently with their task they must discover also the responsibility of Congress, and the harsh and killing effect upon army administration of Congressional legislation. The commissioners have sufficient power under the President's invitation to gain all the knowledge that is essential to the purposes of a proper inquiry.

IT is evident that Mother Earth has still El Dorados that are neither buried under Klondyke snows nor bask in Afric's golden sands, where the too primitive Boer asserts his supremacy. A lump of gold weighing a hundred and fifteen pounds, and valued at $32,000, has just been picked up almost on the surface of the sandy soil near Lake Wynn, in the southern district of Western Australia, by a Roman Catholic priest, acting as agent for a bedridden parishioner, who had been informed of its location in a vision. The story is a romantic if not necessarily a miraculous one; but to the mining public of Australia its most interesting feature evidently consisted in the probability that other nuggets, which the vision had neglected to specify, would be found in the same locality. The story of the frantic rush of some six thousand miners to the spot, the moment the priest could be induced to say where he had picked up his sacred nugget, recalls to mind the earliest and most exciting days of Californian and Australian gold-finding. To the world at large the interest of the discovery, though less engrossing, is by no means trifling. Where nuggets of a hundred and fifteen pounds are to be picked up there are sure to be others, and where one such prize is found the others will certainly be sought for. In this way it may well be that we may see a return in Western Australia of the gold fever and the gold production which made Victoria a wonder of the world between 1852 and 1860. One more application of the gold-cure to unfortunates afflicted with the silver craze.

MR. HAY is coming home from his mission to England with much deserved glory. He seems to have achieved the friendship of the English, and to be regarded as a promoter of an Anglo-American alliance. At least, his admirers on the other side speak of him as having greatly advanced international friendship. In view of this we are moved to suggest a kindly recognition of the admirable work which was done by his predecessor, Mr. BAYARD, in this same direction. Mr. BAYARD was once the object of much vituperation on account of his friendliness towards Great Britain, but now that Mr. HAY is coming home covered with glory because he has been a friend of Great Britain it is only fair to call attention to the much greater deeds in behalf of international friendship that were performed by Mr. BAYARD. With much courage and with great persistency, he stood up as a believer in the creed that blood is thicker than water. Never neglecting his duty nor overlooking his loyalty to his own country, he did more than all the other American ministers to Great Britain combined to promote and to strengthen the friendship between his own country and England. He was one of the most conspicuous figures in London society, and he was not only the welcome but the honored guest at most public festivities of the British capital. His own high character, his commanding abilities, his varied accomplishments, and his genial nature made him a favorite with the people a whose court he was the American representative, so that without taking anything from the credit due to Mr. HAY we may recall what is the larger credit due to Mr. BAYARD.

IF there is any other question than that of self-interest involved in the proposition to take on the Philippines and their savages, it is that of our duty to the democratic form of government in general. What have been the peculiar virtues of democracy; or rather, what has the world regarded as the peculiar virtues of our form of government? Our first great virtue is that we have established government of the people, by the people, and for the people. If there is any subject upon which heretofore all Americans have been agreed, it is that government existed for the people, and should be established by them. We have held, too, that it does not matter whether or not a race is prepared for effective and admirable government, for we have professed to believe that the practice of self-government ennobles a people, and makes them strong to bear their responsibilities. Therefore we gave the suffrage to the negro immediately upon his emergence from a state of slavery, and therefore we have watched with interest and confidence the experiment of democracy that is being made in France. If we take these distant islands by conquest, and if we undertake to rule them absolutely, as we must, we are certainly discrediting our past professions of democracy, and therefore discrediting democracy itself in the eyes of the world. In other words, we are retarding the growth of democracy, just at the present moment becoming so interesting as to invite especially vigorous attacks from its enemies. Other virtues of democracy have been that it is peace loving, that it is against conquest, that it is bitterly hostile to the idea of taking the land of other people without their consent. All this would be doubted, and we would be regarded as hypocrites, if we were to carry out the designs of the Philippine annexationists.

IT is announced that the cabinet is unanimously in favor of holding Manila and Manila Bay, that a majority favor retaining control of Luzon, and that some of the members strongly advocate the retention of the whole Philippine archipelago. This is a very serious matter, and one which ought to attract the attention and excite the interest of every patriotic American. If we hold Manila and Manila Bay without the rest of the island of Luzon, we shall undoubtedly have a war on our hands with AGUINALDO and his insurgents. It is equally true that if we undertake to hold the whole of the island we shall have this war. AGUINALDO is just now posing as the friend of the Americans, and the insurgents, under the lead of General PIO PILAR, appear to be rebelling against him. The insurgents insist that the islands are theirs, and there is no ground on our part for joining issue with them on this question, unless we are prepared to hold that they are unfit to govern the islands, and that we have made ourselves responsible for good government there. Indeed, this last is the assumption of those who insist upon our retention of all the islands. They say that Spain is not capable of giving these people a good government, and that the people themselves are not capable of self-government. They add that the United States, having taken possession of Manila and Manila Bay, is morally bound, in the interests of civilization, to see that a better government is established in the place of the one thrown down. This is a fundamental error of the annexationists. The United States is not under any such obligation, at least unless the task of governing the Philippines can be carried on without detriment to our own civilization. If the effect of undertaking the government of the Philippines will be to bring ill to the United States itself, either moral or political, the United States is not bound to injure itself in the interest of the savages of the Philippines. This talk about our destiny and about our moral obligations to civilization and to the world was originated for the purpose of blinding the people to the real question. That question is simply as to our own interests and our own welfare.

THE PRESENT APATHY IN POLITICS.

THE elections in Vermont and Maine indicate an apathy on the part of the voters which is not extraordinary. The war and its incidents have absorbed the political energies of the people, and we imagine that it will be some time before their interest will be fully reawakened. The light votes in the two States which have already held elections would under ordinary circumstances augur ill for the Republican party in the contests on their success in which depends their majority in the House of Representatives, but there are some reasons why Republican losses in Vermont and Maine may not be so significant this year as they have been in the past. The most important of these reasons is that questions of domestic politics are not interesting this year, and are not being discussed, so that a reduced vote is really apparent in each party's poll. For the moment Bryanism seems dead, although the evils in our currency and tariff systems which produced Bryanism continue to exist, while a tightening money market threatens to bring about a state of affairs which in an ordinary year would add great strength to the vociferousness of the shouters for cheaper money. The Republican party has abandoned both silver and prevarication, and is out and out for the gold standard. So much good at least has been accomplished. At last the country has a party which not only means gold, but says what i means. Compared with this firm front of the Re publicans, the Democrats are weak and hesitating Most of their State conventions have endorse Bryanism, both as to its candidate and as to its Ch cago platform. But the endorsement of the silve free-coinage plank is not hearty. There is n ring in it. Silver is not even mentioned muc Certainly we hear no "demonstrations" of th wonderful qualities of this panacea for financi ills. The tariff question is not in evidence. Th failure of the DINGLEY law as a revenue measure momentous to the protectionists, for the war h made more revenue absolutely and immediate necessary.

The failure of the tariff law to produce suf cient revenue, even for the needs of the cou try at peace, has compelled not only an additio to the public debt, but a return to the old int nal-revenue taxes, against which protectioni have naturally protested. Of course such tax were inevitable as a war measure, but there is intelligent person who comprehends the demar upon the government who does not know that t war taxes, with all their burdens, must contin to form an essential feature of our revenue la The socialistic issues which were features of BRYAN platform were really never discussed w seriousness. It is true that votes were influenc by them in the Presidential campaign here there, both in the cities and in the agricultu parts of the country, where there had been m distress, due to a succession of poor crops; but si then abundant crops have brought prosperity, a at all events, the farmers, who two years ago wer favor of government loans on warehouse rece and on kindred devices for availing themselves the taxing power of the government, are too b paying off their mortgages to bother their he over hard questions of public finance. It is dent to any one who takes into account the s of public discussion on the questions over wh the press and the stump-orators were by the

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

during the Presidential election that the country is no longer interested in them; although there must be a tariff question and a money question and a constant danger of a BRYAN movement and campaign so long as there is a tariff law, and a monetary system such as is at present on our statute-books. We do not rid ourselves of evils by getting excited over the affairs of other people and of distant islands.

As to the questions which have come out of the war, something might be expected that would make politics interesting. But the trouble here is that the questions are new, and the next step is remote; therefore sides have not been formed. The country has assumed the government of Hawaii, and Puerto Rico and Cuba seem inevitable. Probably, if the Democrats had had an opportunity to put the issue to the front, they would have opposed expansion; and if they could have pushed BRYAN aside, their opposition would have been a wholesome movement. But as it is, expansion is an accomplished fact, while it is too early for the country to divide into parties on the question of the manner of government that shall be adopted for our colonies. Perhaps the time and the opportunity for such an issue will never meet. Besides the general uncertainty and doubt as to what is to be done with respect to our colonies, the mind of the people is distracted over the conduct of the war.

We are inclined to think that in the end there will be more of a political issue in this question of army administration than there seems to be on the surface, for the essential point is not as to the guilt or incompetence of this man or that man, of this staff department or that staff department. It is much deeper and more fundamental than that. It goes to the very heart of our system of government, and before the army question can be satisfactorily settled we must determine whether or not it will be wise to change our government so radically that it will be a very different kind of government from that which the fathers supposed that they were framing. At the moment the whole country is indignant by reason of the terrible sufferings of our soldiers, and it is generally, and with some reason, supposed that this indignation will be manifested by the defeat of Republican candidates for Congress. This, judging from past examples in our history, would be the natural result of such revelations as have appeared in the newspapers from one end of the country to the other. It may be, however, that Republican Congressional candidates will escape this time, because they and their newspapers are at one with the Democratic newspapers in making the Secretary of War the scapegoat for the whole miserable business. There is, in fact, no reason why one party should be punished more than the other for what has gone on and is going on in the administration of the affairs of the army, for the main fault lies with the system under which these terrible evils are not only probable, but almost inevitable. At any rate, we doubt if the voters have made up their minds to punish Republican Congressmen for what they firmly believe to be the guilt of MR. ALGER. There is abundant excitement over the matter, it is true, and some effort is being made to give a political expression to the excitement, but as yet there is little evidence of success in this effort.

Perhaps another cause for political apathy lies in the fact that the people have come at last to realize fully their utter helplessness. They are in the hands of the boss, and, war or no war, public interest or public apathy, the candidates who are to be nominated will be those who are selected by QUAY or PLATT, or the Connecticut ring, or MURPHY and CROKER, or HANNA or FORAKER, or TANNER or ALTGELD. With many men, and they the men who have the most intelligent interest in politics, this apathy does not denote indifference. It may mean hopelessness for the moment, but there is resentment also. Moreover, as we have indicated, the parties are nearer together on questions of principle than ever before. There is less reason than ever before for the best Republicans and best Democrats to remain apart. There is much that is intensely interesting and important in the near future. Large issues are to be raised, and large questions are to be settled. There is sometimes a calm that accompanies a change of sentiment, just as there often is a stillness before a tumultuous storm. Before the next Presidential election there is sure to be one of the best opportunities for the formation of a new party that this country has ever witnessed. Apathy is unnatural in American politics. It has always preceded exciting times. It is only necessary to recall the years that followed the "Era of Good Feeling" to conclude that the present indifference is a prelude to important shiftings in parties and to much excitement—excitement that is very likely to lead to the disappearance of the kind of boss who rules us now, and to the reappearance, as leaders, of intelligent and educated men. Meanwhile, in view of the task before us, let us assume no more responsibilities than we must.

AUSTRALIAN FEDERATION.

THREE months ago the result of the referendum in the colonies of Australia on the question of federation appeared to persons at a distance to hold out little hope of the consolidation of the colonies under a single government. The press in England reluctantly, and that of both France and Germany with some appearance of satisfaction, arrived at the conclusion that the refusal of New South Wales to accept the proposed constitution would at least put the movement back for many years, and might not unlikely lead to the permanent isolation of the various colonies. There were excuses for the misunderstanding too, yet further developments would seem to prove that the opinion formed was a hasty one. It was founded on the idea that the adhesion of the oldest colony of the Australian group was essential to any federation, and this is now freely admitted in Australia itself; the error lay in the hasty conclusion that New South Wales itself was not in favor of joining a federal union.

The general election of the Parliament of that colony, particulars of which have just reached this country, disclose the true position of the matter, and indicate that there is a strong probability that the cause of the federal union of Australia will triumph within a very short time. The issue tried at the recent election was essentially that of federation, and it is significant that in the contest there was no anti-federation party. The question was not as to the policy, but as to the terms, of union, and the voters were divided into hostile camps only on the questions what were the smallest amendments in the proposed federal constitution that ought to satisfy the colony in giving its adhesion to the scheme, and which of the contending leaders was the most likely to bring about an agreement. The result was a victory for the leader of the existing government, and the acceptance of his programme as the one that would content the people of New South Wales; and the new Parliament has been elected pledged to support him in the effort to secure federation practically by three definite amendments of the constitution.

The terms laid down by the people of New South Wales as the price of their adhesion to the scheme of union are briefly these: (1.) Either the abolition of the equal representation of large and small colonies in the federal Senate, or some other efficient safeguard against a combination of the less populous colonies overriding the federal legislation passed by a majority of the Chamber elected on a population basis. (2.) The more effectually depriving the Senate of all power of amending money bills. (3.) The removal from the constitution of any provision which necessarily involves the imposition of high protective duties by the federal government. Subject to the amendment of the constitution in these respects, the people of New South Wales have declared that they will accept the act framed by the convention.

The proposals arise naturally out of the circumstances of the mother-colony of the Australian group. She is to-day the most populous of the colonies; she is also the only one of them all which has adopted a free-trade policy, and, as a large majority of her people believe, she has done so to the great increase of her prosperity and wealth. As the colony possessed of the largest population, the largest and least-encumbered revenue, and the greatest developed wealth, her people consider that they alone will be called upon to make a sacrifice for the sake of federation, and it would seem that in these demands they have formulated an ultimatum for the acceptance or rejection of the less populous and prosperous colonies. It can hardly be questioned that the course adopted holds out the best hopes of an agreement. At the convention the great and small colonies had equal representation, and New South Wales was almost invariably outvoted. In all the particulars now objected to the constitution was dictated by the delegates from the three smaller colonies, and by her present action New South Wales merely states the lowest terms of concession by the less populous colonies on which she will join with them in a federation in which at present she has little to receive and a good deal to give.

The interesting question now is, how far the other colonies are prepared to go to secure the senior colony's adhesion to the scheme, which, in fact, means its acceptance. The prospect would seem to be hopeful. There is scarcely a doubt that Victoria will agree, and it appears likely that Queensland will come in on the terms proposed. It is probable that South Australia will hesitate, but eventually accept; and if so, the inclusion of Western Australia and Tasmania can only be a question of time. Should this be so, the action of New South Wales will have the result, whether it be for better or worse, of moulding the latest federation of the English-speaking people upon lines more entirely democratic than any yet attempted. Opinions may differ as to the probable success of the experiment, but there can be no question of its interest and importance for all who are taking part in the development and application of democratic government in the varying conditions of modern society.

ANARCHISM AND ASSASSINATION.

No more startling or revolting crime could have been committed than the murder of the Empress of Austria. Not since MARIE ANTOINETTE was sent to the guillotine has there been a crime more apt to awaken that sentiment of chivalric pity and indignation to which, on the earlier occasion, BURKE gave expression in words that are likely to be remembered as long as the English language endures. Now, as then, a queen has been chosen for murder because she was a queen, but in this case it was a queen beloved by all her people. It is scarcely conceivable that an Austrian or a Hungarian, even an anarchist, could have been found to raise his dagger against the beloved ELIZABETH, who was beloved of all her people, and whose person formed, it is not too much to say, one of the strongest bonds of the dual monarchy. Only a foreigner could do it, and it is not wonderful that Austrian mobs should have risen against Italian residents in Austria to avenge the crime of an Italian.

And yet there is no reason to suppose that the wretch committed his crime as an Italian. He was a murderer in his character of an enemy of the human race. Envy, hatred, and malice, and all uncharitableness, are of no country. Neither are they of any time. We are apt to look upon anarchism as a new disease. In fact it is as old as failure. It is hard, especially for an American, to comprehend that anarchism is merely an embodied rage, a human rabies. He supposes that it must have some political object, however crazy, and be defended by some pretence of reason, however fantastic. The fact is, however, that, outside of Russian Nihilism, the crimes of anarchism have no ulterior motive. The murder of a man or of a woman who has always had enough to eat and drink and wear is to the anarchist "of action" its own reward. If anarchist murder were a political crime, having a political object, its complete failure might teach the anarchists to take up some more promising method of agitation. Everywhere the effect of anarchist crimes has been to strengthen the form of government and the state of society against which the anarchists pretend to take up arms. In a country like Russia—not that there is any like it—in which it is a crime against the state to be an educated man, "to know, to utter, and to argue freely," it is not to be wondered at that men should strive to sweep away the whole fabric of government which oppresses them, and should prefer to have "nihil" in its place. Yet, even in Russia, every violence of Nihilism reacts upon the violent, and establishes more firmly the system of which they complain and against which they revolt. The despotism is not "tempered by assassination." The present Czar sits more securely and more firmly on the throne because his grandfather was murdered. The assassination of CARNOT weakened the Radicals and the Socialists in whose interest it was supposed to have been committed. Who can doubt that the murder of the German Emperor would do more than anything else to delay the inevitable political modernization of Germany? So long as the existing social state in any country seems to the majority of its people—the majority in weight as well as in number—preferable to anarchy, so long will a crime committed to overthrow the social order have the effect of strengthening that order.

We repeat that the passions which produce anarchism are not new. What is new is the facility of communication which the diffusion of the arts of reading and writing and printing has brought with it. Any rabid human animal who would hesitate to murder if he believed that the result would be his own prompt and quiet effacement is encouraged to do murder by the hope of becoming a hero to other rabid human animals who will know of his crime and envy his precedency. The love of notoriety conquers the fear of death. It has been suggested that to defeat the desire for notoriety is to furnish the most effectual preventive for the crimes of anarchists. The suggestion is worthy of attention in the international councils to which the cruel murder of the Empress of Austria may lead.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

EMPRESS ELIZABETH OF AUSTRIA.

THE Empress Elizabeth of Austria was assassinated by Luigi Luccheni, an Italian anarchist, in front of the Hôtel Beau Rivage, Geneva, shortly after noon, Saturday, September 10. The Empress had been stopping some days in Geneva, travelling incognita with a small suite, and was about to take a lake steamer for Montreux. She was walking from the hotel to the boat-landing near by, when the assassin rushed upon her and plunged a stiletto into her breast. The attack was so sudden that no one had time to interfere. The murderer fled, but was overtaken by the crowd and turned over to the police. He boasted of his cowardly crime, and cheered for anarchy. The Empress staggered, but was able to reach the boat. She did not realize she had been stabbed, thinking she had been only struck by the man's fist; but growing faint, her ladies-in-waiting unfastened her waist, and found her Majesty was bleeding internally from a deep wound. The boat at once put back to Geneva, the Empress was carried to the hotel, physicians were summoned, but her Majesty died almost immediately.

As capital punishment has been abolished in Switzerland, Luccheni will probably be turned over to Austria for trial, on the ground of the Empress's right of extra-territoriality.

Diplomats, especially when they labored under the disadvantage of forming part of that very small fry known as attachés, enjoyed but few opportunities of coming into contact with Empress Elizabeth of Austria; and many a full-fledged envoy has actually left Vienna, after a stay there of several years, without ever having even set eyes on the lovely consort of "Franz den Kaiser." For even in the days prior to the tragedies of the Stahrenberg Lake and of Meyerling, which exercised so saddening an influence upon the later portion of her career, she held herself as far as possible aloof from court functions, while I cannot remember her ever taking part in those entertainments of the Viennese aristocracy, such as, for instance, of the Metternichs, the Andrassys, and the Schwarzenbergs, which the other members of the reigning family, including the Emperor, were wont to honor with their presence.

The first time that I had the opportunity of seeing Elizabeth, save at a distance, was on the occasion of the visit of the late Empress Augusta to Vienna, and the contrast between these two Empresses, personifying, the one, the traditions and the prestige of the so-called Holy Roman Empire, the other the glare of the new-fledged and somewhat parvenu German Empire, has always remained impressed upon my mind. Empress Augusta, although at the time a manifest septuagenarian, was arrayed in the most girlish fashion. A light muslin dress with a sash, which might have been suitable for a girl in her teens, only served to render still more marked the artifices that had been called into use to give a correspondingly juvenile appearance to a face that suggested enamel and paint, and which was surmounted by an enormous brown wig.

Her voice, as every one who knew her may very well remember, was pitched in such high tones and was so loud and so devoid of softness that it resembled a positive screech, while her gestures were jerky, and her movements both rapid and nervous. Beside her was the Empress Elizabeth, who, although the mother of a married daughter, looked a mere girl, dressed in the most quiet and sombre fashion, the pallor of her face unrelieved by one bit of paint, her voice melodiously soft, the very perfection of quiet grace and supreme elegance. The Viennese, in spite of all that has been said to the contrary, did not love their Empress much, resenting her reluctance to show herself in public. But I think that they were proud of her on that day, and realized the immeasurable distance that separates the Hapsburgs from the Hohenzollerns.

Subsequently I learned to know her better, especially after having taken part in some of those hunts in which she used to delight, and for the sake of which we were wont each year to migrate for a time from Vienna to Pesth, and I had several opportunities of observing how very kind a heart, how generous and considerate a nature, and how simple and unaffected a mind there were concealed under that somewhat cold reserve and chilly if beautiful exterior, which somehow or other brought home to one the thought of the analogy that existed between herself and her favorite flower, that flower of the snow-covered Alps, namely, the edelweiss.

It is hardly necessary to record here the history of her childhood, nor the romance of a marriage which took place when she was but seventeen. Every one knows that she was the daughter of that grand old patriarch Duke Maximilian of Bavaria, of whom so many entertaining anecdotes are current throughout southern Germany to this day. He permitted his sons and daughters to grow up as they listed, and, with the exception of his eldest son, who married an actress and became the father of the infamous Countess Larisch, they have all turned out remarkable men and women. The younger son, Duke Charles Theodore, is famous throughout the world as an oculist, and has to his credit some three thousand cataract operations.

One of the daughters is the ex-Queen of Naples, who behaved with such magnificent gallantry at the siege of Gaeta, where she assumed the charge of the heroic defence of the fortress in lieu of her craven husband, that the Czar conferred upon her the order of St. George, she being the only woman who has ever received this rare distinction. Another daughter was that Duchess of Alençon who stood aside and sacrificed her life in order to permit others to make their escape from the flames of the charity bazar at Paris two years ago. Empress Elizabeth was quite as much of a heroine as either of these sisters, although few people were aware of the fact until, on the day of her assassination, she actually walked from the Duke of Brunswick's monument to the wharf at Geneva after being stabbed to the heart, and subsequently expired without uttering a word of complaint, only asking the lady in attendance on her, in her own characteristic way, "not to make any fuss."

There was yet another sister, namely, the eldest, Helene by name, whom the Emperor jilted in order to marry the youngest. Yet, in spite of this disappointment sustained by Princess Helene, she remained the warmest friend and most clever counsellor of Elizabeth. The latter stood in sore need of her advice and support when she first went to Vienna as a bride. For not only the court, the aristocracy, and the people, but even the imperial family were against her, on account of the alleged inadequacy of her rank. Perhaps her bitterest foe may be said to have been her own mother-in-law, the masterful and imperious Duchess Sophia, who later on was abetted and supported therein by the now widowed and demented Archduchess Charlotte, ex-Empress of Mexico. It was this unfriendliness, by which she was environed during the first fifteen or twenty years of her marriage, that led her to accord so much attention to the friends of her childhood, namely, dogs, and especially horses. Her power and influence over the latter were extraordinary, while even the past masters of the science of hunting, in Leicestershire and in County Meath, so critical with regard to the riding of foreigners, enthusiastically declared that her seat in the saddle was unrivalled, and that she was the most perfect horsewoman in existence.

There is no greater mistake that it is possible to make than to charge her with having been eccentric to a degree verging on insanity, and more than three-quarters of the stories of her alleged oddities are based on mere hearsay, and utterly devoid of foundation, originating with people who neither knew the Empress nor were even acquainted with her by sight.

ELIZABETH, EMPRESS OF AUSTRIA.

To a clever, high-spirited woman possessed of the originality of Elizabeth there could have been nothing more dreary and intensely tiresome—nay, even exasperating—than the strict rules and laws of etiquette which have been in force at the court of Vienna ever since the days when Austria and Spain were united under the same crown. The Empress rebelled against all these restrictions, which, had she permitted, would have regulated by century-old precedent her every act, her every gesture, nay, her very speech. Of course her revolt in the matter led to her being taxed with eccentricity. For the moment that any one declines to comply with the conventions of our social system, no matter how empty a sham they may be, he or she is at once set down as being mentally unbalanced. The Empress's dislike of being stared at through field-glasses and telescopes, which the Viennese were in the habit of levelling at her whenever they got a chance, and her consequent avoidance, as far as possible, of every public appearance, naturally went far to give fresh color to these stories concerning the alleged lack of balance of her mind; and when, after the terrible death of her only son, she sought oblivion for her sorrow, and a relief from the insomnia which was one of the lasting effects of the shock, by constant travel and change of scene, people insisted that she was completely and entirely mad. Yet nothing could be further from the truth, and those who were at the court of Vienna at the time of the tragedy of Meyerling and during the sad months which followed that event, and who witnessed the fortitude with which Elizabeth bore her own sorrow and made it her duty to soothe the sorely stricken Emperor, to whom she was the first to break the news of the horrible affair, can bear eloquent testimony to the fact that no one in the world was less deserving of the accusation of being crazy or even mentally unbalanced than the kind-hearted, charitable, and altogether blameless Empress of Austria.

EX-ATTACHÉ.

THE "NEW YORK" AT SANTIAGO.

THE WEEKLY desires to add a few words to the description of the naval battle of Santiago (published, with a chart, in the issue of September 3), from which credit to the flag-ship New York was omitted. It is always difficult, in preparing a report of this kind so soon after the actual occurrence of events, to escape error, and it is equally gratifying to be able to rectify any errors that may have been committed as soon as they may be pointed out. The ship's company of the New York feel justly aggrieved because their ship was left out of account in the chart published by the WEEKLY. This omission is especially disturbing as it is known that the captain of the Cristóbal Colon gave as his reason, to the Italian naval attaché, for running his ship ashore that the New York was coming up so fast as to make this action imperative, the New York running at 17 knots and the Colon at 13.7 knots. In the text of the article it was stated that the New York had gone to Siboney on the morning of July 3. The flag-ship started for Siboney, but, upon noticing heavy smoke rising above the entrance to Santiago Harbor, put about at 9.37 A.M., about a mile and a half west of Siboney. By 10.40 A.M. (or an hour later) the New York had passed the mouth of the harbor, and was half-way between Morro and the point where the Oquendo and Teresa were beached some five or ten minutes later.

She passed the burning wrecks at 10.55 A.M., and was then rapidly overhauling the Vizcaya. The latter turned in toward the shore at 11.15, crossing the New York's bows not more than a mile or a mile and a half distant—so close, in fact, that the pursuers could easily see the Spanish crew without the use of glasses. When the Vizcaya struck the reef, she was just forward of the New York's starboard beam. The flag-ship left the Iowa to look after the wreck, and kept on after the Colon, and at 11.35 heard the explosion of the Vizcaya's magazines, the Vizcaya at that moment bearing on the New York's starboard quarter, with the Iowa abeam. The New York, therefore, at the time the Colon went ashore (at 11.45), was just about where the Colon is shown on the chart at 6, and the actual position of the Colon should be marked considerably further west on the chart. The New York was unquestionably in the chase, and was one of the most important factors in the result.

The surrender of the Colon was principally due to the fire of the 13-inch guns of the Oregon, which ship has not received all the credit due her for her splendid conduct in this affair. The Brooklyn, on the contrary, has received much more than her deserts in popular but not in professional estimation. She was so far out at sea during the chase that the distance between her and the Colon was five miles, so that her 8-inch shots could not reach the Spanish ship. Indeed, the only shots that carried to the Colon were the 13-inch shots of the Oregon. The New York throughout the chase was the nearest of all the American vessels to the shore, and received the fire of the Spanish batteries in passing them.

WILFORD WOODRUFF.

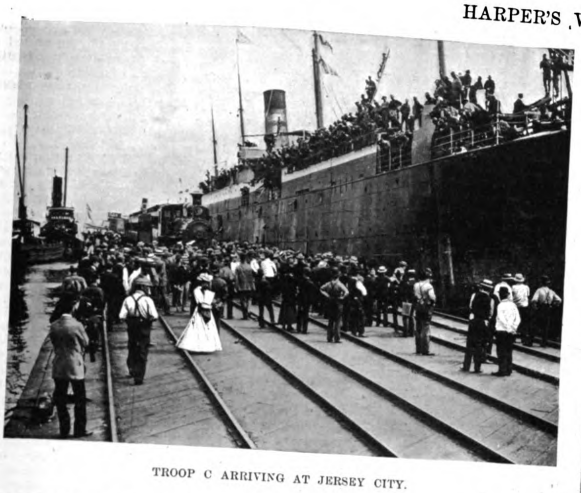
WILFORD WOODRUFF, fourth President of the Mormon Church, who died in San Francisco September 2, from kidney troubles and old age, was born in Farmington, Hartford County, Connecticut, March 1, 1807. His ancestors had lived in that section for many generations. In his first years of manhood he disagreed with his family on religious matters, holding that the Churches of the time lacked true spirituality. He and his brother Azmon were in Oswego, New York, in 1833, and heard the preaching of two Mormon elders. Both were converted by a single sermon.



Wilford was sent to Kirtland, Ohio, where he became a favorite of the so-called prophet Joseph Smith. His time, until 1843, was taken up almost entirely with his travels to preach the new gospel. He travelled all through the United States and in many European countries. In England, in 1839, he directed a large force of missionaries, and his success so aroused the clergy that a petition against the Mormons was sent to Parliament. He was one of the leaders in the movement of the Mormons to Salt Lake after the shooting of the prophet Joseph Smith by an Illinois mob in 1844.

He became President of the Church in 1887, succeeding John Taylor, who had followed Brigham Young. Mr. Taylor died while eluding arrest for polygamy, and Mr. Woodruff was selected in secret, and for many months did not show himself in public.

Under his administration have occurred most of the events which have brought the Mormon Church into consonance with American ideas. The United States confiscated hundreds of thousands of dollars worth of church property soon after he came into office, and after this blow, and after the penitentiary had been filled with polygamists, and all the Church leaders had been driven into hiding, the pressure became so great that, on September 24, 1890, he issued a manifesto counselling the abandonment of polygamy.

This manifesto ended the fight on religious lines which had waged bitterly in Utah. Effective opposition to Statehood ended when he and the other members of the Mormon First Presidency declared soon after that "the Church will not assert any right to control the political action of its members." It is a matter of record in Utah, however, that this pledge has not been kept since Statehood was

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google
Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE

TROOP C ARRIVING AT JERSEY CITY.

TAKING THE SICK ASHORE

THE HOME-COMING OF NEW YORK'S CAVALRY.

SCENES ATTENDING THE ARRIVAL OF THE "MISSISSIPPI" WITH TROOPS A AND C.—DRAWINGS BY MAX F. KLEPPER.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google granted. President Woodruff's last sermon called for union of Mormons on political lines.

President Woodruff was never an ardent polygamist, contenting himself with four wives. He had a very large family, and his favorite son, Owen A. Woodruff, has been made a member of the twelve apostles in the Church.

THE DESTRUCTION OF NEW WESTMINSTER.

In the destruction of New Westminster, by fire, on the afternoon of September 11, British Columbia loses its oldest and one of its most important towns. That it had dropped far behind of late was due to the modern changes in methods of commerce and transportation following the introduction of railways and ocean steamships. New Westminster occupied a pleasant forest-bordered slope upon the north bank of the Fraser River, some fifteen miles from its mouth, which has the form of a delta broken by level, treeless, and exceedingly fertile islands. This site was chosen in 1850, when the Hudson Bay Company resigned control and that region became a British colony for a fortified camp; but the discovery of gold on the upper waters of the Fraser in 1858 gave soldiers and citizens something else to think about, and New Westminster rose like a mushroom to be the port of entry to the new diggings, whose story is one of the most romantic chapters in the wild history of "El Dorado." One of the substantial results was to leave New Westminster a flourishing town, and the capital of the new colony of British Columbia, which the gold-hunters and boomers had erected independent of Vancouver; but when the mines no longer yielded fortunes to the wayfarer and were largely abandoned, the mainland colony reunited with Vancouver Island, and its capital returned to Victoria, except some branch offices, like that of the crown lands and forests, which remained to show visitors with what stately and elegant leisure the Queen's business could be conducted.

The greatest resource of this struggling little city has been the canning of salmon. The blue-back and other salmon annually ascend the Fraser to spawn in enormous numbers. There are now more than a dozen canneries at or near the city, which turn out nearly half a million cases of cans a year, and pay out some $500,000 in wages annually. The population of New Westminster approached eight thousand.

The whole centre of the city was destroyed by the conflagration, which began upon the wharves, and swept away saw-mills, lumber-yards, shipping, railway stations, business streets, and residences, until over three hundred buildings had been laid in ashes. A very high wind was blowing, the water-supply was deficient, and nothing perhaps would have been saved had not help come from Vancouver. So much of this loss is of that inestimable kind which consisted in old associations and religious and educational advantages that it is doubtful whether the town can ever fully recover from this final blow to an existence which has already outlived many hopes and survived many reverses.

IN FRONT OF MANILA.

[Special Correspondence of "Harper's Weekly."]

Headquarters of General Greene,
Camp Dewey, Tambo, August 6, 1898.

All the troops already landed have had their baptism of fire except the Astor Battery, which is eating its heart out here in camp. Not being armed with rifles, the men cannot be used as infantry, and as there is no place possible for the guns in the intrenchments at the front, they cannot move a wheel. The affair on Sunday night last, which, I am sure, has been much exaggerated by cable, did not assume the proportions of a battle, but might be called a brisk engagement. The force of the enemy has been variously estimated from two to four thousand; and our troops, including the supports, counted probably less than a thousand, all told. The losses in the Tenth Pennsylvania were ten per cent. of their number, and this large proportion was due to their exposed position in the rice-swamp to the right of our short intrenched line. A great many of the other losses occurred on the way from the post of supports to the firing-line, for there is a danger-zone of several hundred yards between our picket-line and the intrenchments. The situation at the front, briefly described, is this: Our troops have intrenched themselves from the sea-shore to a point beyond the Pasai road, a distance of 1460 yards. Most of this line is through thickets of bamboo and other tropical growth, and it is all on low marshy ground. The intrenchments are not continuous, but, with the exception of the part between the sea-shore and the Calle Real, a distance of about 300 yards, they are detached rifle-pits, and have been built since Sunday night. Near the sea-shore the trenches are 1300 yards from the formidable sand-bag batteries of the enemy, and on the extreme right they come within 250 yards of a strong timber block-house, which bears the number 14 in plain figures. The Spanish rifle-pits near the sea-shore have apparently been abandoned; but from the Calle Real, which is the main thoroughfare from Manila to Cavité, and runs near the sea eastward to block-house No. 14, their intrenchments are very numerous, and irritatingly near our lines. We have thus gone on steadily occupying a position considerably in advance of the insurgents, who have retired from the position on the left, but now find themselves on the right, between our rifle-pits in front and our picket-line and supports in the rear. There has been no unpleasantness about this occupation thus far, but the insurgents are a source of considerable annoyance and trouble, for force has to be used to prevent them from firing from our trenches when the line is perfectly quiet. Their idea of fighting seems to be to blaze away into the landscape and make as much noise as possible. To-day, as I write, I can recognize the dull sound of the Napoleonic bronze six-inch gun they have up close in the rear of our trenches, near the Pasai road, the highway parallel to the Calle Real, and only a few hundred yards east of it. This gun is mounted on a limber-carriage with small wheels, and bears the date 1803, and also the date when a Krupp breech was put on, 1874. Every time they fire this, the Spaniards reply, and as they have the range of our earth-works perfectly, their shells often cause considerable injury. Three men of the Twenty-third regulars were killed in that way last night and seven wounded. Between our lines and the suburbs of Malate and Cingalon, south of which the Spanish positions are the strongest, are impassable rice-swamps, intersected by the two above-mentioned roads leading into Manila, and the great swamps extend eastward as far as the neighborhood of the Pasig River. The roads are simply canals of mud, quite impracticable for any vehicles except the light two-wheeled native carts and the buffalo-sleds.

A severe southwesterly monsoon has been blowing for a week, and it has been impossible to land here without great danger in swamping. On Wednesday five cascos, or native lighters, loaded with troops of the Fourteenth and Twenty-third regulars, were towed over from Cavité. The method adopted in landing these cascos is to throw out an anchor and let them drag it as they drift through the surf, thus keeping the head on to the sea. But on Wednesday afternoon the surf was so heavy that two of the cascos broke from their anchor and drifted broadside on to the beach. The first one was wrecked and smashed to pieces in a few moments, but the second struck in a deeper place and did not break up. As they drifted into the surf many of the men were seen to strip and stow their clothes in their knapsacks, preparatory to swimming. The moment the first lighter struck, the men swarmed into the water and waded ashore with the water up to their armpits—sometimes dashing over their heads. A bandsman, carrying his great silver-plated tuba, was the first to land, and as he came through the surf, sometimes completely buried in a mass of tumbling white water, the great tuba, carried on his raised arms, flashed in the sun like the armor of some strange sea-god. Hundreds of natives gathered on the beach to see the landing, and to sell fruit and tobacco to the new-comers. For an hour or two the scene rivalled that of the famous taking of Lung Tung Pen. Great stalwart soldiers, clothed only in a knapsack, stalked through the whole camp to find their places away down the line; others, having lost their clothes, and with their accoutrements hanging on the bamboo to dry in the strong wind, wandered about as complacently as if they were in full dress; and all the while the natives—men, women, and children—in apparent unconsciousness of the white nudity of the soldiers, carried on a brisk trade with such of the men as could find their money. Fortunately no one was seriously hurt in this landing, although several were nearly drowned.

From this brief résumé of the situation here it will be seen that our position is not altogether satisfactory. We are losing valuable lives every day, and simply holding the lines. Of course, it was necessary to occupy the front positions, because, in case we go into Manila by this road, which is apparently the only one we can take, it is absolutely necessary to be ahead of the insurgents, to stop plunder and outrage. We are now waiting for the moment to arrive when the navy shall co-operate with the army, and in one decisive blow bring about the reduction of the town. When that moment will be I do not venture to prognosticate; certainly not while a monsoon is blowing. The camp oracle declares it will not come until the Monadnock arrives. He made the same prophecy before the Monterey reached us, which she did on Thursday. I have always been of the opinion that the town would be surrendered as soon as the army made such a display in force that the inhabitants would be confident of protection against the insurgents. The troops of the third expedition, which arrived on Sunday, are landing here as fast as the weather will permit, and in a few days the bulk of the army will be in this camp.

No one who has not experienced the weather we have been having lately can form any idea of the discomforts of camp life in the almost continuous downpour which has been going on for the last week. Every article of clothing is drenched, and the unfortunates—and there are many of them—who have but one suit of clothes, and that a canvas one, have not known what it is to be dry for days. Boots and shoes are always wet. Every morning they are covered with blue mould, inside and out, and if one tries to clean and oil them they are as bad again in five minutes. I saw a parade of the Nebraska regiment last night in the company streets. A large proportion of the men were in their under-clothes, and scarcely one had a complete uniform. All the troops look as if they had been through a six months' active campaign, and the camp looks like a lacustrine village. But there is almost no illness as yet among the men, and their spirits are exuberant. General Greene is the busiest man in camp, as may be imagined, for in addition to the military operations at the front, the difficulties about supplies, about the landing of troops, and the transportation increase daily, and very much add to the labors of the one upon whom the whole responsibility rests. The example of the general's unflagging energy is invaluable and contagious, and it is scarcely necessary to say that the troops have unbounded confidence in him. Thus far all the active work in the field has been done by the troops in General Greene's brigade, and they have proved themselves most efficient soldiers in every respect.

F. D. Millet.

OUR TROOPS IN THE PHILIPPINES.

[Special Correspondence of "Harper's Weekly."]

Camp Dewey, August 7, 1898.

The Monterey, black and ugly, steamed into Manila Bay on Thursday, August 4, and dropped anchor opposite Cavité. With her coming a new chapter opens in the story of the siege of Manila. Many weary days has the admiral watched for the arrival of the Monitor, for with her and the Monadnock, following closely in her wake, he has nothing to fear from the Spanish 10-inch guns in Manila, or the interference of the big German battle-ship, which lies threateningly among the foreign fleet, barring the way to the Philippine capital. The Germans still maintain their hostile attitude towards us, although, since the energetic action of Admiral Dewey towards them, they have shown a wholesome respect for our blockade regulations. An American who came down on a German transport, and was transferred to the German flag-ship, reports that the German officers told him Admiral Diederich would not allow the American fleet to bombard Manila. How much of this may be put down to a desire to brag it is impossible to say; but one thing is certain—that Admiral Dewey would not have delayed after the arrival of the second expedition for the coming of the Monterey unless he had more to cope with than Spanish guns.

General Merritt, with the third expedition, arrived here on Monday, July 25, and the troops have not yet all been landed, on account of the rough weather in the bay, which makes landing on the beach at Camp Dewey extremely difficult. Since July 29 a regiment of our troops has each day been marched up two miles from camp towards Manila, and placed in trenches dug just ahead of the insurgent lines. To make this occupation it was necessary to order the insurgents to leave this portion of their works, which extend completely around Manila. The soldiers of Aguinaldo willingly gave up the position to our men, and now only act as scouts in this region, while still maintaining the rest of their siege-works.

On one side of the Manila road running down to the beach our trenches were built under fire from the Spanish lines during the night. Here four guns from the Utah batteries A and B have been placed in gun-pits, with embrasures in the six-foot earth-works. On the other side of the road inland our rifle-pits are not continuously connected. On account of the swampiness of the ground and the dense growth of bamboo, which obstructs advance on every side, our men in twos and threes lie behind low heaps of earth. The soldiers often lie half in the water, and wholly exposed to the drenching showers, which beat down furiously every half-hour. Our lines extend in this way about two miles inland, to where a swampy river separates our works from the beginning of the insurgent rifle-pits. At no point along this line of ours can one see more than a thousand yards ahead, and in most places fifty feet is the limit of vision. Considering every detail of rain, swamp, and thicket, one could not well imagine a more nasty country for an active campaign; and when you add to these difficulties the fact that the Spaniards have a disagreeable habit of fighting exclusively at night, one wonders why our men were shoved forward into these trenches before we were ready to attack the city by sea and land, instead of allowing insurgents and Spaniards to waste men and ammunition in nightly squabbles. At any rate, since our men have occupied these earth-works we have lost seventeen killed and thirty-eight wounded, without our advancing or attempting to advance an inch. Indeed, the orders to our men have been not to load their rifles unless they were actually attacked by an advancing force of Spaniards. It is not to be expected that two hostile forces can lie at distances ranging from two hundred to fifteen hundred yards without doing some fighting. Every night the Spaniards have attacked our position, small detachments advancing against us through the swamps and brush. On August 2 I spent the night in the trenches, and saw the peculiar method of warfare used by the Spaniards. During the day no shooting had been done. Our pickets had been relieved regularly without drawing fire from the enemy, except for an occasional sharp-shooter, who got into the swampy places between our rifle-pits, and, up to his waist in water, fired occasionally from the thickets. As night closed in absolute quiet reigned. About nine-thirty suddenly a perfect shower of bullets came pelting down across our trenches. The whole Spanish line seemed to flame up as if lightning were playing up and down their trenches. Their five and three inch guns pounded our earth-works, and sent shrapnel bursting above our heads. Their firing was extremely accurate, for in the morning I discovered that the top of our earth-work was furrowed with their bullets. Indeed, it is a mistake to think that Spanish marksmanship on land is bad. Their shells struck with great accuracy, especially about our guns, and on the night of August 1 one of their shells actually exploded on a gun of Battery B, and carried away the sights, without, however, doing other damage.

After the first fusillade small groups of Spaniards left the protection of their earth-works and came forward in skirmishing order. On the right of our line the bamboo is so thick that only the flash of their rifles told of their presence; but near the shore, where the ground is more open, indistinct forms could be seen slipping forward, and stopping from time to time to shoot. Apparently their object was to cut our line in two at its weakest point, flank us, and, if possible, drive half our men into the sea, but they were driven off by a well-directed and sustained fire from our men. After about an hour the Spaniards withdrew, and left us in peace for the rest of the night.

One thing this desultory fighting proves—that our volunteers, after a very short time, are going to develop into splendid soldiers. They were as cool as veterans throughout the fight, and their only fault was a tendency to burn cartridges too rapidly. It is a very trying ordeal to put raw recruits to meet a night attack in a thickly wooded country of this sort. The Utah battery especially distinguished itself; they worked their guns, more exposed to shot and shell than any of the other soldiers, as if they were at target practice.

Our relations from day to day are becoming more strained with the insurgents and Aguinaldo. We forget that they drove the Spaniards from Cavité to their present intrenched position, thus saving us a long-continued fight through the jungle. We are now the masters, and are making our power felt, while we rather look down on the Philippine Indian who used to be our ally. Only day before yesterday we unceremoniously seized Aguinaldo's telegraph line; but on his vigorous protest, and an implied threat that continued action of this kind would be likely to turn the native population against us, gave up his telegraph line, and did what we ought to have done from the first—built one of our own. However much the bad feeling between American and insurgent may grow, one thing is certain, that to turn these islands over to Spain again would be criminal. We entered into the war to deliver Cuba from oppressive Spanish rule. By our actions here we encouraged the Filipinos with hopes of a free country, and made it possible for them to rise and force the Spaniards into Manila, leaving the rest of Luzon Island completely under their control. Having accepted Philippine aid against the Spaniards in the hour of our need, then to turn them over to Spain again, that she might this time with undivided resources throw her Cuban army into these islands, would be a dastardly act. English merchants assure me that the result would be a wholesale massacre of the natives. Any action on our part now seems preferable. Give them their liberty and guarantee it to them. Give them to Japan, England, even to Germany, or, as a last resort, keep them ourselves, rather than allow Spanish dominion, which has been worse here than in Cuba, to re-establish itself.

J. F. Bass.

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google
Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE

THIS BUSY WORLD

LOST races continue to turn up, either actually by the discovery of living representatives, or historically by disclosure of their records. A London correspondent of the New York Sun told, under date of August 27, of a traveller, freshly returned from East Central Africa, who reports the discovery of astonishing remains of a former civilization on the great Inyanga plateau—the roof of that region, a vast plain 7500 feet above the sea. Here are remains of forts, strongholds, lookouts, and prodigious numbers of stone retaining walls on the hill-sides, some of them forty miles long, with relics of an elaborate system of irrigation, indicating a great population and highly intelligent husbandry.

More notable still is the discovery, briefly recited in a recent issue of the New York Herald, of surviving descendants of the aborigines of Mexico in the heart of the wild Sierra Madre Mountains. The story is that Dr. Ales Hrdlicka, physician and anthropologist, of New York, spent three months of the present year—from April to July—in northern Mexico, in the service of the American Museum of Natural History, and penetrated with much difficulty far up into the Sierra Madres, where he found people of a race long believed be to extinct. He staid with them, formed agreeable relations with them, and found them cheerful and hospitable, and willing to be studied. He studied both the living and the dead, digging up bones, measuring skulls and skeletons, and fetching home a satisfactory line of skeletons and mummies for future reference. Dr. Hrdlicka is represented as believing that these people are pure-blooded representatives of the prehistoric races which left such astonishing remains in Mexico and Central America. As reported in the Herald, he speaks highly of their mental capacity, and says they are handsome people, with chocolate-colored (not copper-colored) skins, with skulls of a shape different from and better than those of the American Indians, and with nothing in them of Indian cruelty. If these people prove to be really of the races which formerly flourished from Peru northward to Mexico, their discovery is a matter of great moment to scientists, and of very lively interest to the general public.

Still another extraordinary traveller's tale, which comes by way of London, records the presence, in that centre, of M. Louis de Rougemont, a Swiss, who has been absent from civilization, much against his will, for the last thirty-five years. The outlines of his story, as set forth by the Westminster Gazette, reads like a tale by Mr. H. G. Wells, and makes Robinson Crusoe seem an every-day story by comparison. He went cruising after pearls in the early sixties in the South Seas, got together a great treasure, and was overtaken by a storm, which swept away all his accomplices, and left him alone on his ship. Then he was cast away on a sand spit in the Timor Sea, where, after a long time, he was joined by four negroes, who were blown ashore. The five built a boat and escaped to Australia, and there Rougemont lived twenty-eight years, undergoing experiences and adventures the like of which, it is positively averred, have never before been narrated, and witnessing many curious and highly interesting things, about which anthropologists and others are much excited. The Westminster Gazette represents this adventurer to be the sensation of the London hour. Doubtless it is due to the pressure of other news that we have not been more fully regaled with particulars about him.

The prospect of the planting of a colony of Germans in Syria is interesting. Syria has an area of about 146,000 square miles, and a population of 2,700,000, which leaves room for many immigrants. Two-thirds of the present population are Mohammedan. What the country seems to need most is roads, almost all the transportation being now done on the backs of mules and camels. Wheat and other grains can be raised to advantage in Syria, but even the poor old broken-down Erie Canal can beat camels as a means of getting grain to market, and until Syria has a full set of parallel competing railroads it is not likely to raise more grain than is needed for local consumption. It trades, however, in many other things—silk, olive oil, indigo, gums, dates, relics, and the like, and ought to do a good business in entertaining tourists. Emperor William of Germany expects to go to Palestine this fall to dedicate the German church at Jerusalem. No one who knows him doubts that he will wear spurs at the dedication. We are told that he hopes to regain for the Roman Catholics the possession of the chamber of the last supper.

Judge Thomas M. Cooley, who died at his home at Ann Arbor, Michigan, on September 12, was one of the best and most useful men of his generation, and was the great authority of his time on those branches of the law which touch upon constitutional construction. He was the sort of successful man that is particularly dear to the American heart, for he was a farmer's son who won education in the teeth of adverse circumstances, won professional success because his merits were so great that it could not escape him, and used his great powers both indirectly and directly in the public service.

He was born on a farm near Attica, in western New York, in 1824, studied law for a year in a lawyer's office in Palmyra, and in 1843 moved to Michigan and settled on a farm near Adrian. He kept on with his law studies in the intervals of farming, and was admitted to the bar in 1845. For two years he helped out an infant law practice at Tecumseh, Michigan, by editing a newspaper, and in 1847 settled in Adrian. In the course of ten years he made a reputation as a lawyer, and in 1847 was elected to the Legislature. The next year he was appointed reporter to the Supreme Court. In 1859 he became a professor in the law department of the University of Michigan at Ann Arbor, and began a connection with the university which lasted for nearly thirty years. In 1864 he was elected a judge of the Supreme Court, and continued on the bench in Michigan until 1885. In 1887 he was appointed receiver of the Wabash Railroad, a labor which he resigned at the solicitation of President Cleveland to become a member of the Inter-State Commerce Commission. He was chosen chairman of the commission, but after four years of laborious service his health broke down, and in 1891 he retired from active life. It will be seen that the best years of his life were spent in the public service, as a teacher of law, as a judge, and as an inter-State commerce commissioner. His work as a judge was very valuable, but perhaps his greatest service was rendered as a writer of law-books. His book on Constitutional Limitations and his hand-book on Constitutional Law are regarded by competent authority as "the chief substantial addition to American constitutional law made in our time."

Mr. Booker T. Washington, of the Tuskegee Institute, at Tuskegee, Alabama, believes that the new responsibilities which we have incurred in Cuba and Puerto Rico include an obligation to promote the education of the negroes of those islands. Both in Cuba and in Puerto Rico the negroes form half of the population. No one disputes that they need training—intellectual, industrial, religious—such as is given at Hampton and Tuskegee. In the present state of Cuba industrial education is especially necessary. By way of making a beginning Mr. Washington proposes to bring to this country a few promising young Cuban negro men and women and train them at Tuskegee, so that they can go back and begin the work of industrial training on the island. To bring them to Tuskegee and teach them will cost $150 apiece for each year's instruction. Mr. Washington wants to hear from persons who are disposed to help in defraying the costs of this work.

An illustration of the difference between the attitude of European dignitaries to American artists in Europe and that of their own government toward them is afforded by the information lately received that the Prince-Regent of Bavaria has conferred upon our fellow-countryman Edwin Lord Weeks the gold cross of officer of the order of St. Michael. Uncle Sam's disposition, as interpreted by the statesmen who make his tariffs, seems to be to make it as hard as possible for the American artist to develop his talent. In Europe, on the contrary, the sentiment of the authorities seems to be that a man who can paint good pictures should be encouraged to do so, even though he happen to be an American. So long as American artists continue to be rewarded abroad and discouraged at home it need not surprise any one if they find the atmosphere of Europe more congenial than ours.

We shall all be interested to learn what sort of a reception Admiral Cervera meets with at home, and what sort of justice he gets from his own countrymen. So far as we know, he sailed out of Santiago Harbor under direct orders from his superiors in authority, though against his personal judgment. The facts of his situation seem to be clear and easily demonstrated, but whether the present temper of the Cortes is such as to permit it to recognize facts when they are presented is a question.

The episode of the admiral's experiences in this country is without precedent or counterpart. There never was a hero who was more polite. The kind old man must be relieved that for the present he has no more acknowledgments to make and no more letters of thanks to compose.

The Tree-Planting Association found in the consequences of the extreme heat that wound up our summer a useful object-lesson of the need of shade trees in the streets of New York. An appeal which they have issued asserts that the cooling effects of trees in cities are recognized both by scientists and laymen, and calls upon all owners of city property, but especially owners of tenement-house property, to plant shade trees in front of their holdings. The association insists that shade from trees can be obtained in a few years if the right sort of trees are planted, and it offers to send free to all inquirers, from its office at 64 White Street, full information as to what trees are most suitable, where to get them, and what it costs to have them set out. The fall is the time to plant trees, so that persons who are willing to experiment according to the Tree-Planting Association's suggestions should make their arrangements at once. New York streets have certainly been hot enough this summer to warrant attention to any reasonable means of making them cooler. Moreover, if trees can be made to grow in the streets of New York they will grow in the streets of any city, and the example of their usefulness here will have widespread effects.

We hear a great deal about the prospects of prosperity. Everybody who ought to know seems to believe it is coming now with somewhat of a bang. Mr. George J. Gould, for example, was quoted the other day as saying, on his return from Europe, that everything he had heard since he got home convinced him "that we are on the eve of an era of prosperity perhaps unprecedented in our history." Those are good words. We are all in the attitude of the Sunday-school children when the teacher called for silence that they could hear a pin drop, and the little boy who was holding his breath shrieked, "Let her drop!" We are exceedingly attentive to promises of prosperity. Let it come! We won't let it get away. Mr. Gould points out that the great harvest will make work for the railroads, that that will make railroad securities "boom," and that all sound stocks will be the better for it. That is first rate for the folks who have the securities and the sound stocks; but the rest of us also want a lift, both those of us who have no railroad securities and those who own stocks that are not sound. No prosperity will be accepted as unprecedented and satisfactory which does not make the unsound stocks sound. The sound stocks are well enough as it is; we get a blast of prosperity that will make bad securities good, then we shall really begin to take some comfort. Even more than that we need such an improvement as will bring work to the unwillingly idle, and put money into pockets that can only be replenished by daily labor. Meanwhile our five years' experience in sailing close to the wind is serving us in pretty good stead, and it may be that if we continue to be kept in practice we shall learn presently how to scrape a profit even out of hard times. Perhaps, after all, that very accomplishment has more to do with bringing on good times again than even good crops.

News from the colleges begins to accumulate again. The embarrassment of Trinity College in Durham, North Carolina, over a gift of $100,000 to that institution from Washington Duke, the tobacco manufacturer, has abated. It was charged by one Clark, a Populist judge of North Carolina, that Mr. Duke's proffered gift was "blood-money, earned at the expense of the health and morals of the young men of the country by a gold bug," and it was hinted that President Kilgo accepted it with the understanding that sound-money doctrines should be taught to Trinity students. The trustees of the college, having looked into the charges of Justice Clark, have acquitted President Kilgo of any misconduct.

The University of California has lost its president, Dr. Martin Kellogg, and has acquired from Miss Cora Jane Flood a large gift of valuable property, including the Flood mansion at Menlo Park. Both incidents seem to have been somewhat unexpected, though President Kellogg's resignation was not so unlooked for but that rumor already points to Professor Edmund James, of the University of Chicago, as his probable successor.

The resignation of President Gates of Amherst, offered and accepted last June, does not take effect until the expiration of a year's leave of absence. A new president cannot be elected until the office is vacant, so the Amherst trustees have plenty of time to negotiate for a fit man. With the headships of Amherst, Brown, California, and Rochester vacant, the current demand for college presidents must be brisk. It was reported the other day that the Brown trustees wanted to engage Colonel Roosevelt, but the obvious multiplicity of the colonel's other engagements makes that rumor seem improbable.

Cornell, besides building a medical college in New York, has been considering plans for a new alumni hall and student club house at Ithaca, to be built by the alumni, at a cost of $150,000. Plans for it have been offered in competition by graduates of the Cornell College of Architecture, and the best one will take a prize of $500.

Reports from Cambridge prophesy that the new Harvard Freshman class will equal in number, if it does not exceed, the Freshman class of last year. The requirements for entrance to Harvard's Scientific School were lately raised, with satisfactory results. Changes are now proposed which will make entrance somewhat more difficult in the Academic Department. New requirements, not to be operative for at least another year, call for somewhat more Greek and Latin and mathematics, but give much greater choice as to other subjects.

College men in general, but especially Harvard men, have read with interest and pleasure of the marriage, on September 18, at Worcester, of Mr. R. C. Lehmann to Miss Alice Davis. There was a great muster of British and American boating-men at Mr. Lehmann's wedding, which must have been a very lively and joyous occasion. Mr. Lehmann seems to have finished for the present with coaching American crews, but we shall not forget him, and we are glad that he seems to have taken an effectual precaution against forgetting us.

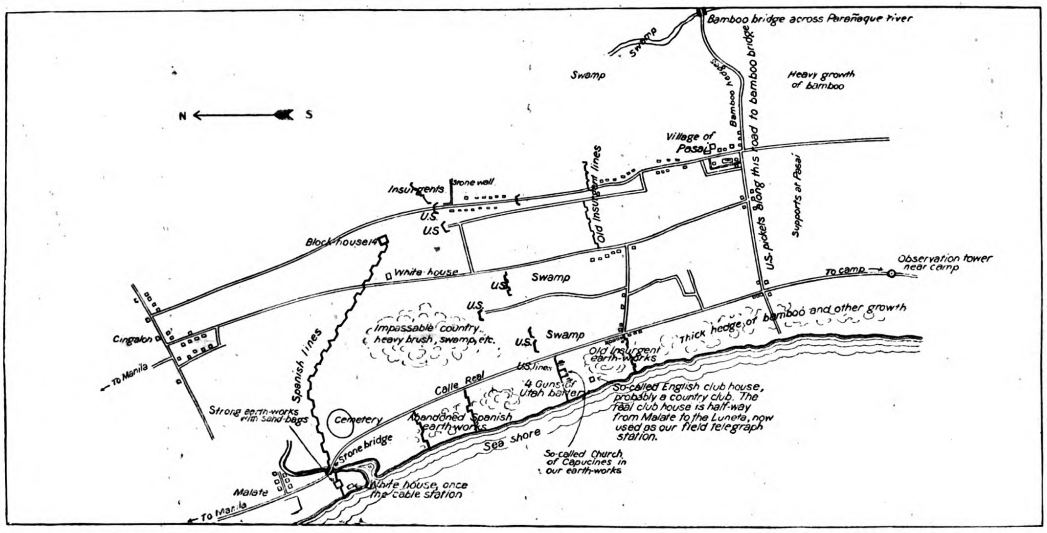
By the will of Albert A. Munger, who died on August 26, the Art Institute of Chicago has fallen heir to a collection of paintings which is reported to have cost $800,000, and to be of a present value exceeding that sum. It includes "The Bathers," by Bouguereau, and Meissonier's "Vidette," paintings which Mr. Munger greatly prized, and of which Chicago will rejoice to be the owner.

The frequent iteration of complaints about baseball as it is played by professional clubs in New York recalls the reasons which are stated to have influenced Dr. Coit to exclude that game from St. Paul's School at Concord. The story as given by graduates of St. Paul's is that Dr. Coit had no special prejudice against baseball as a sport, but that he found that his boys felt constrained to bet on baseball games, and would do it, so he finally expelled the game from his school because it involved too much gambling. Cricket was substituted for it, and being a slower and less interesting game, and one which led much less frequently to stirring contests, it answered the doctor's ends a good deal better.

The fault found with baseball in New York is analogous to that found in Concord. The game is too good a game for the men who play it. It is a very sad thought that cricket may have to be substituted for it in New York as a police measure, and because the rowdyism that seems to be incident to it here has a bad effect on public morals.

The rumor that the President wants Senator Hoar to be ambassador to Great Britain is still in use in the newspapers, as is also the report that Senator Hoar insists upon staying at home. Let us hope he won't go. He is our bulwark against the persuasive forebodings of Professor Norton, and ought to feel a sacred obligation to stick to this continent at least as diligently as Dr. Norton does. No citizen of reasonable timidity wants to be alone in these times on the same continent with Dr. Norton, Mr. Garrison, and the Evening Post. It is Senator Hoar's duty to stay by us, and sustain us by such occasional reassurances as his conscience permits.

Besides, he wouldn't like being ambassador. That office would run him painfully in debt, upset all his habits, and compel him to give up a steady job which suits him and affords him means of support. Why not send a soldier to London this time? If General Wheeler were not in Congress, and indispensable there, he would make a delightful ambassador, provided the pay was doubled. Since he can't be spared, why not send General Wilson, who, besides possessing all sorts of other qualifications, is a Republican of influence and distinction? A man who undertakes to be American ambassador to Great Britain should have some remnants of youth about him, including an unimpaired liver, a few good stomachs, a lively interest in this world and all its concerns, and a taste for sport. It is true enough that Colonel Roosevelt has all these qualifications, but he is too young, whereas General Wilson is about the right age.

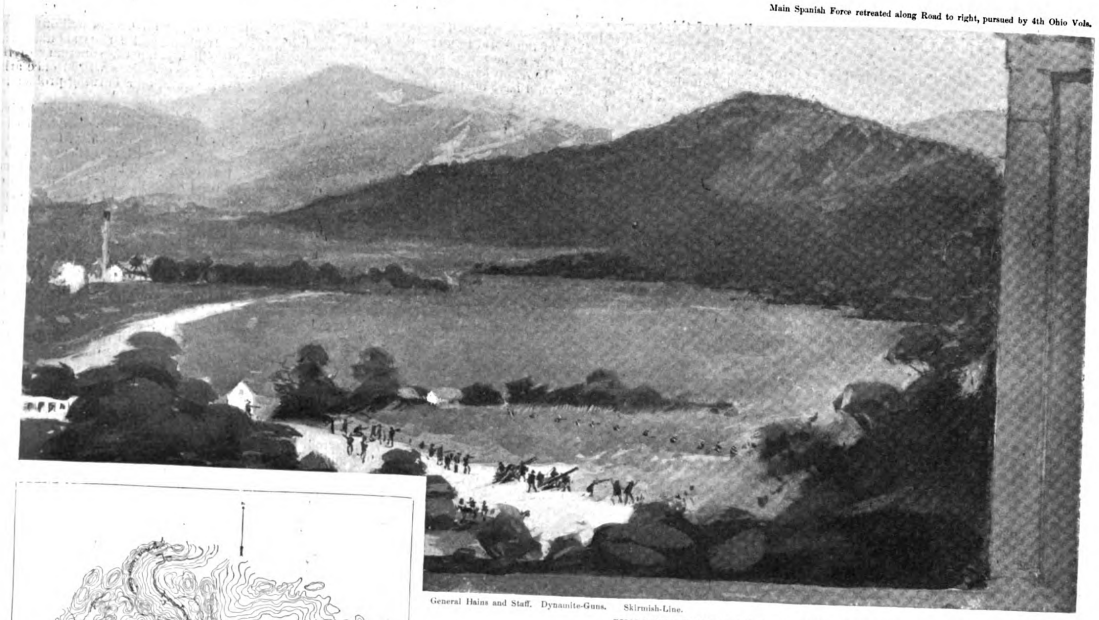


As for Secretary Long, to whom the vacant place is thought to have been last offered, it is hardly conceivable that he should care to fill it. He is too much like Senator Hoar in being cheerful and contented at home, and too well satisfied with his present sphere of usefulness to care to change.

E. S. MARTIN.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

WITH THE UTAH BATTERY THE DAY AFTER THE FIGHT—LOOKING DOWN THE TRENCH FROM NEAR THE ROAD.

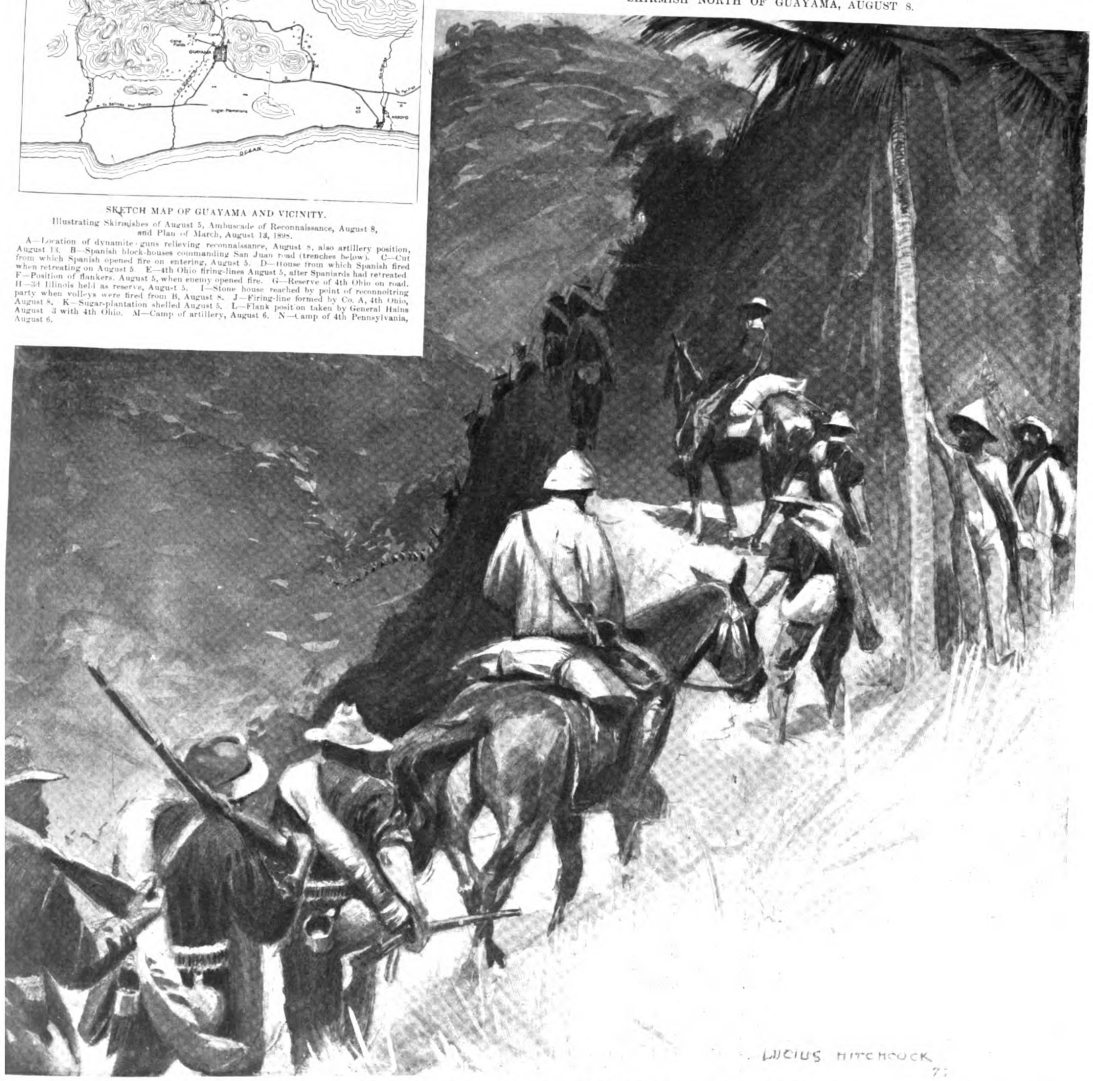


POSITIONS OF AMERICAN, SPANISH, AND INSURGENT FORCES.
FROM A SKETCH-MAP BY F. D. MILLET, SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT FOR "HARPER'S WEEKLY" IN THE PHILIPPINES.

A NIGHT BATTLE IN THE RAIN.

FIGHTING IN THE PHILIPPINES—THE ENGAGEMENT OF JULY 31, NEAR MALATE.
DRAWN FROM SKETCHES BY JOHN MCCUTCHEON, SPECIAL ARTIST WITH GENERAL MERRITT'S FORCES.—[SEE PAGE 934.]

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google



SKIRMISH NORTH OF GUAYAMA, AUGUST 8.

SKETCH MAP OF GUAYAMA AND VICINITY.

Illustrating Skirmishes of August 5, Ambuscade of Reconnaissance, August 8, and Plan of March, August 13, 1898.

A—Location of dynamite-guns relieving reconnaissance, August 8, also artillery position, August 13. B—Spanish block-houses commanding San Juan road (trenches below). C—Cut from which Spanish opened fire on entering, August 5. D—House from which Spanish fired when retreating on August 5. E—4th Ohio firing-lines August 5, after Spaniards had retreated. F—Position of flankers, August 5, when enemy opened fire. G—Reserve of 4th Ohio on road. H—3d Illinois held as reserve, August 5. I—Stone house reached by point of reconnoitring party when volleys were fired from B, August 8. J—Firing-line formed by Co. A, 4th Ohio, August 8. K—Sugar-plantation shelled August 5. L—Flank position taken by General Hains August 3 with 4th Ohio. M—Camp of artillery, August 6. N—Camp of 4th Pennsylvania, August 6.

THE ADVANCE TO SAN JUAN—GENERAL HAINS'S FLANK MOVEMENT, AUGUST 13—SCENE NEAR THE POINT WHERE THE GENERAL RECEIVED THE MESSAGE ANNOUNCING THE CESSATION OF HOSTILITIES.

WITH OUR TROOPS IN PUERTO RICO.

DRAWN BY LUCIUS HITCHCOCK, FROM SKETCHES BY LIEUT. J. M. A. DARRACH, U.S.A., AND T. DART WALKER, SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT FOR "HARPER'S WEEKLY" WITH GENERAL MILES'S FORCES.—[SEE PAGE 942.]

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

LONDON.

September 3, 1898.

THE quasi-papal encyclical of the young Tsar in favor of international disarmament fills the air, and although the public interest in the impending battle at Omdurman is a serious rival, the portents indicate that the Tsar's proposals to the powers will be followed by consequences of world-wide importance, though not perhaps those which were anticipated by the impulsive and peace-loving young Emperor. The bishops, the clergy, the labor leaders, peace-society secretaries, and the sentimentalists are beside themselves with joy at the noble words of the manifesto. If only words were things, chortling would not be premature. Most of the people whose opinions carry weight are still out of town, but in the city, in country houses and elsewhere, the general, though perhaps not the final, opinion of thoughtful and responsible people on this subject is not that of the bishops and clergy. The first and most obvious comment on the proposal for a diminution of national armaments is that Russia should begin. She has recently emerged from a series of international transactions any one of which would have led to war in former times, and justifies war to-day. She is still busily engaged in enterprises designed to injure and destroy the trade which is the life-blood of the English-speaking nations. In Abyssinia at the present time Russian emissaries are doing their utmost to excite the Emperor Menelek against English civilization on the Upper Nile. The withdrawal of the Russian mission from Abyssinia, the cessation of Russian intrigue in Persia, the retirement of Russian troops from the Pamirs, the suspension of the construction of the strategical line of railway now within eighty miles of Herat, and the substitution of respect for solemn international compacts, such as the Treaty of Tien-tsin, would be better evidence of the sincerity of the Russian government than the use of dovelike language. From the utterances of the clerical and visionary representatives of English public opinion it might be inferred that we were within measurable distance of the Second Advent. As a matter of fact, Englishmen smart under the lessons they have recently received from Russia. Her disinterested and steadfast repudiation of the sacred word of the Tsar, her contempt for international engagements and for the rights of other nations, are too recent to inspire confidence in John Bull's aged bosom. When Lord Salisbury endeavored to prevent dangerous complications in China by means of a self-denying ordinance to govern both Russia and England, the Slavs scornfully refused to adopt the only policy that automatically ensured peace. M. de Giers treated Lord Rosebery's protest against the fortification of Batoum with contemptuous silence. M. Ladygensky pledged the sacred word of the Tsar that under no circumstances would the Russian Empire directly or indirectly interfere with the internal affairs of Korea. The presence of M. Pavloff in that interesting peninsula illuminates with fierce light the filmy texture of a Russian promise. Russia has always posed as the advocate of humanity, and the strange emotionalism of the Slav nature constantly lends itself to enthusiastic support of misty generalities which Russians are not prepared to apply to their own persons and interests.

There is no reason to suppose that the young Tsar is insincere in his impulsive appeal to the powers to forget the lessons of Russian deeds and accept the counsels of Russian words. History suggests caution. In 1874 the rules of civilized warfare were revised and rendered more stringent at the instance of the Tsar Alexander II. The message read on that occasion by Baron Jomini to the delegates at Brussels declared that the object of his Majesty "is, above everything, an object of humanity," and included such phrases as the following: "It is to be hoped that the progress of enlightenment and of manners will render wars more and more rare. . . . No government would to-day undertake it lightly. . . . War cannot be the normal state of nations. . . . It is only a painful exception. . . . The rule is pacific relations which soften the manners by uniting the interests of nations." The convention was signed. Russia's humanitarian aspirations were satisfied on paper. But a few months later she was massacring the Yomud Turcomans, the Russian commanders having instructions to spare neither age nor sex. The reason for the massacre was that the Turcomans could not raise 300,000 rubles within a fortnight. Baron Jomini's phrases did not apply to the Turcomans. Since then Russia has reduced six millions of her Jewish population to the extremity of misery and despair. As I write these lines the British government is allowing Cyprus to be used as a sanctuary and an asylum for the Russian Doukhobortsi, a sect of blameless and humane people, whose crime is that they resemble in their hatred of war the followers of the founder of Pennsylvania. The Tsar admits that the armaments of Europe are defensive, and that the outlay he stigmatizes as frightful arises from a sense of self-preservation. Where is the aggressor? What nation is the notorious cause of Europe being an armed camp? America is not the malcontent. Her army is insufficient to police her possessions beyond the sea. Her navy is unequal to the requirements of an imperial power. England is not the firebrand. The real charge against John Bull is that he is too indolent and obese to stir on his own behalf. Germany covets no territory in Europe belonging to her neighbors. To Austria war could only spell ruin. Spain has had as much fighting as she can digest for some time to come. Turkey only asks to be let alone. Italy is more intent on the demands of her creditors than on the extension of frontiers which are delimited by nature. Only two powers remain. One ruled by the Tsar "peace-maker" with an army which on a peace footing numbers over a million of men, and a navy avowedly aggressive. Without colonies, vulnerable coast-line, or over-sea trade, Russian sea power is incompatible with her professions of peace. With this navy and this army Russia not only violates treaties, but makes treaties to violate them. Russia has imposed on England the burden of her own militarism by compelling us to add tens of millions of pounds to our annual expenditure in order to provide force to repel the attacks of a power whose international conduct places her on the circumference, if not outside, of the circle of civilization. Russia has encouraged France in her dream of reconquest. Russia came to an agreement with Austria regarding the condition of the small states in the Balkan Peninsula, and broke her pledge before the ink was dry. The last public act of this peace-loving Russia was to send ship-loads of rifles and cartridges to the Montenegrins. This is the power that invites the nations of the world to abate their armaments. The fox in the fable made the same proposals to the lion and the tiger. If Æsop had survived to bring his work up to date, he would have changed his fox into a bear.

Nobody threatens Russia. She is safe in Europe behind the guns and torpedoes of Cronstadt and the Black Sea. Russia can therefore begin the game of disarmament, and the question of her sincerity will thus be put to the touch without delay. The young Emperor is an amiable and kindly man, overwhelmed with a sense of responsibility, and surrounded by a ring of astute and determined advisers who are not publicly known to have accepted the Sermon on the Mount as their practical guide in life. Lacking decision of character, and being in poor health, the Tsar is at the mercy of his advisers, who quarrel among themselves with a vigor that would do no discredit to countries blessed with constitutional systems of government. When the advice given him is good, the Tsar's policy is creditable. The advice of M. Goremykine, the Minister of the Interior, an enlightened and capable statesman, as a rule reflects credit on the sovereign and his government. When the advice received is evil, as in the case of foreign affairs, the results are evil. Count Muravieff is brilliant, but superficial. No far-sighted diplomatist could have made such a needless exhibition of Russian perfidy as Count Muravieff and his agents have done since he succeeded Prince Lobanoff. Prince Ouchtomsky, a private friend and adviser of the Tsar, and his travelling companion in India and the Far East, is a bitter Anglophobe, and, according to his own written statements, is intent on building the structure of Russian power in Asia on the ruins of England. The Tsar has chosen to accept the advice of Count Muravieff and of Prince Ouchtomsky. He will reap what he has sown. England is not at heart with Lord Salisbury. The rescript, so far as it is not the result of the Tsaritsa's good heart, is doubtless due to M. Witte's representations as to the incapacity of Russian finances to support the strain involved by Count Muravieff's foreign policy. The manifesto, therefore, however Christ-like in its language, is Machiavelian in fact; it appears at an opportune moment for Russia. The perennial famine is even worse this year than usual. The peasantry will need help. The attempt to plant a gold standard on an agricultural country already shakes the structure of Russian credit to its foundations. War with a first-class power during the next five years might easily expose the divine figure of the North with theatrical results. Its hands may be of iron and its forehead brass, but the feet are of clay. After a full meal in China a period of repose is opportune. Russia is as one who says grace over stolen mutton. The plous of all lands burn with admiration and approval of the grace. They forget the origin of the mutton. I believe the reason of this to be our indifference as a nation to the teaching of history. In Germany and America the subject is considered of the first importance. No pains are spared to make its teaching vital and interesting. In France and Switzerland it is treated with considerable respect. Children receiving elementary education at the hands of the state in other countries are taught the story of their own country, its great men, its constitution, and its relation to other powers. Not so England. From top to bottom the ignorance of history is colossal, appalling, and dangerous.

The unnatural alliance between France and Russia has received a shrewd blow. When quarrelsome nations fall out, peaceful nations breathe freely. One of the most momentous effects of the Tsar's rescript will be that if Russia fights England, it will be single-handed. Frenchmen are proverbially unwilling to "work for the King of Prussia"; and, on the other hand, Russia, with her new-born profession of peace, has no stomach for disputes not of her own making. France is ruled by her army. Rules of evidence, constitutional law, and republican theories are set aside to maintain the fiction that French generals are infallible. It is already evident that the real rulers of France are suspicious of their august ally. France is unwilling to accept her defeat by Germany and the loss of her provinces. In the hope of recovering them she has already spent since 1871 five thousand million dollars on her army. Half that sum has been left for posterity to pay. It is not, therefore, in human nature to expect that the French army, at the bidding of the amiable occupant of the Russian throne, should draw a sponge across the slate, and, for the love of his beautiful eyes, ignore all the sacrifices she has made, and start anew on the basis of definitely abandoning Alsace-Lorraine to Germany.

The more immediate effect, therefore, of the Tsar's proposals will be to disintegrate Franco-Russian solidarity, and by the year 1900, if the French are true to their historic character, the Russian Emperor is well in the running for a prize given to the most unpopular man in Paris. It is an unfortunate feature of proposals for disarmament that they are not seldom followed by a bloody war. Some good judges, whose opinions do not reach the newspapers, regard the rescript in this light.

The dramatic arrest and suicide of Colonel Henry of the French staff as the self-convicted forger of a document held by M. Cavaignac, the French Minister of War, to constitute justificatory evidence against Dreyfus, is likely to have consequences that will still further affect the Franco-Russian alliance. The persecution of the Jews in France was partly mere mimicry of Russia. The Jews of France, however, are enormously powerful. Although one-eight-hundredth of the population, one-quarter of the wealth of the country is alleged to be possessed by them. The growing anti-Semitism of Europe is perhaps more remarkable in France than in any other country, because Napoleon, early in the century, inspired by the principles of the Revolution, accorded to the Jews equality and freedom denied by other powers altogether, and by England until 1836. The resignation of General Boisdeffre, the French Chief of Staff, will be regarded by an ignorant and prejudiced public as a surrender to the Hebrew race. The passions already excited—not altogether, I am bound to say, without cause—will become more inflamed, and a repetition of the events which followed the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes is by no means impossible in the case of the Chosen People resident in France. Already fire and sword have been used against them in Algeria, if not with the connivance of, at all events without check from the authorities. If anti-Semitic riots should break out in Paris, England will become the sanctuary of the Jews of the world, and grave questions will at once arise that will make the Jewish question a burning problem.

Mr. Chamberlain's sudden departure for America gives a well-earned holiday and rest to the one statesman who, under circumstances of incredible difficulty, has upheld the name and honor of England with signal success. To-day the news comes that the French have actually evacuated Boussa, and that the British flag has been hoisted on what is, and has been during the whole of the French occupation, British territory. The quidnuncs and scribes are never weary of girding at Mr. Chamberlain for what he says and for what he leaves unsaid. The Secretary for the Colonies knows his own mind, and unless I am wholly mistaken I believe he more truly represents the spirit and the ideals of the British race than any member of Parliament in or out of office. He alone has succeeded where others have failed. Amidst circumstances of complexity and difficulty undreamt-of by those entirely outside the secret history of affairs, he has ruled the colonial empire of the Queen with a sympathy, firmness, and tact that present a vivid contrast to the methods of the Foreign Office. The organization of the two departments is eloquent of the difference between Mr. Chamberlain and Lord Salisbury. As successive American ambassadors and their attachés could tell, if they were at liberty to speak, delay, superciliousness, incivility, and red tape are the most prominent characteristics of the men of family who run the diplomatic machine. Letters remain unanswered, interviews are postponed until too late to be of any service, and ignorance is power in the corridors of the Foreign Office.

In the Colonial Office, promptness, vigor, and courtesy are met with by every one. No pains are spared in getting at the facts. Information is sought from unofficial sources. Business methods pervade the establishment. Letters receive prompt reply. What Mr. Chamberlain has done with the colonies he is capable of doing with foreign countries. He is not to be bluffed. When he sups with any one he is capable of using the long spoon, when his society requires that implement, and he may be relied upon to use it effectively. But there is no one in public affairs who has a more profound conviction as to the desirability of peace than Mr. Chamberlain himself. Loyal to his colleagues, not one word has escaped him which would indicate dissatisfaction with the management of public affairs outside his own department. He is a reserve force to be reckoned with, and has enhanced a reputation which now overshadows the rest of the ministry. He is a personality, and the country is wearied of gelatinous treachery to imperial interests.

Colonel Hay's departure from England cannot be allowed to pass without comment. He leaves us to help his country in facing questions more intricate and complex than those of war. With Colonel Hay as Secretary of State, America will be able to face them with confidence and courage, and with the certainty that the high standard by which she has been guided through the whole struggle will be maintained. Colonel Hay has made an extraordinary impression during his brief sojourn here. He has talked well, and not talked too much. Distinctively American, he has not sought to appear more English than the English. That his patience and temper must have been tried by the officials with whom he was in contact at the Foreign Office goes without saying, and it is to be hoped that Colonel Hay's insight into the working of that wonderful institution will enable him, as Secretary of State, to bring indirect pressure upon our nation to introduce more democratic, efficient, and rational methods into the conduct of our foreign policy. Colonel Hay's connection with Mr. Lincoln touches the imagination of the people, for he represents the highest, the best traditions of American public life, and has made an impression that will not easily be forgotten. It is rather hard on the gentleman in charge of the American Embassy here that so much of his time should be devoted to meeting the demands of his travelling countrymen for social and other privileges. The American ambassador is probably the most hardly worked member of the diplomatic corps, but, in addition to his professional duties, large numbers of his compatriots on tour seem to regard him as a sort of advance-agent for the purpose of effecting their entry into court or social life. The hand-shaking to which the President of the United States was until recently subjected finds its parallel in the duties imposed on the American ambassador here by eager but somewhat inconsiderate compatriots.

ARNOLD WHITE.

THE STAY-AT-HOME'S RESOLVE.

I'm going to buy a sailor suit, with Texas on the cap,
And I shall be set up for life, no matter what may hap;
For it is quite the fashion now to take our men-of-war
And give 'em gratis everything they choose to ask us for.

They ride upon the cable-cars, and don't pay any fare;
They ride upon the whirling "L" as freely as the air;
They go into the theatres, and get the finest seats
At just the same expense as when some other fellow treats.

They hie them to the cooling coast, unto the big hotels,
And get the best attention from the lowly and the swells;
And when they ask the landlord for his bill, the fellow twirls
And says, "There's not a cent to pay; come out and kiss the girls!"

I'm mighty glad that this is so: 'tis just as it should be.
I rather wish, however, that these things would come to me,
And, though I staid at home, while they plunged deep into the row,
I'm going to buy a sailor suit, and try it, anyhow.

J. K. B.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THE DRAMA.

THE opening of the dramatic season in New York has shown the fulfilment, or half-fulfilment, of one of the promises, or half-promises, of the war. We have been led to expect, as a result of the late conflict, that our consciousness of national individuality and power would leap forth rejuvenated; and the students of literary history never question that when the consciousness of national individuality and power leaps forth rejuvenated it instinctively seeks expression in the arts. England fought and conquered the Spanish Armada, and the era of Elizabeth followed. We have fought and conquered two Spanish armadas; should we not also by rights have a Shakspere or two? Our sailors and soldiers are already on the lookout for the bard to celebrate their prowess, and if they find one Shakspere it is a fair wager that they will see two of him. Truly the war has not left us where it found us: the theatres of Broadway and the Bowery are so lively with furloughs and shore leave that one rubs his eyes at the uniforms, wondering whether, after all, he has not been transported to London or Paris or Berlin. It may be incidentally mentioned that the general atmosphere our men brought back from Santiago beat everything in the way of heat and humidity that was ever known in the opening week of the theatrical season. The entire dramatic world suffered from a Spanish fly.

A Spanish Fly for the Theatre.

I.

The most obvious bid for patriotic patronage was "The Maine Avenged," at the Star. For seventy-five cents or less one could see the Maine blown up. One could see, in fact, the man who pressed the button, and the button the man pressed, to say nothing of four acts teeming with instances of Yankee prowess, Cuban patriotism, and Spanish cowardice. Incidentally one was told, without extra charge, that all this talk against the spirit of revenge is Thomas Decay. "What is patriotism," the lecturer shouts, "but the refinement of revenge? And revenge, but the quintessence of patriotism?" It was the ante bellum cry of the yellow journal done into dramatic form. Of course the scare-heads evoked response from the gallery; but the response was that of connoisseurs bent on showing that they knew what to approve. The same sort of applause was once won by an actor who wagered that he could stop a play for thirty seconds at any part of any act by shouting, "Kill me, but spare my life!" The absence of any genuine feeling in the audience was worth an evening to witness. To succeed to-day a melodrama of the war should be filled with Spanish bravery and American chivalry. Capital leading figures might be made of Admiral Cervera, and of Pedro Lopez de Castillo, the private of infantry who wrote a letter on behalf of 11,000 Spanish soldiers to say they liked the way the Yankees had treated them. The less said about the Cubans the better. I do not mean to say that such a melodrama would be more truthful, though perhaps it would. The point is that the playwrights who are responsible for "The Maine Avenged" have suffered financially from the cynicism that made them write down too low to their audiences. The people may need to have their emotional diet served out in scoop-shovels, but to awaken any real response some small percentage of the sentiment must be manly and honest.

Unmellow Drama.

A more interesting melodrama on a current topic is "Devil's Island," produced at the Fourteenth Street Theatre, which has to do with the Dreyfus incident. The sentiment here, though always laid on with a trowel, occasionally rings true. When the very wicked Russian countess tries to seduce the hero (Dreyfus), he exclaims: "I have a wife. Beside her all other women are as shadows!" And the countess herself, though sufficiently mercenary, shouts, "Gold is good, but love is better!" The applause that greeted these sentiments was a tempest compared with the applause at "The Maine Avenged," and the poor critics who were obliged to go to the play could at least laugh with a free heart. The signal feature of the play is that the prisoner of Devil's Island is rescued by one Maxwell, the Paris correspondent of the New York Whirlwind. This Maxwell has a manner of patronizing the dignitaries of Europe which is worthy of Mr. R. H. Davis's correspondent, Gordon, in the King's Jackal; and his patriotism is no less pronounced. "Something tells me in my heart," he exclaims, "that justice will yet find refuge, and wrong be righted, beneath the stars and stripes!" Yet even with such admirably popular sentiments, there is an occasional false note. After witnessing the degradation and banishment of her husband Madame Dreyfus falls in a swoon and sees visions—skilfully flashed on a curtain by means of a magic lantern—of herself appealing for justice to the powers of the world. The Queen-Regent of Spain and the Pope, who sit enthroned before their national flags, receive her coldly, and were roundly jeered by the gallery; but when Queen Victoria was shown sitting before the British flag the picture was greeted not with similar reprobation, as was plainly intended, but with rapturous applause. The final picture of President McKinley and his cabinet righting the wrong beneath the American flag came in almost as a second fiddle. The quick comedians of Fourteenth Street have apparently not yet grasped the fact that Great Britain has become a part of our larger ego. Nothing would be more desirable, politically or artistically, than a really excellent patriotic melodrama; and nothing, apparently, would prove a greater commercial success. The sole deficiency, it would seem, is a playwright who can study to please the popular heart intelligently and without cynicism or pessimism.

II.

That we have been given no musical comedy inspired by the war is inherent in the nature of things. No opera-bouffe could be as deliciously funny as every passage of the late conflict with which the Spaniards were mixed up. Librettists should be bold—should be very bold—but their good sense or the destinies have saved them from being too bold. Judging from the musical plays that have been produced, their saving grace has been the destinies that, according to Touchstone, are responsible for the actions of nature's natural. It would be hard to fancy a more obvious and threadbare book than that of Seymour Hicks and Harry Nichols's "A Runaway Girl," at Daly's. It resembles "The Gayety Girl" and "The Circus Girl" as closely in its general scheme as in its title. The various parts in all three were tailor-made in London to suit the pronounced idiosyncrasies of a certain company of actors. Any other company attempting the play must inevitably wear something the air of a misfit-clothing shop.

Musical Tragedy.

Despite all this, I beg to be allowed to recommend "A Runaway Girl." The costumes and scenery, copied after those used in London, are pretty, and in excellent taste. The company is as adequate as could be expected, and at least one member of it, Mr. James Powers, has the gift of individual and spontaneous expression. The fact remains that any one who looks at the book seriously as a work of art will meet with tragic disappointment; but perhaps it is fitting that any one who insists on looking seriously at a musical comedy should find a tragedy.

III.

The fact that the two most interesting farces of the season's opening are by Americans is doubtless due to a lucky accident, though superficial references to our new political era are so common in all new plays that it would be easy for a theorist to persuade himself to the contrary. In Hoyt's "A Day and a Night," at the Garrick, for instance, John Bull and Brother Jonathan amble arm and arm through the piece, and disburden themselves, by jest and innuendo, of much political wisdom. Jonathan refuses to sit on John Bull's knee until he makes sure there is no tack on it; and he flees his company outright when it transpires that he is to be required to do the Englishman's fighting. The main idea of the play is not particularly fresh. A young man, brought up in the godly atmosphere of a New Jersey town, and prominent in the local church, comes to New York to engage a new choir, and is introduced to the actresses of a musical company. The perpetrator of this jest is the young man's father, a retired naval officer, who, on his return home from the Pacific Station, finds his son altogether too sanctimonious. As the young man becomes more intimate with the actresses, it transpires, to the father's delight, that he knows a thing or two, and is pretty successful in remembering both of them. Mr. Otis Harlan conceives the part of the sanctimonious son with great humor, and acts it with uncommon repose. Mr. William Devere plays the part of the jovial father with a presence and reserve worthy of legitimate art. It need scarcely be said that the situations are risky; but for the most part they are treated with such delightful frankness that they need not offend any man of healthy temperament—women are a law unto themselves in such matters. The appeal is to the eternal appetite for japes, which few normal beings can resist. To any one who has lived to deplore the noxious suggestions of what usually passes for farce, this is enough to commend the play; but it is coupled with a positive grace of treatment. Time and again the audience tremble on the verge of an indecency of the kind that is fast becoming conventional; and almost without fail, by a clever artistic turn—an appeal to the sanity of human nature—the dénouement is clean and wholesome. A certain episode concerning a garter is a masterpiece of joyous nonsense at the expense of an expectant audience. Thus much might be said of many of Mr. Hoyt's farces. What gives quality to the present one is that he has refined the methods that have made his previous successes, and has produced a series of consistent and well-ordered scenes. Within the lines of farce the incidents are constructively worked out, and for the most part one feels that he is face to face with real American men and women in a way that he is not permitted to do even in most of our attempts at comedy. Sad to relate, the play closes with a scene in which, in a succession of tedious speeches, the son and the father join hands to hoodwink the mother. More skilful construction would have avoided ending a play with explanations; and the best that can be said of the spirit of the scene is that it is stupidly conventional. If it is not this, it is blackguardly.

American Farces.

The artistic evil of such a convention is best illustrated in Mr. William Gillette's farce, "Too Much Johnson," with which he opened his season at the Empire. As all theatre-goers will recall, the hero of this farce constructs a series of gigantic lies, extending from Yonkers on the Hudson to Santiago de Cuba, and executes them with that colossal nerve and repose known only to Mr. Gillette. So far so good; but the purpose of these lies is to cover the hero's faithlessness to a young and unobjectionable wife, and to save him from the just wrath of a wronged husband. The play ends triumphantly with the defeat of the wronged wife and the wronged husband. In such a play the natural instincts suffer in proportion as one is carried on by the humor of the situation, and the limit of delight is the limit not of the capacity for legitimate enjoyment, but of one's callousness of heart. The value of a more wholesome convention is best seen perhaps in "Les Fourberies de Scapin." Molière's impostor has no more conscience than Mr. Hoyt's or Mr. Gillette's, and his impostures are no less bold and surprising; but the poet is careful to let nothing happen that could offend the tenderest heart, or stand in the way of a natural delight in the cleverness of Scapin's knaveries.

The distinction is worth bearing in mind in considering Mr. Augustus Thomas's farce, "The Meddler," which, first produced in San Francisco under the title of "Don't Tell His Wife," is running a doubtful course at Wallack's. This also is a farce of lies, but note the difference in the point of departure. A young married woman is suffering in reputation, if not in virtue, from the attentions of a society idler, and the Meddler, a from the attentions of a husband's, decides that it is his boyhood friend of the husband's, decides that it is his duty to interfere. He has some rather manly and very sincere conversation with other friends of the invaded household, during which they discuss the very trying question of whether it is ever defensible to give a husband a kind word of warning. The other friends applaud conventional prejudice against tale-bearing. The Meddler, carried on by his loyalty, undertakes to interfere. Unfortunately his wisdom and courage are not equal to his goodness of heart. Instead of speaking to the husband, he addresses the wife. In the course of the scene that ensues the husband appears, grasps a part of the situation, but is led to believe that the invader of his household is the Meddler himself. The same weakness and irresolution that led the Meddler to speak first to the wife prevent him now from coming out with the truth, and he is launched on a course of evasions and lies that in the end involves every friend of the household. The prime motive here is honest, and the complications it involves are no more laughable than they are pathetic. Mr. Thomas has grasped a live and fresh situation from the world we all see about us, and has treated it in a truly comic vein. An instance of his skill is the fact that he does not allow it to transpire that the wife is innocent until we have come into sympathy with the Meddler's motives; and by so doing he gains one item of confusion with which to confound his luckless hero in the last act. There is material in this farce for a play of high quality—a play worth a thousand and one nights of the farce of commerce. Unfortunately it is rendered unstageworthy by a critical error in construction. After two acts that fairly carry one out of himself, the vital motive is lost in a mesh of inconsequent complications. With a view to simplify and strengthen the last act a number of alterations have been made, and upon the success of these the fate of the play will probably depend. The company is adequate, and Mr. Robson, who plays the part of the Meddler, is much more than adequate. He has succeeded in sinking his mannerisms, and has achieved firm grasp on a difficult part. Whatever the fate of the play, Mr. Thomas is to be congratulated for the truth and sincerity of his attitude toward his art.

Not the least pleasant feature of the Meddler is the fact that the chivalry and kindliness of his motives have as strong a flavor of Americanism as the wholesomeness and extravagance of Mr. Hoyt's humor. If these appear a small residuum for all-our patriotic emotions of the past year, it is well to remember that the years before us are many, and that the most difficult step toward true artistic expression, namely, the first one, has long been made. It is really not too much to hope that the expansion of our political horizon will in the end widen and deepen our interest, and give literary expression to our national traits and ideals.

IV.

The most successful play of the season, one is reluctantly forced to admit, comes from London. In "The Adventure of Lady Ursula," which has been given in most of the leading cities of the country, and is now produced at the Lyceum, Mr. Anthony Hope has given us a drama of unusual charm, one that inevitably calls for comparison with the masters. In the acting Mrs. Virginia Harned Sothern is to be seen at her best; and though Mr. Sothern's part is not strong, it is admirably suited to his quality. The staging too is of the best. Altogether it is worthy of a second and a third hearing, and of a more extended notice than will be possible until next week.

JOHN CORBIN.

SIGNALLING THE PEACE MESSAGE FROM GENERAL BROOKE'S POSITION, AUGUST 13.

A DRAMATIC INTERRUPTION.

[SPECIAL CORRESPONDENCE OF "HARPER'S WEEKLY."]

GUAYAMA, PUERTO RICO, August 20, 1898.

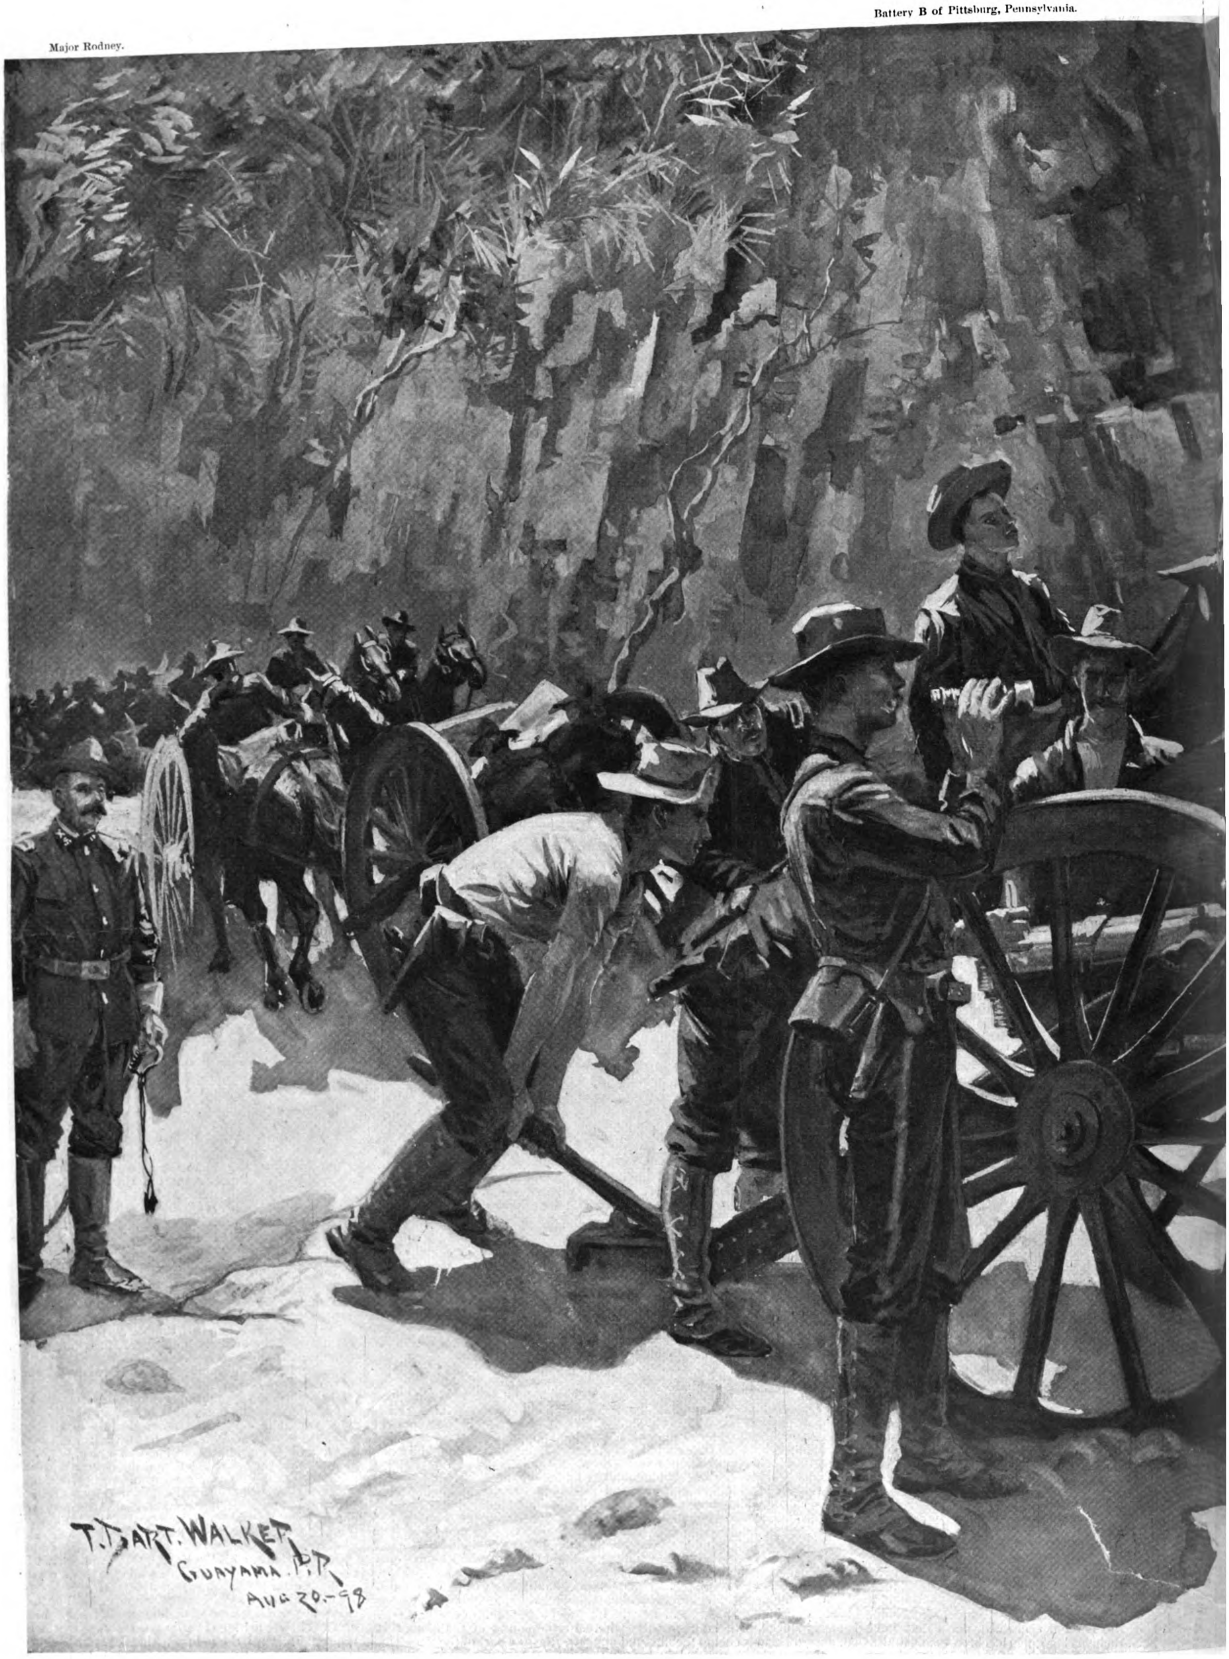
THE drawing I send you [see pages 940, 941] is a correct representation of what may truthfully be said to be the most dramatic situation of the war. With a firing-line formed and the artillery unlimbered, the peace message from the President arrived.

"But three minutes and we should have fired," was the only comment of General Brooke.

Orders were given on the evening of August 12 for the brigade of General Hains, three batteries of artillery, City Troop of Philadelphia, and Troop H of the Sixth Regular Cavalry, to be in marching order at 6 A.M. for the advance upon San Juan. The morning was warm, but a cool, steady breeze afforded relief from the hot sun's rays. At eight o'clock the troops commenced forming from the by-streets, and we were soon led out of the city, with General Brooke at the head. The streets and balconies were crowded with natives, some cheering, and some anxiously inquiring if we intended to leave them to the Spaniards' mercy.



General Hains, with the Fourth Ohio, was sent to flank the enemy's position on the left, while the cavalry were to perform a similar movement on the right.

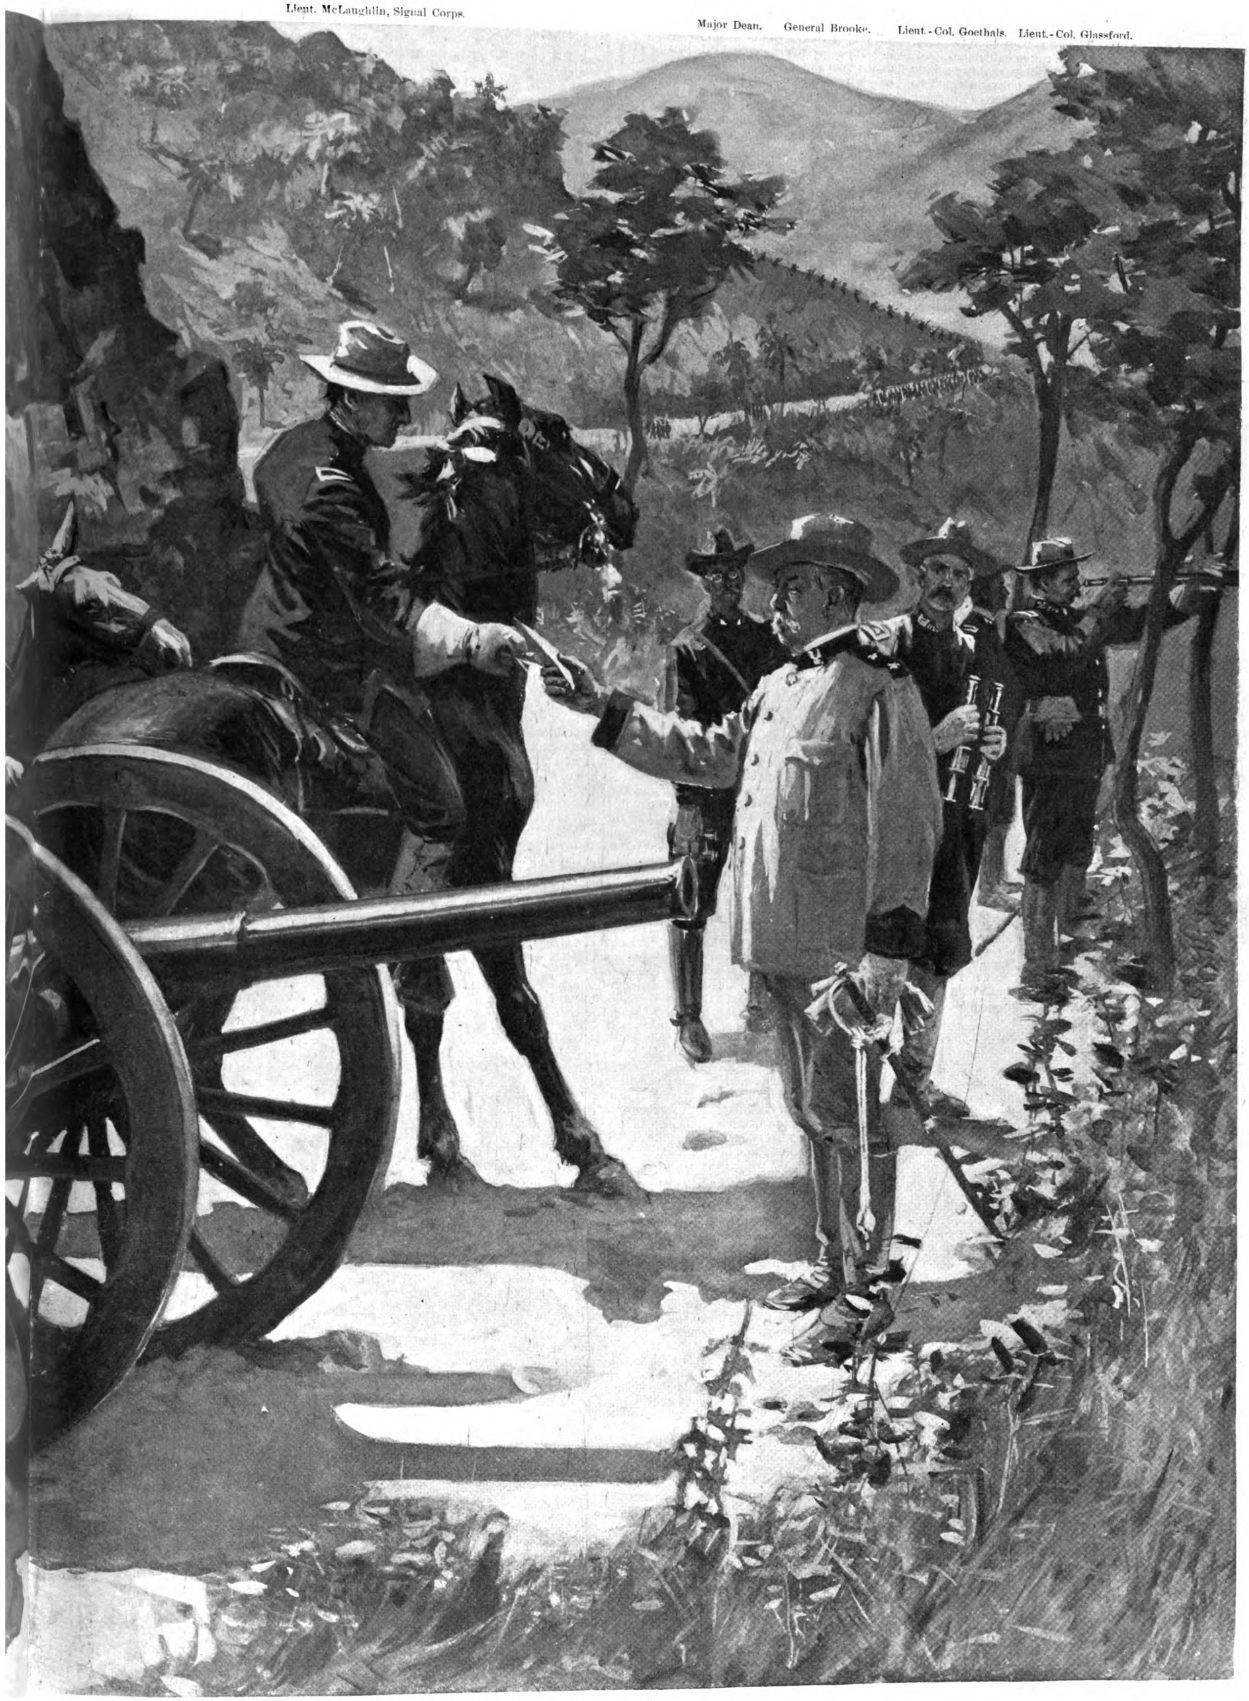
General Brooke showed much courage, leading the advance in person. Most of the distance he was afoot, his staff and horses halting at various distances along the road. When he reached the point on the Cayey road where a battalion of Ohio troops came so near being annihilated a few days ago, he carefully swept the distant hills with a pair of field-glasses for some time. The troops were soon ordered forward, and clambering up the steep slope, were formed into a firing-line. The batteries followed. Battery B of Pennsylvania, having the right of line, was the first

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Battery B of Pittsburg, Pennsylvania.

Major Rodney.

THE DRAMATIC ENDING OF



DELIVERY OF THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE OF PEACE TO GENE

DRAWN FROM LIFE BY T. DART WALKER, SPECIAL ARTIST FOR "

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

OF THE WAR IN PUERTO RICO.

GENERAL BROOKE ON AUGUST 13 AS HE WAS ABOUT TO OPEN FIRE.

FROM HARPER'S WEEKLY" WITH THE AMERICAN FORCES.—[SEE PAGE 939.]

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

to commence unlimbering. The guns were soon in place, their targets were marked, and the range calculated.

Below us stretched the beautiful valley, making a blue perspective, and in the hazy distance between the two mountain ranges could be seen the sea. Natives hurrying from the hills dotted the roads through the valley, some with their belongings piled in ox-carts. Colonel Glassford's signal corps was industriously erecting telegraph wires many feet below us, but keeping abreast with our advancing lines, and the "wigwaggers" were swinging their strange signals from every hill-top. The cavalry had now disappeared around the hills, and General Hains, who was some six miles to our left, and about three miles from the enemy's position, was advancing in single file over a steep and rugged mountain path.

The Spanish position could be plainly noted, and through the glass many white figures could be seen going to and from a house to the intrenchments, with their arms full of something indistinguishable. Their position was well placed, requiring the American troops to pass them on both sides of the mountains. At numerous points on the road bridges had been destroyed. None of them was of any great length, but they were of considerable height, forming passages over glenlike mountain streams. The deep rumbling of the moving artillery was all that broke the silence, even orders being issued in a subdued voice. Every line of the men's faces was marked with eagerness, and they went about their work with the ardor only born in real fighters.

Amid such surroundings a mounted officer, closely followed by his orderly on a mule, appeared around the bend, lashing his tired horse through the battery.

"An important message, sir," said Lieutenant McLaughlin.

General Brooke read the message handed him. Passing the document to one of his officers, he quietly turned, ordering the guns limbered up, and that the troops return to Guayama. The contents of the message were soon passed along the line, and we all beat a much undesired retreat. Not a comment was heard for some time, so stupefied were the soldiers. We re-entered the city with a crestfallen air.

T. Dart Walker.

GENERAL BROOKE STUDYING THE ENEMY'S POSITION FROM THE EXTREME FRONT, AUGUST 13.

THE PUERTO RICO CAMPAIGN.

DESCRIPTIVE ACCOUNT OF THE OPERATIONS AND SKIRMISHES ABOUT GUAYAMA, PUERTO RICO, OCCURRING ON THE 5th, 8th, AND 13th OF AUGUST, 1898.

Guayama, Puerto Rico, August 2), 1898.

The 1st of August saw the landing of General Brooke and staff at Arroyo, on the southern coast, some thirty miles east of Ponce. During the next few days General Hains and his brigade arrived on board the transports Seneca and City of Washington, accompanied by the auxiliary cruiser St. Paul. The landing of the troops was uneventful, save for the throwing of a few shells from the St. Louis and Cincinnati as a warning to some guerillas lurking about the outskirts. Headquarters were established, and on August 4 Brigadier-General Hains received orders to proceed to the town of Guayama with two regiments of his brigade. With the exception of the lack of transportation, which was finally effected by means of native ox-carts, the troops were ready to move. In spite of difficulties, General Hains left Arroyo at half after eight on the morning of the 5th of August, the Fourth Ohio supplying the advance-guard, while the Third Illinois brought up the rear; the Fourth Pennsylvania was left at Arroyo as a temporary garrison.

It was reported that Guayama, some five miles distant, was extremely Spanish in sentiment, and that the enemy's troops had gathered there in considerable force. Information in regard to the roads was sadly lacking, and but few trustworthy interpreters could be found. One negro, having previously been an inhabitant of St. Thomas, was pressed into service, and was taken as guide.

About 9.45 a road was reached leading to the right. The information as to its destination being uncertain, it was thought best to leave the Third Illinois at that point as a reserve. This was done, and the Fourth Ohio proceeded along the main road, having thrown out flankers to the right and left, and covering a mile of front, including both wings. In this formation the advance was made, the main column following along on the road some four hundred yards to the rear. The general and his aides a few hundred yards in rear of the point and in advance of the column.

The day was favorable in regard to weather, a slight breeze cooling the air and tempering the heat of the sun. A peculiar dazzling haze covered the hills with a bluish tint or veil, which made distances uncertain to the eye, and which also blended the blue of the uniforms with the shadows of the undergrowth, so that our flankers were scarcely distinguishable at a distance of four or five hundred yards. General Hains, with four of his staff, had proceeded in advance of the column, which had just halted, owing to the difficulties met by the flankers in pushing forward through the brush, and at a point distant about two miles from Guayama the first sign of the enemy's presence was noticed; a peculiar, sharply singing "pstwing" was heard tearing its way over our heads, being a sound in which force and velocity were so delicately compounded as to seem one and inseparable. An aide called attention to the telegraph wire, which had sagged to the road-side, and insisted that it had been cut; but the discussion was soon ended by the arrival of many more leaden messages bearing the same meaning. The right and left flankers, composed of the Fourth Ohio, were re-enforced and became the firing-line, and the skirmish had begun. The men in column on the road were drawing most of the fire, and two of them had been wounded at the first fire. The rest began to tear down the barbed-wire fences beside the road, sought convenient cover, and awaited orders. The range of the enemy's fire was evidently a long one, as many of the bullets lay spent at our feet, and the report of the Mausers was not heard until after the song of the bullet. No smoke or flash could be seen in any direction, and it was some time before the enemy's exact position could be ascertained. Most of the firing seemed to come from a cut in the road some distance ahead, and aides were sent to the firing-lines with instructions to that effect. The enemy's fire was quite steady, evidently coming from sharp-shooters and guerillas, as no volley-firing could be distinguished. Our firing-line gradually advanced, wheeling slowly to the north, until it finally closed in about the southern end of the town, the entire movement occupying two hours. At this point the enemy's fire ceased, and the Fourth Ohio advanced cautiously into the town. A few stray shots were fired upon the troops from the houses and roofs, but they pushed out to the main square or plaza. Here many of the natives rushed forward, throwing their arms about our horses, hugging the soldiers, and shouting "Vivan Americanos" and "Puerto Rico Americano." The flag was raised above the city hall, and amid the cheering came the shout, "The Spaniards are coming back," accompanied by the singing of some score of bullets. Confusion and disorganization seemed imminent; but in a twinkling the general, with four companies of the Fourth Ohio, was at the northern end of the town, from which place the fire seemed to be coming. Here two firing-lines were formed, one facing the north, the other following the direction some Spaniards were taking who were seen escaping to a near-by sugar-plantation northeast of the town.

The firing here lasted about one hour. The majority of the Spaniards had retreated toward the hills in the north and taken up positions behind houses and rocks, and making good use of the natural cover. The dynamite-guns, under Captain Potter, were finally brought up, and were here used with great effect, five shells being thrown, which silenced the firing very effectively, and the Spaniards retreated north of the town. The advance upon and capture of the town occupied the better part of the day, and the remaining hour or so before night was devoted to the placing of a careful picket and outpost for the town; the Fourth Ohio took up the northern lines, while the Third Illinois was brought in and placed to the south and west.

Little of interest occurred during the next day or two. Spanish troops were seen by our outposts from time to time, but no engagement took place. On the 8th a reconnoissance was ordered by General Hains to ascertain the nature of the country to the north, and also the strength and location of the Spanish forces. Colonel Coit and Captain Walsh, in command of companies A and C of the Fourth Ohio, accompanied by Lieutenant Darrach of General Hains's staff, left Guayama at about nine in the morning of the 8th and proceeded along the San Juan road for a distance of about two and a half miles. Here the Spaniards could be seen distinctly with the glass, throwing up intrenchments upon the opposite hills; also small bodies of them moving about upon the side of the mountain some three or four thousand yards distant.

The road on which the troops were proceeding was cut along the face of the hill, and by a circuitous route wound its way around toward the enemy's position. The point and several officers were advanced some two hundred yards beyond the column, and had gone through two open ledges, by which the road passed the front of the slope. The last company was about to enter the first of these when a terrific volley fire was opened from the Spanish entrenchments. Colonel Coit and two members of General Brooke's staff, who had ridden up, took shelter behind a house by the road, and the rest of the command, under Captain Walsh, lay flat upon their faces. A gutter or trench by the side of the road was the only cover, and into that rolled the men, and by its cover managed to crawl around the bend to a place protected from the enemy's fire. Four of the men of C company were found at this point, and the gauntlet had to be run to the next turn, where it was thought company C has assembled. Here, however, but a few men were found, the rest having taken to their heels at the first volley. A firing-line was formed, however, and the wounded brought back to cover. A few well-directed volleys had returned the enemy's fire, when re-enforcements came up in the form of two dynamite-guns and some companies of infantry under Lieutenant-Colonel Adams. The Spanish soon retreated from their trenches around the point of the most distant turn, and the reconnoitring party returned with a certain knowledge and remarkable memory of the enemy's position and strength. The number of the enemy's troops was thought to be about eight hundred, and was increased by re-enforcements from San Juan during the next few days.

The position held by the Spanish on Pablo Vasquez mountain commanded the surrounding country as well as the main road on both sides of the range, and no advance could be made until they had been routed.

The next operation of interest was on the 13th, when General Brooke, who had arrived with three batteries of artillery and two troops of cavalry, ordered a concentrated movement of his forces upon the enemy's position. General Hains, with the Fourth Ohio, had moved to a flanking position on the extreme left by a circuitous march through the mountains to the west of the Pablo Vasquez range. He had reached his position, and was about to deploy, when Colonel Dean, an aide to General Brooke, appeared upon a blown horse, with the information that a cessation of hostilities had been declared, and orders for General Hains to return to Guayama. His men were in sight of the Spanish intrenchments, and in less than a quarter of an hour would have been engaged. A more theatrical finale occurred in General Brooke's command. The artillery was in position, the pieces having been sighted and loaded. The City Troop of Philadelphia and H troop of the Sixth regulars were ready to deploy to the right or pursue a fleeing enemy. Three minutes' delay would have occasioned the opening of an engagement which would have been as severe as any of the war. General Brooke received the orders transmitted by the Signal Service just in time to save many lives of both the Spanish and ourselves.

Lieutenant J. M. A. Darrach, U.S.A., A. D. C. to General Hains.

CRUISING WITH THE BRITISH CHANNEL FLEET.

BY CAPTAIN W. ELLIOT CAIRNES.

Nowadays we are all familiar with the terms "sea power," "fleets in being," etc., etc., and even the man in the street can talk glibly of battle-ships, cruisers, quick-firing guns, and high-explosive shells; in short, the importance of naval power has been of late brought so forcibly into prominence that no excuse is needed for a short description of the manner in which the highest efficiency is sought for in that most powerful training squadron in the world, the British Channel Fleet.

To most people the idea that this fleet is a "training squadron" in the highest sense will be a new one, so I may as well commence this article by making it clear that one of the chief objects aimed at in its work is the education of the officers in fleet tactics and evolutions and the instruction of the young seamen who form the greater proportion of its personnel in gunnery, boat, and anchor work. One consequence is that the personnel is continually changing; officers rarely spend more than a year or so in the fleet, while the seaman ratings are changed about every six months, the finished article leaving the Channel well qualified to do his part in upholding his country's flag in whatever part of the world he may be sent to. A word or two as to the present constitution of this squadron will fitly come in here.

The backbone of the fleet is of course the battle squadron, which consists of eight battle-ships of the most modern type, all practically identical in design, namely, the Majestic (flag), Magnificent (Rear-Admiral), Hannibal, Mars, Jupiter, Prince George, Resolution, and Repulse. The six ships first named displace 14,900 tons, are protected with Harveyed steel armor, varying from nine to fourteen inches in thickness, carry four of the new 12-inch 46-ton wire-wound guns, twelve 6-inch quick-firers, a host of smaller weapons, four submerged and one above-water torpedo-tubes, and have a sea speed of sixteen and a half knots. The Resolution and Repulse displace a few hundred tons less, are slightly slower, are armed with four 13½-inch guns and ten 6-inch quick-firers, in addition to smaller guns, and have only two torpedo-discharging tubes, both submerged. In appearance the main difference is that the heavy guns in the barbettes are unprotected at the breech by the armored hood adopted in the newer battle-ships, and the freeboard at the bow being slightly less takes away somewhat from the seaworthy appearance so remarkable in the vessels of the later type. The funnels, also, are spaced a little farther apart. To this magnificent and homogeneous fleet of battle-ships a squadron of six cruisers is added for purposes of scouting, etc., but at the time of my visit to the fleet only four of these vessels were cruising with it. These four were the Blake, a fine first-class cruiser of 9000 tons and twenty-knot speed; the Isis, a second-class cruiser of 5600 tons, which has steamed over twenty-one knots on her trials; the Furious, also a second-class cruiser, but of 5750 tons displacement, and of a newer type than the Blake; and the little Pelorus, a new third-class cruiser of 2135 tons, which has steamed over twenty-and-a-half knots on her steam trials. None of these cruisers are armored, protection to their vitals being afforded by steel turtle-back decks, and to their guns' crews by steel shields and casemates. The two cruisers required to make up the proper complement are the Diadem, a splendid vessel of the first class, now undergoing exhaustive trials, and the Arrogant, a sister ship to the Furious, which has been detached for a short time for special service. So much for a description of the component parts of the squadron; now for a record of its daily life during the fortnight which I spent on board one of the ships—a ship which I ought not to identify further than by saying that she was one of the cruiser division.

It was on a summer evening in August that I ascended the gangway of this cruiser, while she was lying with the rest of the fleet off Oban, that popular port of call for yachtsmen, at the mouth of the Clyde, on the west coast of Scotland. My host was on the lookout for me, and introductions to his shipmates quickly made me feel at home; indeed, no shyness or "gaucherie" would long hold out against the breezy welcome of these genial seamen. When I arrived, work for the day was over; men in the first class for leave were already on shore, and the remainder of the hands were enjoying a "caulk" (Anglice, sleep) on the forecastle, or were smoking and spinning yarns under the lee of the superstructure. On the quarter-deck their officers were similarly employed, the only look-out apparently being kept by the marine sentry and by the signal-man on the fore-bridge, whose watchful glass was alert to pick up any signal on its way from the flag-ship. In the Channel Squadron, I may say, the signal-staff enjoy no sinecure, and even when idly in harbor fluttering bunting and flickering semaphores indicated that the Admiral was circulating orders and intelligence throughout his fleet. That these signals were not all "strict service" was made clear by one which the yeoman brought for our information, neatly written out on his slate. It was to the effect that the officers of the fleet were asked to a garden party, to a colossal picnic, were made honorary members of the yacht club, and had been challenged to a cricket-match by the local team. In reply to these pieces of information we had to indicate the number of officers we could contribute to each of the above-mentioned functions. This gave rise to a good deal of chaff and argument, which lasted till the bugle hinted that it was time to dress for dinner; and I was rather surprised to find that there was no very wild anxiety to plunge into the vortex of Oban society. Going to

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

AN ANCHOR DRILL.

the cabin which I was to inhabit for the next fortnight or so, I found that my host's marine servant had stowed away all my gear in the neatest fashion, and it was clear that there would be nothing to complain of so far as comfort was concerned. On board ship dinner is rather earlier than on shore, seven o'clock being the usual hour; in fact, all meals in the navy are at hours which a landsman finds at first decidedly unusual. Breakfast is served in the wardroom punctually at eight, lunch at twelve, afternoon tea at 3.30, and dinner at seven. These hours are fixed upon so as to fit in with the working-hours of the ship's company; and now, while we are lying quietly in harbor, I may take the opportunity of laying before you a sketch of the usual routine of the men-of-war of the Channel Squadron.

The work of the day on a man-of-war begins, in the summer months, at 4.55 A. M., when the hands are turned up, and the hammocks are lashed and stowed in the nettings. At a quarter past five breakfast is ready, and smoking on the upper deck is allowed till 5.40, when it is, "Out pipes," and the hands turn to to clean decks, etc., till 8.15, when there is a stand-easy for a quarter of an hour. At 8.35 both watches fall in, and the cooks clean the mess-decks, and at 9.15 all hands fall in for divisions, when the men are paraded and inspected by their officers, and then prayers are read. Soon after 9.30 an evolution or drill takes place by signal from the flag-ship, and there is always the keenest competition between the different ships as to which shall be first in the drill. As each ship completes the evolution ordered she hoists a pennant, and as no pennant may be hauled down till all are up, it is easy to see which ship is first and which is last. At 12 noon dinner is piped, and smoking is allowed till 1.10, when the hands are usually employed cleaning guns or arms till two, when the second evolution of the day is usually signalled. At 4.10 supper is ready, and smoking is allowed till 4.40. At 4.50 the hands fall in for evening quarters, and the work of the day is generally over, the hands being "piped down"—otherwise sent to bed—at 9.45. In addition to this ordinary routine each day has its special duties. For instance, on Saturday the crews are usually exercised at fire-quarters in the morning, the rest of the day being given up to cleaning, while on Thursday the signal is expected to "make and mend clothes," which is interpreted as the signal for a half-holiday. At sea the routine varies somewhat in a few details, breakfast being at 6.30 instead of 5.15, and the hands being piped down half an hour earlier. It was a Friday evening when I joined the fleet, and as I had not studied the "Routine Board," I was rather startled when fire-quarters went at half past seven the next morning, and a marine burst into my cabin to close the scuttle—which I had left open for the sake of fresh air—and the "dead-light" covering it. When I turned out on deck the excellence of the drill was easily apparent, every man being at his appointed station, and not the slightest confusion being anywhere visible. The pumps and fittings were tested, and everything being right, the exercise was over, and until eight o'clock all hands were busy at their usual work of cleaning guns. At eight o'clock, when in harbor, a rather pretty little ceremony may be observed. The bugler sounds the "Attention," all hands face aft and salute while the colors are run up to the top of the staff, the band, if the ship possesses one, playing the national anthem. When the music stops, the bugle sounds the "Carry on," and every one resumes his interrupted work. One of the first things which strikes a stranger visiting one of these ships is the smartness with which every movement is carried out. All movements are executed at a smart run, and it seems to be the universal motto that whatever is being done must be done as energetically and quickly as possible. Add to this the fact that the men always work barefooted, and the extraordinary speed and silence with which all orders are carried out will be easily understood. The keen rivalry between the different ships also exercises an excellent effect, and is very easily realized when any evolution is being carried out. As the hour for the daily evolution draws near, the chief executive officer—be he commander, as in a battle-ship or large cruiser, or first lieutenant, as in a smaller ship—becomes anxious as to what drill may be ordered. There is so much anxiety to be first on these occasions that some officers are inclined to hazard a guess as to the intention of the admiral, and sundry small preparations are made which much facilitate speed if the guess should prove accurate. Occasionally these guesses lead rather to disaster, as I witnessed in one case, when the executive officer of a neighboring ship anticipated that the evolution ordered would be, "Man and arm boats." This evolution was about due, not having been performed for some days; consequently, to save time, all guns, rifles, ammunition, etc., were placed unostentatiously in the boats, and their crews were ordered to enter them and lie down. If the expected signal had been made, it would only have been necessary to lower away the boats, and a considerable start would have been obtained over the rest of the fleet. Unfortunately, when the signal for the evolution went fluttering to the yard-arm of the flag-ship, we could all read P. Q. 2, which signifies, "Boats pull round the battle fleet," and the discomfited crews had to crawl in a most undignified manner from their boats, removing all guns and other gear, to the vast amusement of the rest of the fleet. As the number of possible evolutions run into a large number of figures, it is easy to see that a good guess is rather unlikely, and that less is to be hoped for from a lucky shot than from a well-drilled ship's company. Some of the drills are rather dangerous, as, for instance, some of the anchor drills, in which very heavy weights have to be controlled by hand, and very often moved considerable distances. A little miscalculation or misdirected energy may at any moment lead to the crushing of one or more men or the capsizing or stoving of a boat; but so much care is taken, and every one is so well up in his work, that though these drills are carried on with wonderful speed, accidents very rarely happen. "Abandon ship," also, is an evolution which can only be safely carried out in smooth and tideless waters, as to stow all the ship's company in her boats these must be over-crowded considerably beyond the margin of safety. One of the prettiest drills for a spectator is, "Man and arm boats," an evolution which in a well-drilled ship can be easily carried out in three minutes, without any previous preparation. "Clear for action" is also a pretty drill. The speed with which all stanchions, awnings, etc., which might possibly interfere with the fire of the guns, are removed is very remarkable, and the grim purpose to fulfil which primarily these great vessels are constructed becomes quickly apparent. The guns' crews alert by their great weapons, the sand on the decks to prevent slipping on freshly spilled blood, the fire-hose rigged to quench any outbreak caused by hostile shells, the busy parties at the magazines and ammunition-hoists getting up shot and shell, and last, but not least impressive, the surgeons and their assistants in the wardroom with rows of gleaming instruments, sponges, water, and all the horrid paraphernalia of their beneficent profession, showed plainly the ultimate object of all this careful training, which one had hitherto been inclined to regard rather as novel gymnastic exercises than as anything connected with the reality of war.

When the fleet is exercised at this evolution the crews are drilled in different exercises as soon as the ship is reported clear. Perhaps boarders are called for, when marines, seamen, and even stokers, with flashing bayonets and boarding-pikes, appear as by magic in answer to the boatswains' whistle. Or the guns are trained on various marks, or torpedo-tubes are worked, though torpedoes are not run; but everything is made ready for that purpose, even the war-heads being prepared as for actual service. At "general quarters," the name for another evolution, the guns are cast loose and the men take station in the same manner; but the ship is not stripped so thoroughly, and more time is given to the drilling of the men with the cutlass, big gun, or rifle. And so the time goes on in harbor. The mornings are taken up with work, but in the evenings officers go ashore, and in many cases leave is given, though not on a very liberal scale, to the crews. Though each ship is provided with steam-cutters and picket-boats, these are not allowed to be used in the Channel Fleet, and all boat-work must be done under sail, or, should there be no wind or sailing be dangerous, with the oar. The object of this is to train the men and young officers in sailing and handling boats, and though some risks are run, the end quite justifies the means.

After a few days at Oban the fleet weighed and stood up to Ballachulish, the first hint that a move was intended being conveyed by the signal from the flag-ship, "Prepare for sea aloft." This does not imply, as might be understood by a landsman, any handling of sails, but signifies that the canvas covers to protect the masts and spars from the blackening smoke from the funnels are to be laced on without loss of time. This is rather a pretty drill. These young seamen, though trained for the modern steam-propelled war-ship, seem to be as alert and as active as their predecessors, and swarm into the rigging and out to the end of the yards as nimbly as any topman in the days of Nelson. These preparations for sea were made overnight, and orders were also issued by signal for steam for ten knots to be ready by 7.30 A. M. As we were going through the narrow waters leading to the loch of Ballachulish no fleet evolutions would be possible, and a ten-knot speed, to economize coal, was all that was necessary. The fleet weighed at the appointed time, and nothing more impressive could well be imagined than the great floating fortresses, with leadsmen in the chains (men-of-war at sea always keep the lead going), moving in single file through the picturesque scenery of the Highlands. The waters were smooth, and the heather-covered hills seemed in places so close that one would imagine it possible to throw a pebble from the shore on to the decks. In Ballachulish Loch the scenery was very fine. The loch appeared from its northern end to be absolutely landlocked, and it must have been quite startling to those on shore to see so magnificent a squadron lying in this Highland loch, with frowning hills enclosing it on every hand. Here also the usual drills and exercises went on, and in the afternoons swarms of clean-shaved naval officers, in "mufti" suits whose innumerable creases betrayed their close confinement in cabin chests, invaded every hotel in the neighborhood, climbed on to the charabancs, and visited the historic pass of Glencoe and all other interesting places within reach. It was not until we had left Ballachulish behind us, and had reached the more open waters of the Irish Channel, that I was able to see any of the evolutions of the squadron at sea. That considerable nerve is needed for the handling of these enormous battleships, as I saw them handled, may be guessed from the fact that it is impossible to stop one of them, even at ten knots speed, with both screws reversed, under half a mile; and the work is made still more "jumpy" from the liability of all hitherto invented steam steering-gear to suddenly break down at awkward moments. However, risks must be run if the art of handling these great ships is to be acquired, and there is no doubt that the skill in fleet tactics acquired by constant practice in peace will stand the British navy in good stead when the dogs of war are loosed.

OUR SKIPPER.

The usual cruising formation of the fleet is the one known as columns of divisions disposed to beam, which means that the two divisions, of four battle-ships each, headed by the vice-admiral and rear-admiral respectively, steam in parallel lines, the distance between the columns being usually as many cables as there are ships in column (a cable equals 200 yards), each ship being two cables astern of its predecessor in column. The vice-admiral heads the weather-column, the rear-admiral the lee, while the cruisers form a third division on one or other beam of the battle fleet. Each ship shows by her steaming-cone hanging from her signal-yard her rate of speed, the cone being hauled close up to the yard when her speed is accelerated; two flags on a halyard from each end of this yard act as helm signals, and another flag or flags indicate the number of revolutions which her engines are making in a minute. Thus the admiral can see at a glance what any of the ships are doing; and that he uses the power to the utmost is apparent from the promptness with which any slackness in keeping station is noted. Should station continue to be kept badly by any ship, the flag-ship frequently calls by signal for the name of the officer of the watch, and the name of the offender is made, and read off by every signal-man in the fleet—a mode of punishment which leads to much chaffing of the culprit by his friends in other ships. Some of the drills carried out at sea are very interesting. All men-of-war carry two boats always swung out and ready for instant lowering, with life-belts ready for use inside; these boats are termed "life-boats," and, in order to test the drill and readiness of the crews, the admiral frequently makes a signal, "Drop a life-buoy," when the marine sentry at the stern releases one of the buoys under his charge, and the life-boat is lowered with the utmost speed to go in search of it. Great emulation is shown by the different ships in this drill, the picking up of the buoy being shown by one signal from each ship, and the return of the life-boat by another. Sometimes things are made more lively by the signal being made to SIGNAL-MEN AT WORK.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

HEAVING THE LEAD.

OFFICER OF THE DAY.

PAINTERS AT WORK.

p two life-buoys, when the two life-boats of each ship e to be placed in the water and raced off, each to pick its own buoy. The quickness with which constant ctice enables this exercise to be performed even in a ppy sea is almost incredible, and this smartness and diness in boat-work cannot fail to be of great use to -of-war's men on innumerable occasions.

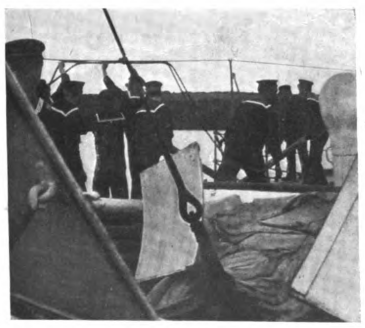
ne of the most impressive fleet movements is the one wn as the "Gridiron." In this evolution the fleets t in columns of divisions disposed to beam, and, on a en signal, simultaneously turn inward at points, the ships passing each other d-arm to yard-arm, and when the per distance is reached, turn on to r course again, the position of the umns being thus inverted. This evo- on is really dangerous, as the smallest ak-down in the steering-gear or failure erve or judgment on the part of an cutive officer might lead to a repetition he Victoria disaster.

n our way down Channel I saw a y good instance of the value of water- e boilers in ships of war. The cruiser as on gradually dropped further and ther astern of station, the reason being one of the fan-engines had broken n; at last we were over a mile be- d the fleet, and the many-colored flags tering from the flag-ship and answered is showed that the admiral had his eye us and wanted to know what was ng. Fortunately the chief engineer foreseen the coming break-down, and ordered two additional boilers to started just half an hour before the alty.

Within half an hour of the accident the fan-engine, or one hour after ting up, these boilers were coupled with those previously in use, and un- a full head of steam we came tearing hand over hand after the battle-fleet. th the old pattern return-tube boilers s would have been impossible, as from ht to twelve hours would have been ded to get the steam required. Cer- ly water-tube boilers have their weak nts, but they also have their advan- es.

One night there came down on us one those dense opaque fogs for which Channel has an unenviable repu- ion, and I shall never forget the nge experience of being in the midst an invisible fleet, the whole air rent d quivering with the shrieks and moans of the si- s. We were in the usual steaming formation of the et, already described, when the fog came on. It was er midnight, and I had just left the bridge, where I d been watching the work of station-keeping in a fleet night. At night the steaming-cones are replaced by ps, which are also used for helm-signals, and if astern a number of ships it requires a practised eye to tell ich lights belong to your immediate leader. The of- er of the watch corrects his station by frequent obser- ions with the sextant, calling for more revolutions if ing ground, and reducing speed if gaining on the ship ahead. My eye had got tired with watching the dancing lights ahead, astern, and on our beam,—where the massive battle-ships were ploughing their steady way undisturbed by the sea, which was making our decks heave and slant, and sending showers of glittering spray as high as the fore-bridge, so I went below and turned in. I had hardly fallen asleep when I woke with the boom of a gun still in my ears; then followed shriek after shriek from our siren, and as sleep was clearly impossible, I went on deck to find out the cause of this midnight disturbance.

READY TO RAM THE ENEMY.



There was no difficulty in ascertaining this. A fog was all around us — a dense, white, clinging fog, shrouding from our view all but a few yards of tumbling sea; in front, astern, and on our beam the hoots of sirens and fog-horns betrayed the presence of the fleet, and it would be impossible to imagine anything more weirdly thrilling than the volume of strange discordant sound swelling on all sides from invisibility. I could imagine that we were steaming in the midst of an assemblage of strange invisible sea-monsters; there seemed a queer individuality in the long-drawn-out wails and stertorous blasts of the fog-horns. Occasionally a booming sound, clearly from a distance, would indicate the approach of some tramp or passenger steamer. God help the vessel which should stray on this fog-shrouded night into the paths of these blind and unwieldy monsters of the sea! Even if sighted at the last moment, nothing could save her, as no man-of-war in the fleet would dare to shift her helm in that fog, in the certainty that so doing would bring her into the path of one of her consorts. Fortunately our fog-horns, helped by the guns fired every half-hour by the leaders of each column, gave ample warning of our passage. Dense as the fog was, station was accurately kept by the aid of fog-buoys towed by a long line from each vessel. Our leader was hidden absolutely, but a few yards ahead we could see her buoy leaping from wave to wave, the white foam marking its course being clearly visible. On this buoy our course was kept, and with such good results that when the fog suddenly lifted, at eight next morning, no ship in that fleet was out of station.

At Milford-Haven we coaled. This is now regarded as an evolution, and a very important one too, and the keenest rivalry is maintained between the different vessels. Without coal a fleet is useless, and the more time taken up in coaling, the longer are the ships kept from their duties, consequently everything possible is tried to quicken the process of filling the empty bunkers. Every one on board, even marine officers and chaplains, turned to with a will. Soon the white decks were inches deep in coal-dust; coal-dust was everywhere, and the usually smart and clean-looking officers and men were unrecognizable under their grimy masks. That little time was wasted will be clear from the fact that the battle-ships of the squadron took in coal at the average rate of 102 tons per hour, the flag-ship very properly heading the list with a splendid average of 162 tons, and in her best hour stowing no less than 190 tons. After the coaling my trip came to an end, though not before I was a witness of what might have been a very serious accident. While the little Pelorus was busy coaling, a steam-collier, unable to stem the heavy tide, was carried on to her bows. A crash, a bump, and the collier, with a momentarily increasing list, was headed for the shore, which she reached only just in time to avoid sinking in deep water. The unarmored stem of the Pelorus was twisted at right angles, but so tough was the steel of which she is built that no fracture occurred, though rivets were started, and enough water was taken in to flood the fore-compartment. As I left, orders had just been issued for her to go to Plymouth to be docked.

So ended my cruise; and though I was not fortunate enough to see any gun practice, yet I have no doubt, from the figures I have seen, that gunnery is held in proper estimation in the Channel Fleet, and that in the days when those great weapons are aimed in deadly earnest our seamen gunners will give as good an account of themselves as their cousins under the stars and stripes.

ISSUING GROG.

CLEARING FOR ACTION.

MEN FALLING IN FOR PUNISHMENT.

SENATOR GRAY OF DELAWARE.
Democratic Member of the Peace Commission

LABOR COPARTNERSH

MR. HENRY DEMAREST LLOYD has mad heretofore as a student of industrial prol articles in periodical publications, and b volume Wealth Against Commonwealth. on the co-operative experiments in Engla Ireland, which he entitles Labor Copar cially valuable, as giving facts in re actually done, gathered by personal vis concerned. Mr. Lloyd does not conce for the co-operative experiments, or his success, but he indulges in very little arg ing, and lets the facts speak for themselv

His observations include experiment farming (which, under the English lan of the most difficult fields for the ass labor), manufacturing, especially of sh printing, store-keeping, etc. He makes of these experiments are decidedly succes method of production and exchange is ground, with a variety of benefits to t There have been failures and there ar they seem to bear a small proportion to sults. These are not merely financial, giv

* Labor Copartnership. Notes of a visit to co- heteries, and farms, in Great Britain and Irelan employé, and consumer share in ownership, mar By Henry Demarest Lloyd. New York and Brothers. 1896.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

SENATOR GRAY OF DELAWARE,
Democratic Member of the Peace Commission.

JUDGE THOMAS M. COOLEY.
Died September 12.—[See Page 935.]

JAMES A. SEXTON,
New Commander-in-Chief of the G.A.R.

WILFORD WOODRUFF,
The late head of the Mormon Church.
[See Page 932.]

LABOR COPARTNERSHIP.*

[R. HENRY DEMAREST LLOYD has made himself known
:tofore as a student of industrial problems by various
:les in periodical publications, and by his suggestive ume Wealth Against Commonwealth. His new book he co-operative experiments in England, Scotland, and and, which he entitles Labor Copartnership, is espely valuable, as giving facts in regard to what is ally done, gathered by personal visits to the places cerned. Mr. Lloyd does not conceal his sympathy the co-operative experiments, or his desire for their cess, but he indulges in very little argument or reasonand lets the facts speak for themselves.

[is observations include experiments at co-operative ning (which, under the English land system, is one the most difficult fields for the associated efforts of or), manufacturing, especially of shoes and clothing, ıting, store-keeping, etc. He makes it plain that many hese experiments are decidedly successful, and that this hod of production and exchange is steadily gaining nd, with a variety of benefits to the working-men.
re have been failures and there are drawbacks, but / seem to bear a small proportion to the beneficial re-
s. These are not merely financial, giving wage-earners,

Labor Copartnership. Notes of a visit to co-operative workshops, ories, and farms, in Great Britain and Ireland, in which employer, loyé, and consumer share in ownership, management, and results.
Henry Demarest Lloyd. New York and London: Harper & hers. 1898.

FIRST LIEUT. A. L. MILLS, U.S.A.,
Colonel Superintendent, U.S. Military Academy, West Point, N. Y.

on the whole, a better income than mere wages can yield, but social and moral as well, stimulating the higher motives, and tending constantly to elevate and strengthen character.

While the results noted by Mr. Lloyd appear to show a generally beneficial effect, he takes no great pains to point it out, but gives his facts and figures, and leaves inferences to the reader. This is what gives the book its real value. It is full of information, and tells us just what the co-operative associations have done and are doing as a means of justifying the principle upon which they are founded.

One purpose is to show the increasing tendency to an actual copartnership of working-men in the co-operative enterprises, the ownership of capital, and the management of business by those who perform the labor, instead of mere sharing in profits through the beneficence or the prudence and sagacity of employing capitalists. The book has the great merit of affording knowledge and stimulating thought, instead of thinking for the reader.

WIND MOODS.

THE wind that moans in surly glee
Across the leagues of rolling brine
Has only sweetest melody
To whisper in the dreaming pine.

R. K. MUNKITTRICK.

BREAKFAST GIVEN TO THE ANNEXATION COMMISSIONERS BY JUDGE KALUA AT WAILUKU, MAUI PHOTOGRAPH BY DAVEY, HONOLULU, HAWAIIAN ISLANDS.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THE ASSOCIATE HERMITS.*

BY FRANK R. STOCKTON,

AUTHOR OF "THE GREAT STONE OF SARDIS," ETC.

XXVII.—MRS. PERKENPINE DELIGHTS THE BISHOP.

IT was the bishop who first appreciated the fact that a certain air of loneliness had descended upon the shore of the lake. He had prepared breakfast at his camp, but as Mr. Clyde did not make his appearance he went to Camp Rob to look for him. There he saw Matlack and his assistant busy in their kitchen tent, and Mrs. Perkenpine was also engaged in culinary matters. He had left Arthur Raybold asleep at Camp Roy, but of the ladies and gentleman who were usually visible at the breakfast-hour at Camp Rob he saw no signs, and he approached Mrs. Perkenpine to inquire for Clyde. At his question the sturdy woman turned and smiled. It was a queer smile, reminding the bishop of the opening and shutting of a farm gate.

"He's a oner," said she. "Do you suppose he could ketch a rabbit, no matter how fast he ran?"

"Come, now," said the bishop, "he wasn't trying to do that?"

"He was either doin' that, or else he was runnin' away. I seed him early this mornin'—I wasn't up, but I was lookin' round—and I thought from the way he was actin' that he'd set a rabbit-trap and was goin' to see if he'd caught anything, and pretty soon I seed him runnin' like Sam Hill, as if his rabbit had got away from him. But perhaps it wasn't that, and maybe somebody skeered him. Anyway, he's clean gone."

The bishop stood and reflected; the affair looked serious. Clyde was a practical, sensible fellow—and he was gone. Why did he go?

"Have you seen any of the Archibalds yet?" he asked.

"No," said she; "I guess they're not up yet, though it's late for them. My young woman ain't up nuther, but it ain't late for her."

The bishop walked slowly toward the cabin and regarded it earnestly. After a few minutes inspection he stepped up to the door and knocked. Then he knocked again and again, and hearing nothing from within he became alarmed, and ran to Matlack.

"Hello!" he cried. "Something has happened to your people, or they have gone away. Come to the cabin, quick!"

In less than a minute Matlack, the bishop, and Bill Hammond were at the cabin, and the unfastened door was opened wide. No one was in the house, that was plain enough, but on the floor were four bags packed for transportation.

Matlack looked about him, and then he laughed. "All right," said he; "there ain't no need of worryin' ourselves. They haven't left a thing of theirs about, everything 's packed up and ready to be sent for. When people do that, you may be sure nothing 's happened to them. They've gone off, and I bet it's to get rid of that young woman's preachin'. But I don't blame them; I don't wonder they couldn't stand it."

The bishop made no reply. Remembering his recent conversation with Mrs. Archibald, he believed that, if they had quietly gone away, there was a better reason for it than Miss Raybold's fluency of expression. It was possible that something might have happened after he had retired from the scene the night before, for when he went to sleep Raybold was still walking up and down in the moonlight.

His mind was greatly disturbed. They were gone, and he was left. "What are you going to do?" he asked Matlack.

"Nothing just now," said the guide. "If they don't send for their things pretty soon, I'll go over to Sadler's and find out what's the matter. But they're all right. Look how careful them bags is strapped up!"

The bishop left the cabin and walked thoughtfully away in the direction of Camp Roy. In two minutes he had made up his mind: he would eat his breakfast—he could not travel upon an empty stomach—and then he would depart. That was imperative.

When he reached the camp he found that Raybold had risen and was pouring out for himself a bowl of coffee. Seeing the bishop approach, the young man's face grew dark, as might have been expected from the events of the night before, and he hurriedly placed some articles of food upon a plate, and was about leaving the stove, when the bishop reached him. Raybold turned with a frown, and what was meant to be a glare.

"I shall bide my time," said he, and with his coffee and his plate he retired to a distance.

The bishop smiled, but made no answer, and sat down and ate his meal in peace; and then he prepared to depart. He had nothing but a little bag, and it did not take long to put in order the simple culinary department of the camp. When all was done he stood for some minutes thinking. There was a path through the woods which led to the road, so that he might go on to Sadler's without the knowledge of any one at Camp Rob, but he felt that he ought to see Matlack and tell him that he was going. If anything went wrong at Camp Roy he did not wish to be held responsible for it. Mr. Archibald could afford to go away without saying anything about it, but he could not, and, besides, if he should happen to see Miss Raybold it would be far more gentlemanly to tell her that he was going and to bid her good-by, than to slip off through the woods like a tramp. He would go, that he was determined upon; but he would go like a man.

When he reached Camp Rob the first person he saw was Miss Raybold, standing near her tent with a roll of paper in her hand. The moment she perceived him she walked rapidly towards him.

"Good-morning," she said. "Did you know that the Archibalds had gone? I was never so amazed in my life. I was eating my breakfast when a man and a cart drove up to their cabin, and Mrs. Perkenpine, running to see what this meant, soon came back and told me that the family of three had departed in the night, and had sent this cart for their baggage. I think this was a very uncivil proceeding, and I do not in the least understand it. Can you imagine any reason for this extremely uncourteous action?"

The bishop could imagine reasons, but he did not care to state them.

"It may be," he said, with a smile, "that they discovered that their natures demanded hotel beds instead of camp cots, and that they immediately departed in obedience to the mandates of their individualities."

"But in so doing," said Miss Raybold, "they violated the principles of association. Our scheme included mutual confidence as well as self-investigation and assertion. I must admit that Mr. Archibald disappointed me. I think he misunderstood my project. By holding one's self entirely aloof from humanity one encourages self-ignorance. But perhaps our party was somewhat too large —the elements too many and inharmonious—and I see no reason why we who remain should relinquish our purpose. I believe it will be easier for us to become truly ourselves than when our number was greater, and so I propose that we make no change whatever in our plans; that we live on, for the time agreed upon, exactly as if the Archibalds were here. And now, if you have a few minutes to spare, I would like to read you something I wrote this morning before I left my tent. I was awake during the night, and thought for a long time upon the subject of mental assimilation, the discussion of which we did not finish last evening, and this morning, while my thoughts were fresh, I put them upon paper, and now I would like to read them to you. Isn't there some shady place where we might sit down? There are two camp-chairs; will you kindly place them under this tree?"

The bishop sighed, but he went for the chairs. It would be too hard for him to tell her he was going to leave the camp, and he would not try to do it. He would slip off as soon as he had a chance, and leave a note for her. She would not perhaps like that, but it was the best he could do.

The reading of the paper occupied at least half an hour, and when it was finished, and Corona had begun to make some remarks on a portion of it which she had not fully elaborated, Mrs. Perkenpine approached, and stood before her.

"Well, miss," said she, "I'm off."

Miss Raybold fixed her eye-glasses upon her. "What do you mean?" she asked.

"I'm goin' back to Sadler's," she replied. "Phil's goin', and I'm goin'. He's jest told me that the cart 's comin' back for the kitchen fixin's and his things, and him and Bill Hammond is goin' to Sadler's with it; and if he goes, I goes."

This speech had a very different effect upon its two hearers. Corona was as nearly angry as her self-contained nature would permit; but, although he did not allow his feelings to betray him, the bishop was delighted. Now they must all go, and that suited him exactly.

"It is a positive and absolute breach of contract!" exclaimed Miss Raybold. "You agreed to remain in my service during my stay in camp, and you have no right to go away now, no matter who else may depart."

Mrs. Perkenpine grinned. "That sort of thing was all very well a week ago," said she, "but it won't work now. I've been goin' to school to myself pretty steady, and I've kept myself in a good deal, too, for not knowin' my lessons, and I've drummed into me a pretty good idea of what I be, and I can tell you I'm not a woman as stays here when Phil Matlack's gone. I'm not a bit scary, but I never staid in camp yet with all greenhorns but me. When I find myself in that sort of a mess, it's my nater to get out of it. Phil says he's goin' to start the fust thing this afternoon, and that's the time I'm goin', and so if you would like to go, you can send word by that man in the cart to have you and your things sent for, and we can all clear out together."

"Positively," exclaimed Corona, turning to the bishop, "this is the most high-handed proceeding I ever heard of!"

"That's 'xactly what I think," said Mrs. Perkenpine; "it most takes my breath away to think how high-handed I am. Before I knowed myself I couldn't have been that way to save my skin. There didn't use to be any individuality about me. You might take a quart of huckleberries and ask yourself what it was particular 'bout any one of them huckleberries—'xceptin' it might be green, and it's a long time since I was that way—and you'd know jest as much about that huckleberry as I knowed about myself. Now it's different. It's just the same as if there was only one huckleberry in a quart box, and it ain't no trouble to see all around that."

"I think, Miss Raybold," said the bishop, "that this good woman has prosecuted her psychical researches with more effect than any of us."

"Bosh!" exclaimed Miss Raybold. "Do you really think I must leave this camp at the dictation of that person?"

"'Scuse me," said Mrs. Perkenpine, "but I'm goin' to scratch things together for movin'. We'll have dinner here, and then we'll pack up and be off as soon as the carts come. That's what Phil says he's goin' to do."

With a satisfied mind and internal gratitude to Mrs. Perkenpine, who had made everything easy for him, the bishop endeavored to make Corona feel, that as her departure from the camp was inevitable, it would be well not to disturb her mind too much about it. But it was of no use trying to console the lady.

"It is too bad," she said; "it is humiliating. Here I believed that I was truly myself, that I was an independent entity, that I was free to assert my individual nature and to obey its impulses, and now I find that I am nothing but the slave of a female guide. Actually I must obey her, and I must conform to her."

"It is true," said the bishop, musingly, "that although we may discover ourselves, and be greatly pleased with the prospect of what we see, we may not be permitted to enter into its enjoyment, and must content ourselves with looking over the fence and longing for what we see."

Corona faintly smiled. "When we have climbed high enough to see over that fence," she said, "it becomes our duty to break it down."

"When I was in England," said the bishop, "I saw a fence—an oak fence—which they told me had stood for four hundred years. It looked awfully tough, and it now reminds me of some of the manners and customs of civilization."

"And you were in England," said Corona. "Did you visit Newnham College?"

He never had. But she told him that she had been there for two years. "And now," she continued, "there may be time enough before I must pack up my effects to finish what I was going to say to you about approximate assimilations."

XXVIII.—THE HERMITS CONTINUE TO FAVOR ASSOCIATION.

WHEN the Archibald party reached the capital city of their State, the four of them took a carriage and drove immediately to the Dearborn residence. Margery had insisted that Mr. Clyde should go with them, so that he and she should present themselves together before her parents. In no other way did she believe that the subject could be properly presented. The Archibalds did not object to this plan; in fact, under the circumstances, they were in favor of it. During the journey young Clyde had produced a very favorable impression upon them. They had always liked him well enough, and now that they examined his character more critically, they could not fail to see that he was a kind-hearted, gentlemanly young man, intelligent and well educated, and, according to private information from Margery, his family was of the best.

Arrived at the Dearborn door, they found the house in the possession of one female servant, who informed them that Mr. Dearborn was in Canada, on a fishing expedition; that Mrs. Dearborn had gone to attend some sort of a congress at Saratoga, and that she did not expect to be at home until the following Friday, three days after, which was the day on which she had understood her daughter was to be brought back to her. This was disheartening, and the four stood upon the steps irresolute. Margery ought to go to her mother, but neither of the Archibalds wished to go to Saratoga, nor could they despatch thither the prematurely betrothed couple.

"I know what we must do," said Mrs. Archibald; "we must go home."

"But, my dear," said her husband, "we agreed to stay away for a month, and the month is not yet up."

"It doesn't matter," said she. "Kate and her husband will take us in for the few days. When we explain all that we have gone through, she will not be hard-hearted enough to make us go to a hotel until Friday; and Margery can come with us."

Margery turned upon Mrs. Archibald a pair of eyes filled with earnest inquiry.

"I know what you want. No," said Mrs. Archibald; "he can go to a hotel in the town; and I shall write to your mother to come to us as soon as she returns, then you two can present yourselves together according to your plans. There is no use talking about it, Hector; it is the only thing we can do."

"We shall break our word to the newly married," said her husband. "Isn't there a State law against that?"

"When we made that arrangement," said his wife, going down the steps, "we did not know our individual selves; now we do, and the case is different. Kate will understand all that when I explain it to her."

They drove back to the station, and took a train for home.

Mr. and Mrs. Bringhurst were sitting in the cool library about nine o'clock that evening, and he was reading while she was listening, and they were greatly astonished when they heard a carriage drive up to the front door. During their domestic honeymoon they had received no visitors, and they looked at each other and wondered.

"It is a mistake," said he; "but don't trouble yourself. Mary has not gone to bed, and she will hear the bell."

But there was no bell; the door was opened and in came father and mother, followed by a strange young couple.

"Welcome!" exclaimed Kate, when at last all were seated and supper had been ordered. "I should say so. A dozen times during the last week have we talked about the delight it would give us if we could have you here and entertain you a little while as our guests in our own house—for you gave it to us for a month, you know. And yet we refrained from sending you an invitation because we did not want to cut off your holiday. And now you are here! The good fairies could not have arranged the matter better."

When all the tales had been told; when the assertion of individuality and the plans of hermit association had been described and discussed, and the young Bringhursts had told how they too, without knowing it, had been associate hermits, devoting their time not to the discovery of their own natures, but of the nature of each other, and how perfectly satisfied they had been with the results, it was very late, and young Clyde was not allowed to go out into the darkness to find a hotel.

It was on Thursday afternoon that Mrs. Dearborn arrived at the Archibald's house. The letter she had received had made her feel that she could not wait until the end of the congress.

"Now, mother," said Margery, when the two were alone together, "you have seen him and you have talked to him, and Uncle Hector has told you how he went to the office of Glassborough & Clyde and found he was really their nephew, and all about him and his family, and you have been told precisely why it was necessary that we should engage ourselves so abruptly on account of the violent nature of Mr. Raybold and the trouble he might cause, not only to us, but to dear Aunt Harriet and Uncle Archibald. And now we come just like two of your own children and put the whole matter entirely into your hands and leave you to decide, out of your own heart, exactly when and where we shall be married, and all about it. Then, when father comes home, you can tell him just what you have decided to do. You are our parents, and we leave it to you."

"What in the world," said Mrs. Dearborn, an hour

* Begun in HARPER'S WEEKLY No. 2167.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google aware, not only that I desired to propose marriage to her, but that it would be well for me to do so. There were objections to this course, which, as an honest man, I could not refrain from laying before her, and with my proposition I stated these objections; but they were overruled to my entire satisfaction, and she consented to become Mrs. Bishop."

"Mrs. Bishop?" said the other, inquiringly.

"Oh, yes; Bishop is my name—Henry C. Bishop. It was the name which suggested the title which was playfully given to me. Before our compact was made, I had told Miss Raybold all about my family. She never asked me to do so, but I knew she desired the information, for I had learned to read those beautiful eyes."

"But," said Mr. Archibald, "how about your position? Did you get the place as librarian?"

"No," said the other; "I did not ask for it. The question of my vocation has been settled most admirably. There never was a human being more frank, more straightforward and pertinent, than Miss Raybold. She knows what she wants, and she makes her plans to get it. With regard to means, she is sufficiently endowed, but the life work to which she has devoted herself is far more than she can ever accomplish alone. She needs the constant assistance of a sympathetic and appreciative nature, and that, I am happy to say, I am able to give her; and were I to devote myself to any other calling which would interfere with that assistance, I should be doing her a positive wrong; therefore, should I state it in definite words, I should say that I am to become my wife's private secretary. That is my position, and it suits me admirably; and I may add that Corona assures me that she is thoroughly well pleased. We are to be married in the fall. It is likely that for some time we shall be associate hermits, and I hope it will not be long before we shall have the pleasure of meeting again our former companions of the hermit camp."

"By-the-way," said Mr. Archibald, as his visitor was about to leave, "tell me something of Matlack. I had a great liking for our guide."

"All that I can tell you is this," said Mr. Bishop, smiling: "Not long after we arrived at Sadler's, he went to Peter and asked him if he intended to send out a camping party to any considerable distance. It so happened that a couple of gentlemen were going to a point on the very limits of Sadler's jurisdiction, and with them Matlack petitioned to go, although another guide had been appointed. I made inquiries—for I also was interested in the guide—and I found that, for some reason or other, Matlack had become a sort of Daniel Boone, and wanted to go away as far as possible from his kind."

"I hope," said Mr. Archibald, "that our example has not made a real hermit of him. Good-by. I am very sorry that Mrs. Archibald is not at home; but in both our names I wish you and your future wife the best of good fortunes."

"Father," exclaimed Mrs. Kate, when she heard of this interview, "now you must grant me one more favor! Here is another pair of lovers who owe everything to our honey-moon and your wedding tour. We ought to know them, for we made them what they are. So let us invite them here, and let them be married from this house. I do not believe she has a proper home of her own; and, in any case, the only way they can pay us what they owe us is to give us the pleasure of seeing them wedded here."

Mr. Archibald rose to his feet. "No, madam," said he; "I am willing, to a certain extent, to make this house a source of hymeneal felicity, but I draw the line at the bishop. I do not intend that my home shall become a matrimonial factory!"

THE END.

THE NEW CORNELL MEDICAL COLLEGE.

RAPID progress is being made with the Cornell University Medical College, which came out of Limbo into actuality as a consequence of the difference between Chancellor MacCracken and the former medical faculty of the New York University. Funds amounting to $1,500,000 have been provided by Colonel Oliver H. Payne, and are to be used partly for endowment and partly to buy land and to build a home for the institution. Plans for the new building, to cost $500,000, have been made by Messrs. McKim, Mead, & White, a block of land has been bought on the west side of First Avenue, between Twenty-seventh and Twenty-eighth streets, and the building is to be ready for use in October, 1899. The faculty of the new college is, with a few exceptions, the former New York University faculty, which had the painful difference with the Chancellor. It has been strengthened, however, by many new recruits.

ADVICE TO MOTHERS.—MRS. WINSLOW'S SOOTHING SYRUP should always be used for children teething. It soothes the child, softens the gums, allays all pain, cures wind colic, and is the best remedy for diarrhœa. —[Adv.]

SANITARY PRECAUTIONS.

THE inspectors of the factories where the Gail Borden Eagle Brand Condensed Milk is produced have access at all times to the dairymen's premises, with authority to exact every sanitary precaution. Such care results in a perfect infant food.—[Adv.]

GOOD constitutions framed for U. S.— for the world at large, with ABBOTT'S—THE ORIGINAL ANGOSTURA BITTERS, as foundation—then indigestion a stranger. —[Adv.]

DR. SIEGERT'S ANGOSTURA BITTERS are the most efficacious stimulant to excite the appetite.—[Adv.]

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Pears'

What is wanted of soap for the skin is to wash it clean and not hurt it. Pure soap does that. This is why we want pure soap; and when we say pure, we mean without alkali.

Pears' is pure; no free alkali. There are a thousand virtues of soap; this one is enough. You can trust a soap that has no biting alkali in it.

All sorts of stores sell it, especially druggists; all sorts of people use it.

WALTHAM WATCHES.

The American Waltham Watch Company makes forty-five varieties of movements WHICH ARE FULL JEWELED WITH RUBIES, SAPPHIRES, AND DIAMONDS. The "Riverside" movement which has seventeen jewels—twelve rubies and five sapphires—is particularly recommended as being within the means of every one and as accurate a time-keeper as it is possible to make.

For sale by all jewelers.

THE "ONEITA"

PAT. APR. 23TH 1895.

Elastic-Ribbed UNION SUITS

are complete undergarments, covering the entire body like an additional skin. Perfectly elastic, fitting like a glove, but softly and without pressure. No buttons down the front. Made for Men, Women, and Young People. Most convenient to put on or off, being entered at the top and drawn on like trousers With no other kind of underwear can ladies obtain such perfect fit for dresses or wear comfortably so small a corset.

ONEITA KNITTING MILLS,
Office: No. 1 Greene St., N. Y.
Send for Illustrated Booklet. Address Dept. 7.

See that Hole?

WHAT IS IT FOR?

To insert a pointed instrument and eject the pen from the holder. Prevents the ink from flowing back into the holder and soiling the fingers.

Samples on receipt of return postage. Ask for Vertical No. 37.

The perfection of pens, slightly stiff, smooth points, durable, and uniform.

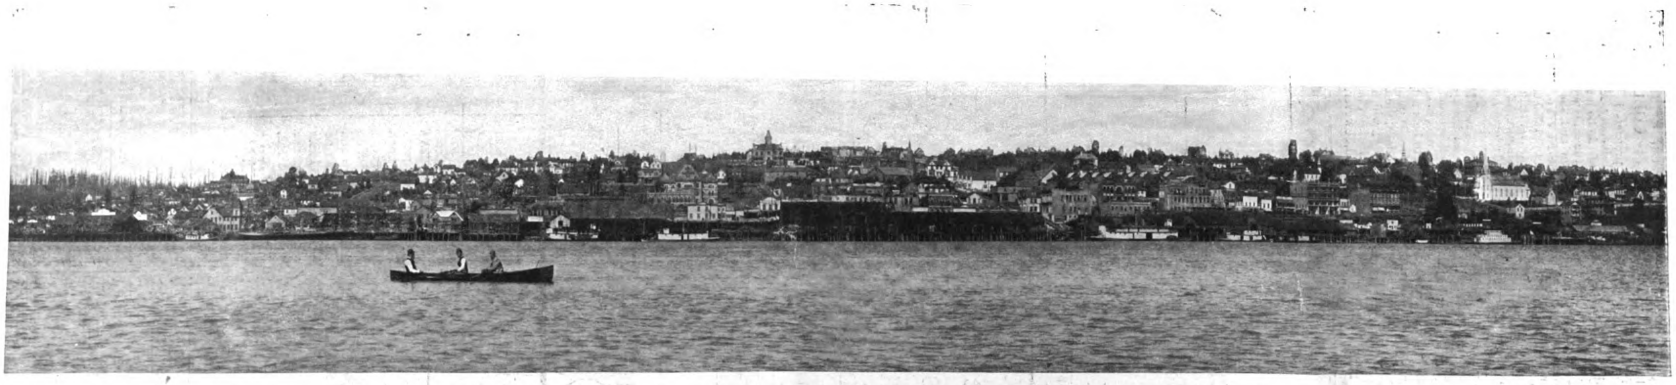
SPENCERIAN PEN CO.
450 Broome St., New York, N. Y.

WILL POWER and Personal Magnetism insure the otherwise impossible, making friends and business success. All possess this power. We show you how to use it. Key to Power. 30c., or 12c. and addresses of three ministers, teachers, or physicians. Circulars free. Address PROF. L. H. ANDERSON, H. Y., 98 Masonic Temple, Chicago.

THE CELEBRATED

SOHMER

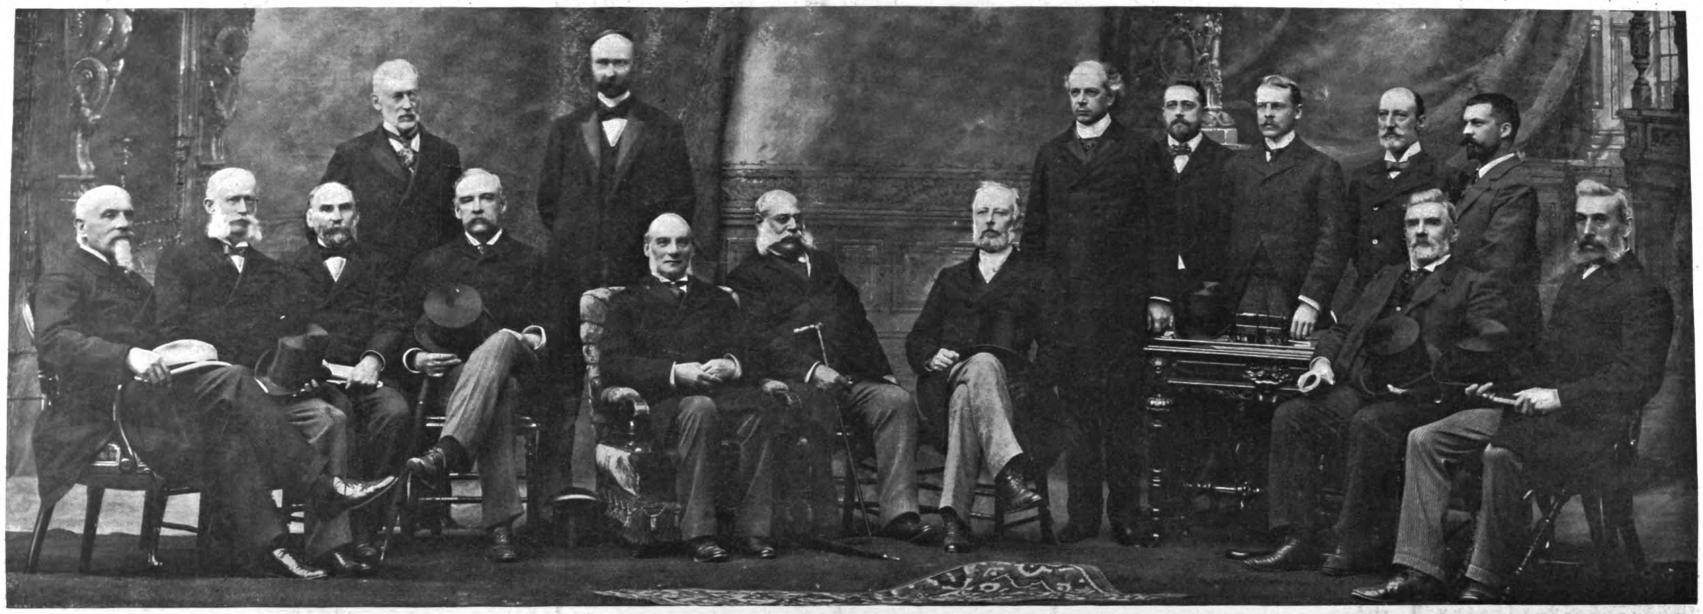
Heads the List of the Highest-Grade Pianos.



Caution.—The buying public will please not confound the genuine SOHMER Piano with one of a similar-sounding name of a cheap grade.
Our name spells—

S—O—H—M—E—R

New York Warerooms
SOHMER BUILDING
Fifth Ave., cor 22d St.



Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

CITY OF NEW WESTMINSTER, BRITISH COLUMBIA, DESTROYED BY FIRE SEPTEMBER 11, 1898.—[See Page 934.]

Hon. John A. Kasson. Hon. Charles W. Fairbanks. Mr. Charles H. Butler, U. S. Examiner Expert. Mr. C. P. Anderson, American Secretary. Mr W. C. Cartwright, British Secretary. Hon. H. Bourassa, M.P., British Secretary.

Hon. T. Jefferson Coolidge. Hon. John W. Foster. Hon. Nelson Dingley. Hon. George Gray. Rt. Hon. Baron Herschell, President. Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright. Hon. Sir Louis Davies. Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier. Hon. John Charlton, M.P. Hon. Sir James Winter.

THE BRITISH-AMERICAN JOINT HIGH COMMISSION FOR THE SETTLEMENT OF DISPUTED QUESTIONS BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES AND CANADA.—By Courtesy of A. Montminy & Cie.—[See Page 950.]

Photograph registered in Canada.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE

TRAVIS VS. BLAIR.

DOUGLAS VS. CURTIS—AT THE EIGHTH HOLE.

THE AMATEUR GOLF CHAMPIONSHIP.

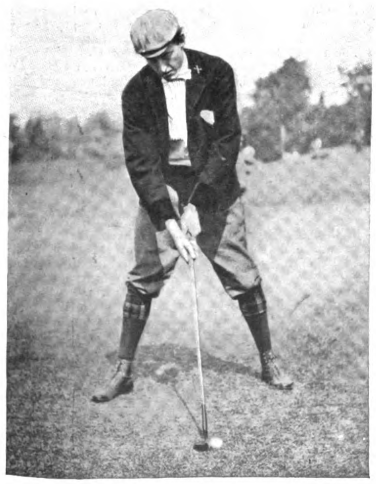
It was nearly seven o'clock, Monday night, and quite dark, when the last man in the medal round of the championship meeting finally holed out by the uncertain light of a couple of stable lanterns. The early morning start had been made on time, but, with one hundred and seven contestants, delays were inevitable, and the four-minute schedule was too close a margin. As a consequence, it was noon before the last couple in the first round could get away, and the half-hour thus lost could not be made up. The tail of the list managed to scramble in before darkness made play impossible, but it showed conclusively that medal play at thirty-six holes, with a field of one hundred or more, is too big an undertaking for these short September days. It would be a pity to abandon the medal and match system, but either the entry list must be curtailed or the medal round must be made under new conditions. It is hardly possible to interfere with individual rights in the matter of entry; the competition is supposed to be open to all members of clubs affiliated with the National Association, and it should remain so. But with more than one hundred starters there is great risk of good men being shut out through sheer inability to finish before nightfall. Either the qualifying round must be cut down to eighteen holes, or the thirty-six holes must be spread over two days, the whole field playing the first round on Monday and the second on Tuesday. In the latter case only sixteen men (instead of thirty-two) would qualify, as otherwise the match rounds could not be finished within the limits of the week. The question will probably come up for discussion at the annual meeting of the association.

It was a great triumph for American golf that a native-bred player should lead the field in Monday's medal play. It is true that Whigham was out of condition and that the scoring was on the high side, but Choate's victory was none the less creditable, for Douglas and Macdonald and Coats were all behind him. Choate is a Harvard undergraduate, and may be counted upon to improve. His style in driving is beautifully free and effective, and he plays his irons well. He fell an easy victim to W. B. Smith in the first match round, but he had made his mark, and could rest content with the honor of the gold medal.

Whigham's failure to qualify was not unexpected. He was still weak from his illness, and had had but little practice this year. It was an eminently sportsmanlike act for him to come out at all, and such defeat is in the nature of an honor.

The high scoring was a surprise, for it had been generally supposed that the medal would be won by a card of 160 or thereabouts. The best was Choate's 175, and there were only eighteen rounds under 90 out of the total of over two hundred. The greens were fast, and a trifle bumpy from the dry weather, and this made the putting difficult. The congestion at the tees was another and even severer handicap. The course was so crowded that the delay at the short holes often amounted to several minutes, and such an annoyance is quite enough to put a man off his game. It could not be helped, but it had its effect.

DOUGLAS PUTTING AT THE FIRST HOLE.



The field was certainly a representative one, for Hollins junior, Betts, Harriman, Terry junior, Forgan, and Robbins were the only prominent absentees. H. C. Leeds and G. C. Clark were disappointments in that they failed to qualify, but the college element was well represented among the thirty-two by Choate, Cutting junior, Hubbard, and Curtis, of Harvard, W. B. Smith and John Reid, Jr., of Yale, and Bayard and Blair, of Princeton.

The form shown at the tee was an improvement over that at Shinnecock two years ago, where the field was also representative. Just about half the players used an effective full swing, and the "baseball" swing was confined almost entirely to the older men, such as Keene and Thorp. The majority stood almost square to the ball. There were perhaps twenty who stood with the right foot drawn back (Laidlay stance), and still fewer who adopted the open position. There were but two left-handed players, and they did not qualify.

In the match play of Tuesday the principal interest centred in the Macdonald-Hubbard contest. Hubbard is a Harvard student, and hardly more than a boy, but he put up a very pretty game. His chief weakness lay in his wrist shots, and in this department Macdonald easily outclassed him. Hubbard won the Newport cup a week or so ago, and must be reckoned upon as a factor in future contests.

Douglas beat Curtis, the inter-collegiate champion, rather easily. The latter did brilliant work at times, but he often tried to do too much on the greens, and he was lacking in steadiness. He drives with an easy, full swing, and it was interesting to compare it with Douglas's mighty "swipe." Douglas seemed to put nearly twice as much powder into his stroke, and yet he had to play the odd from the tee shot as often as not. The only particular upset of the day was Wright's defeat by Thorp. The former golfs in far the better style, but the ex-medallist would not be denied, and the "get-there" method scored another point.

The match between Douglas and A. H. Smith on Wednesday was a surprise, in that Douglas was forced to put up rattling golf to win out. Smith is a new aspirant for championship honors, but he possesses abundance of nerve, and remarkable ability in the holing-out department. He got in some wonderful putts during the morning round, and as Douglas was 'way below par in his work on the greens, the Huntington Valley man was one up on the first eighteen holes. In the afternoon round, however, Douglas pulled himself together, and won by four up and three to play. Douglas clearly outclassed Smith on his mid-field shots and short approaches. Time and again he would take his brassey and lay his ball up on the green with a clear carry of one hundred and seventy or eighty yards. The second shot is perhaps the strongest point in Douglas's play, and it is one that counts tremendously. He tries for everything, and a hazard with him is simply a question of yards. If a bunker is barely within the range of his best shot, he takes the chance, and generally brings it off. It is slashing golf, and a treat to watch.

JOSEPH H. CHOATE, JR., WINNER OF THE MEDAL ROUND.

ON THE CLUB-HOUSE PIAZZA.

"THE GOLFER'S ALPHABET."—Illustrations by A. B. Frost.—Rhymes by W. G. van T. Sutphen.—4to, Illuminated Boards, $1 50.—Harper & Brothers.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

The defeat of Tyng by Foxhall Keene was a sad surprise to the Morris County men, but their champion was clearly off in his work on the greens, and Keene has improved immensely since Tyng beat him out for the Shinnecock cup a year ago. Keene undoubtedly had the luck, but he also played the better golf, and deserved to win. His easy victory over so strong a man as Tyng argued favorably for his chances with Travis on Wednesday, and the match was followed with a great deal of interest. Travis was hardly himself in the morning round, but he started off with a rush after luncheon, and soon had the match well in hand. Keene played the sandiest kind of golf, and brought off some beautiful iron strokes, but the Oakland champion could not be headed, and the match ended at the fourteenth green.

The W. B. Smith-Fowle and Macdonald-Coats matches had been virtually settled by the morning rounds, and most of the gallery drifted back to watch Douglas and Stillman. As usual, Douglas had been sizing up his man during the morning play, and although he had finished the first round three up, he had not been forced to extend himself. But on the second eighteen the Fairfield crack suddenly began to play record-breaking golf. He went out in 36—a wonderful performance; and that, too, with one lost stroke for a ball out of bounds. The match ended nine up and eight to play; but the chances were so good for breaking the record of 80, established by Tyng, that Douglas went on playing the bye-holes. With ten fours in his card it soon became evident that the record was in danger, and the gallery became enthusiastic. No finer exhibition of fair full driving and brassey work has ever been given upon an American course, and for the first time in two days' play Douglas's holing out was on a par with his general work. He finished in 76, and it is worth while to give the complete score:

Out....4 4 4 4 3 4 5 4 4—36
In.....4 6 6 5 4 3 4 4 4—40—76

In the semi-finals, on Friday, Douglas and Macdonald were the favorites over Travis and W. B. Smith, the Yale champion. To everybody's surprise, Smith ended the first round with a lead of three up, while Douglas led

WALTER B. SMITH,
Silver Medallist

Travis by a single hole. But in the afternoon round Douglas simply smothered his opponent, and won as he pleased. Travis seemed to be out of condition, and his strokes were lacking in power as well as in accuracy. Nevertheless, Colonel Bogey himself would have found difficulty in keeping up with Douglas at the pace he was going.

W. B. Smith, of the Onwentsia (Chicago) Club won from C. B. Macdonald after an exciting struggle. It was a popular victory, and particularly so in that it insured the final honors for an Eastern player. For the first time in the history of national golf, the West was out of it.

Smith, being an American golfer, naturally carried with him the sympathies of the gallery, but it was acknowledged that Douglas on his public form was entitled to win. Both are young men, Douglas having graduated from St. Andrews University in Scotland two years ago, and Smith being an undergraduate at Yale. Smith is a very long driver, and although it is a trite saying that big driving does not win matches, it is equally true that it does make the putting a deal easier. The Yale man fiddles about a good deal in taking his stand, but once set, his swing comes through full and free, and with a tremendous lot of power from the right forearm at the moment of impact. Occasionally he tops a tee shot or plays a wild one, and just here Douglas's machinelike steadiness was supposed to give him the advantage. Douglas will now and then foozle an approach shot or miss short putts, but he seldom or never makes a mistake through the green. On paper he was an easy winner, and for once the prophets were right. Douglas finished the morning round with a lead of three holes, and although Smith played up nobly in the second round, the champion could not be headed. Douglas was dormie five at the thirteenth hole. Smith won the fourteenth, but the strain was too great, and his drive for the fifteenth went out of bounds. It cost him three to reach the green, and Douglas took the hole, winning the match and championship by five up and three to play.

What for convenience may be called the "picked" score is a combination of the lowest number of strokes in which the several holes were made during the progress of the tournament. The record has no particular importance, except in that it serves to try out the golfing possibilities of the course, and to show the wide gap that exists between theoretical scoring and the average individual performance.

| Hole. | Distance (yards). | Bogey. | Picked Score. | Made by. |
|---|---|---|---|---|
| 1 | 238 | 4 | 3 | Several |
| 2 | 175 | 3 | 2 | Macdonald and Travis |
| 3 | 234 | 4 | 3 | Several |
| 4 | 370 | 5 | 3 | Douglas |
| 5 | 310 | 4 | 3 | Several |
| 6 | 363 | 5 | 3 | Several |
| 7 | 350 | 5 | 3 | Keene |
| 8 | 350 | 4 | 3 | Several |
| 9 | 433 | 5 | 4 | Several |
| 10 | 253 | 4 | 3 | Several |
| 11 | 415 | 5 | 5 | Several |
| 12 | 442 | 5 | 4 | Coats |
| 13 | 545 | 6 | 3 | Travis |
| 14 | 333 | 4 | 3 | Michael |
| 15 | 165 | 3 | 2 | Several |
| 16 | 193 | 4 | 3 | Several |
| 17 | 408 | 5 | 4 | Several |
| 18 | 383 | 5 | 3 | Stillman |
| | 5960 | 80 | 57 | |

The picked scores of the four men in the semi-finals figure out—Travis, 66; W. B. Smith, 66; Douglas, 69; and Macdonald, 71.

W. G. VAN T. SUTPHEN.

THE JOINT HIGH COMMISSION.

QUEBEC, September.

WHERE the Right Hon. Baron Herschell of England sits, there is the head of the tables round which gather the members of the Joint High Commission of Great Britain and the United States, certain errant uncertainties of whose doings journey daily into the United States over the wires of a couple of telegraph companies. The Commission, then, has organized; but though that formality was disposed of as far back as August 23, it cannot be said with assurance, even after so many days, to have accomplished very much more. The protocol contains eleven or twelve items of international difference, and to these have since been added a subject that may prove the least susceptible of jointure. A little summer sojourn at the delightful Château Frontenac is a dissipated dream. Diplomacy, if it wins, shall have had to fortify itself against the rigor of those breezes which scamper down from Labrador to thrill the marrows, and are no respecters of statesmen or their protocols.

After the felicitous exchange of official compliments which took place at the opening, and in which the resonant London press happily found renewed assurance of our distinguished consideration, the Joint High Commission moved into the little Legislative Council Chamber in Parliament Building, locked the door behind it, and proceeded to debate when it would be ready to deliberate. It was soon apparent that all were not quite ready, and accordingly the several commissioners went their several ways, to meet again a little past the middle of September.

It would be fully unfair to say that the Commission accomplished nothing prior to its long adjournment, for there was undoubtedly an exchange of opinion upon nearly all the subjects that are to be discussed, and when the members separated each side had some idea of what the other side would give and would demand. These subjects are, briefly—pelagic fur-sealing in Bering Sea and the North Pacific Ocean; provisions in respect to the fisheries in Eastern waters contiguous to both countries, and also fisheries on the Pacific coasts; provisions for the delimitation and establishment of the Alaska-Canadian boundary by legal and scientific experts; provisions for the transit of merchandise in transportation to or from either country across intermediate territory, whether by land or water, including natural and artificial waterways and intermediate transit by sea; provisions relating to the transit of merchandise from one country to be delivered at points in the other beyond the frontier; modifications of the alien-labor law applicable to the subjects or citizens of the United States and Canada; the mining rights of the citizens or subjects of each country within the territory of the other; such readjustment and concessions as may be deemed mutually advantageous of customs duties applicable in each country to the products of the soil or industry of the other, upon the basis of reciprocal equivalents; a revision of the agreement of 1817 respecting naval vessels on the Great Lakes; arrangements for the more complete definition and marking of any part of the frontier line by land or water where the same is now so insufficiently defined or marked as to be liable to dispute; provisions for the conveyance for trial or punishment of persons in the lawful custody of the officers of one country through the territory of the other; reciprocity in wrecking and salvage rights.

The principal supplemental question, which may finally be thrown out of court, relates to the rights of United States citizens owning timber tracts in Canada to export their own timber in its raw state. The issue here is directly between the province of Ontario and the State of Michigan, and the question was presented, ex parte, by Hon. Don M. Dickinson, of Detroit, who represents the American lumbermen. Upon the exhaustion, or partial exhaustion, of our middle Northwest forests, large tracts of growing timber in Ontario were purchased by lumbermen in Michigan and adjacent States, who proceeded forthwith to draw upon their preserves for the purpose of supplying the mills on the American side with logs. Enterprising persons in Ontario thought they saw an opportunity to force the establishment of saw, pulp, and other mills and furniture manufactories in their own province, and thus deprive the Americans of the monopoly they had for so long possessed. The Ontario Legislature was induced to enact a measure the effect of which was to prohibit the export of logs, thus compelling the American owners of the Ontario timber tracts to build mills in Canada, such as they already operate in the United States, or to let their growing timber continue to grow. The Americans, exasperated, sought to have the act declared unconstitutional, on the ground that it was virtual confiscation, but they have not succeeded thus far, and the question therefore comes before the Joint High Commission to embarrass it. If the American commissioners were to insist upon the prohibition of export being abrogated, Sir Wilfrid Laurier could not concede a point without incurring the deepest displeasure of the government of Ontario, which is of the same political persuasion as the federal government of which he is the head. The question may be regarded as a local issue with which the general government has no concern; but if the opposite view be taken, a single concession by the British commissioners will jeopardize the whole work of the conference. Ontario is ambitious, as indeed is Canada. But in Ontario the feeling is particularly strong that the time is passing when the country may be satisfied to be a producer of raw materials only. Instead of exporting these, Canada wants to convert them on her own soil into the finished products, which may find market at home, in the United States, or elsewhere abroad.

This leads logically to a consideration of what the conference may be doing upon the question of reciprocity of trade. It may be stated positively that the question has been considered, and a draught has been made of what the United States deems would be an equable measure of reciprocity. The venerable Mr. Kasson was the only member of the Joint High Commission who remained at the Château Frontenac during the intermission, and his energies were bent upon this particular subject, with a view to having a schedule ready for the consideration of his American associates upon their return. Special interests throughout both Canada and the United States have sought persistently to influence the Commission for and against certain specifications likely to be inserted in any measure of reciprocity that may be contained in the prospective treaty. If all these volunteer voices were heeded, there would be no need of spending more time in Quebec. There seems to be a popular fear in Canada that the country is to be made a "slaughter market" for American manufacturers. But, from a set of facts now before the Commission, it appears that there is complaint in Canada because the United States sold the Dominion last year large quantities of raw material for manufacturing purposes, and then, in the most unneighborly fashion, kept out by her tariff Canada's exportable surplus of agricultural products and manufactures, so that the Dominion was obliged to seek markets in England, where there are no tariffs. Yet Canada has a tariff of her own that is far from liberal. In spite of it, however, she imported from the United States last year goods to the value of $86,587,000, which is $53,760,000 more than the value of goods imported by Canada from Great Britain. On the other hand, Canada sold Great Britain goods to the value of $104,787,000, while her exports to the United States amounted to only $41,122,000. There has recently gone into effect what is known as the British preferential clause of the Canadian tariff, by which British imports are favored by a relaxing of the tariff to the amount of twenty-five per cent. The Canadian tariff averages about thirty-three per cent. Several of the visiting delegations from American boards of trade (notably Boston) have sought to impress upon the American commissioners that, unless a like concession is obtained for the United States, Great Britain will quickly absorb the greater part of the profitable and growing trade which the United States had with Canada last year. But while some Americans hold that, placed on the same basis as Great Britain, the United States may easily keep the Canadian markets against the competition of the mother-country, other Americans hold that there is no real reciprocity while any tariff exists, however low. It is believed that Lord Herschell regards such an extremity as equivalent to retaliation upon the mother-country. It is not impossible that, in the solution which Hon. Mr. Kasson has so diligently sought, the American tariff against Canadian products has been relaxed to just the amount of the British preferential clause of the Canadian tariff.

Sir Louis Davies has informed the Commission that Nova Scotia acquiesces in any proposition that may be made to accord to American fishermen the privilege of occupying the inshore fisheries of that province, which means the obliteration of the troublesome three-mile limit, and of baiting and refitting at Canadian ports. But this carries with it a quid pro quo, which shows the thrift of provincial merchants and shippers. Nova Scotia has been selling Puerto Rico fish, lumber, and agricultural products to the value of $1,000,000 a year. If the United States, now the virtual possessor of Puerto Rico, will leave her that market upon the terms at which she now has it, she will accord our fishermen access to her inshore preserves. An easy settlement is anticipated, though a protest from New England fishermen, who have suffered much in Nova Scotia, and now feel themselves entitled to the whole profits of the conquered territory, will have consideration.

If any treaty results from the conference, it will surely contain a provision that pelagic fur-sealing in Bering Sea shall be stopped forthwith, regardless of the time limit fixed by the Paris tribunal. Canadian sealers may have to be compensated for being deprived of their right to slaughter these valuable animals in their own peculiarly nefarious fashion, but Mr. Laurier is prepared to ask his Parliament for an appropriation for that purpose.

The rumor has gone forth, with scores of others, that the Joint High Commission has already agreed upon a settlement of the Alaska-Canadian boundary specifically. The statement is doubtless premature, but it is not so improbable that agreement has been reached upon the general proposition that legal and scientific experts may be employed and other arrangements made for the more complete definition and marking of any part of the frontier-line by land or water "where the same is now so insufficiently defined or marked as to be liable to dispute."

The Commission has considered the alien-labor law and the questions growing out of it, and while virulence had been shown in both countries in dealing with it, it appears now that a spirit of conciliation has succeeded one of retaliation. The Canadian Minister of the Interior, in a laudable effort to colonize remote unoccupied sections of the country, unwittingly attracted to it large numbers of a class of most undesirable immigrants, many of whom would have been turned back at Ellis Island, but here found no bar to admission. What numbers of these passed over into the United States is not certain, but that United States immigration laws were constantly evaded is admitted to be true. The need, therefore, of uniform laws is so plain that the Commission could not fail to recognize it; nor did it overlook whatever justice there may be in the argument that the special legislation of the United States against the admission of the seasonal labor of Canada, which finds a market in the Dakotas during harvesting and in New England during the fishing period, wrought a hardship, not only to a not undesirable kind of alien labor, but also to those United States citizens by whom this seasonal service is really needed.

S. A. WETMORE.

"THE GOLFICIDE," AND OTHER TALES OF THE FAIR GREEN.—By W. G. van T. Sutphen.—Illustrated.—16mo, Cloth, Ornamental, $1 00.—Harper & Brothers.

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google
Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE

WRIGHTS
GENUINE HEALTH
UNDERWEAR

Constructed on the hygienic principle of maintaining an equable temperature whether the body is at rest or during violent exercise. This result is obtained by having a quantity of air stored next to the skin, which is made possible by having the wool, which comes in contact with the skin, fastened to the outer fabric in tiny loops—each separate—thus providing air space. This also prevents shrinking or felting in washing. All the Genuine Wrights garments are constructed on this principle. Send for our booklet, mailed free if you mention this magazine. In purchasing, look for this trade ticket, denoting the genuine garment.

WRIGHTS UNDERWEAR CO.
New York City.

VICI
Leather Dressing

The best Shoe Dressing in the world. The genuine is made only by Robert H. Foerderer, Philadelphia, manufacturer of the famous

VICI KID

Ask your dealer for Vici Leather Dressing, and be sure the trade-mark with the name of the maker, is on each box or bottle. Imitations may ruin your shoes.

A book about buying, wearing and caring for shoes, mailed free. Address
ROBERT H. FOERDERER, Philada., Pa.

STATEMENT OF
THE TRAVELERS
Life and Accident & Insurance Company,
OF HARTFORD, CONN.
Chartered 1865. (Stock.) Life and Accident Insurance.
JAMES G. BATTERSON, Pres't.

Hartford, Conn., January 1, 1898.

| | |
|---|---|
| PAID-UP CAPITAL, - | $1,000,000.00 |
| Assets (Accident Premiums in the hands of Agents not included.) | $22,868,994.16 |
| Liabilities, . . . | 19,146,359.04 |
| Excess Security to Policy-holders, | $3,722,635.12 |

July 1, 1898.

| | |
|---|---|
| Total Assets (Accident Premiums in the hands of Agents not included.) | $24,103,986.67 |
| Total Liabilities, . . . | 19,859,291.43 |
| Excess Security to Policy-holders, | $4,244,695.24 |

| | |
|---|---|
| Paid to Policy-holders since 1864, | $35,660,940.19 |
| Paid to Policy-holders January–July, '98, . . . | 1,300,493.68 |
| Loaned to Policy-holders on Policies (Life), . . . | 1,161,705.00 |
| Life Insurance in Force, | 94,646,669.00 |

GAINS.
6 Months—January to July, 1898.

| | |
|---|---|
| In Assets, . . . . . | $1,234,992.51 |
| In Surplus (to Policy-holders), | 522,060.12 |
| In Insurance in Force (Life Department only), . . . | 2,764,459.00 |
| Increase in Reserves, . . | 705,642.18 |
| Premiums Received, 6 Months, | 2,937,432.77 |

JOHN E. MORRIS, Secretary.
EDWARD V. PRESTON, Sup't of Agencies.
J. B. LEWIS, M.D. Medical Director and Adjuster,
SYLVESTER C. DUNHAM, Counsel.
NEW YORK OFFICE, 31 Nassau St.

The Improved
BOSTON GARTER
Is the recognized
STANDARD for MEN'S WEAR.
Keeps the Stocking Free from Wrinkles
DOES NOT BIND
THE Velvet Grip CUSHION BUTTON CLASP
Lies flat to the leg. Does not tear the stocking, and will not unfasten accidentally.
SOLD EVERYWHERE
Sample Pair by Mail { Silk. 50c. / Cotton, 25c.
GEORGE FROST CO.
BOSTON, MASS.

Your Salary

depends on your value. Technical knowledge will greatly increase your value. Study at home. Success guaranteed. Best text books free.

STENOGRAPHY

Bridge Steam, Electrical or Civil Engineering; Mathematics; Chemistry; Mining; Architectural or Mechanical Drawing; Surveying; Plumbing; Architecture; Metal Pattern Drafting; Prospecting; Book-keeping; English Branches

TAUGHT BY MAIL

Circular free. State subject you wish to study. Estab. 1891. 45,000 students and graduates. The International Correspondence Schools, Box 1159 Scranton, Pa.

$2.00 a Month

No. 4711. WHITE ROSE GLYCERINE SOAP.

Transparent as crystal. The strictly hygienic properties and absolute purity, as well as the refined and delicate perfume of this toilet soap, have placed it at the apex of all.

SOLD UNIVERSALLY. SAMPLE CAKE 15 CENTS.
MÜLHENS & KROPFF, U. S. AGENTS, NEW YORK

7,000 Guns in Stock

WE SELL GUNS of every reputable American and foreign make, and give wholesale prices to everybody. We carry in stock

Fishing Tackle and Sporting Goods amounting to a quarter of a million dollars. We can please the fancy of millionaires, or meet the demands of the poorest sportsman and angler. Write for prices, or ask us to send you our Sporting Goods Catalogue. We load and sell over

1,000,000 Hand Loaded Shells a Year
Ask us to send you our price card of hand and machine loaded shells. We have

The largest Gun Repair Shop in America
We make guns, re-bore, re-stock, repair—in fact, alter a gun to suit the owner, and guarantee satisfaction. Write for prices.

MONTGOMERY WARD & CO.
Originators of the Catalogue Business
111 to 120 Michigan Ave. cor. Madison St., Chicago
MENTION THIS PUBLICATION WHEN WRITING

The Best is the Cheapest

Rae's Olive Oil is both the best and cheapest, quality considered.

The Chemical Analysis of S. Rae & Co.'s Finest Sublime Lucca Oil, made Sept. 15th, 1896, by the Ledoux Chemical Laboratory, declares it to be "unadulterated by admixture with any other oil or other substance. It is free from rancidity and all other undesirable qualities, and it is of Superior Quality and Flavor."

S. RAE & CO., Leghorn, Italy.
Established 1836.

Financial

Letters of Credit. Bills of Exchange bought and sold. Cable Transfers to Europe and South Africa. Commercial and Travellers' Letters of Credit. Collections made.

Brown Brothers & Co.,
BANKERS, No. 59 WALL STREET.

THE BEST PENS ARE
ESTERBROOK & CO. PROFESSIONAL PEN
PENS
ESTERBROOK'S
LEADING NUMBERS:
048, 14, 130, 239, 313, Al, 556.
PENS IN ALL STYLES, FOR EVERY PURPOSE.
FOR SALE BY ALL STATIONERS.
The Esterbrook Steel Pen Co.
26 John St., N.Y. Works, Camden, N.J.

BRASS BAND

Instruments, Drums, Uniforms, Equipments for Bands and Drum Corps. Lowest prices ever quoted. Fine Catalog, 400 Illustrations, mailed free; it gives Band Music & Instructions for Amateur Bands.
LYON & HEALY. 17 Adams St., Chicago.

Those Fine English Tobaccos

Capstan
Bird's Eye
Westward Ho
Three Castles
Gold Flake, etc.

Put up by W. D. & H. O. WILLS, of Bristol, England, and famous the world over for their superb flavor and exquisite aroma, can be obtained for you by your dealer. If he will not get them, write to us for price-list of the well-known brands.
J. W. SURBRUG, Sole Agent, 159 Fulton Street, NEW YORK.

HARPER'S CATALOGUE
Descriptive list of their publications, with portrait of authors, will be sent by mail to any address on receipt of ten cents.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

"I've called to tell you, sir, that the photographs you took of us the other day are not at all satisfactory; why, my husband looks like an ape!"

"Well, madam, what fault did you find with the photographs?"

A simple and proper method of cleaning costly and easily injured articles is to make a suds of hot water and Ivory Soap, and allow it to cool until lukewarm. This solution, while very effective, is perfectly harmless.

Ivory Soap contains no alkali. It will not destroy the surface or texture of any material, however delicate.

Ivory Soap differs from other soaps. It is more carefully made, and the materials used in its manufacture are the purest and best.

Copyright, 1897, by The Procter & Gamble Co., Cincinnati.

Armour's
Extract of Beef
"has that rich, beefy flavor."
It's handy for summer use, requires no cooking, may be used with hot or cold water.
"Culinary Wrinkles" may be had for the asking—gives 50 ways for using Extract.
ARMOUR & COMPANY, CHICAGO.

Arnold Constable & Co.
Upholstery.
Velour Glacé,
Tapestry Silk Damask,
for Curtains and Furniture Covering.
Real Lace Curtains.
Arabian, Marie Antoinette, Brussels, and Renaissance.
Tamboured Lace and Muslin
for Sash Curtains.
Broadway & 19th st.
NEW YORK.

For absolute comfort and convenience in CAMPING or YACHTING
"PERFECTION"
AIR MATTRESSES AND CUSHIONS
are important requisites—they are waterproof, light, and convenient—can be deflated and rolled into small compass. Desirable for hospital or home use.
Free illustrated catalogue tells all about them.
MECHANICAL FABRIC CO.,
Air-Goods Department, Providence, R. I.

"He lets me have good tobacco."
—BEN: JONSON.
How particular are you about your pipe tobacco? Is the price an object?—there are hundreds of cheap kinds. Is the quality an object? One kind is perfection!
Yale mixture
A Gentleman's Smoke
is made for fastidious smokers who appreciate its pleasant flavor and unvarying excellence.

Nathan B. Goodnow & Co.,
BANKERS.
ESTABLISHED 1873.
2 Post Office Sq., Boston, Mass.
Transact a General Banking Business, including the Purchase and Sale of Stocks, Bonds, and Grain, for Investment or on Margin.
Dealers in Government and Railroad Bonds.
Books containing Four-Year Range of Prices, Dividends, and Earnings sent free on request.
A Permanently Invested Fund of over TWO HUNDRED AND TWENTY-FOUR THOUSAND DOLLARS is held as a Guaranteed Security for all persons having business with us.
Correspondence solicited.

HARPER'S CATALOGUE thoroughly revised and classified, will be sent by mail to any address on receipt of ten cents.

HARTSHORN SHADE ROLLERS are perfect in action. Over 40 years' experience guides the manufacture. Get the improved. No tacks required. To avoid imitations, notice script name of Stewart Hartshorn on label.

TRADE E & W MARK
EARL & WILSON'S LINEN COLLARS & CUFFS
BEST IN THE WORLD.

WALLINGFORD, CONNECTICUT.
ROSEMARY HALL, a Country School for Girls.
MISS RUNTZ REES, Principal.
Ninth year begins Oct. 1, 1898.

A work of unusual value, and will be indispensable to every one who seeks to study modern monetary history.—The London Athenæum.

INTERNATIONAL MONETARY CONFERENCES
Their Purposes, Character, and Result
By HENRY B. RUSSELL

There is a great deal which the reader may learn from this volume. He will find from Mr. Russell that the United States, in seeking to promote the use of silver in their coinage arrangements, have not been influenced by purely selfish reasons, and he will discover also how difficult it is for even the most impartial thinker to clear himself of the influence of his own surroundings. . . . Mr. Russell has confined his labors to the useful task of providing his readers with a valuable compendium of facts. He announces in his Preface that he does not intend "to advance any theory or to propose any scheme." He has honestly kept to his word. In doing so he has written a book which will be of the utmost use to the economic student in unravelling the most difficult and tangled of the monetary problems of the present day.—The London Athenæum.

8vo, Cloth, $2 50
New York HARPER & BROTHERS London
Publishers

"AMERICA'S GREAT RESORTS," 48 pages, with map, sent free on receipt of a two-cent stamp by GEORGE H. DANIELS, G. P. A. New York Central, New York.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

A NOVEL BY HENRY JAMES BEGINS THIS WEEK.

HARPER'S WEEKLY

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. XLII.—No. 2180. NEW YORK, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 1, 1898. TEN CENTS A COPY. FOUR DOLLARS A YEAR.

Copyright, 1898, by HARPER & BROTHERS. All Rights Reserved.

Spanish Officers and Men.

Colonel Glassford. Colonel Richardson.

PUERTO RICO—THE FIRST FLAG OF TRUCE AFTER THE NEWS OF PEACE.

DRAWN BY T. DE THULSTRUP AFTER A SKETCH BY T. DART WALKER, SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT OF "HARPER'S WEEKLY."—[SEE PAGE 958.]

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

HARPER'S WEEKLY

(TWENTY-FOUR PAGES)

NEW YORK CITY, OCTOBER 1, 1898

Terms: 10 Cents a Copy—$4 00 a Year, in Advance

Postage free to all Subscribers in the United States, Canada, and Mexico

Subscriptions may begin with any Number

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS

New York City: Franklin Square

London: 45 Albemarle Street, W.

Also for sale at Brentano's, 37 Avenue de l'Opéra, Paris

IN spite of the fact that we are facing a colonial problem, and that we have already acquired distant territories for which no government has been provided, the politicians are taking no steps whatever to arrange a proper system of colonial government. Such a system must have for its basis a permanent colonial service, otherwise our colonial governments will not only reflect but will exaggerate all the faults that obtain in our domestic affairs. These distant governments will be carried on by the "boys," who, far away from home, will not even be under the restraint of public opinion as expressed by the daily newspapers. Not only is it true that our politicians are not considering this problem at all, but they are actually urging the President to revise the civil service list in order that he may take some offices out of the classified list, in which they are now included. In other words, the politicians, instead of rising to new responsibilities, are insisting upon falling further and further below the old ones.

COUNT CASSINI, the Russian ambassador to the United States, delivered himself of an interview the other day, in which he insisted that the Russian movement towards the Yellow Sea, and the securing of an ice-free port as the terminus of its Siberian Railroad, had no hostile purpose in it. This may be so, but Russian assertions and Russian promises are not to be taken without question; and it is to be hoped that Lord CHARLES BERESFORD will make so strong an impression upon the potentates of the Yang-tse-kiang valley that the Russian effort to extend its commerce will be confined to the north of China. The people of the United States are very deeply interested in maintaining and increasing their trade with China, which may become better than it is even with China under Russian auspices, but which will be better still if British influences prevail. It is more than probable, as Mr. H. W. WILSON points out in the September National Review, that a firm British foreign policy will obtain and maintain all that is needed for British commercial expansion. Under the circumstances, however, we think that a firm front on the part of Great Britain will be much better than an acceptance of the Tsar's policy of disarmament, at least until the Tsar himself indicates his good faith by beating his own spears into pruning-hooks.

THE difficulty which the President has had in securing commissioners for the purpose of investigating the complaints made against army administration was to have been expected. We do not think that at this time an investigation for the purpose of finding out the persons guilty of the incompetence and indifference which resulted in so much hardship to the troops will be very valuable. The country knows that great blunders have been made, and that staff corps have shown themselves for some reason or other to be inefficient. But underlying the incompetency and indifference is the bad system under which such things are inevitable. If a commission should be decided on to consider this phase of the question, which is essential and fundamental, we do not think the President would find much difficulty in securing commissioners who would undertake the task. If the examination could be diverted from an inquiry whose result must be offensive to individuals, to an inquiry into the system which must be remedied if we are to have an efficient army organization, we think Mr. MCKINLEY would find that first-rate men would come to his assistance. This is the work which is of most importance, and which must be done if Congress is to be convinced that its own interference with military command is the essential evil to be cured.

THE Duc d'Orleans has come to the support of the French army in the DREYFUS case. This is perfectly natural. The Prince desires to be put upon the throne of his ancestors, and knows that his ambition cannot be realized except with the help of the army. The issue in France between the army and the people—that is, between the army and personal liberty and law and order—is growing more and more clearly defined. The army has been convicted of having, through a court martial, condemned DREYFUS to a horrible punishment for a crime of which he has not been proved guilty, and of which it is very clear that Major ESTERHAZY is guilty. He was condemned not only on insufficient evidence, but in secret, and on testimony which is tainted with forgery and fraud; and yet the President of the republic, the head of the house of Orleans, the commanding officers of the army, and some of the leading statesmen of France unite in insisting that his punishment shall be continued, and that his case shall not be revised. In other words, it is held by many high authorities that whatever the army does must stand unquestioned. This is a bad outlook for the individual Frenchman, but a much worse prospect for the French Republic. Indeed, it seems that there is no republic in France, and that the army is her irresponsible tyrant. In order to carry out their purpose to suppress all criticism the chiefs of the army have demanded Colonel PICQUART from the civil authorities, and have lodged him in the military prison of Cherche Midi. This, Colonel PICQUART suggests, is for the purpose of murdering him, and the populace is beginning to ask if the officers of the general staff are all criminals.

THE war has accomplished something for politics in New York. Colonel ROOSEVELT'S career as leader of the Rough Riders has so aroused public opinion, or excited the public imagination, that Senator THOMAS C. PLATT is obliged to accept him as the Republican candidate for Governor. This must have been a very serious blow to the Republican boss and to the Republican machine, but it is not half so serious now as it will be if Mr. ROOSEVELT be elected Governor. He says, and Mr. ODELL affirms his statements, that no conditions were imposed and no terms were demanded by Mr. PLATT at the consultation between the two, when Mr. PLATT accepted him. The Senator seems to have surrendered unconditionally. Mr. ROOSEVELT is therefore not bound even by a promise that ought to be broken. We know, of course, that he would not have made any such promise, and Mr. PLATT seems to have been shrewd enough to realize that it was useless to impose terms upon a man of his character. The result of Mr. ROOSEVELT'S administration, if he should be elected, ought to be the destruction of the PLATT machine. Mr. ROOSEVELT will find it difficult to carry on his office, because he will be beset by demands for places and for money-making opportunities made by and on behalf of men who he knows ought not to be trusted with public employment, but he will have the courage to meet this emergency as he has met other emergencies, and his administration is likely to be a fresh breeze blowing through the corruption with which the machines have tainted the State government. By the end of his administration there will probably be a Republican party in the State, but the Republican machine will be very nearly useless.

WE cannot sympathize entirely with Mr. R. FULTON CUTTING and the other Independent gentlemen who have sought to put Mr. ROOSEVELT in nomination before the meeting of the Republican Convention. We quite agree with them that it is well to vindicate the right of the Independents to make nominations, and to resent the attitude of the party bosses towards free citizens. PLATT and CROKER do not believe that any other persons in the State than themselves have the right to put candidates in nomination, and so far as the Independents' action resents this insolence it is wholesome. But there is another consideration. Mr. ROOSEVELT wants to be Governor, and wants to be Governor through the success of the Republican party, to which he is apparently much attached. That Mr. ROOSEVELT is a good man for Governor has been shown by the action of the Independents themselves, and the desire of the people of the State to vote for him for that office is pretty evident. Now the independent movement for Mr. ROOSEVELT made by Mr. CUTTING and his friends really imperilled Mr. ROOSEVELT'S chances. That the threatened danger was not greater was due to the enormous popularity of Mr. ROOSEVELT, but if the politicians had had half a chance to throw down this popular candidate they would have done so, and would have seized upon the action of the Independents as a pretext. This is clearly recognized by most people, who therefore regard the Independents as marplots. It is one of the essential elements of political success, and especially of the success of a new party seeking public favor, that there should be popular confidence not only in the integrity but in the intelligence of those who conduct the movement. Therefore the fact that the voters generally look upon this action of the Independents as a foolish and useless attempt, and as one likely to result in damage to the candidate for whom they want to vote, injures the Independent movement. We believe in independent movements. We want independent movements founded upon the idea that both virtue and intelligence are necessary to success in politics. The action of Mr. CUTTING and his friends has invited unpopularity, and is the sort of thing which for nearly a generation has injured independent movements and helped to keep the machines in power.

SHALL WE SHAME DEMOCRACY?

ALTHOUGH the Peace Commissioners have taken their departure for Paris, where they will meet the Spanish Commissioners, it is not too late for the American people to express their views upon the policy of annexation and expansion. The administration has thrown the subject into the arena of public discussion, and has invited the people to express their opinions. It does not matter that, to a certain extent, a conclusion has been reached and formulated in instructions imparted to the Commissioners. These instructions may still be changed by the public, if its voice in behalf of reason can make itself heard. Thus far there has been a timorous reticence on the part of those who often do the speaking for the country, although, as has been shown more than once, they are frequently in the minority, and that decidedly. But in the presence of this most momentous problem, the most momentous that has been presented to the republic for solution since the Constitution was adopted, political parties are silent and evasive, and many of the newspapers, especially those which are supposed to speak more or less for the administration, are strangely reticent and halt in their opinions. In truth, we have good reason to believe that this reticence means doubt on the part of some of those who will have most to say touching the ratification of the treaty. But some of the expansion advocates have been so noisy that they have seemed to be the whole country. As a matter of fact, however, the country has not spoken, while its most trustworthy organs have avoided speech, or have uttered only delphic tones. It is the last chance for debate and opposition, and those who fear evil for the country in the possible annexation of Cuba and the Philippines must now speak, or forever after hold their peace.

It is unnecessary to examine with any care or seriousness the arguments which have been advanced by the expansionists. The sentiment for expansion often proceeds from the bosom and not from the head. Fundamentally it is imitative, or at least it is suggested by what is being done in Africa and the East by the powers of Europe. Curiously enough, too, the false impression as to the value of colonies, and as to the methods by which colonies have been made valuable, that prevails in the mediæval mind of the German Emperor prevails also with our democratic imperialists. They are for following France and Germany's revival of the sixteenth, seventeenth, and eighteenth century method, because England, having been taught, as Spain has at last learned, that the method was attended with disastrous and even fatal consequences, has succeeded in her wholly different nineteenth-century scheme—a scheme demonstrated to be absolutely impossible in such tropical islands as we are urged to assume. Was any important thing ever so droll or childish? The imperialists say, however, that we ought to play "our part in the world"; that we ought to assume our responsibilities; that we have a destiny to fulfil; that we owe it to civilization to see that good and stable government shall take the place of Spanish rule, and that the people of Cuba and the Philippines are unfit to govern themselves. All of this, reduced to sensible terms, means that the United States will be bigger, and its people more entitled to strut, if we take on distant possessions. We dismiss also as of little value the contention that we must keep these various islands because we have taken them, and that their conquest has in some way changed our obligations to the world. We do not share in this view of the impotency of the country. We have just those obligations, and no others, in this respect, as we assume. We have taken these islands in due course of war, and, if it is for our advantage to drop them, we may do so without any dishonor whatever. We are no more morally bound, in the pretended interest of civilization, to keep the Philippines and Cuba than we were bound to take them. The assertion by foreign powers that, hav-

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

ing conquered Spain, we are under obligations to them to retain her territory, inconvenient and hurtful though such retention may be to us, is a bit of insolence that may be best resented by not heeding the specious appeal to our cupidity.

We believe that the best interests of the United States will be consulted if the islands can be surrendered to their people, with a proper regard to vested interests of natives, Spaniards, and other foreigners. Whether the government adopted by the people be good or otherwise is not for us to decide with any nicety. The people of every country have a right to determine their own form of government. If it is bad, they must suffer until suffering and experience bring improvement. If it is so bad that their neighbors suffer, their neighbors have the usual remedy. We cannot deny to the Cubans and the people of the Philippines the right to govern themselves without denying the assertions of our own Declaration of Independence. Our refusal to permit these foreign peoples to rule themselves would be an assault by the republic upon what it has declared to be a fundamental human right, while if we proceed henceforth upon the theory that our duty requires that we shall exercise a tutelage over peoples who unsuccessfully try to govern themselves, where will our conquests end? And are we prepared to assert that our own house is in such order, that we can consistently undertake the management of our neighbors' affairs?

Our refusal, therefore, to permit the former subjects of Spain to govern themselves will discredit the democratic form of government, and will deny the validity of the idea on which we based our own revolution against Great Britain. In the second place, Congress solemnly promised that the war against Spain should not be one of aggression or of aggrandizement. Our enemies on the Continent of Europe have predicted from the first that we would not keep this promise, and that we never intended to keep it. This is not true so far as the people are concerned. It is a prediction born of animosity. If they consent to keep the conquered territory, it will be because they will believe that conditions have changed, and that the promise is therefore no longer binding. But this, in our opinion, will be a false conception of the fact, and ought not to excuse a breach of our word. Do we want to give the enemies of popular government the right to say that democracies are as untruthful, as avaricious, as indifferent to the rights of other people, as ready to deprive them of their liberties and their lands, as are empires and monarchies? Is there any possible gain that we can derive from the possession of Cuba and the Philippines that can compensate the world for the loss of the faith which it has hitherto had in democracy as the promoter of peace, as the generous succorer of the down-trodden, as the friend of personal liberty, as the bulwark of the modern principle that government of the people is by the people and for the people?

Besides the wrongs that we will do to democracy and to our own reputation for frankness and fair dealing, we must count the cost of colonial government. We shall need an army of 150,000 men for the colonies alone, not to speak of the great increase of our navy that would be necessary. They say that our commerce will be vastly benefited by these new possessions. We venture to reply that for every dollar that we would gain by an increase of trade with tropical islands we would gain a thousand dollars by opening our own markets to the more abundant commerce of Europe. Not only would our expenditures for military and naval establishments be increased, the army would necessarily be wholly regular and permanent. We are already learning that we cannot use militia and volunteers to garrison or defend colonies. We are already hearing complaints from one end of the Union to the other because the government wishes to keep "our boys" in Cuba and Puerto Rico for two years. We have learned too that Congress is not a proper body to govern military forces, and that it ought not to be intrusted with the power to declare war. But these powers are grants of the Constitution, which must be amended in this respect if we are to become an efficient military power. We have learned also that the constitutional power of the Senate to ratify treaties may be dangerous to the peace of the country at times when tension is great. If, for example, our relations with a foreign power, through our acts in the East, should become as delicate as those between France and England on account of the MARCHAND expedition at Fashoda, how many speeches by Senators, such as those that were made against Spain last spring, would be required to bring on war? Then, too, we know that for years to come our colonies must be governed by friends of the Senators, because the Senate has the power to confirm the President's appointments, which means the power to dictate them. Add to all, the insistence of Congress to determine all executive and administrative action by statute, and its constant neglect of all its duties over Territories, and we have, in anticipation, the crudest, most expensive, and most dangerous foreign relations that can well be imagined. We can much more easily count the cost than the advantage of the proposed experiment, and the cost must be so enormous that blind folly alone can urge the country to incur it.

THE CONNECTICUT RING.

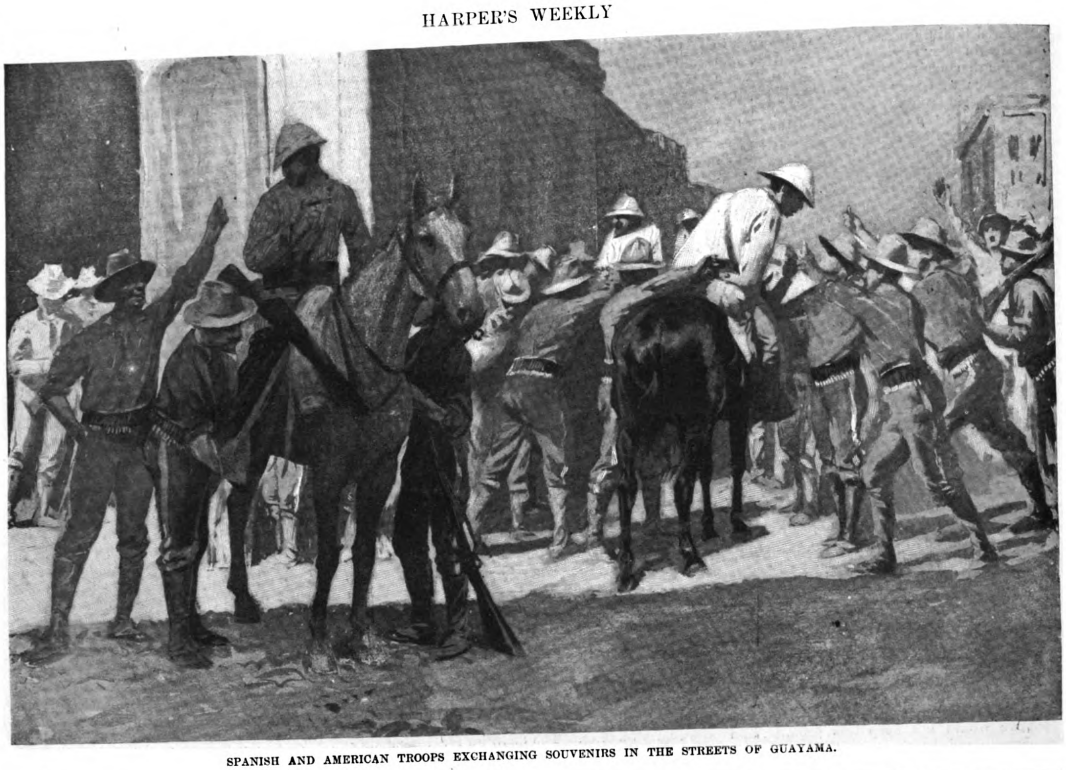
THE two uprisings against the bosses of which we spoke the other week have had very different terminations. The boss of New York, so far as the Governorship thereof is concerned, has followed the precedent of the snakes of Ireland, and "committed suicide to save himself from slaughter." Nobody imagines that Senator PLATT would have accepted a nomination so intensely antagonistic to his power and so intensely antipathetic to his taste as that of Colonel ROOSEVELT for any other reason than sheer necessity. He has surrendered under threat of a movement upon his "works."

In Connecticut the case was much more difficult, and the result correspondingly different. It is not likely that Mr. PORTER was under any illusions about his undertaking. To attack the Republican ring in Connecticut was in the nature of a forlorn hope, and it is a considerable personal triumph for the candidate of honesty to have received the votes of about one-third of a convention packed as Republican conventions in Connecticut are. Indeed, it is hard to imagine any conditions more discouraging to reformers than those which prevail in Connecticut. The party rule there is not of a boss, but of a ring. The facilities for ring-making are imbedded in the political constitution of the commonwealth. The rotten borough system, under which a stagnant rural township has the same weight in the councils of the State as a growing industrial community ten times its size, is as promising a breeding-ground for jobbery and corruption as the wit of man could devise. Every rotten borough necessarily has its boss, and every boss necessarily has his price. It is his interest to get his price, and to this end to multiply opportunities for selling himself. Every other local boss being actuated by the same desires, the necessary outcome is government by blackmail. Those who groan under the rule of a single boss have no reason to envy those who groan under the rule of a ring. When the boss becomes intolerable, he can be disposed of by beating him at the polls. But a ring of small local bosses and blackmailers is like MILTON'S angels, "Vital in every part," it "can but by annihilation die," and it cannot be annihilated by a single defeat. As NERO wished that the people of Rome had but a single neck, that he might sever it at a blow, so the unhappy people of Connecticut might wish that their tyrant were an individual, that they might decapitate him all at once. But a boss that is also a hydra is not to be disposed of so summarily. Indeed, so apt are the legal conditions of Connecticut for the production of the hydra-boss, that it is doubtful whether he can be got rid of until the conditions are removed. This will require the united efforts of all the decent people in the State who are ashamed of its present political degradation. That degradation is much more widespread than people outside of Connecticut are aware. It affects not only what is properly State legislation, but what is properly local legislation. The government of log-rolling and blackmail which it produces extends to the affairs of all the boroughs—the rotten and the sound. There is scarcely a community in the State which is not systematically plundered under color of law and the authority of the Legislature. The smallest village in the State is not too small to escape the attention of the local spoilsmen, who together make up the State ring.

The importance of rescuing Connecticut from the ring of log-rollers and blackmailers which is engaged in exploiting it for their own advantage is obvious to every citizen who does not profit by the exploitation. No American State is in a condition of deeper political degradation. Perhaps in no other does the corruption of politics so "come home to men's business and bosoms." But, thanks to the absurd and obsolete assumption of the political equality of communities widely unequal, the combination of the local bosses is not only in possession; it is intrenched and fortified. The more necessary for the public it is that the system should be overthrown, the more necessary it is for the politicians that it should be maintained. They are fighting for life, and behind intrenchments.



Those who know the strength of the position Mr. PORTER undertook to attack know how bold was his undertaking. To them the fact that he could carry a third of the delegates to a machine-made Republican convention, so far from being discouraging, is full of promise. The political lull of which we spoke last week would have its best result if it should bring about a political reorganization on new lines. How few and slight, for example, are the points of difference between the anti-machine Republicans and the gold Democrats compared with their points of agreement! In no other State does a combination of these elements look more feasible than in Connecticut. Certainly in none is it more needed.

THE REVOLT AGAINST QUAY.

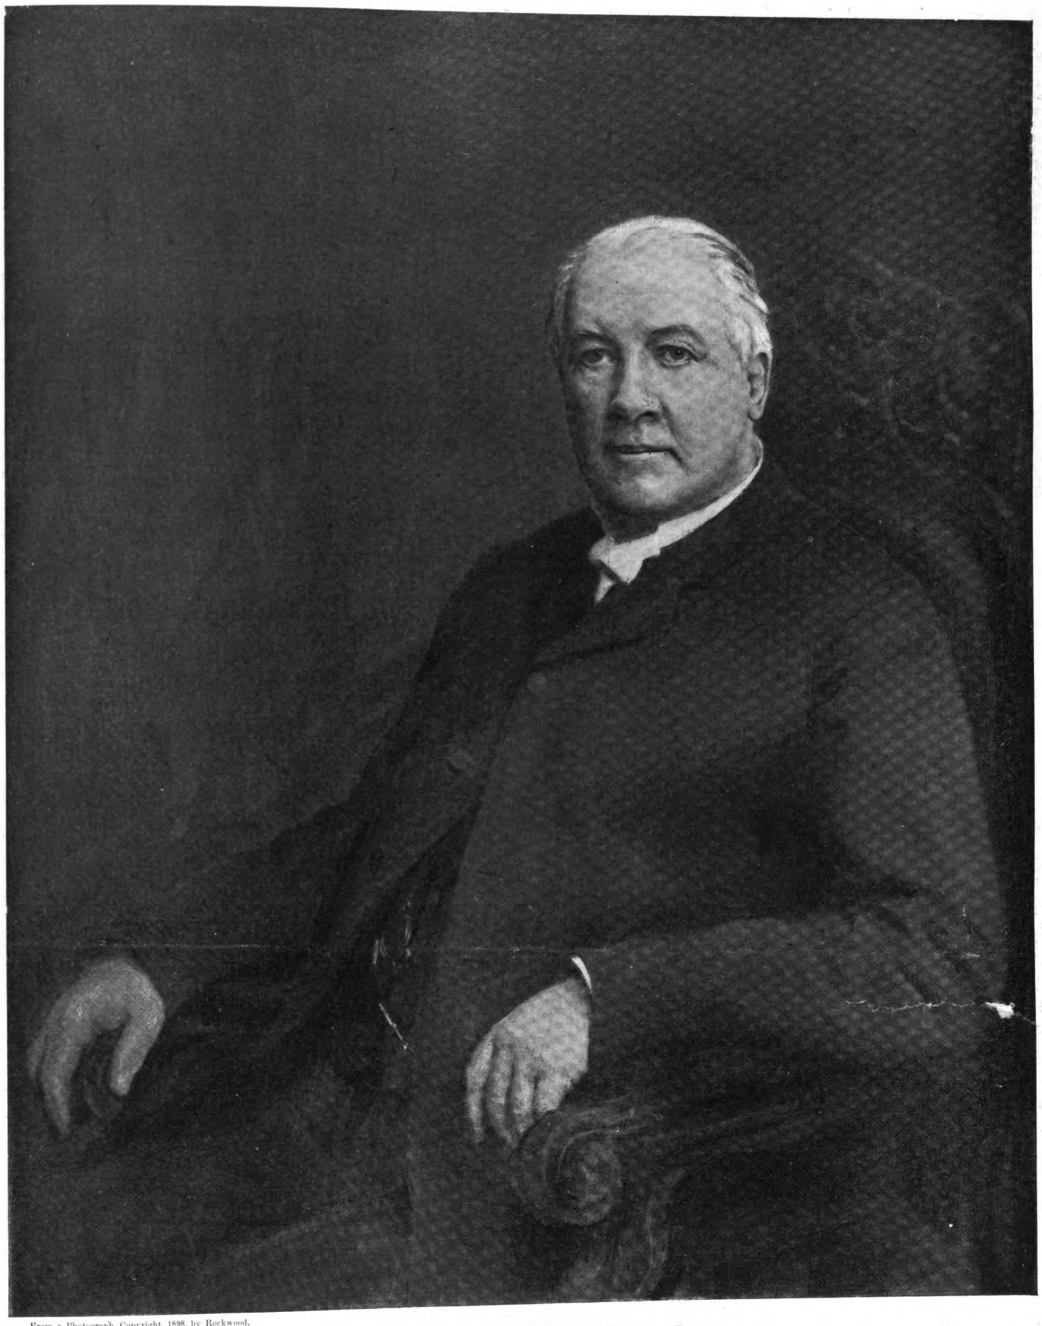
THE public-spirited citizens of Pennsylvania are engaged in another attempt to rescue the Republican party and the State government from the corrupt and withering grip of MATTHEW STANLEY QUAY. While their hopes are stronger this time than at any previous election, because they have the support of former Postmaster-General JOHN WANAMAKER, a former QUAY supporter, and that of a rival machine anxious to control the rich patronage heretofore, as well as now, at the disposal of QUAY, nevertheless, it must be confessed, though reluctantly, that QUAY'S chances of success are not of the poorest. The very fact that both the Gubernatorial and Senatorial successions are involved in the approaching election has bestirred Mr. QUAY and his machine to redoubled efforts. While it may be true, as we are informed, that he is frightened by the outlook, it must not be forgotten that he is usually scared in time to enable him to repair his fences, strengthen his lines, and bring up his re-enforcements. This wonderful capacity of political generalship, although belittled by application to machine politics, instead of being employed in the higher and more worthy forms of political activity, has always stood him in good stead; and never more so than in 1895, when Governor HASTINGS and bosses MARTIN and MAGEE of Philadelphia and Pittsburg united their forces in a determined onslaught upon him. If he was able to win then, when only the State chairmanship was involved, and with the municipal, State, and federal patronage against him, how much more likely is he to win now when a Governorship and a United States Senatorship are at stake; when the federal patronage is already his, and when the State and municipal patronage of his opponents is distributed, with no more in sight? Indeed, we cannot escape the conclusion that Mr. QUAY will win. His own forces are united and know what they want, and, from many past experiences, know how to get it, while his opponents are fighting in two different camps, one for the Governorship and the other for the Senatorship, without any vital bond of union (although both are fighting QUAY—one because it believes all machine politics are bad, and the other because it wants to be the machine). He will win, not because the people are not aroused as never before to the iniquity of his methods and his shortcomings. Last year his candidate for State Treasurer had fewer votes than his opponents combined. The sentiment for better government is now making solid and substantial growth. The reports indicate that Dr. SWALLOW, the independent candidate for Governor, is likely to poll upwards of 300,000 votes, and that he will outdistance his Democratic competitor. All this is true; but Mr. QUAY will win because he will outgeneral his opponents, as he did in 1884 when he was elected State Treasurer, and again in 1887 when he was elected United States Senator, and again in 1895 when he won the State chairmanship fight against the greatest odds.

Should he fail of having sufficient Republican votes in the next Legislature, he would not hesitate to bargain for Democratic votes. He practically dictated the Democratic nomination for Governor through the Standard Oil Company, of which Mr. "JIM" GUFFEY, the Democratic boss, is a leading representative, and with which Mr. QUAY works in close harmony. There can scarcely be a doubt that the same forces which defeated Judge GORDON in the Democratic convention will come to his rescue, if needed, in the next Legislature. Old SIMON CAMERON was not above accepting an election at the hands of corrupt Democrats, and Mr. QUAY, as his apt pupil, has no scruples against benefiting by similar practices. What Mr. QUAY is after is his re-election, not the maintenance of party or principles, except as they benefit him, and it makes no difference to him whether he is elected by Republican or Democratic votes, so long as he is elected.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

SPANISH AND AMERICAN TROOPS EXCHANGING SOUVENIRS IN THE STREETS OF GUAYAMA.



RECEPTION GIVEN IN HONOR OF GENERAL MILES BY PROMINENT CITIZENS OF PONCE.

HEALING THE WOUNDS OF WAR IN PUERTO RICO.

DRAWN BY LUCIUS HITCHCOCK AND T. K. HANNA, JR., AFTER SKETCHES BY T. DART WALKER, SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT OF "HARPER'S WEEKLY."

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

From a Photograph, Copyright, 1898, by Rockwood.

REV. JOHN HALL, D.D.—Drawn by William Thorne.

THE REV. DR. JOHN HALL.

The melancholy announcement of the death of the Rev. Dr. Hall comes to many thoughtful people as a sharp and saddening reminder of the transitoriness of life. We are accustomed to submit with equanimity to the inferior and secondary changes incidental to a hurrying and an overcrowded age. Many, indeed, welcome changes of a certain class, as adding variety to life. But all who care profoundly for the best things delight in the continuity of life's greater relationships; and sometimes, to the point of self-delusion, we all but persuade ourselves that things which are strong and wholesome and gladdening and good must remain with us always. Especially is this true of those human relationships of others toward ourselves and toward society at large, which convey to the world gifts of strengthening, encouragement, and consolation.

As one by one the greater poets of the Victorian Age have passed out of the world, a strange sense of lopeliness has occurred in many hearts which, without ever having come into personal contact with the men themselves, loved to think of them as alive and speaking. It was so when Longfellow died. Tens of thousands who never had seen him walked with sadness on their faces because of the knowledge that this world no longer held his sympathetic and refined spirit. It was so when Tennyson "crost the bar." He had lived so long, had wrought so mightily, it seemed as if he must live on forever.

So is it now as multitudes who never saw his face learn of Dr. John Hall's departure from the world.

All who knew his name and his worth hoped that the strong and good preacher was endowed with gifts of physical and mental vigor which might suffice for many active and beneficent years to come.

We had grown so used to his presence in the pulpit, to his influence in the pastorate, to his grave and kindly presence in the councils of the church, it had not occurred to us that the time was drawing near when one who had made his pulpit as a throne among us for an entire generation must abdicate the station so long and so honorably maintained.

It is not our purpose to enter into any account of Dr. John Hall's life and life work. The chief facts therein are commonly known. His career in America has had such grand simplicity of outline it is readily comprehended, and has become a part of the familiar and common knowledge of the people. But it does seem worth while, at a time when many changes are occurring in men and in institutions, to inquire into the secret of that hold upon the public respect and public affection which was evidently gained by Dr. Hall long ago, and which he retained to the very end.

Dr. Hall had never felt called upon to enter aggressively into public affairs in this country, as some other excellent men in the ministry have entered; he had taken no active part in political reforms, nor had he identified himself conspicuously with sociological experiments. He had not distinguished himself as a theological controversialist. His opinions on controverted points were expressed with power and with clearness, but so far as we remember he abstained from those polemical activities in and through which other men have acquired distinction. Yet further, Dr. Hall had never gained fame as a rhetorician. His manner of speech had been singularly moderate, grave, plain, close to the facts of life, and of the sort that common people can understand.

By what means, then, it may be asked, did he gain this unusual hold upon public affection and appreciation? We think an answer may be given. Dr. Hall's commanding influence as a figure in American ecclesiastical and social life was gained by fidelity to a certain conception of the preaching office, by fidelity to his official responsibilities, by fidelity to the lives of individuals.

He was faithful to a certain conception of the preaching office. That conception may be described as ambassadorial. He looked upon himself as an ambassador of Christ charged with a message. It was the steadfast labor of his life to deliver the message. He appears to have thought far less of himself and of the rhetorical modes of

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148 delivery than of the message committed unto him. He believed that message without mental reservation, and, with a single-hearted earnestness which appealed equally to men of widely different faiths, he spoke what he believed to be "the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth." There is something in human society which recognizes this fidelity and is drawn toward it. Society may be insincere in many things, yet it is sincere enough to know and to reverence sincerity when it finds it. And whether men have agreed with Dr. Hall in his point of view or not, they have believed not only in the sincerity of his convictions, but in his loyalty to the ambassadorial conception of the preaching office.
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

So also did he gain his power in the community by fidelity to his official obligations. He brought with him to America an old country training in the grand principle of responsibility. To watch his busy life from day to day, wending its serious way from one church board to another, from one philanthropic society to another, was in itself an education. Many men are glad enough to accept the official distinction of membership in ecclesiastical or social organizations, and then to let their duties sit very lightly upon their shoulders. Not so with Dr. Hall. For him to belong to anything having official responsibility was a great reality, and in each of his many offices as trustee of religious or philanthropic associations he seemed to give his whole mind to the immediate duties devolving upon him. The continuity of this practice through an entire generation made him a tower of strength. It was by faithful deeds, by regular hours of attendance, by sagacious and thoughtful counsel, he won his great place in the social and religious life of our community.

But almost beyond all else was his fidelity to individuals. He cared for people. The simple annals of human life as they are unfolding within the dwellings of average men, women, and children were great in his sight. The joys and the sorrows, the aspirations and the perplexities, the living and the dying, of simple folk called forth the richest and the best which he had to give. He went about doing good. And as the day has come, which we hoped might be a far distant day, when his familiar face and form shall no longer appear on the streets of New York, few names in all the history of this populous and composite city will represent more honest love and respect of men than the name of the kind, genial, godly Irish gentleman, who for thirty years stood in the midst of us, true to his divine master, and true to his duty as a helper of human souls. CHARLES CUTHBERT HALL.

Union Theological Seminary, New York.

IN THE MONSOON OFF MANILA.

[Special Correspondence of "Harper's Weekly."]

Cavité, August 5.

When the rain lets up long enough to give a fair view nowadays, this part of Manila Bay presents a very businesslike appearance to American eyes. Possibly the Spanish, looking out from the walls of their beleaguered city, may see something businesslike going on off Punta Sanglei too. His Excellency von Diederichs, admiral of the German navy, may take an occasional glance across from the quarter-deck of his big battle-ship Kaiser, flagship of the squadron here, and give some time to meditation on what he sees. The Filipinos understand at last, apparently, and if they are not content, they make small show of their displeasure. Anchored in a huge semi-circle that begins far down in Cañacao Bay, where the Manila lies, and extends out by Sanglei Point clear around to a point just off the arsenal that was once the particular pride of the Spanish, lie thirty-two ships, all belonging to the United States, or in the service of their army and navy. They lie so close together, and spread over so much of the horizon, that at night they shut out the view of Manila from the Cavité shore almost entirely, and of all the great rows of brilliant arc-lights that nightly twinkle along the ruined Luneta only here and there one shows through to warn us that Manila is yet Spanish, and is yet gay, even though hard pressed on sea and land.

To begin with the navy—for the navy began this Philippine business—there are eight ships of American construction whose business is solely the making of war, and two which were built by the Spaniards for the same purpose, but now fly the stars and stripes in recognition of our superior ability at the game. First of our ships, of course, in every respect but one, is the big fine cruiser Olympia, flag-ship of the nervy Dewey, who won his second silver star and jumped a grade by the work he did in Manila Bay on May-day. One ship in his squadron excels his flag-ship in the business work of war-making, the Monitor Monterey. A long time had the lookouts on the ships of Dewey's fleet been watching the Boca Grande for the column of smoke that should herald the "flat-iron's" coming; and yesterday, when they saw it, and when the solid heavy-weight of the fighting fleet steamed past Sanglei Point, and her guns roared in obeisance to the two-starred flag fluttering from the Olympia's main-truck, a cheer went round the leaden-sided American ships, such as Cavité had not heard since that day when the greatest difficulty with our fighting was the desire of the Jackies to stop and cheer. Close in beside the Olympia lies the single-funnelled Charleston, standing up very straight and dignified since Captain Glass used her to compel the surrender of the rich and fertile Ladrone Islands. Beyond the Charleston lies the Baltimore, whose 8-inch rifles silenced the battery of 10-inch Krupps that had thundered so long from Sanglei Point on May-day. It was while she was doing this that a shell burst above the captain's head and cut some of the fore-rigging. "And he just twisted his old head over his shoulder a bit," said an enthusiastic Jacky, telling about it, "and he hove out his chest, and he says, 'Starboard a little.'" Away over by the Tambo shore is the Raleigh, standing by to talk to the Spanish guns at Malate, in case they make it too hot for our boys in Camp Dewey. She fired her 5-inch quick-fire guns so fast, in the great battle, that the Spaniards said afterward that when she came along the whole bay was on fire. In by the Olympia, on the other side from the Charleston, is the Boston, and beyond her lies the Monterey. At the ends of the line lie the Concord, in Cañacao Bay, and the Petrel, off the arsenal, the plucky little chap who ran in behind Cavité Point after seven fleeing Spanish gunboats, and came out unscathed, with every Spaniard destroyed.

With these eight home-built fighting-ships are the little gunboats Callao and Leyte, taken from the Spanish. It was the captain of the Callao who came in after the fight and began a salute. Then, when he surrendered, he asked where the Spanish ships were, and Dewey took him out on the quarter-deck of the Olympia and pointed them out, eleven pitiful wrecks lying about the bay. It was on the Leyte that all the silver half-dollars were captured, which the boys are sending home to "Polly" as mementos. Inside Cañacao Bay is the Manila, the Spanish transport that surrendered to the Petrel, and is now a converted cruiser. All these are navy ships, and for the war the handsome little revenue-cutter McCulloch is in the navy too as a cruiser.

It was from her tall funnel that the spark flew, that night they all passed through the Boca Grande, which warned the Spaniards that enemies were near. And when the guns on El Fraile blazed away, the McCulloch answered with her 6-pounders as gamely as if they had been 600-pounders. The machinery-supply ship Nanshan and the despatch-boat Zafiro, with the collier Brutus, which came yesterday with the Monterey, make up the list of Dewey's ships.

With them are a curious lot of foreign flags. One—the old red ensign of Great Britain—flies from the mizzen-gaff of the ship Ellen A. Read, that every South Street waterrat of New York knows as he knows his name. She happened in here one day not long ago with a load of Newcastle coal. Wasn't it handy for Dewey? That happened earlier with the bluff-bowed Honolulu, that has windjammed all around the world from St. John, New Brunswick. It has happened, too, to the big steam-collier Cyrus, which dropped in on her way from Singapore to a place to sell her coal, and Nyanza, from any port, for any port, with just what Dewey needed most. Here they all are, with 15,000 tons of coal or more, and all bunkers full in the fighting-fleet. All fly the English flag, and so does the Kwong-hoi, a rickety old side-wheeler that just looked in one day with a load of good things, and has never cared to look out again. Now the Kwong-hoi has a partner, the Martha, of Kiel, and when von Diederichs looks this way with his long glass he can see the black and white and red of Germany flying from the staff of a ship that is selling supplies to Americans. There's a Belgian too, the Calgoa, most favored ship of all the fleet; has callers every day from every other ship, and the army too. She's a sheep-ship from Australia. She brought 4700 frozen carcasses, and the day she dropped in to call on the admiral he sent a whole sheep to the captain of every foreign man-o'-war in the bay and to every foreign consul in Manila, just to verify the story floating around about how hard pushed for supplies the Americans were.

And the transports, ten of them, most of which shifted their summer destination from the cool latitude of the Klondike to the rain and heat of Manila Bay, just to help Uncle Sam's boys along on their way to conquer an empire for their uncle. They lie well bunched together, with the exception of the two which the Spaniards sunk at the entrance, and the two which were left behind at Honolulu. Their names are two days yet to wait. Then work will go on with a rush, for now that the Monterey is here, Dewey is ready to demand the surrender of Manila as soon as the army is prepared to go into the city. Some desperate work has been done in landing troops through the surf, and the Astor Battery ruined their ammunition. They lost a chance to go to the front because they were reloading their shells with powder Dewey gave them. It has not been too rough, however, to stop work on the fleet. They have all been stripping ship, preparatory to the attack on Manila. In the May-day fight boats were carried inboard on the cradles, and many of them were splintered by shells or ruined by the concussion of the guns fired beneath them. Now that they have a good place to leave them, the ships are peeling off their jackets. The boats are all coming ashore, except two for each ship. Steam-cutters, whale-boats, barges, and gigs, they are all piled up in the yard of the arsenal. There is little woodwork to be taken out of the ships now. Most of it went out for the May-day fight, and has never been replaced. They are still using strips of clean new canvas for bulkheads; and on some of the ships, if there are two guests at tiffin, the wardroom skirmishes for chairs.

The ships are good to see, lying out here between the troop-ships and danger. They are clean and bright, and they are just like home. Only their color is changed, and they are bare of the fine furniture and fittings they have in peace-times; but they are just the same immaculate, spotless homes of discipline and good order that we see in the yards or on the stations in American waters when we visit our friends in the service in the "piping times." Their men are clean, straight, manly, barefooted dare-devils, ready for anything that comes, from all night in a picket-boat to all day at the guns, and the quicker that comes, the better for their liking. Next week perhaps we shall see it. Perhaps not till the Monadnock comes. But when it comes it will be short, sharp, and to the point, like the dealings of the man who commands the fleet.

Oscar King Davis.

PEACE IN PUERTO RICO.

[Special Correspondence of "Harper's Weekly."]

Guayama, September 2, 1898.

I send herewith three sketches. The first one, entitled "The Flag of Truce," took place one day after the signing of the protocol. Lieutenant-Colonel Richardson and Lieutenant-Colonel Glassford, of General Brooke's staff, accompanied by two orderlies, rode into the mountains, and were soon met by two officers of the Spanish army, also accompanied by two aides. They exchanged compliments and cigars, and Colonel Richardson delivered a communication to be transmitted to the Captain General. The Spanish officers had not heard of the protocol until some ten hours after our own forces had been informed.

The meetings under flag of truce occur now every day, but with much less formality, we having been invited to lunch at their fortifications, and they having come into the city and accepted like hospitality. One of these visits forms the subject of my second sketch. The soldiers surrounded the Spanish detail and begged for souvenirs. The Spaniards were more than willing to exchange, and did so to such an extent that not a button, buckle, nor sign of rank was left on their uniforms. The officers' uniforms were also minus a button here and there. Our own escort, entering the intrenchments of the Spanish, were importuned in the same manner, until everything movable was sacrificed to the greed for mementos. In the streets of Ponce one is pestered all day by numerous venders of buttons, swords, uniforms, and cockades, and it is now rumored that an enterprising manufacturer is reaping a harvest. While in Ponce I had the good fortune to see the reception given by the "400" of Ponce to General Miles, General Wilson, and numerous officers.

There are in the cities many wealthy people, as one might imagine from the numerous large plantations hereabouts, but one rarely sees a family or gets a glimpse of their family life. As soldiers, we are continually in communication with the poorer classes, and I must say the impression given by this continual association has not been to their advantage. I found the refined Portorriqueño women to be of exceptional beauty. Their manner and grace had the stamp of refinement, and their dress, in richness and taste, was what one would only expect to see in New York's best society. They sented themselves in rows along the walls, and a conversation could only be commenced after many verbal formalities. The dancing was painfully graceful, and quite different from the "hop, skip, and jump" balls of America. The men were tall and slender, rather pale, dignified and polite. Their clothes were becoming, hinting at no small tailor's bill. They are extremely fond of their women, and act toward and speak of them with the most delicate courtesy. In conversation with a Portorriqueño he fondly boasted that their women could never degenerate to the "new women" class, and from what I saw I think the point well taken.

General Miles was received graciously. He was dressed in a white fatigue uniform, but was hardly recognizable without his characteristic mustache.

The orchestra opened with one of Sousa's marches, and immediately followed with a very serious composition by a native.

Dancing and the refreshments followed, and at a late hour the "Star-spangled Banner" was rendered, in a way which showed that the song was unfamiliar; but they have abided with us only a few days, and we can afford to be lenient. T. Dart Walker.

THIS BUSY WORLD

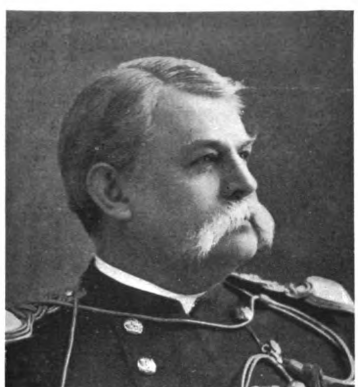
Mr. George W. Smalley has lately confided to the New York Herald some very dismal apprehensions about the ultimate fate of the rare books which are at present in the Lenox Library, and which, perhaps, in the fulness of time may be transferred to the new Public Library on the reservoir site. Mr. Smalley is evidently wise about rare books, and especially rare Americana, and very jealous about the keeping and destiny of those Mr. Lenox got together. He resents with some bitterness the amalgamation of the Lenox collection with the Astor and Tilden libraries, and protests vainly, as he admits, but strenuously, against the removal of Mr. Lenox's treasures from the strong-house which their owner provided for them. Many others besides Mr. Smalley regret, whenever they pass the Lenox Library, that that admirable building cannot continue to serve its present purposes. There are no compunctions about disturbing the Astor books or about the action of the Tilden trustees, but there are regrets over the disturbance of the Lenox collections even in the minds of persons who, on the whole, approve the action taken. But Mr. Smalley seems unwarrantably gloomy about it. He is actually afraid the Lenox books won't be safe in the big library. He fears that as the flowing tide of democracy surges along, some yellow journal may insist that a free people has a right to handle everything in its library, and that a body of trustees responsive to the ignorant caprices of some elective body of Aldermen or Assemblymen may allow Mr. Lenox's unique documents to go into unwashed or ungentle hands, and so see corruption. He speaks of "the late Mr. Lenox whose matchless collection is now about to be flung to the wolves," and it seems to be a real solace to him to remember that, after all, the best collection of Americana is in the British Museum, and so, safe.

It would be unkind and uncivil not to regret the harassment of Smalley's mind, but, after all, if we are going to the dogs so fast as he seems to fear, of what great consequence is it that the memory of our early history, and the books and documents that bear on it, should be preserved? If the people of New York are, or promise to become, such a sorry lot of vandals that Mr. Lenox's rare books will not be safe in the great library building which their money is to build, there must be evils in store for us beside which the profanation of the Lenox book-cases will seem trifling and unimportant. Let us comfort ourselves with the thought that if by reason of democracy and bosses and popular suffrage we are all to be rushed headlong to the demnition bow-wows, at least we shall not suffer from flea bites on the way. Let us comfort ourselves further by remembering that rare Americana and most of the treasures that delight collectors are easily kept out of the hands of the vulgar, because the vulgar have very little interest in them, and are bored with looking at them even in a glass case. The wolves have no appetite for mummies. They like fresh meat.

There was a charming story in the Sun the other day about General Chaffee and how he dealt with a frightened recruit in the action at El Caney. What seems to be the same tale has come to the Weekly from another source—from Captain Haskell of the Twelfth Infantry—and shall have another telling, for no one ought to miss it. As General Chaffee's line went up a hill into action at El Caney this recruit dropped out of

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google



the ranks. The general noticed him, and went to see what ailed him. He found a young and very badly frightened soldier. Captain Haskell says he said to him: "Are you hurt? I saw how well you kept up under fire as we came on. Come with me to the crest and look through my glass at the enemy's works. We shall soon take them in the flank. We will try to lead the assault if you like." So, by the gentlest means, he put that recruit on his legs again, shared with him his own abundant courage, and brought him back, renewed and grateful, into the fight where he belonged. That was like saving a soul. The story shows the general's quality —or one strain of it, at least—and makes it easy to believe Captain Haskell's report that the Fifth Corps look upon him as the Skobeleff of our army—a soldier who, like Skobeleff, combines magnetic influence with swift observation, great endurance, and whatever degree of heroism the occasion demands.

Here is an extract from a private letter which throws some light on the reported indisposition of Cuban soldiers to work, and on other things too. It is from a lady now living in New York, but who formerly lived in Havana. She writes under date August 31:

I am your old friend from Havana, and am delighted to hear from you. I really had given up all hopes of ever meeting you again, but here we are trying to be good Americans—Fred and Michi working busily; Gustav a soldier for Uncle Sam, who has just returned from the Santiago campaign, a miserable weak object, though a native; and having been months with the insurgents, he never failed in health, but the starved state that he was kept in and so much hard work has completely overcome his strong constitution. He is in care of Dr. Bird, and is already showing a difference since being at home.

Perhaps the insurgents knew better than to work too hard in Cuba.

The friends of General Joseph T. Haskell, who died on September 16, at Columbus, Ohio, have at least the satisfaction of feeling that he had had his chance as a soldier and had made the most of it, and that his gallantry and skill had had due recognition. As Lieutenant-Colonel of the Seventeenth Infantry, he was in the Santiago campaign, and got three serious wounds at El Caney while leading his regiment into action. Of five soldiers and two officers who volunteered to bring him off the field three were shot. General Haskell survived the field hospital, was brought to Siboney and sent to Fort Monroe, where he made a rapid recovery, and returned to Columbus, where his regiment had been stationed when the war began. He was promoted to be Brigadier-General for gallantry on the field, and his commission reached him on September 7. When the Seventeenth got back to Columbus, nine days later, he rode in a carriage at the head of the regiment through the city. The same afternoon he died suddenly of apoplexy, hastened doubtless by his wounds. General Haskell entered the army during the civil war as a captain, and later received a commission in the regular army. He was known as one of the best tacticians in the army, and was greatly beloved and admired for his fine soldierly and personal qualities. Men who were with him at Santiago, and after, speak with the warmest admiration of his fine spirit, and of his indomitable cheerfulness in the hospital and while suffering afterwards from the effects of his wounds.

BRIG.-GEN. JOSEPH T HASKELL, U. S. V.
Photograph by Baker, Columbus.

Complaint is made by a reader of the WEEKLY that there has been too much said in this department of it, and in the newspapers generally, about General Wheeler, Colonel Roosevelt, the Seventy-first New York, and the Rough Riders in the Santiago campaign, and not enough about the regulars and the officers who led them. General Wheeler, we are told, is made conspicuous, while very little is said or heard about General Kent. Yet, this complainant says:

It was General Kent who had the entire command of the Second, Sixth, Ninth, Tenth, Thirteenth, Sixteenth, Twenty-first, and Twenty-fourth regiments of regular infantry, who, with the assistance of the First, Third, Sixth, and Ninth cavalry, were the men who took San Juan Hill. General Kent made himself conspicuous throughout the fight by his gallantry in leading the men on in the terrible charge. It was the regulars under his command who took the hill, and the Thirteenth Regiment who seized the colors. Notwithstanding the facts that General Kent had more men under his command than Admiral Dewey, faced a deadlier fire from the enemy, displayed more bravery, secured such an important position before Santiago as to necessitate the Spanish fleet's leaving Santiago Harbor—notwithstanding these facts, with innumerable others, we do not hear or read a word concerning this gallant officer. Why is it? Prejudice?

Prejudice does not seem to be the trouble in this case. If General Wheeler and Colonel Roosevelt have had more than their share of attention, it has been because they were conspicuous public men and very interesting characters personally when the war broke out. If the Seventy-first Regiment has had an excessive amount of attention from the New York papers, it is because it was the only New York regiment in the Santiago campaign, and therefore the regiment in which the local readers of New York papers felt the strongest personal interest. There is no prejudice against the regulars, no lack of appreciation of their qualities as soldiers, no conscious begrudging of the honor that is due to them; but comparatively few officers of the regular army are widely known to the general public, or as good to gossip about as better known men. The Rough Riders have been more talked about than the whole regular army, but very few persons believe that there is any one of Uncle Sam's ten regiments of cavalry that is not at least as efficient as—probably somewhat more efficient than—the Rough Riders. There is no use of hoping that the volume of gossip about every soldier or regiment shall be determined by merit and importance of service. That is not the way talk runs. Only a very limited amount of justice can get itself done in a short war. A few lucky men get chances, and some of them become famous. An equitable distribution of laurels by the newspapers seems to be altogether impracticable, though we have a right to expect to see better justice done in the official distribution of promotions and rewards.

In a notice of Judge Day, chairman of the Peace Commission, in the WEEKLY of August 27, it was stated that he graduated from the University of Wisconsin with the class of 1870. Information comes from Ann Arbor that he graduated from the Literary Department of the University of Michigan in 1870, taking the degree of B.S., and in 1871-2 attended the Law School of the same university, but did not graduate.

It was noted the other day in this department that the Chamber of Commerce of Cincinnati had raised money to put up at Fort Thomas a bronze memorial of the work of the Sixth United States (regular) Infantry at San Juan. A reader of the WEEKLY writes from Newport, Kentucky, in fervent protest against the notion thus fostered that Fort Thomas belongs to Cincinnati, or even to the State of Ohio. He points out that the fort is on the south side of the river, in Campbell County, Kentucky, near Newport, and is reached by an electric road governed by Kentuckians. He maintains that there is no site in or near Cincinnati so fit for a fort as the Kentucky Highlands, in Campbell County; he avers that the true friends of the Sixth Regiment are the Newporters, and unkindly insinuates that the Ohio metropolis is advertising itself at the expense of its Kentucky neighbors.

No doubt the geographical facts are as our correspondent has stated, but it seems harsh in him to grudge to Cincinnati the expression of an interest and regard, the sincerity of which there seems no sound reason to question. The bronze tablet was a good idea. Why should not the WEEKLY's Newport friend regard it not with jealousy, but as a trophy wrung from the admiring Cincinnati folks by Newport's gallant regulars. As long as the tablet is coming to the old Kentucky shore, it seems as if Newport had inadequate reason for complaint.

No communication on this subject has come as yet from Covington, Kentucky, which seems to lie near enough to Fort Thomas to have a claim on the affections and laurels of the Sixth.

Another good soldier whose death, on September 18, at Fort Myer, Virginia, came as the result of the Santiago campaign, was Captain Allyn Capron, of the First Artillery. He had had typhoid fever, and died from a relapse. He was the father of Captain Allyn Capron, Jr., of the Rough Riders, who was killed at Las Guasimas on June 24, and the son of Captain Allyn Capron, who was killed while commanding his battery of the First Artillery at Cherubusco, in the Mexican war. He was appointed to West Point from North Carolina in 1863, graduated into the artillery, and came to be regarded as one of the most accomplished officers in his branch of the service.

It has been stated (in the Sun) that two sons of Captain Capron enlisted in this war, and that one was killed at Guasimas and another died of typhoid fever. Another account says that two cousins of the Caprons, also named Capron, were among the volunteers who went to Cuba. The thread of fact cannot be clearly followed through these somewhat confusing stories, but it is evident that Captain Capron's widow has been sorely bereaved by the war. It is a solace to find it stated (in the Herald) that two younger sons are still left to her.

Dr. George W. Lindheim's death, on September 16, in New York, was very tragical. He was the surgeon in charge of 260 sick men and convalescents who came, the other day, by rail from Chickamauga to New York. It will be remembered that the train was boarded at Cleveland by local physicians, who declared that some of the sick men would die if they were carried on, and criticised Dr. Lindheim severely because he would not put them off and send them to a hospital. He brought all his men through safely, according to orders. None died at last accounts, and all were either convalescent or recovering, but the surgeon himself is dead of typhoid fever, and his death is said to have been largely due to worry over the harsh criticisms of his behavior. He was twenty-seven years old. He joined the Eighth New York Regiment as corporal, but, being a Red Cross surgeon, was assigned to duty in the hospital corps. His death has doubtless had an effect in checking the tendency towards reckless censure of the army surgeons.

The marines came out strong in our recent war, not only at Guantanamo, but in divers other individual instances. One exploit that is to be credited to that branch of the service was done by Lieutenant T. P. Kane, while serving on the Harvard. On May 11, when that ship ran into St. Pierre, Martinique, for coal, Captain Cotton heard a rumor that the Spanish fleet was outside. Martinique, being a French port, had strong Spanish sympathies, and the verification of rumors about Spanish movements was difficult and hazardous. Lieutenant Kane, however, volunteered to get word of Cervera's ships, and put off in an open boat in an uncomfortable gale to take a look about outside the harbor. He got back in the small hours of the morning, bringing the first authentic news of the whereabouts of the Spanish fleet that reached Washington. His errand was extremely perilous, and entirely successful.

Another good piece of work that he did was to go ashore, climb the hills of Martinique, and observe the flash-light signals by dint of which the natives sent war news to the near-by Spanish islands. By this exploit he got important information, and also was able to make a report, on the basis of which Captain Cotton was able to have the flash-light proceedings stopped as contrary to neutrality. Lieutenant Kane is a son of Captain T. F. Kane, U. S. N., retired, who served with distinction in the civil war. He is a great-grandson of Commodore Henley, who served on Lake Erie and at Tripoli under Perry.

MISS VARINA ANNE JEFFERSON DAVIS.—[SEE PAGE 974.]

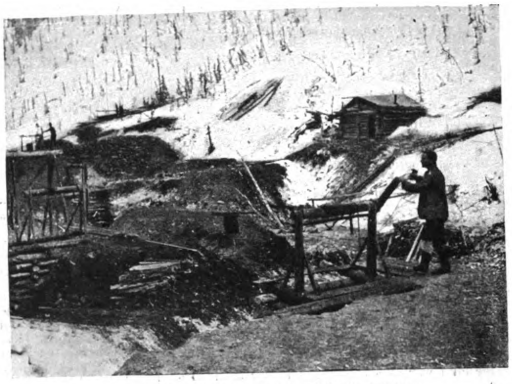
The prevailing reluctance to accept places on the war-inquiry commission is in marked contrast to the willingness shown some months ago to accept military commissions. It is not recalled at this moment that a citizen was discovered who was too modest, too busy, or too consciously incompetent to accept the President's invitation to become a general. But as for the citizens to whom the President desires to intrust the investigation of the conduct of the war, they are as ready with excuses as the folks in the parable who were invited to the feast. At this writing seven commissioners are understood to have been caught, and report says there are good prospects of securing four more. It will be remembered that only the Quartermaster, Commissary, and Medical departments are to be subject to the commission's inquiry; but, after all, if those departments are thoroughly looked into, the conclusions reached will have application beyond them. It is an unusual case where examination of the liver, lights, and stomach does not yield facts from which conclusions may be drawn as to the patient's general health.

President Eliot of Harvard, being asked by the World what we ought to do with the Philippines, declines to express an opinion in the present state of his knowledge of the subject. He believes that until we are more fully informed about the population, resources, and climate of the islands we should not commit ourselves to any final action. It seems somewhat rash of Dr. Eliot to plead ignorance, for the administration is obviously desirous to have the best sentiment of the country with it in whatever action it takes, and it would be just like the President to ask Dr. Eliot to go and look over the Philippines and report. The President's avowed intentions as to his peace policy are, "to do the best I can, with such knowledge and light as I have, in the hope that my acts in the matter will be approved by the deliberate judgment of mankind."

M. Henri Menier, chocolate-manufacturer, of Paris, who lately bought for £125,000 Anticosti Island, at the mouth of the St. Lawrence, is having some trouble over the title of his purchase. Some of the families which have lived long on the island dispute his ownership, and propose to make a case for the Canadian law courts. The purchase was an unusual transaction, and appeals strongly to the imagination. The island is far up in the land of fogs and west of Newfoundland, is 130 miles long, some 27 miles wide, and contains 2,500,000 acres. Its coast-line is 340 miles long, and it abounds in timber, game, and streams which are full of fish. M. Menier proposed to colonize it and establish there an agricultural community. He has prohibited hunting and fishing without a permit, and is raising such crops as oats and barley. He has chosen a pretty big plaything, but his chocolate business has been profitable, and if his title proves to be good, his development of the island is likely to be a very interesting work. The disputants of his claims lay stress on the inexpediency of allowing a Frenchman to control an island which commands the mouth of the St. Lawrence, but it is understood that he claims to have become a citizen of Canada. Yachtsmen will be interested in the success of his venture. There is at present somewhat of a dearth of interesting stopping-places for yachts on the American shore north of Halifax, and a good station on Anticosti might help to make popular summer yachting trips to Quebec.

E. S. MARTIN.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google



NATIVE DOG-TEAM.

MEAT-MARKET IN DAWSON.

BLACKSMITH SHOP.

DUMPS AND WINDLASSES ON HUNKER CREEK.

DOG-TEAM—DRIVER IN PARKA AND MUKLUKS.

A TYPICAL CABIN IN DAWSON.

HAULING WATER WITH DOGS.

PROSPECTOR WITH OUTFIT AND SLED.

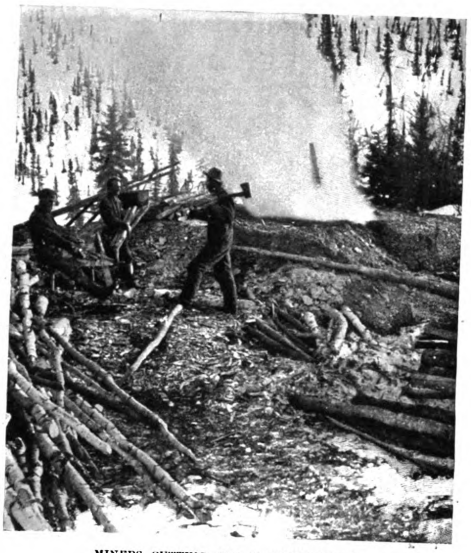
WINTER SCENES IN THE KLONDIKE.

From Photographs by Tappan Adney, Special Correspondent for "Harper's Weekly."—[See Page 962.]

Digitized by Google

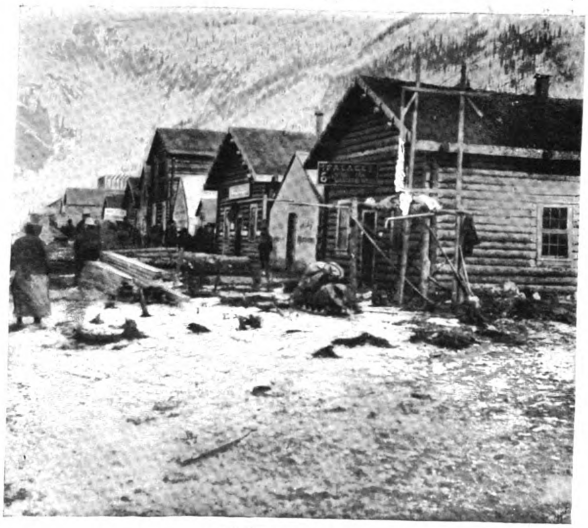
Original from PENN STATE

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google



WHIP-SAWING SLUICE-BOX LUMBER.

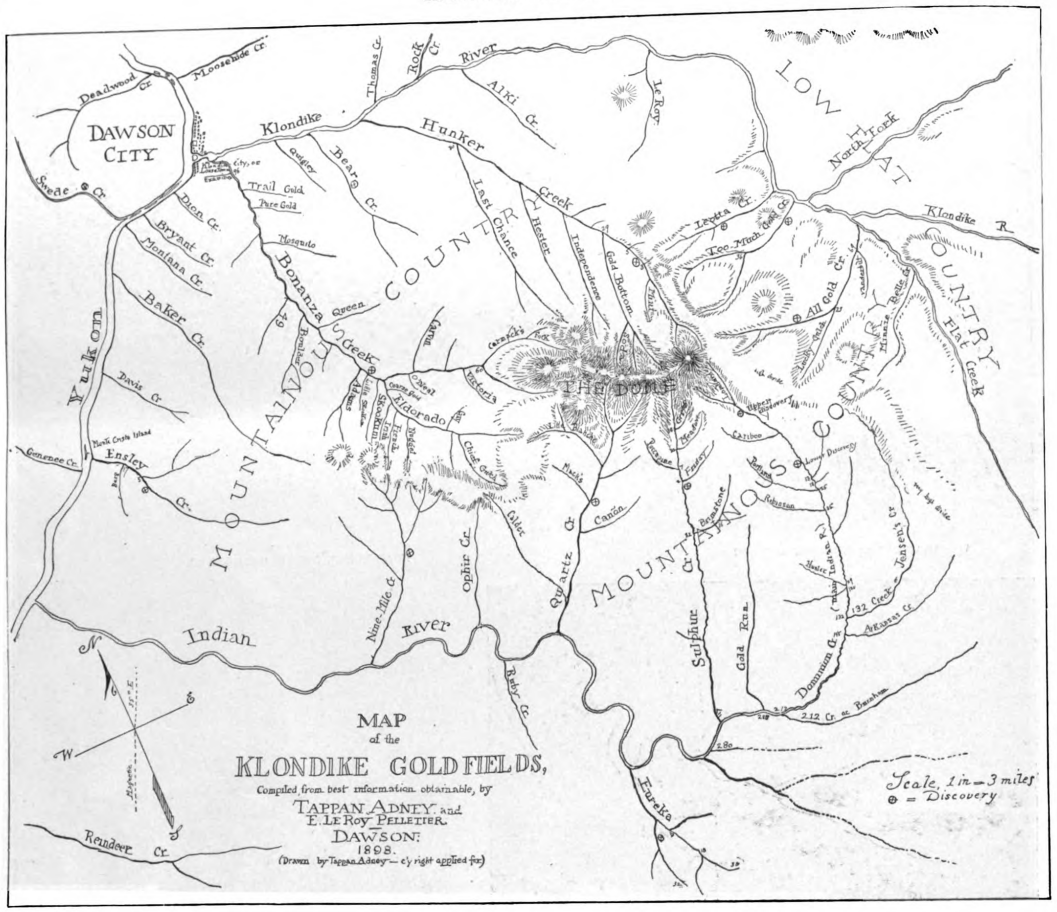
ROAD-HOUSE, MOUTH OF HUNKER.



MR. ADNEY'S CABIN ON BONANZA CREEK.

MINERS CUTTING THE WINTER'S WOOD.

PROVISION-DEALER, DAWSON.



STREET IN DAWSON.

WINTER SCENES IN THE KLONDIKE.

FROM PHOTOGRAPHS BY TAPPAN ADNEY, SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT FOR "HARPER'S WEEKLY."—[SEE PAGE 962.]

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

A WINTER'S WORK IN THE KLONDIKE.

LETTER AND ILLUSTRATIONS FROM TAPPAN ADNEY, SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT FOR "HARPER'S WEEKLY."

DAWSON, March 15, 1898.

DAWSON is now, or is about to become, one of the world's great mining-camps, yet little that is authentic is known of the vast region in which it is located. Klondike was, in the first newspaper account that went out last year, described as a place in the arctic regions where the polar bear made its sallies upon the lonely prospector; where the temperature in winter averaged ninety degrees below zero; as a land of eternal ice, where the rivers begin to freeze not from the top, but from the bottom, locking them in solid ice; a region devoid of animal life save for the venomous mosquito, which swarmed in countless millions. The conflicting accounts that go out concerning this country are due in no small part to the diversity of the regions known under practically one name, Alaska, wherein conditions differ as widely as between the North and South of the United States; but still more is due to the fact that Alaska is now, and probably ever will be, the paradise of liars.

No absolutely correct map exists of the Klondike district, and there will be none until the government makes a survey of the creeks, which will not be for two or three years. A number of maps have been prepared by different persons, and some of these are more reliable than others. It will be understood how much those maps differ when the Klondike is given on Ogilvie's sketch as a perfectly straight stream, when, in fact, at a distance of forty miles from Dawson, the river runs for many miles at right angles to its lower part. The Klondike enters the Yukon at right angles in a nearly easterly and westerly direction. It is a stream of forty yards' width, shallow, exceedingly tortuous in its summer bed, with numerous quick "rips" in rapids In winter, its whole bed being covered with snow, it seems a much larger stream. Its whole length can hardly be over one hundred and twenty-five miles. For thirty miles its rather narrow valley lies between gently rounded hills or banks of slide, the hills on the right being conspicuously higher than those on the left. Beyond this the valley widens into an immense plain, in which the river forks in three directions, the north fork running for fifty miles into a series of bald buttes, the foot-hills of the Rockies, whose great, ragged, snow-capped backbone extends in unbroken sweep from far to the westward to the eastward, until lost in the dimness of space. The main and middle fork extends to the same foot hills, while the south fork reaches into the southeast, where it heads directly against the McQuesten fork of Stewart River. Concerning the upper part of the river almost nothing is known; the Indians never venture there, on account of fear of their hereditary enemies, the Nahomies.

The name Klondike is from the Indian "Tron duk," which, according to Ogilvie, means "plenty of fish." "Duk" is simply the termination for river, while from the best information attainable from the Indians, it is the place where fish-weirs are set up. On each side of the mouth of the Klondike there is a flat some twenty feet above the river. The upper one is only a few acres in extent, is the old Indian burying-ground, and at the present time is the site of Klondike City, generally known by the name of Lousetown. It is the spot where the boats first land that come down the river, and contains now several score of cabins. The lower part is a mile and a half long and nearly a quarter of a mile wide, being at the base of an impressive bank four or five hundred feet in height. On this is built the city of Dawson, containing now about three hundred cabins, the pretentious buildings and warehouses of the trading companies, saloons, and dance-hall, and the barracks of the Mounted Police on the government reservation at the Klondike end, together with every variety of habitation from tents to scows with houses built upon them. The population is about two thousand, while that of the whole district is hardly less than five thousand.

Klondike had been prospected years ago, but it was regarded as a "moose pasture," not worth the trouble of working. There was no confidence in any of the creeks on the east side of the Yukon. With the exception of bar diggings on Stewart River, all the pay gold has been found in the streams entering the Yukon on the other side. Sixty Mile, fifty-five miles above, with its rich tributary, Miller Creek; Forty Mile, fifty miles below Dawson, and the Brick Creek district, which lies in the same region. Bonanza Creek, on which the first strike was made, enters the Klondike on the right-hand side, about a mile from its mouth. It is about twenty-eight miles in length, being one of the largest in the district. El Dorado is a "pup," a tributary of Bonanza, entering it fourteen miles up. A few miles further up Bear Creek enters, and nine miles from Dawson, Hunker, a stream nearly the size of Bonanza. Above these, at a distance of about forty miles from the mouth, are Leotta and Too Much Gold, and five miles beyond these, All Gold. By reason of the great bend in the Klondike, all these creeks, like the spokes of a wheel pointing towards a hub, have their sources in a great mass of peaks known as the Dome. On the other side of this mountain backbone are a number of creeks, corresponding in size and importance with those on the north, being the tributaries of Indian River, a stream of some size entering the Yukon in a direction parallel with Klondike, thirty miles above Dawson. The chief of these are Dominion, and Sulphur, heading opposite Hunker, All Gold, etc., Quartz, Ophir, and Nine Mile, in succession to the westward. The Dome, or divide, stands so high and conspicuous above the surrounding hills, which grow gradually less toward the mouths of the creeks, as to suggest an even larger mass through which the present creeks have dug their way, at the same time carrying down the gold which lies in their beds. And the fact that gold has been found thus far in the greatest quantity in those creeks, or most of those creeks, that head directly into the Dome, has persuaded many that this ridge contains what is left of the mother lode from which the riches of El Dorado and Bonanza are derived. The quantity of gold in the beds of these streams cannot be estimated and cannot be exaggerated. There is as yet but one El Dorado, they say, but no other stream has been prospected to the same extent as El Dorado. Gold lies in the bed of every stream, but the difficulties of working it out, and the wholly inadequate number of prospectors, make this country as little known as a year ago. It will be a year before it can be known.

The country lies under a thick bed of moss, even to the tops of the hills, and under this moss the ground is mostly frozen as far as one can dig. When this moss is stripped off, the ground thaws readily enough. Formerly, all gold work was conducted by stripping and washing in summer. About three years ago it was discovered that the ground could be thawed by burning, which opened up the whole winter, till then spent in idleness, for work.

The streams here are not what are called bed-rock streams—that is, the water does not run over a rocky bed—but under the present streams is a deposit of decayed vegetable mould or peat, called muck. This muck is often of great depth—in one place in a part of Bonanza, forty-eight feet. Under this is gravel, then the bed-rock. The gold lies in this gravel, and not only on, but in the bed-rock. For bed-rock, in miners' parlance, does not necessarily mean hard rock, but anything that will catch and hold the particles of gold as the water carries it down.

The hole which is sunk is usually about three by five feet. Each fire burns down about a foot, and is usually started at night. By morning the hole is clear of smoke, the earth is softened and can be lifted out. When the hole has been sunk ten feet, or as deep as a man can shovel, a windlass is set up, and the dirt is hoisted out in a square board bucket, and lifted upon the dump. Every little while, after gravel is reached, a panful is taken to the cabin and washed out, and by this it is known when "pay" is reached. Where the creek bed is wide, or where there has been much sliding in, several holes will often have to be sunk in a line across the creek from rim to rim, and there connected by drifting, before the pay, which lies in the old bed of the stream, is found. It will thus be seen that much time, both of actual work and "dead work," is consumed making any prospect of a claim. When one stands

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google on the Dome and sees the miles of creeks all staked to their sources, likewise every pup, he realizes the years that will elapse, and the thousands of men that must work, before what is in every claim can be known.

The main work of the district is being done on El Dorado, which, as far as the forties, or four miles up, is rich beyond the power of imagination to conceive. Yet there are total blanks on El Dorado. On Hunker there is a blank between two of the richest claims on the creek. The gold has slipped over, apparently. Bonanza is spotted from top to bottom, yet the total amount that will be taken out will be large, and there are some very rich claims. Hunker will also turn out a large quantity of gold. Next to this comes Dominion, a creek of great promise, while it is impossible to say in what order the others come. They all show promise, but hardly more can be said, for the amount of work done on them is insignificant.

Thousands of claims have been staked in the Klondike before this winter, no prospect whatever having been made, save what can be done on the side of a tree with an axe and a bad lead-pencil. Thus all the "pups" and fractions on old creeks, and every new creek within fifty miles of Dawson, have been staked in a succession of stampedes of the wildest description. Only one claim was allowed in the Klondike; but every stream putting into the Yukon carried a new right. The Gold Commissioner, however, has limited the number of rights in the whole territory to four. The reduction from 500 feet to 100 has not in the least lessened the number and wildness of these stampedes. Whole creeks have been staked by one man, who gave or sold the numbers for relocation. The result of this indiscriminate staking and recording is that there has been endless confusion in the commissioner's office; fifty claims a day have been recorded all winter, the men standing in big lines outside the commissioner's office, waiting. The commissioner has taken the oath of stakers as to the existence not only of claims and fractions, but of creeks. In consequence, he has recorded fractions that did not exist, and those fractions have been sold on the strength of the commissioner's certificate. He has had a wholly inadequate corps of assistants. He has recorded a total of 7500 placer claims.

As soon as creeks to be stampeded began to run out, attention was turned to quartz, and there have been some astounding results. It is shown beyond a doubt that as there is gold in some quantity in almost every creek, so is the whole country underlaid with veins and ledges of quartz. When the snow goes off, greater results will follow. If the gold in the placer has come out of quartz near at hand, as everything points, then, after the placer is worked out, we may expect to see quartz-mines on a scale correspondingly larger.

The evidence that the gold is not from one, perhaps distant, source, brought hither by glacier or river, is that the gold in creeks adjacent is dissimilar and easily distinguishable. El Dorado gold is paler, being more silver, than Bonanza gold. Hunker is purest of all. The gold has come from the disintegrating of the quartz in the immediate vicinity. There is one curious thing: the "bench" claims, on the side of the hill above the creek claims, are paying sometimes more than the creek. This is especially so about the Skookums, just below El Dorado. The largest nuggets, one of $455, found this winter, came from a bench on Skookum; another, of $382, came from a bench on El Dorado.

In consequence of these finds, the whole side of the creek, from the lower numbers of El Dorado down to Little Skookum, has been staked out to the fourth tier, holes have been sunk to bed-rock, and the most sensational discoveries have been made. The singular thing is that even though abutting on Bonanza, they bear El Dorado gold, showing that at one time the old bed of El Dorado ran across these benches. In further corroboration of this belief, which prevails here, it has been observed on Bonanza that ledge crops out every few claims on the creek. The claims at the crossing of the ledge are barren, but just below is the gold, coarse gold, and the farther down one goes the finer and more scattered the gold, until it peters out. Below the next ledge the same is repeated. At the present time, below the ledge, scores of men are piling the dirt into large dumps. As one goes down, the dumps grow smaller and there is less work being done, while at the end the men have thrown up their lays, leaving the deserted windlasses and dumps.

It is really impossible to know what is being got on the creeks. The mine-owners cannot be expected to tell, and, as a rule, do not. The reports of rich finds are generally, though not always, the invention of those with interests in the creeks to boom. On Bonanza and on Hunker there has been much dissatisfaction on account of lays not turning out, and men by the score have gone to work for wages, or taken new lays. A claim on Bonanza or El Dorado is by no means a sure thing.

A quantity of quartz has been staked on the Dome and the sides of El Dorado. Prospecting and assay will alone show what they are, but it is beyond question that eventually rich lodes will be found in the neighborhood of the rich creeks. The expense of working the mines is the great obstacle to their development.

The ground is not frozen in all places; there are spots where one can go down twenty feet through thawed ground. Probably this is due to the presence of warm springs, for in all the creeks there is a flow of water from springs on the side of the hill that often fills the creek-bed with so-called "glaciers," and puts a stop to work in the holes by filling them up.

The present method of working is most primitive and wasteful. With wages at $1 50 an hour, all that will pay to work is a small and exceedingly uncertain "streak" of "pay." Color, even ten cents to the pan, is hardly "pay," and if nothing more is found, the prospect is abandoned, or more holes sunk. There may be an immense quantity of gravel showing that much, but they can only afford to work that portion of it which goes as high as twenty-five cents. The drain that this makes on the resources of a mining region will be better understood when it is known that the hydraulic propositions have been profitable at as low as ten cents to the cubic yard, a cubic yard containing some two hundred panfuls. The method of sluicing, too, is wasteful, no means being employed to save the fine gold which goes off in the tailings. If some cheaper method could be employed, or even if wages were reduced to, say, $5 a day, the value of every mine in the region would be doubled or trebled.

The frozen condition of the ground will prove no obstacle, I am certain, to hydraulicking. Ten years ago, in the Cassiar Mountains, according to Dawson, the ground remained frozen as here, until the moss and timber were stripped, when the sun alone thawed the ground to a great depth. If each layer is taken off daily, there is no limit to what can be taken off, the tailings being handled with hydraulic pumps. The greatest obstacle is lack of water; this must be stored in reservoirs, but might have to be drawn from the upper Klondike. The ground certainly can be "ground-sluiced"; then it can be hydraulicked. On the streams that are largely worked the wood is growing scarce. The wood on the side of the gulches is small—pine and spruce scarcely larger than an arm (but of great age), as well as small birches and poplars. In the valleys, however, of the main river there is an abundant supply of spruce, the trees going often to thirty inches diameter, straight and tall. These are used for lumber, the demand for which is great at the present time for new buildings going up and for the sluice-boxes. There are three mills in operation, and boards are $200 a thousand.

If every winter is as mild as the present one and last year's, the climate need not deter any one of fairly cheerful disposition and good lungs from coming into this country. The Yukon has not frozen this winter, an air-hole remaining in front of Dawson all winter, while the Klondike is open in hundreds of places, and remains open under nothing less than a covering of snow, which makes it exceedingly dangerous to travel except on the beaten trails. The Indians always use a stick, with which they feel the way. There has never been a time this winter when one could traverse, say, Sulphur or Too Much Gold without getting wet, often over one's moccasins. In consequence of the water in the creeks, there have been a number of freezings on stampedes. The temperature has not been lower this winter than −65°, but this temperature is withstood without discomfort by one provided, after the way of the country, with fur-lined mittens and a sufficiency of foot-gear. The hands, feet, and face are all that need to be guarded, the smallest amount of covering sufficing to keep the body warm. Buffalo coats are wholly out of place, deer-skin and drill "parkas" being worn over woollens or moose-hide. The winters are dark and sombre. We are far south of the Arctic Circle, no further north than parts of Norway. The sun does not wholly disappear in midwinter, but appears for five or six hours, or say from ten to three. On this account wages at $1 50 an hour are far from being $15 a day. Six or seven is nearer the mark. In the deep gulches and on the north sides of hills there is practically no sun, merely a glow in the southeast that dies away in the southwest.

The summers are short, but the amount of sunlight is great, and vegetation springs up in profusion. Potatoes have been raised at Forty Mile, and no doubt other vegetables will be grown. The mosquitoes here are very bad, but they are also very bad not a thousand miles from New York city. Last July, in the very papers that were sensationally serving up the horrors of this arctic region, was described the death of a baby from mosquitoes in New Jersey. Had that happened here, what a morsel it would have been for the sensation-mongers! The Indians find smoke sufficient protection, but the white population mostly wear veils over wide-brimmed hats. It is in the low country, downriver, that the mosquitoes are so bad. At the mouth of the Tanana a horse was stung to death in a night. They tell of the Tanana country that when a man wanted to see the sun, he had to throw a club up into the air.

The river at one time supported a large Indian population that maintained an existence on meat and fish. The natives are dying off rapidly, until there are scarcely over a hundred at Dawson, but the food-supply remains the same. Moose are very plentiful on the Klondike to its head-waters. The Indians have been hunting all winter, and killed large numbers. The miners are driving them further away from Dawson, but almost every day come reports of moose killed on Bonanza, Hunker, etc. The foot-hills of the Rockies are the range of the reindeer. A herd of ten to twenty thousand passed across the head of Klondike last autumn. They are abundant on the head of Forty Mile. Fur-bearing animals are somewhat scarce, but a short while ago were more plentiful. They are mink, marten, otter, beaver, weasel or ermine, rabbits, lynx, and wolverenes. The wolves do not venture near the lower Klondike, but all winter a herd have made their centre of operations above the forks, forty miles up. They feed on caribou and moose. I saw the skin of one that the trapper said gave nearly a quart of oil. It was the first and only wolf he ever saw that had any fat whatever. Wolves have several times attacked parties, and been driven off. On the White River, a few winters ago, they took a sled-load of moose-meat away from a hunter.

The snowfall this winter is about three feet, and is exceedingly light, so much so that in the early winter snowshoeing was exceedingly difficult. The snowfalls are not large and permanent. There is a general absence of heavy snow clouds here. Almost the only evaporation is from air-holes on the Yukon. From them a mist arises which hangs low in the gulches, making it at times a trifle raw. This mist turns into a gentle snow, which day by day falls, adding imperceptibly to the total depth. One result of the absence of wind in early winter is that the snow accumulates on the trees as nowhere else, in masses the size of hogsheads, bending the birches and spruces quite to the ground. By the middle of January the winds have begun to shake the snow off; by the middle of March it is about all gone.

Very many have lived in tents all winter, with stoves, in comfort. The chief drawback is that the blankets every morning are covered with dense frost, which must be dried out. There are some men who take their first colds when they go into a cabin.

There has been a great amount of scurvy. Half the patients in the hospital are suffering from scurvy. Scurvy manifests itself in a variety of ways; it is a state of the system resulting from poor cooking and lack of a variety of food. Those bringing outfits into the country should not stint themselves in the least, but provide themselves with every variety of the best food that money can buy. Spruce tea is the remedy for scurvy, a simple and effective one, as well as a preventive, in a measure.

All winter transportation is by dogs, save a score of horses that have been working steadily all winter, hauling lumber, wood, and hay from meadows on the upper Klondike. It is necessary on a trail to house the horses in a tent with a stove. The native dogs are the best; they are tough, and thoroughly understand the business of hauling. There are many so-called "outside" dogs of all breeds, and they are getting mixed with the "inside" dogs, not always to the advantage of the breed. The outside dogs, with the exception of the Newfoundlands, are not adapted for hauling, but are so employed, the short-haired ones having to wear "parkas" of blanket. A good dog will haul on a smooth trail 300 pounds, but when the work is hard and the trail new, they are not put to more than 100 to 150 pounds. Fish was scarce, so they have had to be fed on good rice, vegetables, and meat. They have sold for as high as $300—a good dog being rarely to be bought for less than two hundred and odd dollars. The dogs are arrant thieves, so that food cannot be stored in the cabins, but is placed in caches, little houses set upon poles, high out of reach. These caches are a striking feature of Dawson. The dogs make an interesting study in themselves.

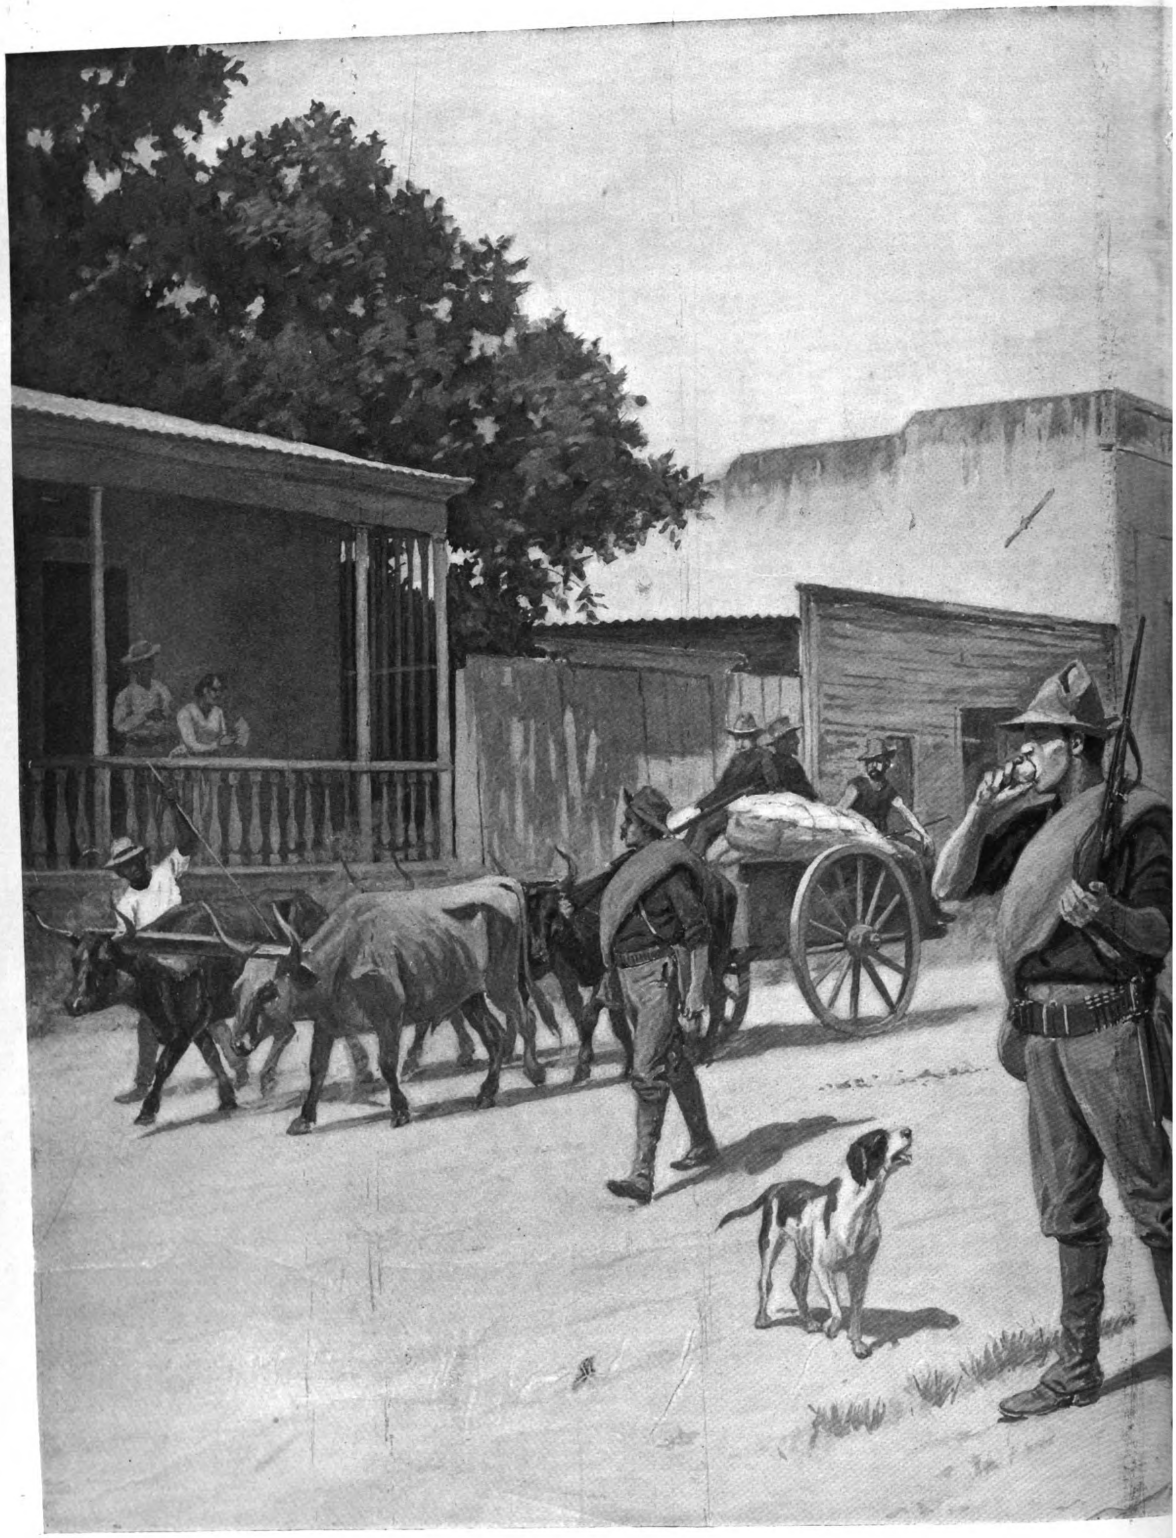
Completely organized government and a system of jurisprudence will be in operation in the spring, in anticipation of whatever influx there may be from the outside world. Hitherto miners' law (not mob law, by any means) has proved adequate in Alaska, and while there has been justifiable criticism of the arbitrary and wholly insufficient government we have had, in the future, with the greater measure of home-rule we will have, we will probably be able to secure a greater measure of justice than under the old system. Major Walsh, the new Governor, or "Commissioner," is said to have power to decide upon every exigency that will arise, even to the unmaking of the order in council extending the claim to 200 feet, and setting a tax of ten to twenty per cent. upon the whole output.

Until the one-hundred-foot rule went into effect on the 1st of January, it was understood that one hundred or even two hundred feet was not sufficient reward for perilous years of hardship as a prospector; but the stampedes have continued day and night since then, with all the energy and perseverance of the first stampedes, while there appears to have been not the least cessation of work on the rich, or rather known, creeks. In consequence of which it is hardly likely that there will be any modification of objectionable orders in council. Neither will there be any forcible resistance to the collection of the taxes, since it lies with one man in the office of the gold commissioner to confiscate not only the whole dump, but the offender's entire rights in the district, for a failure to tell the truth about the output.

Seven thousand five hundred claims have been recorded thus far. The staking has not been confined to the region about the Dome, but every creek of the Yukon, from Twelve Mile Creek, below here, to Stewart, has been staked, including thus far, in order, Twelve Mile, Ballarat, Deadwood, Moosehide, Dion, Bryant, Montana, Swede, or Swedish, Baker, Ensley, Reindeer, Rosebud, and Henderson, with Eureka on the south side of Indian. No locations have been made on the north side of Klondike.

From the old-time prospector's point of view, the camp is spoiled already. The new-comers have staked up the creeks in many cases without any means of prospecting save the usual axe and lead-pencil, and he is wholly at sea. Formerly he had the whole country to himself. In the stampedes that have continued all winter it has been necessary to stake first and prospect afterwards, and the marvellous part of the whole is that there is so much gold in the country that the later prospects have justified the staking. Most of the claims are taken on speculation. We have been asking ourselves: "When the people come in in the spring in the numbers that are anticipated, will they buy claims on the creeks already staked out, or will they institute a series of stampedes to remote creeks?" Even now the stampedes have extended into American territory, American Creek and others, where 1350 feet is allowed; and when it comes to be generally understood that pay can be had there without the disadvantage of the miscalled government we have been inflicted with this winter, no small number of the new arrivals will keep on down to American soil, where the recorder of claims will know that fractions, claims, and even creeks have existence in fact before issuing certificates of ownership.

Assuming, what is not the case under present conditions, that every claim thus far staked contains pay, and allowing that two men can work out fifty feet across in a year, it requires one hundred and fifty thousand men to work out every claim. The number required in fact would be much less, but when the unlocated regions elsewhere are considered, these figures will afford some notion of the work needed to develop the placers, while if the quartz shall prove profitable, the Yukon will support a tremendous working population. Few have realized the possibilities of this country. There is no need of lying, as it is to be expected those having interests here will do. What was considered wildcat the other day, is solid investment. But this is not yet the place for the man with a few dollars. Every man will not make a fortune. Thousands of disappointed men will go back, broken in health, many of them, and broken in fortune, but wiser and more apt to be content with home.



I have endeavored in the above account to give some idea of the conditions here, without going largely into the details of life here, which furnish interesting stories in themselves.

A WELCOME TALE.

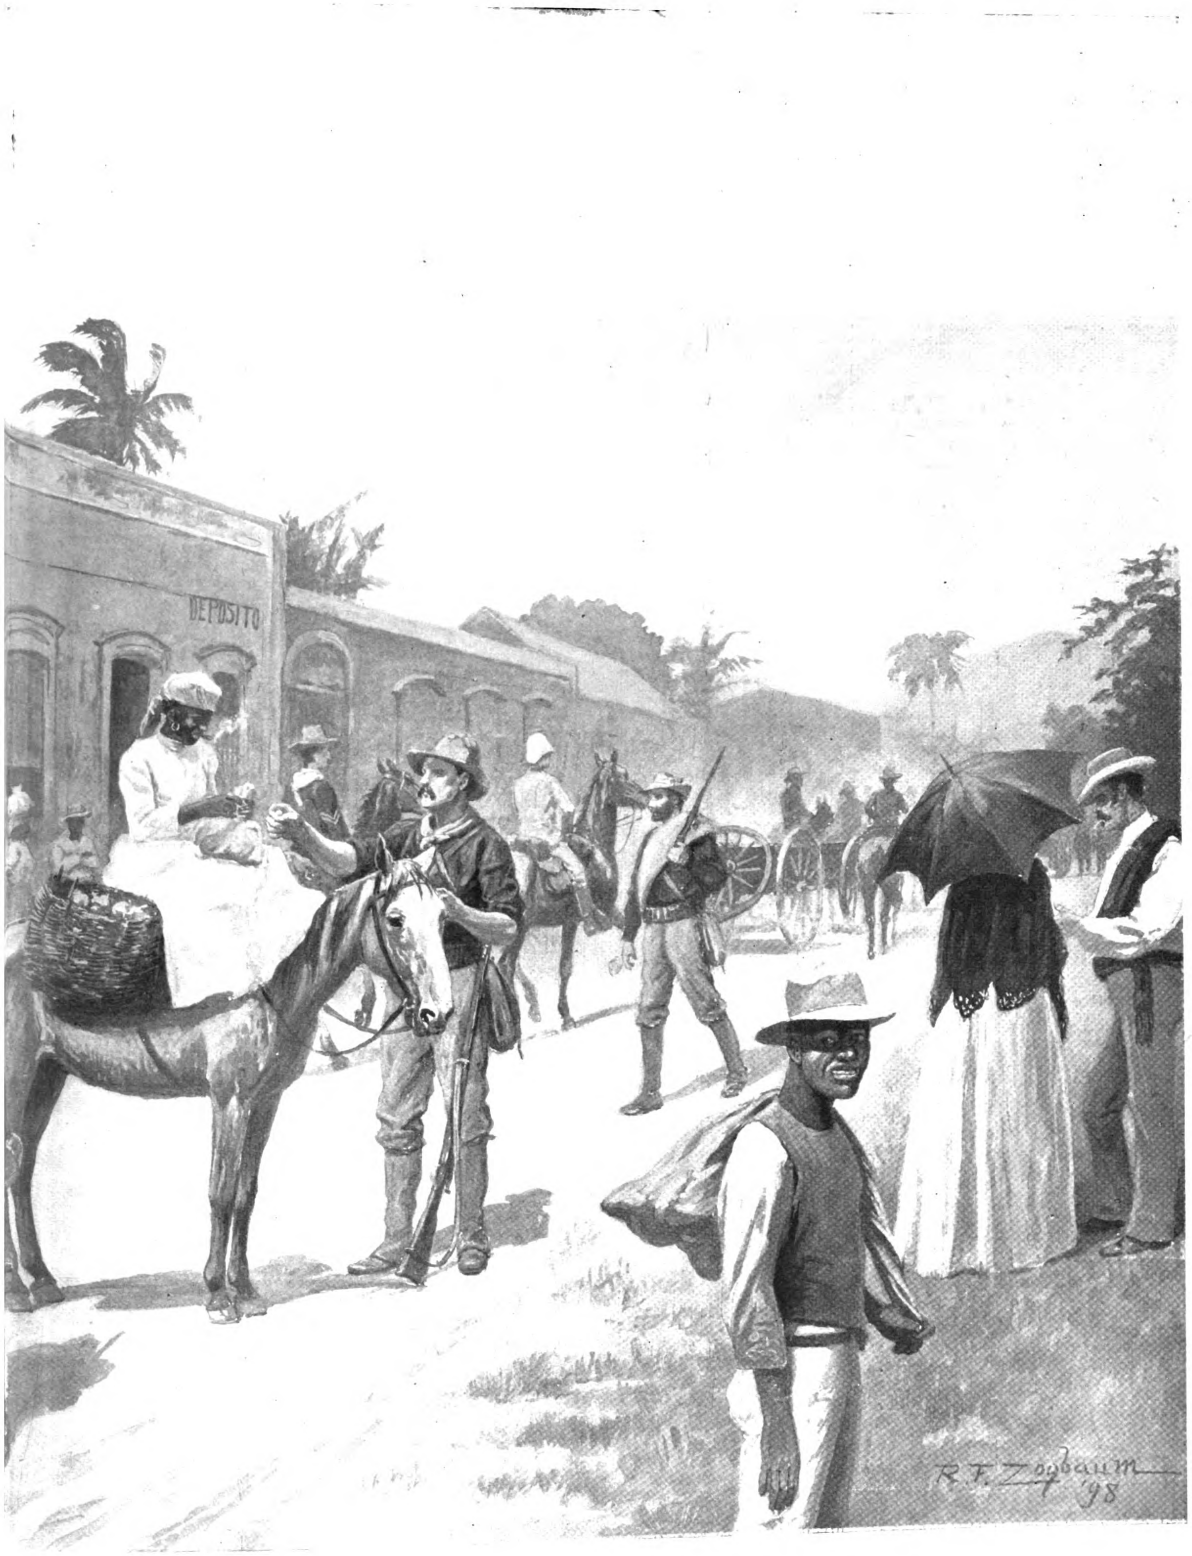
ALL along the woodland ways
And in the lonesome thicket
To-day we hear the merriment
Of katydid and cricket.
They tell us, and we are rejoiced
The wise musicians know it,
That coming soon, they sing in tune,
And some white morn will show it,
As sure as fate, from Nature's hand,
The secret never lost,
To this uncomfortable land
Will safe arrive, the frost.

MARGARET E. SANGSTER.



Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

WITH OUR TROOPS IN PUERTO

DRAWN BY R. F. ZOGBAUM, S.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

)—ON THE SAN JUAN ROAD, PONCE.

Artist for "Harper's Weekly."

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THE AWKWARD AGE.

A Novel.

BY HENRY JAMES,

AUTHOR OF "DAISY MILLER," "AN INTERNATIONAL EPISODE," ETC.

I.

SAVE when it happened to rain Vanderbank always walked home, but he usually took a hansom when the rain was moderate and adopted the preference of the philosopher when it was heavy. On this occasion he recognized, as the servant opened the door, a congruity between the weather and the "four-wheeler" that, in the empty street, under the glazed radiance, waited and trickled and blackly glittered. The butler mentioned it as, on such a wild night, the only thing they could get, and Vanderbank, having replied that it was exactly what would do best, prepared, in the doorway, to put up his umbrella and dash down to it. At this moment he heard his name pronounced from behind and, on turning, found himself joined by the oldish fellow-guest with whom he had talked after dinner and about whom, later on, upstairs, he had sounded his hostess. It was at present a clear question of how this amiable, this apparently unassertive person should get home —of the possibility of the other cab for which even now one of the footmen, with a whistle to his lips, craned out his head and listened through the storm. Mr. Longdon wondered, to Vanderbank, if their course might by any chance be the same; which led our young friend immediately to express a readiness to see him safely in any direction that should accommodate him. As the footman's whistle spent itself in vain they got together into the four-wheeler, where, at the end of a few moments more, Vanderbank became conscious of having proposed his own rooms as a wind-up to their drive. Wouldn't that be a better finish of the evening than just separating in the wet? He liked his new acquaintance, who struck him as in a manner clinging to him, who was staying at a hotel presumably at that hour dismal, and who, confessing with easy humility to a connection positively timid with a club at which one couldn't have a visitor, accepted, under pressure, his invitation. Vanderbank, when they arrived, was amused at the air of added extravagance with which he said he would keep the cab: he so clearly enjoyed to that extent the sense of making a night of it.

"You young men, I believe, keep them for hours, eh? At least they did in my time," he laughed—"the wild ones! But I think of them as all wild then. I dare say that when one settles in town one learns how to manage; only I'm afraid, you know, that I've got completely out of it. I do feel really quite mouldy. It's a matter of thirty years—!"

"Since you've been in London?"

"For more than a few days at a time, upon my honor. You won't understand that—any more, I dare say, than I myself quite understand how, at the end of all, I've accepted this queer view of the doom of coming back. But I don't doubt I shall ask you, if you'll be so good as to let me, for the help of a hint or two: as to how to do, don't you know? and not to—what do you fellows call it?—be done. Now about one of these things—"

One of these things was the lift in which, at no great pace and with much rumbling and creaking, the porter conveyed the two gentlemen to the alarming eminence, as Mr. Longdon measured their flight, at which Vanderbank perched. The impression made on him by this contrivance showed him as unsophisticated, yet when his companion at the top, ushering him in, gave a touch to the quick light and, in the pleasant, ruddy room, all convenience and character, had, before the fire, another look at him, it was not to catch in him any protrusive angle. Mr. Longdon was slight and neat, delicate of body and both keen and kind of face, with black brows finely marked and thick, smooth hair, in which the silver had deep shadows. He wore neither whisker nor mustache, and seemed to carry in the flicker of his quick brown eyes and the positive sun-play of his smile even more than the equivalent of what might, superficially or stupidly, elsewhere be missed in him; which was mass, substance, presence—what is vulgarly called importance. He had indeed no presence, but he had somehow an effect. He might almost have been a priest, if priests, as it occurred to Vanderbank, were ever dandies. He had at all events, conclusively, doubled the Cape of the years—he would never again see fifty-five: to the warning light of that bleak headland he presented a back sufficiently indifferent. Yet, though, to Vanderbank, he could not look young, he came near—strikingly and amusingly—looking new: this, after a minute, appeared mainly perhaps indeed in the perfection of his evening dress and the special smartness of the sleeveless overcoat he had evidently had made to wear with it and might even actually be wearing for the first time. He had talked to Vanderbank at Mrs. Brookenham's about Beccles and Suffolk; but it was not at Beccles, nor anywhere in the county, that these ornaments had been designed. His action had already been, with however little purpose, to present the region to his interlocutor in a favorable light. Vanderbank, for that matter, had the kind of imagination that liked to place an object, even to the point of losing sight of it in the conditions; he already saw the nice old nook it must have taken to keep a man of intelligence so fresh while suffering him to remain so fine. The product of Beccles accepted at all events a cigarette—still much as a joke and an adventure—and looked about him as if even more pleased than he had expected. Then he broke, through his double eye-glass, into an exclamation that was like a passing pang of envy and regret. "You young men, you young men—!"

"Well, what about us?" Vanderbank's tone encouraged the courtesy of the reference. "I'm not so young, moreover, as that comes to."

"How old are you then, pray?"

"Why, I'm thirty-four."

"What do you call that? I'm a hundred and three!" Mr. Longdon took out his watch. "It's only a quarter past eleven." Then with a quick change of interest, "What did you say is your public office?" he inquired.

"The General Audit. I'm Deputy Chairman."

"Dear!" Mr. Longdon looked at him as if he had fifty windows. "What a head you must have!"

"Oh yes—our head's Sir Digby Dence."

"And what do we do for you?"

"Well, you gild the pill—though not perhaps very thick. But it's a decent berth."

"A thing a good many fellows would give a pound of their flesh for?"

The old man appeared so to deprecate too faint a picture that his companion dropped all scruples. "I'm the most envied man I know—so that if I were a shade less amiable I should be one of the most hated."

Mr. Longdon laughed, yet not quite as if they were joking. "I see. Your pleasant way carries it off."

Vanderbank was, however, not serious. "Wouldn't it carry off anything?"

Again his visitor, through the pince-nez, appeared to crown him with a Whitehall cornice. "I think I ought to let you know I'm studying you. It's really fair to tell you," he continued with an earnestness not discomposed by the indulgence in Vanderbank's face. "It's all right—all right!" he reassuringly added, having meanwhile stopped before a photograph suspended on the wall. "That's your mother!" he exclaimed with something of the elation of a child making a discovery or guessing a riddle. "I don't make you out in her yet—in my recollection of her, which, as I told you, is perfect; but I dare say I soon shall."

Vanderbank was more and more aware that the kind of hilarity he excited would never in the least be a bar to affection. "Please take all your time."

Mr. Longdon looked at his watch again. "Do you think I had better keep it?"

"The cab?" Vanderbank liked him so, found in him such a promise of pleasant things, that he was almost tempted to say "Dear and delightful sir, don't weigh that question; I'll pay, myself, for the man's whole night!" His approval at all events was complete. "Most certainly. That's the only way not to think of it."

"Oh, you young men, you young men!" his guest again murmured. He had passed on to the photograph—Vanderbank had many, too many photographs—of some other relation, and stood wiping the gold-mounted glasses through which he had been darting admirations and catching side-lights of shocks. "Don't talk nonsense," he continued as his friend attempted once more to throw in a protest; "I belong to a different period of history. There have been things this evening that have made me feel as if I had been disinterred—literally dug up from a long sleep. I assure you there have!"—he really pressed the point.

Vanderbank wondered a moment what things in particular these might be; he found himself wanting to get at everything his visitor represented, to enter into his consciousness and be, as it were, on his side. He glanced, with an intention freely sarcastic, at an easy possibility. "The extraordinary vitality of Brookenham?"

Mr. Longdon, with the nippers in place again, fixed on him a gravity that failed to prevent his discovering in the eyes behind them a shy reflection of his irony. "Oh, Brookenham! You must tell me all about Brookenham."

"I see that's not what you mean."

Mr. Longdon forbore to deny it. "I wonder if you'll understand what I mean." Vanderbank bristled with the wish to be put to the test, but was checked before he could say so. "And what's his place—Brookenham's?"

"Oh, Rivers and Lakes—an awfully good thing. He got it last year."

Mr. Longdon—but not too grossly—wondered. "How did he get it?"

Vanderbank laughed. "Well, she got it."

His friend remained grave. "And about how much now—?"

"Oh, twelve hundred—and lots of allowances and boats and things. To do the work," Vanderbank, still with a certain levity, explained.

"And what is the work?"

The young man hesitated. "Ask him. He'll like to tell you."

"Yet he seemed to have but little to say." Mr. Longdon exactly measured it again.

"Ah, not about that. Try him."

He looked more sharply at his host, as if vaguely suspicious of a trap; then, not less vaguely, he sighed. "Well, it's what I came up for—to try you all. But do they live on that?" he continued.

Vanderbank once more just faltered. "One doesn't quite know what they live on. But they've means—for it was just that fact, I remember, that showed Brookenham's getting the place wasn't a job. It was given, I mean, not to his mere domestic need, but to his notorious efficiency. He has a property—an ugly little place in Gloucestershire—which they sometimes let. His elder brother has the better one, but they make up an income."

Mr. Longdon, for an instant, lost himself. "Yes, I remember—one heard of those things at the time. And she must have had something."

"Yes, indeed, she had something—and she always has her intense cleverness. She knows thoroughly how. They do it tremendously well."

"Tremendously well," Mr. Longdon intelligently echoed. "But a house in Buckingham Crescent, with the way they seem to have built through to all sorts of other places—"

"Oh, they're all right," Vanderbank soothingly dropped.

"One likes to feel that of people with whom one has dined. There are four children?" his friend went on.

"The older boy, whom you saw, and who, in his way, is a wonder, the older girl, whom you must see, and two youngsters, male and female, whom you mustn't."

There might by this time, in the growing interest of their talk, have been almost nothing too uncanny for Mr. Longdon to fear it. "You mean the youngsters are—unfortunate?"

"No—they're only, like all the modern young, I think, mysteries, terrible little baffling mysteries." Vanderbank had broken into mirth again—it flickered so from his friend's face that, really at moments to the point of alarm, his explanations deepened darkness. Then, with more interest, he harked back. "I know the thing you just mentioned—the thing that strikes you as odd." He produced his knowledge quite with elation. "The talk." Mr. Longdon, at this, only looked at him, in silence, harder, but he went on with assurance: "Yes, the talk—for we do talk, I think." Still his guest left him without relief, only fixing him, on his suggestion, with a sort of suspended eloquence. Whatever the old man was on the point of saying, however, he disposed of in a curtailed murmur; he had already turned back to the series of portraits, and as he glanced at another Vanderbank spoke afresh. "It was very interesting to me to hear from you there, when the ladies had left us, how many old threads you were prepared to pick up."

Mr. Longdon had paused. "I'm an old boy who remembers the mothers," he at last replied.

"Yes, you told me how well you remember Mrs. Brookenham's."

"Oh, oh!"—and he arrived at a new subject. "This must be your sister Mary."

"Yes; it's very bad, but as she's dead—"

"Dead? Dear, dear!"

"Oh, long ago"—Vanderbank eased him off. "It's delightful of you," he went on, "to have known also such a lot of my people."

Mr. Longdon turned from his contemplation with a visible effort. "I feel obliged to you for taking it so; it mightn't—one never knows—have amused you. As I told you there, the first thing I did was to ask Fernanda about the company; and when she mentioned your name I immediately said, 'Would he like me to speak to him?'"

"And what did Fernanda say?"

Mr. Longdon stared. "Do you call her Fernanda?"

Vanderbank felt positively more guilty than he would have expected. "You think it too much in the manner we just mentioned?"

His friend hesitated. Then with a smile a trifle strange, "Excuse me; I didn't mention—"

"No, you didn't; and your scruple was magnificent. In point of fact," Vanderbank pursued, "I don't call Mrs. Brookenham by her Christian name."

Mr. Longdon's clear eyes were searching. "Unless in speaking of her to others?" He seemed really to wish to know.

Vanderbank was but too ready to satisfy him. "I dare say we seem to you a vulgar lot of people. That's not the way, I can see, you speak of ladies at Beccles."

"Oh, if you laugh at me—!" And the old man turned off.

"Don't threaten me," said Vanderbank, "or I will send away the cab. Of course I know what you mean. It will be tremendously interesting to hear how the sort of thing we've fallen into—oh, we have fallen in!—strikes your fresh ear. Do have another cigarette. Sunk as I must appear to you, it sometimes strikes mine. But I'm not sure, as regards Mrs. Brookenham, whom I've known a long time—"

Mr. Longdon again took him up. "What do you people call a long time?"

Vanderbank considered. "Ah, there you are—! And now we're 'we people'! That's right; give it to us. I'm sure that in one way or another it's all earned. Well, I've known her ten years. But awfully well."

"What do you call awfully well?"

"We people?" Vanderbank's inquirer, with his continued restless observation, moving nearer, the young man had laid on his shoulder the friendliest of hands. "Don't you perhaps ask too much? But no," he added, quickly and gayly, "of course you don't: if I don't look out I shall have, on you, exactly the effect I don't want. I dare say I don't know how well I know Mrs. Brookenham. Mustn't that sort of thing be put, in a manner, to the proof? What I meant to say just now was that I wouldn't—at least I hope I shouldn't—have named her as I did save to an old friend."

Mr. Longdon looked promptly satisfied and reassured. "You probably heard me address her myself."

"I did, but you have your rights, and that wouldn't excuse me. The only thing is that I go to see her every Sunday."

Mr. Longdon pondered; then, a little to Vanderbank's surprise, at any rate to his deeper amusement, candidly asked, "Only Fernanda? No other lady?"

"Oh yes, several other ladies."

Mr. Longdon appeared to hear this with pleasure. "You're quite right. We don't make enough of Sunday at Beccles."

"Oh, we make plenty of it in London!" Vanderbank said. "And I think it's rather in my interest I should mention that Mrs. Brookenham calls me—"

His visitor covered him now with an attention that just operated as a check. "By your Christian name?" Before Vanderbank could in any degree attenuate, "What is your Christian name?" Mr. Longdon asked.

Vanderbank felt, of a sudden, almost guilty—as if his answer could only impute extravagance to the lady. "My Christian name"—he blushed it out—"is Gustavus."

His friend took a droll, conscious leap. "And she calls you Gussy?"

"No, not even Gussy. But I scarcely think I ought to tell you," he pursued, "if she herself gave you no glimpse of the fact. Any implication that she consciously avoided it might make you see deeper depths."

Vanderbank spoke with pointed levity, but his companion showed him, after an instant, a face just covered —and a little painfully—with the vision of the possibility brushed away by the joke. "Oh, I'm not so bad as that!" Mr. Longdon modestly ejaculated.

"Well, she doesn't do it always," Vanderbank laughed,

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

"and it's nothing, moreover, to what some people are called. Why, there was a fellow there—" He pulled up, however, and, thinking better of it, selected another instance. "The Duchess—weren't you introduced to the Duchess?—never calls me anything but 'Vanderbank' unless she calls me 'caro mio.' It wouldn't have taken much to make her appeal to you with an 'I say, Longdon!' I can quite hear her."

Mr. Longdon, focussing the effect of the sketch, pointed its moral with an indulgent: "Oh well, a foreign duchess!" He could make his distinctions.

"Yes, she's invidiously, cruelly foreign," Vanderbank concurred: "I've never indeed seen a woman avail herself so cleverly, to make up for the obloquy of that state, of the benefits and immunities it brings with it. She has bloomed in the hot-house of her widowhood—she's a Neapolitan hatched by an incubator."

"A Neapolitan?"—Mr. Longdon, civilly, seemed to wish he had only known it.

"Her husband was one; but I believe that dukes at Naples are as thick as princes at Petersburg. He's dead, at any rate, poor man, and she has come back here to live."

"Sadly, I should think—after Naples?" Mr. Longdon threw out.

"I can scarce imagine the Duchess living sadly after anything; even things, I mean, that for you and me—! However," the young man added, taking himself up, "she lives not in what is behind her, but in what is before—she lives in her precious little Aggie."

"Little Aggie?" Mr. Longdon took a cautious interest.

"I don't take a liberty there," Vanderbank smiled. "I speak only of the young Agnesina, a little girl, the Duchess's niece, or rather, I believe, her husband's, whom she has adopted—in the place of a daughter early lost—and has brought to England to marry."

"Ah, to some great man of course."

Vanderbank thought. "I don't know." He gave a vague but expressive sigh. "She's rather lovely, little Aggie."

Mr. Longdon looked conspicuously subtle. "Then perhaps you're the man—"

"Do I look like a great one?" Vanderbank broke in.

His visitor, turning away from him, again embraced the room. "Oh dear, yes!"

"Well then, to show how right you are, there's the young lady." He pointed to an object on one of the tables, a small photograph with a very wide border of something that looked like crimson fur.

Mr. Longdon took up the picture; he was serious now. "She's very beautiful—but she's not a little girl."

"At Naples they develop early—she's only sixteen: an aunt, of course, has nothing to conceal. She is extremely pretty—with extraordinary red hair and a complexion to match; great rarities, I believe, in that race and latitude. She gave me the portrait—frame and all. The frame is Neapolitan enough, and little Aggie is charming." Then Vanderbank subjoined: "But not so charming as little Nanda."

"Little Nanda?—have you got her?" The old man was all eagerness.

"She's over there beside the lamp—also a present from the original."

II.

Mr. Longdon had gone to the place—little Nanda was in glazed white wood. He took her up and held her out; for a moment he said nothing, but presently, over his glasses, rested on his host a look intenser even than his scrutiny of the faded image. "Do they give their portraits now?"

"Little girls—innocent lambs? Surely, to old friends. Didn't they in your time?"

Mr. Longdon studied the portrait again; after which, with an exhalation of something between superiority and regret, "They never did to me," he replied.

"Well, you can have all you want now!" Vanderbank laughed.

His friend gave a slow, droll head-shake. "I don't want them 'now'!"

"You could do with them, my dear sir, still," Vanderbank continued in the same manner, "every bit I do!"

"I'm sure you do nothing you oughtn't." Mr. Longdon kept the photograph and continued to look at it. "Her mother told me about her—promised me I should see her next time."

"You must—she's a great friend of mine."

Mr. Longdon remained absorbed. "Is she clever?"

Vanderbank turned it over. "Well, you'll tell me if you think so."

"Ah, with a child of sixteen—!" Mr. Longdon murmured it as if in dread of having to pronounce. "This one, too, is sixteen?"

Vanderbank again considered. "Seventeen." He just hung fire once more, then brought out: "Well, call it nearly eighteen. I've kept her birthdays," he laughed.

His companion caught at the idea. "Upon my honor, I should like to! When is the next?"

"You've plenty of time—the fifteenth of June."

"I'm only too sorry to wait." Laying down the object he had been examining, Mr. Longdon took another turn about the room, and his manner was such an appeal to his host to accept his restlessness that, from the corner of a lounge, the latter watched him with encouragement. "I said to you just now that I knew the mothers, but it would have been more to the point to say the grandmothers." He stopped before the lounge, then nodded at the image of Nanda. "I knew hers. She put it at something less."

Vanderbank rather failed to understand. "The old lady? Put what?"

Mr. Longdon's face, for a moment, showed him as feeling his way. "I'm speaking of Mrs. Brookenham. She spoke of her daughter as only sixteen."

His companion's amusement at the tone of this broke out. "She usually does! She has done so, I think, for the last year or two."

Mr. Longdon dropped upon the lounge as if with the weight of something sudden and fresh; then, from where he sat, with a sharp little movement, he chucked into the fire the end of his cigarette. Vanderbank offered him another, a second, and as he accepted it and took a light he said: "I don't know what you're doing with me—I never, at Beccles, smoked so much!" But he puffed away and, seated so near him, laid his hand on Vanderbank's arm as if to help himself to utter something that was too delicate not to be guarded and yet too important not to be risked. "Now that's the sort of thing I did mean—as one of my impressions." Vanderbank continued at a loss, and he went on: "I refer—if you don't mind my saying so—to what you said just now."

Vanderbank was conscious of a deep desire to draw from him whatever might come; so sensible was it somehow that whatever was in him was good was also thoroughly personal. But our young friend had to think a minute. "I see, I see. Nothing is more probable than that I've said something nasty; but which of my particular horrors—?"

"Well, then, your conveying that she makes her daughter out younger—"

"To make herself out the same?"—Vanderbank took him straight up. "It was nasty my doing that? I see, I see. Yes, yes: I rather gave her away, and you're struck by it—as is most delightful you should be—because you're, in every way, of a better tradition and, knowing Mrs. Brookenham's my friend, can't conceive of one's playing on a friend a trick so vulgar and odious. It strikes you also probably as the kind of thing we must be constantly doing; it strikes you that, right and left, probably, we keep giving each other away. Well, I dare say we do. Yes, 'come to think of it' as they say in America, we do. But what shall I tell you? Practically we all know it and allow for it, and it's as broad as it's long. What's London life after all? It's tit for tat!"

"Ah, but what becomes of friendship?" Mr. Longdon earnestly and pleadingly asked, while he still held Vanderbank's arm as if under the spell of the vivid explanation with which he had been furnished.

The young man met his eyes only the more sociably. "Friendship?"

"Friendship." Mr. Longdon maintained the full value of the word.

"Well," his companion risked, "I dare say it isn't in London by any means what it is at Beccles. I quite literally mean that," Vanderbank reassuringly added; "I never really have believed in the existence of friendship in big societies—in great towns and great crowds. It's a plant that takes time and space and air; and London society is a huge 'squash,' as we elegantly call it—an elbowing, pushing, perspiring, chattering mob."

"Ah, I don't say that of you!" Mr. Longdon murmured with a withdrawal of his hand and a visible scruple for the sweeping concession he had evoked.

"Do say it, then—for God's sake; let some one say it, so that something or other, whatever it may be, may come of it! It's impossible to say too much—it's impossible to say enough. There isn't anything any one can say that I won't agree to."

"That shows you really don't care," the old man returned with acuteness.

"Oh, we're past saving, if that's what you mean!" Vanderbank laughed.

"You don't care, you don't care!" his visitor repeated, "and—if I may be frank with you—I shouldn't wonder if it were rather a pity."

"A pity I don't care?"

"You ought to, you ought to." Mr. Longdon paused. "May I say all I think?"

"I assure you I shall! You're awfully interesting."

"So are you, if you come to that. It's just what I've had in my head. There's something I seem to make out in you—!" He abruptly dropped this, however, going on in another way. "I remember the rest of you, but why did I never see you?"

"I must have been at school—at college. Perhaps you did know my brothers, elder and younger."

"There was a boy with your mother at Malvern. I was near her there for three months in—what was the year?"

"Yes, I know," Vanderbank replied while his guest tried to fix the date. "It was my brother Miles. He was awfully clever, but he had no health, poor chap, and we lost him at seventeen. She used to take houses at such places with him—it was supposed to be for his benefit."

Mr. Longdon listened with a visible recovery. "He used to talk to me—I remember he asked me questions I couldn't answer and made me dreadfully ashamed. But I lent him books—partly, upon my honor, to make him think that, as I had them, I did know something. He read everything and had a lot to say about it. I used to tell your mother he had a great future."

Vanderbank shook his head sadly and kindly. "So he had. And you remember Nancy, who was handsome, and who was usually with them?" he went on.

Mr. Longdon looked so uncertain that he explained he meant his other sister; on which his companion said: "Oh, her? Yes, she was charming—she evidently had a future too."

"Well, she's in the midst of it now. She's married."

"And whom did she marry?"

"A fellow called Toovey. A man in the City."

"Oh!" said Mr. Longdon a little blankly. Then, as if to retrieve his blankness: "But why do you call her Nancy? Wasn't her name Blanche?"

"Exactly—Blanche Bertha Vanderbank."

Mr. Longdon looked half mystified and half distressed. "And now she's Nancy Toovey?"

Vanderbank broke into laughter at his dismay. "That's what every one calls her."

"But why?"

"Nobody knows. You see you were right about her future."

Mr. Longdon gave another of his soft, smothered sighs; he had turned back again to the first photograph, which he looked at for a longer time. "Well, it wasn't her way."

"My mother's? No indeed. Oh, my mother's way—!" Vanderbank waited, then added gravely: "She was taken in time."

Mr. Longdon turned half round, and looking as if he were about to reply to this; but instead of so doing he proceeded afresh to an examination of the expressive oval in the red plush frame. He took up little Aggie, who appeared to interest him, and abruptly observed: "Nanda isn't so pretty."

"No, not nearly. There's a great question whether Nanda is pretty at all."

Mr. Longdon continued to inspect her more favored friend; which led him after a moment to bring out: "She ought to be, you know. Her grandmother was."

"Oh, and her mother," Vanderbank threw in. "Don't you think Mrs. Brookenham lovely?"

Mr. Longdon kept him waiting a little. "Not so lovely as Lady Julia. Lady Julia had—" He faltered, then, as if there were too much to say, disposed of the question. "Lady Julia had everything."

Vanderbank gathered from the sound of the words an impression that determined him more and more to diplomacy. "But isn't that just what Mrs. Brookenham has?"

This time the old man was prompt. "Yes, she's very brilliant, but it's a totally different thing." He laid little Aggie down and moved away as if without a purpose; but Vanderbank presently perceived his purpose to be another glance at the other young lady. As if accidentally and absently, he bent again over the portrait of Nanda. "Lady Julia was exquisite, and this child's exactly like her."

Vanderbank, more and more conscious of something working in him, was more and more interested. "If Nanda's so like her, was she so exquisite?" he hazarded.

"Oh yes; every one was agreed about that." Mr. Longdon kept his eyes on the face, trying a little, Vanderbank even thought, to conceal his own. "She was one of the greatest beauties of her day."

"Then is Nanda so like her?" Vanderbank persisted, amused at his friend's transparency.

"Extraordinarily. Her mother told me all about her."

"Told you she's as beautiful as her grandmother?"

Mr. Longdon turned it over. "Well, that she has just Lady Julia's expression. She absolutely has it—I see it here." He was delightfully positive. "She's much more like the dead than like the living."

Vanderbank saw in this too many deep things not to follow them up. One of these was, to begin with, that his friend had not more than half succumbed to Mrs. Brookenham's attraction, if indeed, by a fine originality, he had not resisted it altogether. That in itself, for an observer deeply versed in this lady, was delightful and beguiling. Another indication was that he found himself, in spite of such a break in the chain, distinctly predisposed to Nanda. "If she reproduces then so vividly Lady Julia," the young man threw out, "why does she strike you as so much less pretty than her foreign friend there, who is, after all, by no means a prodigy?"

The subject of this address, with one of the photographs in his hand, glanced, while he reflected, at the other. Then with a subtlety that matched itself for the moment with Vanderbank's, "You just told me yourself that Agnesina—"

"Is ever so much the lovelier of the two? So I did. But you've promptly recognized it. It's the first time," Vanderbank went on, to let him down more gently, "that I've heard Mrs. Brookenham admit the girl's looks."

"Her own girl's? 'Admit' them?"

"I mean grant them to be even as good as they are. I myself, I must tell you, extremely like them. I think Lady Julia's granddaughter has in her face, in spite of everything—"

"What do you mean by everything?" Mr. Longdon broke in with such an approach to resentment that his host's amusement overflowed.

"You'll see—when you do see. She has no features. No, not one," Vanderbank inexorably pursued; "unless indeed you put it that she has two or three too many. What I was going to say was that she has in her expression all that's charming in her nature. But beauty, in London"—and, feeling that he held his visitor's attention, he gave himself the pleasure of freely unfolding his idea—"staring, glaring, obvious, knock-down, beauty, as plain as a poster on a wall, an advertisement of soap or whiskey, something that speaks to the crowd and crosses the foot-lights, fetches such a price in the market that the absence of it, for a woman with a girl to marry, inspires endless terrors and constitutes for the wretched pair—to speak of mother and daughter alone—a sort of social bankruptcy. London doesn't love the latent or the lurking, has neither time, nor taste, nor sense for anything less discernible than the red flag in front of the steam-roller. It wants cash over the counter and letters ten feet high. Therefore, you see, it's all, as yet, rather a dark question for poor Nanda—a question that, in a way, quite occupies the foreground of her mother's earnest little life. How will she look, what will be thought of her and what will she be able to do for herself? She's at the age when the whole thing—speaking of her appearance, her possible share of good looks—is still, in a manner, in a fog. But everything depends on it."

Mr. Longdon, by this time, had come back to him. "Excuse my asking it again—for you take such jumps: what, once more, do you mean by everything?"

"Why, naturally, her marrying. Above all her marrying early."

Mr. Longdon stood before the sofa. "What do you mean by early?"

"Well, we do, doubtless, get up later than at Beccles; but that gives us, you see, shorter days. I mean in a couple of seasons. Soon enough," Vanderbank developed, "to limit the strain—" He broke down, in gayety, at his friend's expression.

"What do you mean by the strain?"

"Well, the complication of her being there."

"Being where?"

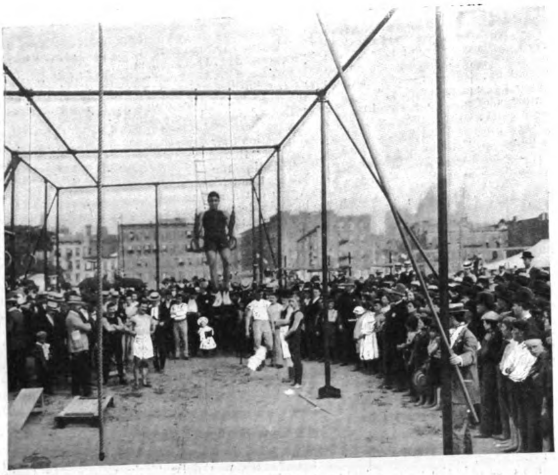
"You do put one through!" Vanderbank laughed. But he showed himself perfectly prepared, "Out of the schoolroom, where she is now. In her mother's drawing-room. At her mother's fireside."

Mr. Longdon stared. "But where else should she be?"

"At her husband's, don't you see?"

Mr. Longdon looked as if he quite saw, yet he was nevertheless, as regards his original challenge, not to be put off. "Ah, certainly," he replied with a slight stiffness, "but not as if she had been pushed down the chimney. All in good time."

Vanderbank turned the tables on him. "What do you call good time?"

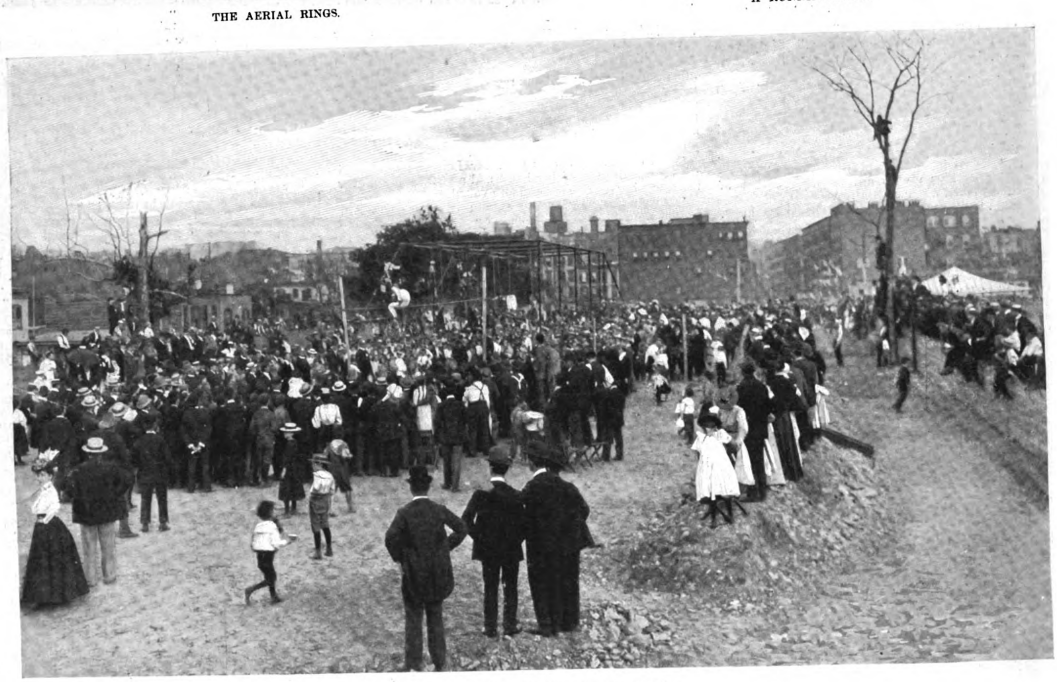


"Why, time to make herself loved."

Vanderbank wondered. "By the men who come to the house?"

Mr. Longdon slightly attenuated this way of putting it. "Yes—and in the home circle. Where's the 'strain'—of her being suffered to be a member of it?"

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

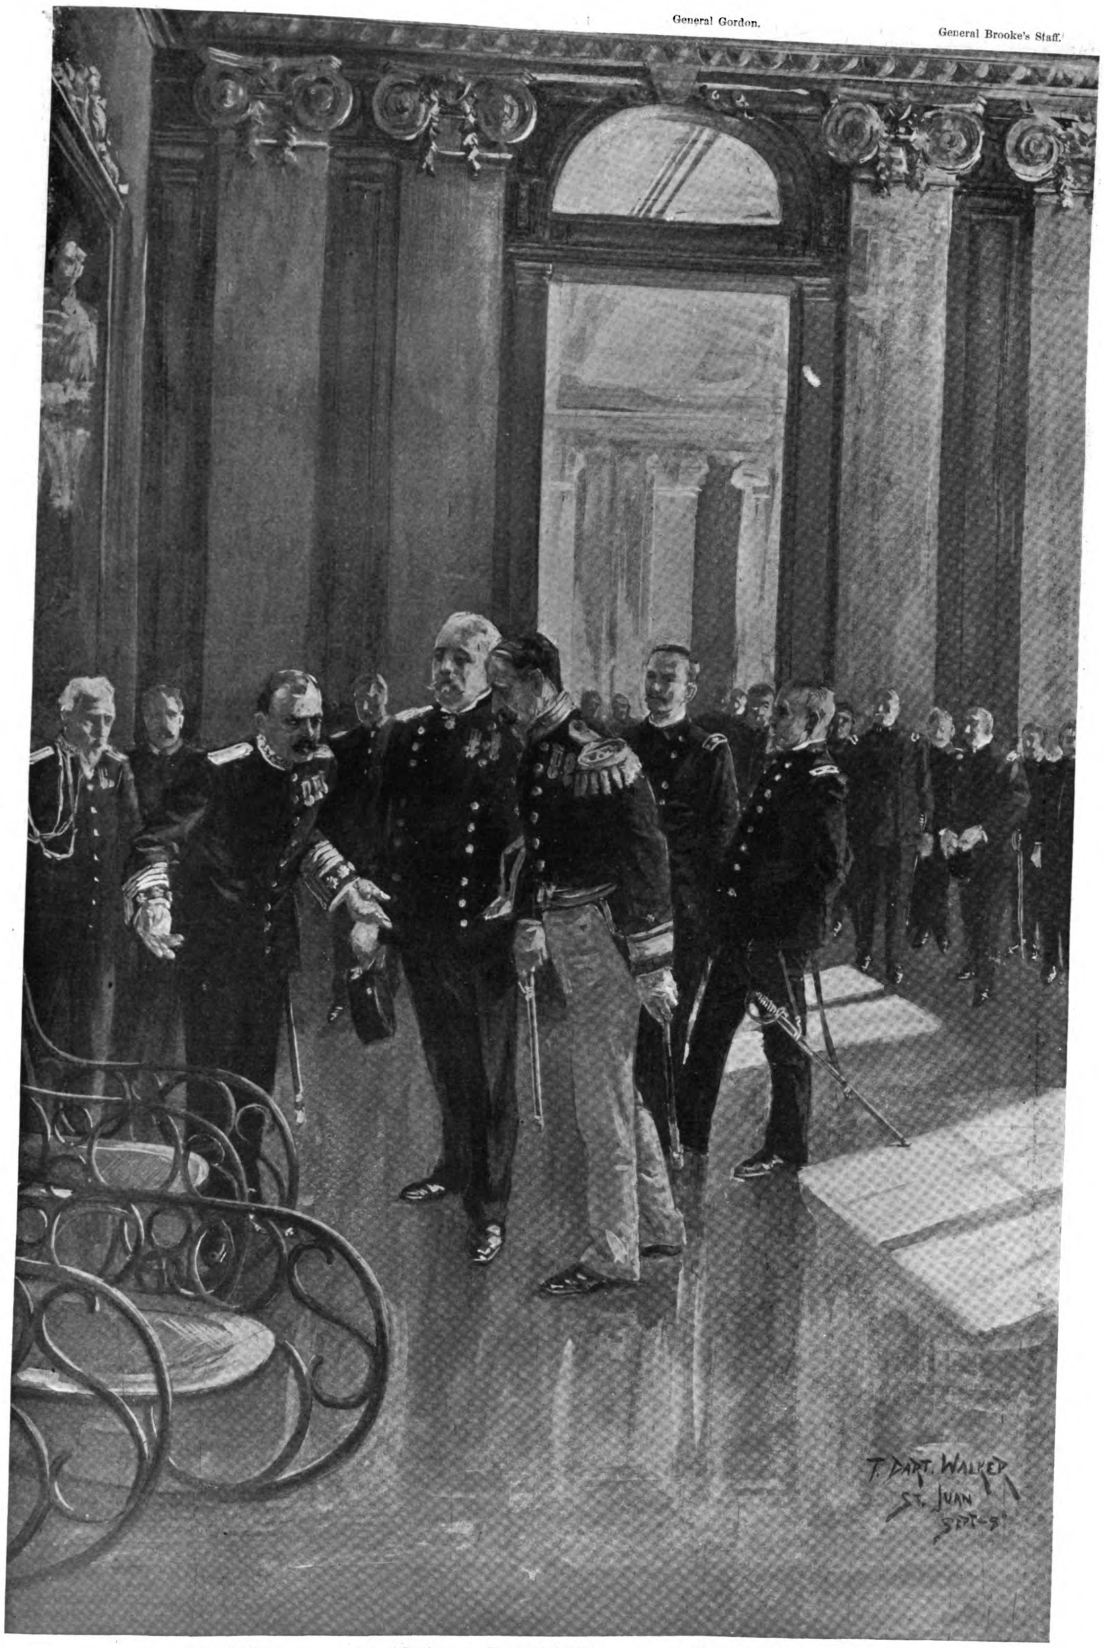


Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THE AERIAL RINGS.

A RUNNING-RACE.

AN INTERESTING GYMNASTIC EXHIBITION.



A CAROUSAL IN THE AIR.

THE SWINGS.

THE NEW FREE GYMNASIUM, FIFTY-THIRD STREET AND HUDSON RIVER, NEW YORK CITY.—[SEE PAGE 974.]

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

PEACE COMES TO PUERTO RICO—GENERAL MACIAS RECEIVING THE AMERICAN COMMISSIONERS AT THE PALACE, SAN JUAN.

Drawn by T. Dart Walker, Special Artist for "Harper's Weekly" with General Miles's Forces.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

MUSIC

AN OVERTURE.

It is, in fact, only within two months that a winter of music of really brilliant importance has been confirmed to us. Theatrical managers, generally, do not fear war abroad, or war fairly near home, as a thing to shut up their shops. The public turns to feigned emotions and superficial excitements on the stage, as a relief from real ones. But those managers whose trade is the purveying of music do not count on such an attitude. Music goes deeper into the mystery of human emotion than any book or play. It always has been too elusive, too subtle a diversion, at least in its finest forms, for an appeal to popular nerves; and it will likely always be so. Between seeking distraction at a Chopin recital, or going to hear Miss Henrietta Petowker, of the Theatre-Royal, Drury Lane, recite "The Blood-drinker's Burial," a public that is war-worried, or money-worried, or even famine-worried, will haste to the Burial every time.

But the protocol is signed, and a music-season New York is to have, as usual. It will be one of the highest pressure, fulness, foreignness, variety, and expense. Possibly one might use the phrase that each autumn is apt to see generously cast about, and say that we shall have an "absolutely unprecedented" season. This would not be either true or definite enough, even in looking forward to eight or ten series of orchestral and choral concerts, to Italian and German and French opera with a blazing galaxy of stars, to the incessant concert-work of many singers and players the first in reputation and virtuosity. By many such winters, New York is seasoned as is no other city in the world. For no other city can and will pay as much to hear as much. But in spite of the shimmering and sparkling past, over which some of us older stagers look with complacency, and a sense that we know very well, forsooth! where the rareness is, there are elements of New York's coming six months of music of a prodigal and oppressive richness.

In another article details can be set forth, and still with timeliness. But it is of immediate interest to notice that many of the incidents of coming months are the result of escapes from last spring's unexpected and—in at least one matter—saddening perplexities. Mr. Seidl's death brought a group of the most significant affairs of this winter into serious quandary. The abrupt severing of Mr. Paur's connection with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Grau's prudent list of "ifs" and "buts" where his opera in the Metropolitan was in question, Mr. Walter Damrosch's retirement from the Symphony Society of New York—were all factors of change and uncertainty in 1897-8 for the outlook on 1898-9. But it is now September. Things have smoothed down and peace is here, and many matters are settled with a judgment and probable success quite as praiseworthy as clashing engagements, internal intrigues, and musical politics well could allow. The highest musical interests of New York never—or at most but once, and that a good while ago—really depended on one man. Regrets for a deep loss ought not to set sensible men and women to talking as if our orchestral paralysis were at hand, and inviting everybody to rally to make it as dismally complete as possible. Mr. Seidl's successor as the Philharmonic Society's conductor and as the head of the fashionable Astoria Concerts will be Mr. Paur. Though we may dispute the need of all Mr. Paur's professional gestures, his capability is established. Just how Mr. Paur will get on with the material now constituting the Philharmonic's orchestra perhaps is another story. We will wait to read it. To the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which New York almost considers its own after eleven winters' visits, returns Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, one of the very best conductors living, persona grata to the band, and remembered by many of us as a great factor—I might have written the great factor—in its attaining its perfection. This is truth; even in our recalling that Mr. Nikisch was Mr. Gericke's successor, and that the making up of the orchestra's ranks has been gradually much strengthened. By the bye, Mr. Nikisch himself and the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra will come here on a visit in the latter part of the season. As to opera at the Metropolitan, offering nearly eighty representations, Mr. Franz Schalk, a new-comer, will take Mr. Seidl's post under Mr. Grau's management. Mr. Schalk is a young and successful leader of opera on German stages, and lately connected with Buda-Pesth's admirable National Opera—whence, in fact, Mr. Grau hurriedly borrowed him for an emergency during Covent Garden performances. The Oratorio Society has decided to live, and will be very busy, and Mr. Frank Damrosch takes his brother's place—an excellent leader in choral work. Mr. Walter Damrosch almost firmly has kept to his declaration to retire for a while from conducting, and only as to certain performances of Mr. Ellis's opera company will make much of a breach in that resolution.

WILHELM GERICKE,
Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

So much for an outline of what we may call the season's personal aspects and arrangements to date. Only, in pointing them out, the enormous overflowing content of performance, day by day, week by week, month by month, from November to May, is loosely defined and colored. But how imperfectly, compared with what will be its actual freightage of arts and artists! It will be noticed by those whose interest leads them to study comparatives in such things that our 1898-9 season will be different from one or another of its famous predecessors chiefly in results of the lively cotillon of conductors—a sort of sudden "all hands round," or puss-in-the-corner, such, indeed, as we have not had in many years, in the return of something like a just balance between opera and concert events, because of the Metropolitan's preparations for a long and popular campaign, instead of locking its doors, as was the case last year; and in the retirement of one old orchestral society. The real aggregate of concerts of the first, second, or third class will not be much greater than in various winters past. The most significant addition to these, by-the-bye, comes in the decision of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to add five matinées to its scheme of New York engagements, and in the proposed visit of the Berlin Philharmonic.

Such a simple reference to conductors to be with us is eloquent enough. The array of great singers and great players visiting America between now and next spring is, however, something to amaze anybody except a Londoner or a New-Yorker. That is no exaggeration. Mr. Rosenthal may be said to inaugurate the star-procession. He is to open the season on the evening of October 23; but he is merely a regimental member when we add Liebling, Sauer, Burmeister, Carreño, Siloti, Joseffy, Aus der Ohe, Zeldenrust. Of violinists will come a long list, headed by Burmester, Marteau, Madam Urso, and Mrs. Powell. And when we cast our eye over the singing-folk of the winter, we have again our old feeling that the opera-houses of Europe have been plundered to make a New York holiday. Eames, Calvé, Melba, Gadsky, Patti, Heinck-Schumann, Brema, Nordica, de Vere, Ternina, de Reszke, Van Dyk, Albert, Alvarez, Dippel, Plançon, Campanari! What is meant by such an assemblage, under one management or another, all for our delectation, is a marvel if we realize their individual "rating," as sailors say.

At present the town is still apt to be a warm town. The annual outbreak of cheerful comic opera by Mr. Hopper and Mr. Wilson, the vivacities of "A Runaway Girl," at Daly's Theatre, and the sincere and often excellent work of the Castle Square Opera Company's doings at the American Theatre, satisfy the hour and the public. Of "The Charlatan" and "The Little Corporal," and of two or three of the Castle Square revivals, I shall speak presently.

There is one aspect of the long hot summer that people not on music's watch-towers do not plainly discern. I mean the comparative lethargy of music everywhere as a creative art; producing, if not actually new forms, at least new examples of interest and beauty on old models. Composers' work-time is apt to be between seasons. Little new work of mark have we. Has music really come to an end creatively, so far as any valuable fruits are concerned? Must we wait—or yield to another generation time to wait—for some new and quickening development that shall begin a new period, and more plainly show how, as our century ends, all is dulling down, and that nobody has anything to say worth saying? Fifteen years have wrought havoc in the ranks of creative musical genius and influence. Wagner, Brahms, Bruckner, Rubinstein, Tschaikovsky, Gounod, Ponchielli—they are gone. Germany is in a state of musical coma, despite the fact that Goldmark, Humperdinck, Kienzl, and sundry others are busy. You cannot make a Bungert into a Wagner, though you stuff him with Homer and musical mechanics, and build a theatre for his spectacular Trilogy all about Ulysses. The brilliant artificiality of French music only interests us in a few of its best operas and concert-works. Two or three over-advertised and busy artificers—always dexterous, never great—do all that is heard of, outside complacent Paris. Most Russians are yet too barbaric, and America's time comes on very slowly. Only one really great universally considered composer is alive to-day. That one is Verdi, nearly eighty, and he will write no more. But let us take heart even in confessing to this twilight of the gods. An art need not perish when it ceases to be imposingly productive, so long as the world preserves taste and clear-sightedness toward the unlimited supply of masterpieces from the past; and so long as we have an unlimited supply of musical intelligences that can unfold them to our delight.

E. Irenæus Stevenson.

DRAMA

"The Adventure of Lady Ursula," which is launched on a prosperous career at the Lyceum, is Mr. Anthony Hope's first attempt at writing a play. That Mr. Hope has the power of making people talk entertainingly was evident enough in The Dolly Dialogues, the work which brought him into prominence as a literary figure. That he could make people do exciting things in an absorbing manner was no less evident in The Prisoner of Zenda. Dialogue and incident being granted, little was lacking, except perhaps a knowledge of stage-craft, to assure success in writing plays, for nowadays those who can write plays do not have to be made to write plays. As Mr. Hope's literary heart is known to have been divided between the modern realistic novel, under the influence of which he wrote his early and unsuccessful books, and the romantic tale of adventure, to which he owes his later successes, it was a question of some curiosity under what influence he would approach the stage. "The Lady Ursula" is as frankly a play of adventure as was the dramatization of The Prisoner of Zenda; but that is not all. In plot and in dialogue Mr. Hope's first play—whether or not he was aware of the fact—is written under the influence of the plays of Shakspere's best comic period, in particular "As You Like It."

Under the Wing of the Swan of Avon.

VIRGINIA HARNED SOTHERN IN THE DUEL SCENE OF "THE ADVENTURE OF LADY URSULA."

To achieve the atmosphere of unreality necessary to the romantic comedy, Shakspere—or rather Thomas Lodge, from whom Shakspere took his plot—transported his people to a Forest of Arden where lions abound. To a modern, this brave license of the Elizabethan fancy is denied; but we still permit ourselves romance and unreality when it is projected into a bygone century. To make the Lady Ursula's adventure as plausible as he could, Mr. Hope chose the early eighteenth century, with its glitter, its superficial charm, and its shallow convention of gallantry. If the plot is impossible even for the days of point-lace and Damascus blades, he plainly says to us: Permit me also my lions in the Forest of Arden. Sir George Sylvester (Mr. Sothern), having been revolted by an affair of honor, has forsworn the gallantries of the day. Though a famous swordsman, he will fight no more duels; and no woman shall cross his threshold. A neighbor of his, the beautiful Lady Ursula Barrington (Mrs. Virginia Harned Sothern), makes a wager, in a spirit of adventure, that she will enter his house, and counterfeits a fainting spell at the forbidden threshold. The obdurate Sir George directs that she be taken to the porter's lodge. Her elder brother, who is ignorant of her plot, happens by, construes this into an insult, and forces Sir George to break the half of his resolve by engaging to fight a duel. The Lady Ursula realizes that this means death to her brother. She is made to see also that though the levity of her action in pretending to faint extenuates the inhospitality of her treatment, a brother cannot urge a sister's folly in order to escape so skilful an opponent. Donning the hunting-suit of a younger brother who is absent in France, she crosses the forbidden threshold, and after a dramatic interview with Sir George succeeds in averting the duel. She acts the man so badly, however, that not only does Sir George suspect who she is, but in the subsequent development of the plot she is forced into a duel with one of Sir George's friends. Realizing her danger, Sir George urges a previous claim to fight. The Lady Ursula faces him bravely. At the last moment he refuses to fire, alleging the only possible excuse, an interest in the supposed youth's sister—that is to say, in the Lady Ursula. In a love passage that follows it transpires that the misogynist has indeed fallen in love, and that his love is returned. The fourth act deals with unimportant developments and ends with a declaration of love.

A Lion in the Forest of Arden.

Lady Ursula's breeches recall the doublet and hose of Shakspere's many masquerading heroines; her duel recalls Viola's duel. Mr. Hope also repeats all the jests arising out of the fact that Lady Ursula is present when she is supposed absent: the masquerading Ursula protests that it grieves her to speak of the Lady Ursula's defects as to speak of her own, just as the masquerading Rosalind swears that Orlando's "very Rosalind" will do as she does. The by-play growing out of the fact that Lady

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Ursula is without skirts and is also without beard is as like Rosalind; and her staggering under a clap on the shoulder is very like Viola. The whole manner of the wit, moreover, is Elizabethan. When the Lady Ursula is choosing a suit from her brother's wardrobe, she rejects various ones in a passage that has the movement of the famous passage where Portia satirizes the defects of her various suitors. She ends with rejecting a sage-green suit because she is "not wise" and has "no man yet to be jealous of." The quip carries one back to the fathers of elaborate old English verbal twists, John Lyly and his Euphues. Such resemblances as can be cited are the barest and least important of all. The dialogue throughout has the spirit and movement of "As You Like It," and awakens endless echoes and suggestions. Yet the play of jest and fancy has a quality of its own, and an excellence that at times recalls the modern masters of dialogue—Pinero, Wilde, and, let us add, Mr. Hope himself. When the Parson says "There is no virtue without temptation," he is answered, "Where there is temptation there remains very little virtue." The misogynist Sir George calls Bluebeard "a wise man, but given to repeating hopeless experiments," and asserts that the Martyrs "welcomed heaven because they were leaving their wives behind them." If the atmosphere of the play is that of Shaksperian comedy, there is certainly nothing for which we could be more grateful this side of the spirit of authentic creation. In The Dolly Dialogues there was a touch of this spirit—a humor that was at once poignant and divining. The Lady Ursula, charming as she is, is without the authentic touch. Yet the play is a most interesting essay, and promises much better things to come.

In structure the play is far from perfect. In the first act nothing whatever happens, and two of the four characters have nothing to do with the main course of the story. The act serves only to explain circumstances which are brought out with sufficient clearness in the second act, when the main action begins. To open with the second act would require considerable constructive skill, but it would avoid the redundance and the tedium of the first act of explanation. The last of the four acts is similarly needless. After the duel and the love passage that close the third act, there is not the least doubt that Sir George has discovered Lady Ursula's disguise, and has fallen deeply in love with her. In itself the fourth act is commonplace and without a breath of dramatic suspense. It is obviously necessary only to drag out the play to the limit of an evening's entertainment. The second and third acts, on the other hand, are admirably constructed, and are full of dramatic movement and dramatic suspense. If at the end of the third act Lady Ursula's identity had been revealed—for instance, by making her brother return to his lodgings where the duel has taken place—the play would have had a vigorous and effective ending.

The acting of Mr. Sothern's company is one of the few things that tend to make up for the rarity in America of stock companies of the better class. No detail of make-up or of expression is slurred or otherwise neglected. The unimportant part of Lady Ursula's servant is taken by no less an actor than Mr. Rowland Buckstone, and his familiar touch of grotesque gives a welcome variety to the piece. Sir George's servant is Mr. C. P. Flockton, whose long association with leading actors in England and America has given him an almost academic correctness and ease. Mr. A. R. Lawrence gives a graceful rendering of his part. Mr. Merton Selten takes the part of an old-world coxcomb with a humor that is a trifle abated by his great unction of manner. As Lady Ursula's elder brother, Mr. Roydon Erlynne appears with a manliness and simplicity of manner that are as unusual as they are delightful. His part is not "fat" in the histrionic sense, and he awakens little response in the audience; but his bearing gives a subdued richness to the scene which is none the less felt. To attempt to characterize the virtues of Mr. Sothern's familiar acting would be to squander adjectives. As far as the limitations of his part permit he is at his best. In the moments before the duel, while the pistols are being loaded, his face is alive with blending emotions and his manner is charged with magnetism. Such a passage of quiet power kindles despair at his mannerisms. At times it seems as if there is nothing he will not sacrifice to superficial smoothness and charm of delivery. In a passage leading up to the duel scene, Lady Ursula, in boots and breeches, bids fair to faint, as she had pretended to faint in propria persona at Sir George's threshold. Sir George hovers over the chair of the supposed younger brother, and says, with an effective cadence, "Are you fainting too?" There is a fine mingling of irony and tenderness in his manner, but nothing short of the harsher, "Are you fainting too?" explains either his irony or his tenderness. Mrs. Sothern has never been as effective in a part like the present, though she has attempted several of them. Her costume is a marvel of scenic propriety and good taste, and her manner throughout suggests careful schooling. If in the charm of her sheer physical exuberance she reminds one of Miss Ada Rehan, the fact is doubtless due to the resemblance her part bears the Rosalind and the Viola with which one is most familiar. Her work is so finished in externals that one is forced to judge it by a high standard; and judged by a high standard it has marked defects. There is no indication that she has felt the part in the least psychologically. There is scarcely a flash of feminine intuition, and not one of the thousand shadings and gradations of expression that, unless I am mistaken, are to be divined in the part. Think of a woman in man's clothes, in a man's lodgings, facing the muzzle of a pistol! Mrs. Sothern could scarcely look more arch and more unconcerned if she were facing a camera. She faints afterward, to be sure, when she is alone with Sir George, but in a perfunctory manner, and is presently as charming and composed as ever.

The settings of the second and third acts are done with the utmost care. Yet there is not a trace of pedantry. Mr. Sothern permits himself the anachronism of Braun photographs of a portrait by Valesquez, and several by Gainsborough; and the effect justifies him. Especially to be praised is the nice subordination of the setting to the scene, so different from the splendid impertinences of scenery with which Sir Henry Irving is extinguishing his acting. Mr. Sothern's settings are a rich and finely adapted accompaniment to his acting, and give harmony to a performance that is throughout a luxury to the senses. JOHN CORBIN.

ON CERTAIN WILY DOVES.

"Let's shed our claws!" said the chicken-hawk
To the calm and peaceful hen.
They shed their claws, they took a walk,
And then!

"Let's shed our teeth!" said the hungry wolf
To the soft and fleecy ram.
They shed their teeth and wandered off—
Poor lamb!

"Let's shed our tricks!" said the steerer bold
To the farmer green as grass.
They shed their tricks, and the farmer's gold
Was brass!

"Let's shed our arms!" said the wily Czar
To the rest of the ruling pack.
They shed their arms; then Asia far:
Cossack! J. K. B.

ADVICE TO MOTHERS.—MRS. WINSLOW'S SOOTHING SYRUP should always be used for children teething. It soothes the child, softens the gums, allays all pain, cures wind colic, and is the best remedy for diarrhœa.—[Adv.]

DON'T BE CARELESS.
IN these days of nurse-maids the Gail Borden Eagle Brand Condensed Milk is a great safeguard to the health of the little ones. It will not easily spoil, being perfectly sterilized in its manufacture.—[Adv.]

CARLSBAD MUD BATHS IN AMERICA.
THERE has just been discovered an alkali mud of great strength at a location of twenty-one miles from Chicago. This mud is an absolute cure for rheumatism and all diseases caused by uric acid in the system, and is a practical duplicate of the celebrated CARLSBAD mud. Two doctors thoroughly familiar with the mud bath cure, and having a large clientele, want some one willing to invest $15,000 for the establishment of the business. A first-class hotel on grounds can be leased on favorable terms. Hotel now used for summer resort business only. Forty minutes from Chicago. Forty trains daily. Five minutes from depot. This is an exceptional opportunity to make big money, and it will pay to investigate. Address, DOCTOR, P. O. Box 143, New York City.—[Adv.]

FOR a tonic and regulator nothing equals DR. SIEGERT'S ANGOSTURA BITTERS.—[Adv.]

STRENGTH comes to overwrought brain and body with ABBOTT'S, The Original Angostura Bitters, as a bracer.—[Adv.]

USE BROWN'S Camphorated Saponaceous DENTIFRICE for the TEETH. 25 cents a jar.—[Adv.]

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Cigar Smokers are finding out what a very satisfactory smoke there is in those little cigars called Van Bibber Little Cigars
and the demand for them — from the most fastidious and exacting smokers — is increasing astonishingly.
Quality and Common Sense
are two of the reasons that have created this demand. We never vary the "quality" — the other reason should cause you to ask for them, or send 25c. (in stamps) for 10. They will be sent by return mail, prepaid, in special pocket pouch, anywhere.
H. ELLIS & Co., Baltimore, Md.
The American Tobacco Co., Successor

WILLIAMS' SHAVING STICK

This man has neglected to shave for several days. He dreads shaving now, but realizes how disgusting his appearance is, and feels mean and uncomfortable. He is much distressed

"I OUGHT TO SHAVE."

Williams' Soaps
are for sale everywhere, but if your dealer does not supply you, we mail them—to any address—postpaid on receipt of price.
Williams' Shaving Stick, 25c.
Genuine Yankee Shaving Soap, 10c.
Luxury Shaving Tablet, 25c.
Swiss Violet Shaving Cream, 50c.
Jersey Cream (Toilet) Soap, 15c.
Williams' Shaving Soap (Barbers'), 6 Round Cakes, 1 lb., 40c.
Exquisite also for toilet. Trial cake for 2c. stamp.
THE J. B. WILLIAMS' CO.
Glastonbury, Conn., U.S.A.
LONDON: 64 Gt. Russell St.
SYDNEY: 161 Clarence St.

He gives a sigh of relief. He remembers Williams' Shaving Stick. He applies the thick, creamy lather. His "stubby" beard immediately yields to its softening influence. His razor glides smoothly over his face. Shaving has lost its terrors.

"I WILL SHAVE."

"I HAVE SHAVED."

"He is a new man." Feels at peace with all the world. His face is soft as velvet, and he experiences the soothing, refreshing sensations that every man does who uses Williams' Shaving Stick. See how happy he looks!

Eau de Cologne No. 4711.

The most pungent, exhilarating and refreshing Perfume. Used by persons of refinement. Imported into America for three-quarters of a Century. Be sure to get "No. 4711," which is the standard in all civilized countries.
MÜLHENS & KROPFF, N. Y., U. S. AGENTS.

The Club Cocktails
MANHATTAN, MARTINI, WHISKEY, HOLLAND GIN, TOM GIN, VERMOUTH, AND YORK.
A COCKTAIL MUST BE COLD TO BE GOOD; TO SERVE IN PERFECT CONDITION, POUR OVER CRACKED ICE, (NOT SHAVEN) STIR AND STRAIN OFF.
G. F. HEUBLEIN & BRO., SOLE PROPRIETORS, 39 BROADWAY, NEW YORK. HARTFORD, CONN. AND 20 PICCADILLY W., LONDON, ENGLAND.

BOKER'S BITTERS
The oldest and best Specific against dyspepsia; an appetizer and a promoter of digestion.
Ask your Grocer, Liquor Dealer, or Druggist.

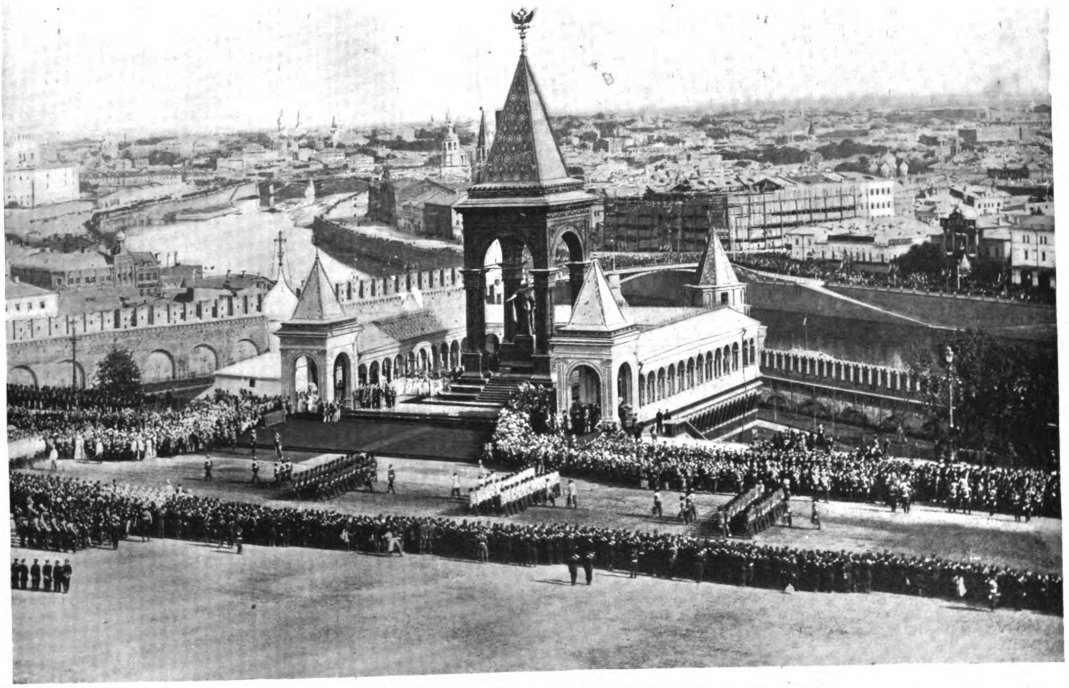
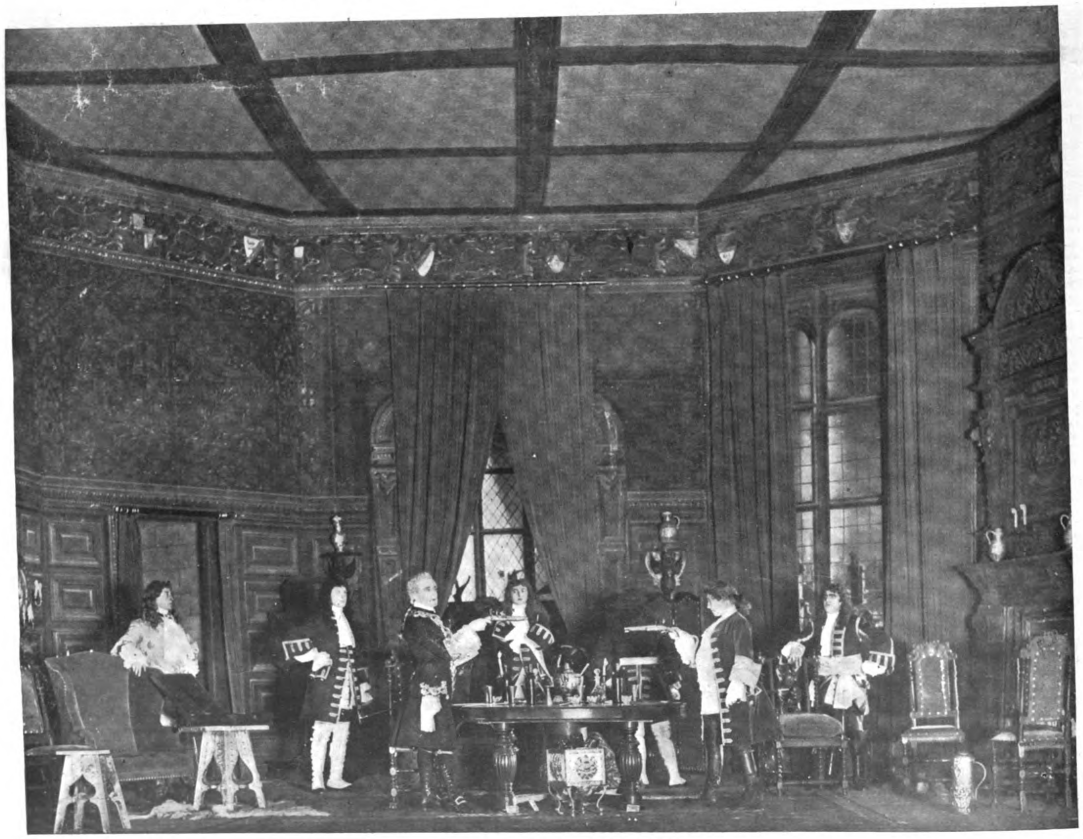
HARPER'S CATALOGUE,
thoroughly revised and classified, will be sent by mail to any address on receipt of ten cents.



CHEW
Beeman's
The Original
Pepsin Gum



Cures Indigestion and Sea-sickness.
All Others Are Imitations.

THE CELEBRATED
SOHMER
Heads the List of the Highest-Grade Pianos.
Caution.—The buying public will please not confound the genuine SOHMER Piano with one of a similar-sounding name of a cheap grade. Our name spells—
S—O—H—M—E—R
New York Warerooms
SOHMER BUILDING
Fifth Ave., cor 22d St.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

MOSCOW—DEDICATION OF THE MONUMENT TO ALEXANDER II.—[See Page 974.]

"THE ADVENTURE OF LADY URSULA," AT THE LYCEUM THEATRE, NEW YORK—THE DUEL SCENE AT THE END OF THE THIRD ACT.
[See Page 970.]

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

"'TIS THE VIM, SNAP, AND SPARKLE."

What Is It?

Why, the most delicious and exquisite

Natural Champagne

Fermented in the bottle. Excels in health-giving properties. Ask your dealer for it, or address

The New Hammondsport Wine Co.
Hammondsport, N. Y.

GOLDEN AGE HITS THE MARK EVERY TIME

To more thoroughly introduce our productions, we will deliver at any point in the United States east of the Rocky Mountains having an express office, one assorted case containing twelve bottles as follows: One pint each of Golden Age, Beef Iron and Wine, and Cognac Process Brandy, and nine quart bottles of assorted Still Wines, making 1 doz. varieties, on receipt of address accompanied with $6.00.

THE SIGNAL READS INSURE IN

THE PRUDENTIAL

LIFE INSURANCE for Men, Women & Children
ALL AGES...Amounts $15 to $50,000
Write for information
THE PRUDENTIAL
Insurance Company of America
John F. Dryden, Pres. Home Office: Newark, N.J.

The Merritt

25 cts.

H.C. CURTIS & CO. TROY, N.Y.

CHICKEN

NOVEL MEXICAN DELICACY.

Minced chicken, highly seasoned with Mexican spices, and wrapped in corn husks. Unique, delightful. At grocers, or ½ pound can mailed for 15 cts in stamps. Booklet sent on request.

TAMALE

ARMOUR PACKING CO.
DEPARTMENT H
KANSAS CITY, MO. U.S.A.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS

MAGAZINE, $4 00 a year
WEEKLY, $4 00 a year
BAZAR, $4 00 a year
LITERATURE, $4 00 a Year
ROUND TABLE, $1 00 a year

MAGIC LANTERNS WANTED AND FOR SALE OR EXCHANGE. HARBACH & CO. 809 Filbert St. Phila. Pa.

"Wherefore all this Success and I have none?" saith the croaker. A word of advice: Produce what there is a great demand for, at any cost, and you'll succeed. Keep it at a standard of excellence and hold it there. Americans like a good thing and will pay for it. Americans hate a mean thing and won't have it. Thus the reached the standard of the best, and is known as The American Gentleman's Whiskey. It is pure, mellow, and ten years old. Regardless of cost, it will maintain this high mark. Physicians prescribe and recommend it for its purity. Clubmen everywhere prefer it for its pure, rich flavor, and its effect as a tonical stimulant.

HUNTER BALTIMORE RYE

There is no Kodak but the Eastman Kodak

Half the charm of a photographic outing is lost if one carries along several pounds of glass plates and holders and has every moment filled with anxiety for their safety.

Kodaks

use non-breakable film cartridges, which weigh ounces where plates weigh pounds.

KODAKS $5.00 to $35.00.

Catalogues free at agencies or by mail.

EASTMAN KODAK CO.
Rochester, N. Y.

Financial

Letters of Credit.

Bills of Exchange bought and sold. Cable Transfers to Europe and South Africa. Commercial and Travellers' Letters of Credit. Collections made.

Brown Brothers & Co.,

BANKERS, No. 59 WALL STREET.

SMITH & WESSON
15 Stockbridge St., Springfield, Mass.

HOW IT WORKS
THE HAMMERLESS SAFETY REVOLVER

12 DIFFERENT STYLES.....SEND FOR CATALOGUE.

REVOLVERS

A NEW POCO.
The Folding Gem.

The neatest, smallest, most carefully built of all the low-priced cameras. A marvel of compactness weighing one pound, and only an inch and a half thick, closed. Automatically locks itself at proper focusing distance. Closes by touching a spring.

TAKES A PICTURE 4 X 5
As perfect at edges as at centre.

COMPLETE, $7.00.
ROCHESTER CAMERA CO.
43 ELIZABETH ST., ROCHESTER, N. Y.

SO SIMPLE A CHILD CAN USE THEM.

SUNART CAMERAS

28 Styles from $5.00 to $100.00
All Cameras Sold under a Positive Guarantee
Send 2c. stamp for Catalogue.
SUNART PHOTO CO.
92 Aqueduct St., Rochester, N.Y.

A TRIP TO JAMAICA,

the QUEEN of the WEST INDIES ISLANDS, is highly recommended to those desiring to avoid the severity of our American winters or in search of rest and recreation. About $5.00 per day is sufficient to defray ALL expenses. Send for illustrated pamphlet "K" for full particulars.

PIM, FORWOOD & KELLOCK, Gen'l Agts.,
24 State Street, - - NEW YORK CITY.

Inter-State Fair at Trenton, September 26, 27, 28, 29, and 30.

The great Inter-State Fair, located on the New York Division of the Pennsylvania Railroad three miles east of Trenton, grows more extensive and interesting each year, and the exhibition to be held on September 26, 27, 28, 29, and 30 promises to be unusually comprehensive and attractive. Every department will be replete with superior and instructive displays. The blooded-stock exhibit will be particularly fine, and the daily programme of races contains the speediest classes obtainable. Circus acts of rare merit and daring and vaudeville entertainments of all kinds will be presented.

The large [illegible] offered in the manifold exhibits and [illegible] sure unusual efforts in the endeavor to [illegible] superiority in the various departments.

The Pennsylvania Railroad Company, as is its yearly custom, will sell excursion tickets on this occasion at greatly reduced rates from stations within a wide radius, and special trains over the New York, Belvidere and Amboy Divisions will be run through to the grounds, thus avoiding street-car transfer. The management of the Fair has put forth extraordinary efforts to make this year's exhibition the greatest ever given.

PETTIJOHN'S

Breakfast Food

FEEDS THE BODY AND THE BRAIN

THE AMERICAN CEREAL CO. CHICAGO

Books on Football

AMERICAN FOOTBALL. By WALTER CAMP. With Thirty-two Portraits. 16mo, Cloth, $1 25.

FOOTBALL FACTS AND FIGURES. By WALTER CAMP. Post 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

This is altogether a unique and remarkable book.—N. Y. Times.

A PRIMER OF COLLEGE FOOTBALL. By W. H. LEWIS. Illustrated from Instantaneous Photographs and with Diagrams. 16mo, Paper, 75 cents.

Treats clearly of the science and strategy of the game, the author's points being well supported by diagrams, and especially by instantaneous photographs. There is a concluding paper on training, and the entire subject is treated with thoroughness and understanding. —Philadelphia Telegraph.

NEW YORK AND LONDON
HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

ANOTHER PATRIOTIC HOME BODY.

HE. "Now that the war is over, I wish I had gone."

SHE. "Well, you might have got killed."

HE. "That's so; but I don't see how I can get a pension unless I put in a claim for being so cut up over not going."

A delicious drink and a piquant relish.

Vigoral

"Concentrated Beef"

Represents all the nutriment and flavor of prime roast beef in a condensed form. It builds up the invalid. Strengthens the convalescent.

Our Chafing Dish Recipe Book sent upon request. It gives fifty ways of using Vigoral.

ARMOUR & COMPANY, CHICAGO.

Pepsalt...

is the best of table salt, into every grain of which is incorporated digestive substances natural to the stomach. Fill your salt-cellar with Pepsalt and use it in place of salt at your meals. If you have indigestion your stomach does not supply the necessary amount of the dissolving or digestive juices. Pepsalt taken in place of salt at your meals makes good this deficiency, as you take with every mouthful of your food a similar substance to that which is required and at the right time, and your indigestion is a thing of the past.

Send for sample in salt-shaker bottle and try it.

Price 25 cents, postpaid.

THE VAUPEL SAMARITAN CO., 45 Sheriff St., Cleveland, Ohio.

Indigestion Has No Terrors For Him

That salt-shaker is filled with Pepsalt

PEPSALT CURES AND PREVENTS INDIGESTION

WONDERFUL TRIËDER BINOCULARS

Have 8 to 10 times the power of the best of the old-style field and opera glasses.

Pocket size—invaluable for Army and Navy, War Correspondents, Race Meets, Regattas, Travel, and the Theatre.

Send for Descriptive Catalogue. For sale by leading jewelers and opticians throughout the United States. Among them:

New York—Theodore B. Starr, F. G. Schmidt, Gall & Lembke, Queen & Co., Ga Nun & Parsons.
Brooklyn—J. B. Hoecker, 332 Fulton St.
Chicago—C. D. Peacock, Spaulding & Co., Hyman, Berg & Co., N. Wattry, H. Borsch.
Philadelphia—Queen & Co., Bouschur & Holmes, Williams, Brown & Earle.
Washington—Franklin & Co., Moore & Leding, D. N. Walford.
Boston—Pinkham & Smith.
St. Louis—A. S. Aloe Co., Erker Bros.
San Francisco—Hirsch & Kayser, Henry Kahn & Co., Geo. H. Kahn.

½ Actual Size.

Prices Range from $44.50 to $72.50.

C. P. GOERZ, 52 Union Sq. (East), N. Y. City

"A PERFECT FOOD—as Wholesome as it is Delicious."

Walter Baker & Co.'s

Breakfast

Cocoa

Trade-Mark.

The Standard for Purity and Excellence....

Costs less than one cent a cup.

Our Trade-Mark on Every Package.

Walter Baker & Co. Ltd.

DORCHESTER, MASS.

ESTABLISHED 1780.

Campers and Yachtsmen

can have home comforts by providing themselves with our "PERFECTION" AIR MATTRESSES and CUSHIONS. Waterproof—Light—Convenient. Made in any shape or size desired.

Illustrated catalogue sent free on application.

MECHANICAL FABRIC CO., Air-Goods Department. PROVIDENCE, R. I.

Arnold Constable & Co.

FALL, 1898.

Ladies' Faced Cloths and Fancy Suitings

in all the New Shades and Designs.
Golf and Cycle Cloths and Cloakings.

Men's Wear.

English, Irish, and Scotch Trouserings, Suitings and Overcoatings in Fall and Winter Weights.

Broadway & 19th St.

NEW YORK.

THE "ONEITA"

PAT. APL. 25TH 1893.

Elastic-Ribbed UNION SUITS

are complete undergarments, covering the entire body like an additional skin. Perfectly elastic, fitting like a glove, but softly and without pressure. No buttons down the front. Made for Men, Women, and Young People. Most convenient to put on or off, being entered at the top and drawn on like trousers. With no other kind of underwear can ladies obtain such perfect fit for dresses or wear comfortably so small a corset.

ONEITA KNITTING MILLS, Office: No. 1 Greene St., N. Y.

Send for Illustrated Booklet. Address Dept. 7.

STANDS A WORLD Remington Standard Typewriter. OF WEAR AND TEAR

WYCKOFF, SEAMANS & BENEDICT,

327 Broadway, New York, N. Y.

EARL & WILSON'S LINEN COLLARS & CUFFS BEST IN THE WORLD

Nathan B. Goodnow & Co.,

BANKERS.

ESTABLISHED 1873.

2 Post Office Sq., Boston, Mass.

Transact a General Banking Business, including the Purchase and Sale of Stocks, Bonds, and Grain, for Investment or on Margin.

Dealers in Government and Railroad Bonds.

Books containing Four-Year Range of Prices, Dividends, and Earnings sent free on request.

A Permanently Invested Fund of over TWO HUNDRED AND TWENTY-FOUR THOUSAND DOLLARS is held as a Guaranteed Security for all persons having business with us.

Correspondence solicited.

Joseph Gillott's

STEEL PENS.

GOLD MEDAL, PARIS EXPOSITION, 1889, AND THE CHICAGO EXPOSITION AWARD.

THE MOST PERFECT OF PENS.

WALLINGFORD, CONNECTICUT.

ROSEMARY HALL, a Country School for Girls.

MISS RUNTZ-REES, Principal.

Ninth year begins Oct. 1, 1898.

Books by

VARINA ANNE JEFFERSON-DAVIS

A ROMANCE OF SUMMER SEAS. A Novel. Post 8vo, Cloth, Ornamental, $1 25.

Miss Davis has handled her plot with much skill and refinement, the story has good action and sustained interest.—N. Y. Times.

THE VEILED DOCTOR. A Novel. Post 8vo, Cloth, $1 25.

From the opening paragraph its author has known what she wanted to tell and how she wanted to tell it.—N. Y. Critic.

New York HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers London

"AMERICA'S GREAT RESORTS," 48 pages, with map, sent free on receipt of a two-cent stamp by GEORGE H. DANIELS, C. P. A. New York Central, New York.

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

TRANS-MISSISSIPPI EXPOSITION NUMBER.

HARPER'S WEEKLY

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. XLII.—No. 2181. NEW YORK, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 8, 1898. TEN CENTS A COPY. FOUR DOLLARS A YEAR.

Copyright, 1898, by HARPER & BROTHERS. All Rights Reserved.

UNDER THE ADMINISTRATION ARCH.

A TYPICAL SCENE AT THE TRANS-MISSISSIPPI EXPOSITION AT OMAHA—ARCH OF THE STATES IN THE BACKGROUND.

DRAWN BY W. A. ROGERS, SPECIAL ARTIST FOR "HARPER'S WEEKLY" AT THE EXPOSITION.—[SEE PAGE 987.]

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

HARPER'S WEEKLY

(TWENTY-FOUR PAGES)

NEW YORK CITY, OCTOBER 8, 1898

Terms: 10 Cents a Copy—$4 00 a Year, in Advance

Postage free to all Subscribers in the United States, Canada, and Mexico

Subscriptions may begin with any Number

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS

New York City: Franklin Square

London: 45 Albemarle Street, W.

Also for sale at Brentano's, 37 Avenue de l'Opéra, Paris

MR. WOODFORD has resigned the mission to Spain, having no more duties to perform that are of immediate moment to the country. He retires with the respect of all his fellow-citizens, and of many Spaniards among those who recognize most clearly the situation of their country.

THE Paris Peace Commissioners of America and Spain have arrived at the place of consultation. If there is any point for discussion, Spain may be counted on to delay the decision as long as possible. If there is not—in other words, if our Commissioners have no discretion—there is no reason why they should have been appointed. There was no need under such conditions for this government to send a messenger even. If we are to lay down our final terms, determined on at Washington in advance, there is no room for negotiation. But we fancy that the rumors of the press are at fault, and that Mr. DAY and his associates will have an opportunity to yield and compromise.

GOVERNOR BLACK is partly the victim of bad political logic. First he offended all decent citizens of the State by his contemptible partisanship, and his appointment of LOU PAYN and ALDRIDGE to responsible positions. Then he offended the scoundrels by permitting the rascalities of the canal improvement management to be revealed, and by undertaking to prevent PLATT from carrying out his agreement with CROKER. In order to be a deservedly popular statesman one must be consistently and persistently virtuous. In order to be a successful politician one must be persistently vicious, and a faithful and loyal adherent and slave of the party rascals.

THE French cabinet, with much reluctance, has ordered a revision of the DREYFUS case. That is, it has sent the case to the Court of Cassation with a view to discovering if DREYFUS was wrongfully convicted. In opposing a revision of the case the French army has been laboring under a misapprehension. It is not DREYFUS now, nor even ESTERHAZY, but the chiefs of the French army and the French Republic itself that are on trial. ESTERHAZY probably wrote the bordereau. He is said to have written it under the order of his superior officer, at whose service he placed his conscience as well as his sword. He too, like President FAURE and the chiefs of the French army, believes in DREYFUS's guilt, but he admits that there is no material evidence in existence to prove it. It may be that his statement as to the orders that he received to commit forgery is worthless, but the case against the French general staff does not depend upon ESTERHAZY and his statements. It is now believed throughout the world, and in France, that the general staff of the French army determined to convict DREYFUS, and did convict him, without any evidence against him; that, having done this, the army prevented the civil authorities from doing justice, and that DREYFUS is suffering imprisonment on his lonely island because the French general staff is supreme in France and has determined to punish him, guilty or not guilty. On this statement the French Republic is not only threatened, but if it must either be under the heel of the army or cease to exist, it had better cease to exist. If the French army had prevented a revision of the DREYFUS sentence, or if it can now prevent a decision that will be accepted as just, the republic of France is under a military tyranny compared with which the empires of the Kaiser and Tsar are free and enlightened governments.

THE autonomists of Cuba insist, naturally, upon an independent government for their island, and they have made a declaration of this opinion which is of great importance. There seems to be a growing sentiment in this country to the effect that we shall be obliged to assume the government of Cuba because we have discovered that the Cuban soldiers under GARCIA are worthless creatures, who aroused a distaste and inspired a dislike in the American soldier for everything Cuban. We know more than this: we know that the government for which GARCIA and GOMEZ fought, and of which MASSO was, or is, the pretended President, does not exist, and has not existed. We know now that President MCKINLEY and Congress were justified in refusing to recognize the belligerency or independence of the Cuban Republic, and that we made a happy escape from FORAKER and his crowd. This knowledge ought to inspire a modest reticence in the Jingoes who urged us into war for the sake of the Cubans who were "struggling for their liberties," but it does not do that; on the contrary, it inspires them to say that since it has been proved that they were wholly wrong before the war, and that they were insisting upon an attitude which wiser men told them then would be a false one, that therefore we should now accept their counsels and assume the government of the island. The truth is, however, that nothing whatever has been proved as to the capacity of the Cubans for self-government, whether by acts of GARCIA and his men or by the recognized and admitted feebleness of the MASSO government. Even the non-existence of that government, now alleged by GARCIA, does not prove that the Cubans cannot manage their own affairs. The people of the island are not all in the insurgent army. On the contrary, the business of the island is conducted by them; they manage the sugar plantations; they grow tobacco; they furnish the workmen for the mines of the eastern end of the island; many of them are capitalists and good citizens; and these men, we fancy, are to be found in the autonomist party. The United States have no right to say that Cuba cannot govern itself because a few ragged insurgent soldiers have turned out to be worthless pilferers. We are in duty bound to permit the whole population of Cuba to decide this question for itself. We are under the highest obligations to permit the people to vote on this question; and if they decide that they want independence, it is our duty to leave the island to its people, as Congress promised that we should.

THE UN-AMERICAN POLICY.

THE discussion of the future foreign policy of the United States is increasing in interest—the opponents of expansion, as the New York Times has pointed out, having the advantage of character and ability. In the current number of HARPER'S MONTHLY is a clear and strong argument in behalf of the maintenance of American institutions by ex-Secretary CARLISLE. It follows and supplements a recent article published in the same periodical by Mr. JAMES BRYCE, whose warning against the perils of colonial expansion is tempered by the natural self-restraint of a foreigner speaking to us concerning our own affairs, but is also quick with the intelligent interest which Mr. BRYCE, beyond any other foreigner, has in our republic. On the same side have ranged themselves Mr. CARL SCHURZ, Mr. GEORGE F. EDMUNDS, Senator CAFFERY, and Mr. CLEVELAND, among other Americans, and Mr. JOHN MORLEY and other leading Liberals, the long-time friends of the United States, among Englishmen. On the other side we have some exuberant and restless young adventurers, some politicians who find phrase-making and demagogy easier than thinking, some editors who mistake cerebral excitement for patriotism and noise for statesmanship, some commercial adventurers who are eagerly interested in the proposition that the government shall buy markets for them with blood and treasure, and some Englishmen, like Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, who realize that if they can only persuade the United States to take the Philippines, Great Britain will be sure to have this country for an ally in any trouble that may arise in China between herself and Russia. Surely if character and ability ever lend weight to one side of a controversy, there is good reason to ask the country to pause and consider before plunging into a departure toward world power, world responsibilities, and world troubles, on the ground of the intellectual and moral differences between the opponents and advocates of expansion.

There is another reason for listening to the opponents of this new movement than the merits of their arguments. They are more consistently American than the advocates of expansion. They are the champions of the fundamental principles of the republic, the hopeful and confident believers in the soundness of the democratic form of government, and in the high achievements of its future. The advocates of expansion, on the other hand, are proving their loss of faith in democratic institutions and their distrust of the American experiment. They denounce as old-fashioned and outgrown WASHINGTON'S and JEFFERSON'S counsels against mingling our affairs and our destinies with those of monarchical Europe. They hold that the Declaration of Independence erred in asserting it to be a "self-evident truth that governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed." They scout the word of LINCOLN, and insist that "government of the people, by the people, and for the people" has perished from the earth, notwithstanding Gettysburg and Bunker Hill. Whether they like it or not—and they profess not to like it—they are really imperialists, for they are endeavoring to overturn the democratic form of government, to destroy the ideals of the republic, to revolutionize American politics by changing the United States from a popular self-government to a power ruling over alien and unwilling peoples, who will not be free and independent, who will be subjects, who will not have a voice in the making of the laws by which they are governed, and who will be taxed without being represented. And yet these enemies of American institutions, these rebels against the policy which has made the United States what they are, and which has built up American citizenship as it exists, have the insolence to declare that those who favor the maintenance of these institutions and that policy are "un-American." In other words, they recognize the character of the task in which they are engaged by objecting to the labels which properly describe them, and by trying to attach one of them to their opponents. Illustrations of the old fable of the thief who sought to turn attention from himself to his honest pursuers are constantly cropping up in modern life, but no renewal of the old trick within our memory is quite so bold as this one made by those Americans who are so tired of their government and its foundation principles that they desire to join the mediæval procession, the head of which, for the moment, is the Tsar of Russia.

The controlling idea of the fantastics who are seeking to escape from republican to imperial conditions was expressed by Attorney-General GRIGGS in his recent speech before the Republican State Convention of New Jersey. There was an unusual amount of demagogy in this speech, but the sum and substance of it was that by annexing distant islands, and by assuming the government of semi-savage peoples, the politics of the United States would grow in dignity and in interest, and a new race of statesmen would spring up, because the questions that would then present themselves for solution would appeal to intellectual and educated men with more force than do the questions of to-day. Domestic politics, in the opinion of Attorney-General GRIGGS, are "too often artificial and transient," and he longs for the time when we shall get away from them.

What are the problems which Mr. GRIGGS despises, and what is the character of our domestic affairs which appear to him to be so mean and petty? In the first place, by adhering to the policy which was marked out for us not only by the fathers, but by our geographical situation, and subsequently by the enormous extent of our territory, a mighty and consistent whole, the American nation and the American citizen have come to be what they are. The men who have built up this country and made it one of the most powerful and prosperous nations of the world are the products of American institutions, which have made men self-respecting and absolutely independent through equality of privileges and equality of power—an equality that will be at once destroyed by the assumption of the power to govern other people. We have attained the heights which appear so low to Mr. GRIGGS largely by reason of our freedom from foreign complications and from the burdens of war and militarism, but mainly by the growth of character developed by our recognition of the right of every human creature to his personal liberty, and of every separate community to govern itself by its own laws, and for the furtherance of its own conception of what is best for itself. These achievements do not arrest Mr. GRIGGS's attention, nor does it occur to him that this republic, the isolated power of the Western continents, guarding its own destinies, not sharing in the international politics of Europe—the chief products of which have been war and diplomatic intrigue—but attending to its own affairs, and developing its own citizens, has had more influence in Europe itself in ameliorating both social and political conditions than all the rest of the world combined. The domestic politics which has produced this kind of result seems to Mr. GRIGGS to be so "artificial and transient" that the American people should adopt a new policy—should

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google turn their backs upon the tasks which they have heretofore pursued, and which have made for human liberty and human happiness, in order that their minds may find relaxation and inspiration in controlling the affairs of savages in the Philippines, and in pushing the commerce of our protected industries into the valley of central China.

As to the present problems which Mr. GRIGGS wishes to escape, some of which are due to perversions of our political system, perversions to which the imperial plan would give a long extension of life, their proper solution is vital to the interests of the republic. They involve and include the questions arising out of our commercial policy. We are on the point of determining whether we shall continue our seventeenth-century trade policy or follow a more enlightened plan. We are endeavoring to make the government more efficient by reforming our civil service. We are doing our utmost to make political life more attractive to the honest and able man by the elimination of a corruption that is killing. We are engaged in solving elementary but necessary problems in finance. We are face to face with grave questions of reforms in the administration of justice. We are beginning to struggle with the boss, who for the moment has so revolutionized our form of government that it is an absolutism in the selection of its officers—an absolutism presided over in each party in more than one of our States by an irresponsible person who is so powerful that, in New Jersey, for example, Mr. GRIGGS could not secure a nomination for any office from his own party, even if a majority of the voters of his party wished to give it to him, if his party's State machine objected.

All these problems are difficult, but they are also interesting and dignified. They are beginning to attract the attention of the most intelligent and best of the younger generation of voters. They are not only American questions, but they are of the utmost importance to the cause of democracy everywhere. Indeed, upon their proper solution depends the immediate condition of democracy. They are, in our opinion, infinitely more important than the work in which the expansionists would have the republic engage, which is, reduced to its true terms, the opening up of a few tropical fields for the commerce of a few American citizens. Not only are these domestic questions of more moment than the proposed international questions, but their abandonment would, for the time at least, be the abandonment of the effort now in progress to make the democratic form of government as effective as an administrative instrument as it has been beneficent to the individual citizen. If it is un-American to promote the interests of America, then the opponents of expansion are un-American. On the other hand, if it is un-American to avoid the vital problems of our country and our time, and to abandon democracy for imperialism, then the expansionists must bear the odium of the accusation.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT FOR GOVERNOR.

MR. ROOSEVELT'S nomination as the Republican candidate for Governor of New York is one good fruit of the war. We say it is a fruit of the war because without the popular enthusiasm which Mr. ROOSEVELT aroused by his conduct as leader of the Rough Riders he could not have received the Republican nomination. Naturally no Republican in the State who was a possible candidate for the Governorship is more offensive to Mr. PLATT than Colonel ROOSEVELT. And at first, we have no doubt, Mr. PLATT was determined that Mr. ROOSEVELT should not be the head of the Republican ticket this year. Events, however, were too strong for the master-boss, and finally he accepted the inevitable, because if he had not he would have been obliged to accept Governor BLACK, who, without ROOSEVELT'S strength, was quite as offensive to him, but for other reasons; and, besides, any other candidate than ROOSEVELT would probably have been defeated by the Democrats. A happy conjunction of events made Mr. ROOSEVELT'S nomination possible.

Notwithstanding some evil features attending the nomination, it is one in which good citizens will rejoice, because it shows that the people still have a power which they can be stimulated to exercise on supreme occasions, and before which the most absolute boss must give way. Mr. ROOSEVELT'S nomination will probably receive the hearty and enthusiastic support of most of the good citizens of the State of New York. While it is too early to say that it is an augury of a good time coming, it is a fact that the nomination carries us back to better days in the history of the State. In point of character the candidate is worthy of the time before PLATT and CROKER dominated the Republican and Democratic machines. Mr. ROOSEVELT is a worthy successor of the men who were Governors before the time of CORNELL, and of Mr. CLEVELAND, the only Governor who, since CORNELL'S time, has maintained the old traditions. Mr. ROOSEVELT, no matter on what grounds his own canvass may be conducted, will be supported by intelligent and thinking citizens, because he is an able and intelligent man, a good administrative officer, and a thoroughly honest gentleman. The presence of such a man as he is needed in Albany, because of the crimes that have been committed by the officials of the party which has now been forced to nominate him as its candidate for Governor, and because of the condition in which men like ALDRIDGE and PAYN have put the affairs of the State. We can trust Governor ROOSEVELT to change the men and the things who have disgraced the Empire State during Governor BLACK'S administration. He cannot be anything but a reformer, and even while his heart may be beating for the Philippines, his mind will be occupied with the affairs of the State of New York, and will do his duty intelligently and honestly.

It is true, too, that in a way his candidacy rests upon national issues, for at the coming election the State of New York is to choose members of the House of Representatives at Washington and legislators who will elect a successor to EDWARD MURPHY. The Republicans of the State, like the Republicans of Iowa and Connecticut, have pronounced in favor of currency legislation that will not only put the finances of the country upon a gold basis, but will reform our currency laws in such a way that the evils which have led to the free-silver movement, and have given it its strongest impulse, will be cured, and we need to be rid of the silver heresy and EDWARD MURPHY.

THE CONTROL OF THE NILE VALLEY.

THE presence of an armed French force at Fashoda will need a lot of explanation. Sir EDWARD GREY, the Under-Secretary for Foreign Affairs in Lord ROSEBERY'S cabinet, warned France in 1895 that any intrusion on the Nile Valley would be looked upon as "an unfriendly act." Fashoda is a thousand miles and more from the nearest French possessions. France made no objection when Germany, Italy, and Belgium in turn acknowledged Great Britain's claim to control the territory in which it stands. How, then, account for the appearance and martial activity of French officers in a town hundreds of leagues from their proper posts, and tacitly confessed by their government to belong to another power?

A glance at the map shows that France stands greatly in need of a connecting link between her possessions in Central Africa and the fortified station of Obok, on the Red Sea. Fashoda meets that requirement, not quite so well as could be wished, but still sufficiently to make it worth occupying. It is within possible striking distance of the French Congo, and easily accessible from Abyssinia, where French influence carries weight with MENELEK. Also it has many advantages of its own. The power that holds Fashoda has control of the province of Bahr-el-Ghazal, said to be the finest recruiting-ground in all Africa, and can make a bid for the Sennar district to the north, which is known as the "granary of the Sudan." Add to these inducements the chance of worrying England and of becoming the latest heroes of the boulevards, and the immediate motives of the French officers in venturing on the Nile Valley are made clear.

But, above everything else, Fashoda is a tempting bait because its possession means the possession of the sources of the Nile, and whoever controls the sources of the Nile controls Egypt. A difference of seven or eight feet in its periodical rise is the difference between flood and famine from Khartum to Cairo. With the French settled at Fashoda, the prosperity, the industries, the very life of Egypt would be in their hands. Not much engineering skill would be needed to divert the Nile from its course, under the pretext of irrigating a special district, and so ruin Egypt at a stroke. Of course a diabolical jest of this kind may be very far from French intentions, but the risk is too great for England to run. Great Britain is not going to see her work in Egypt dependent upon the good-will of a few French officers on the Upper Nile, even if their presence were not fatal to the "Cape to Cairo" dominion, which is the goal of British policy in Africa.

The French will therefore be requested to evacuate Fashoda, and after some protests, and an effort or two to carry out the bluff, they will probably do it. If not, Great Britain will hardly hesitate to turn them out. After the successful two years' struggle in the Sudan, Englishmen are not in the mood for another of Lord SALISBURY'S graceful concessions, let alone the very general feeling that the friendship of France in her present condition is not worth making sacrifices for. But whether by compulsion or persuasion Fashoda will have to be given up. Even so the control of the Nile Valley will not be finally assured to Great Britain. The French have made prodigious efforts within the last ten years to win the friendship of the Negus of Abyssinia. It was with French rifles, and under the guidance of French officers, that MENELEK defeated the Italians at Adowa, and KITCHENER'S campaign was primarily begun to prevent an alliance between the Negus and the Khalifa. How far MENELEK has yielded himself to his French and Russian advisers nobody quite knows, but there is enough uncertainty about his attitude to make Downing Street uneasy. If his splendid fighting strength were to be turned against a British advance southward, the Sirdar would hardly find the last half of the reconquest of the Sudan so easy as the first.

GOLF ETHICS.

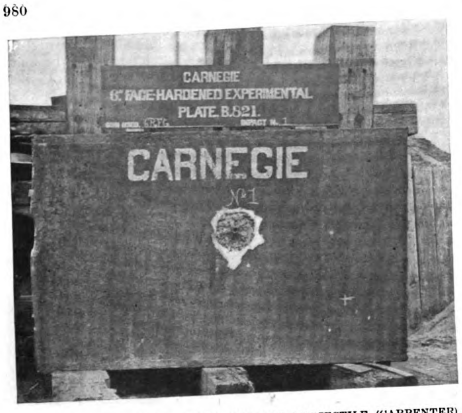
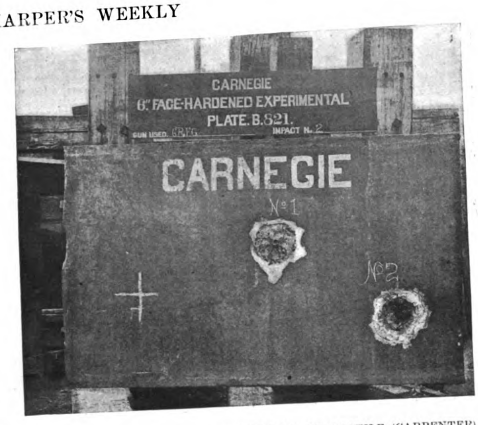
IN theory golf is an admirably simple game; in practice it involves difficulties innumerable. Its accepted code is cumbrous and curiously obscure; and as no two golf courses are exactly alike in physical characteristics, it is easy to see how questions of interpretation may constantly arise. Again, the game is played over a large area, and the opponents in a match are often widely separated. It is such an easy thing to surreptitiously improve the lie of one's ball; and while the unfortunate man in a bunker is not to be judged too harshly if he forgets that he has played thirteen strokes instead of a dozen, the fact remains that he may cheat with comparative impunity, if he cares to take advantage of his opportunities. Of course in an important match there is not much chance for sharp practice, but there are contingencies outside of mere vulgar cheating.



Golf is full of technicalities, and many of its penalties are unduly proportioned to the crime for which they are exacted. The question then arises as to how far a player may take advantage of his adversary upon purely technical grounds and yet retain his standing as a sportsman.

An important match was in progress, and it so happened that no referee was in attendance. A doubtful point arose, and one of the players turned to his opponent for the needful information. Granting that a player is supposed to know his own business, how should the opponent (who did know) have answered? He would have been well within his rights if he had declined to give any information, and, without particular injury to his own prospects, he might have answered the question explicitly. What he did do was to return a reply carefully worded, but ambiguous in its nature. The player was deceived, and committed an infraction of the rules. The opponent thereupon claimed and exacted the penalty.



Well, the question may admit of argument, but the nub of the matter seems to be that the mere winning is an unimportant thing compared to the sport itself. There have been periods in our athletic history when this fact was in danger of being overlooked entirely, but of late years a healthier sentiment has arisen. We now require that honors must be won fairly as well as ably. What is the object of the amateur golf meeting? Is it simply to decide who shall have his name engraved upon the HAVEMEYER vase, or is it to determine who is the premier golfer of the year? If the latter, the golf-lawyer must be unplaced equally with the duffer.

It is pleasant to record the fact that both the titular British and American amateur golf champions are men whose sportsmanship is as distinguished as is their skill. Everybody knows that "Freddy" TAIT is the most chivalric of opponents, and although he prefers to be a gentleman first and a golfer afterwards, it does not appear that he has lost many laurels by the decision. The fine play of Mr. DOUGLAS in the recent tournament at Morristown was admired by thousands of spectators, but his unassuming courtesy and thorough-going sportsmanship were quite as much in evidence as was his skill. On one occasion he assisted his opponent in finding a lost ball, and on another he refused to accept an advantage which his adversary was about to accord through an oversight. The same may be said of the runner-up, Mr. W. B. SMITH. In the final match each man did his best to win, but there was not the shadow of an unfairness in the struggle. If golf, as its admirers assert, is the finest of sports, it can only be worthily exploited by gentlemen, and under the most rigorous conditions of honor and fair play.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

No. 1—IMPACT OF 6-INCH ARMOR-PIERCING PROJECTILE (CARPENTER), WITH STRIKING VELOCITY OF 2021 FOOT-SECONDS.
Estimated penetration, 2.5 inches. Back bulge, 1.5 inches high. No other effect on plate, bolts, backing, or structure.

No. 2—IMPACT OF 6-INCH ARMOR-PIERCING PROJECTILE (CARPENTER), WITH STRIKING VELOCITY OF 2237 FOOT-SECONDS.
Estimated penetration, 5 inches. Back bulge, 4.5 inches high. No other effect on plate, backing, or structure.

KRUPP ARMOR-PLATE TESTS.

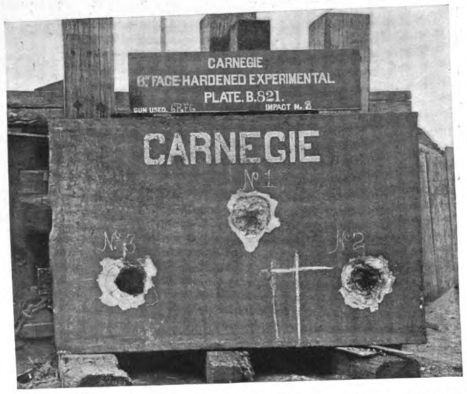
A CONTROVERSY long drawn out, between the makers of armor plate and Congress, may be disposed of, though not settled, through the agency of certain tests made recently at Indian Head, on the Potomac, by the Ordnance Bureau of the Navy Department. Those tests, according to Captain O'Neil, the chief of the Ordnance Bureau, render it practically certain that the newly invented Krupp armor plate will be used on the new ships of the navy. The ships in sight for which armor-plate contracts are yet to be made are three battle-ships and four Monitors.

There has been no controversy in the history of the navy more bitter than that which grew out of an investigation of the manufacture of armor plate made by a committee of Congress during the last administration. The Navy Department had been paying between $400 and $500 a ton for armor plate of Harveyized steel. At the same time, it was claimed by the manufacturers, Russia paid American concerns $500 a ton for the same kind of armor. A committee of Congress undertook to prove what was the cost of making armor plate. Its report said that armor plate could be made at a profit for $300 a ton. Congress then offered the steel companies $300 a ton for armor. They made a counter-offer at $400, which Secretary Herbert wanted Congress to accept. But Congress stood by the committee report, and even voted for an investigation to determine the feasibility of building a government armor plant. This was the state of the controversy when the war broke out.

At about that time it was announced that in the Krupp works at Essen had been invented a new way of hardening plates, superior to the Harvey process. The license to use this new process in the United States was obtained by the Carnegie Company. At that time it was said that the Krupp plate would be offered to the government at the price of the Harveyized plate, $400, and that thus no armor thicker than 12 inches will be used where armor of 16 and 18 inches protects the old battle-ships. This saving in weight will help the department to meet the problem of increasing the speed of the battle-ship without lessening her offensive or defensive power. Another element contributing to this end will likely be the substitution of 12-inch for 13-inch guns. The Ordnance Bureau is now making a 12-inch gun of 52 tons weight which will resist a charge calculated to give 3000 foot-seconds velocity to a projectile, where the 13-inch gun, weighing 61 tons, develops a projectile velocity of 2000 foot-seconds. The loss in mass will be more than balanced by the gain in velocity.

Two tests of the new armor have been made at Indian Head. A 6-inch plate was tested July 13, and a 12-inch plate September 22. In each case one-half the plate had been tested successfully at the Bethlehem Iron Works, though the test of the 12-inch plate had not been complete for lack of a 12-inch gun on the proving-grounds. The tests made at Indian Head resulted as shown in the tables below:



An important feature of all these tests was that the plates were not cracked.

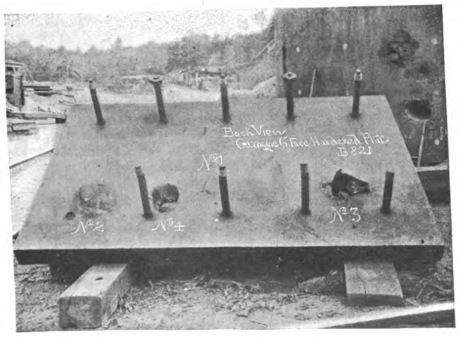
The best plate made abroad was forged at the Creusot works in France. It developed a resistance of 1.41 compared with wrought iron. The resistance of the Krupp plate is 1.71, and it is estimated that a reforged Krupp plate would have a resistance of 2.50. The best Harveyized plate has been hardened to a depth of only 2 inches. The hardening of the Krupp plate extends 4 inches below the surface.

The process by which the Krupp armor is made is secret. Officials of the Carnegie Company say it is known to only two men—experts who were sent to Essen to study it—and even they do not know the last word on the subject. The increased cost, it is claimed, is represented by the slowness of the process of manufacture.

Though the ordnance experts favor the adoption of the new plate, I have heard it stated very positively that Congress will not follow their advice, so we may see a renewal of the armor-plate controversy this winter.

GEORGE GRANTHAM BAIN.

No. 3—IMPACT OF 6-INCH ARMOR-PIERCING PROJECTILE (CARPENTER), WITH STRIKING VELOCITY OF 2350 FOOT-SECONDS.
Penetrated the plate, the 12-inch oak backing, and brought up against the two ⅝-inch steel plates without cracking them.



No. 4—IMPACT OF CAPPED 6-INCH ARMOR-PIERCING PROJECTILE (CARPENTER), WITH STRIKING VELOCITY OF 1984 FOOT-SECONDS.
Penetrated plate, backing, and skin plates, and went a few inches into the sand-butt, not covering itself with sand.

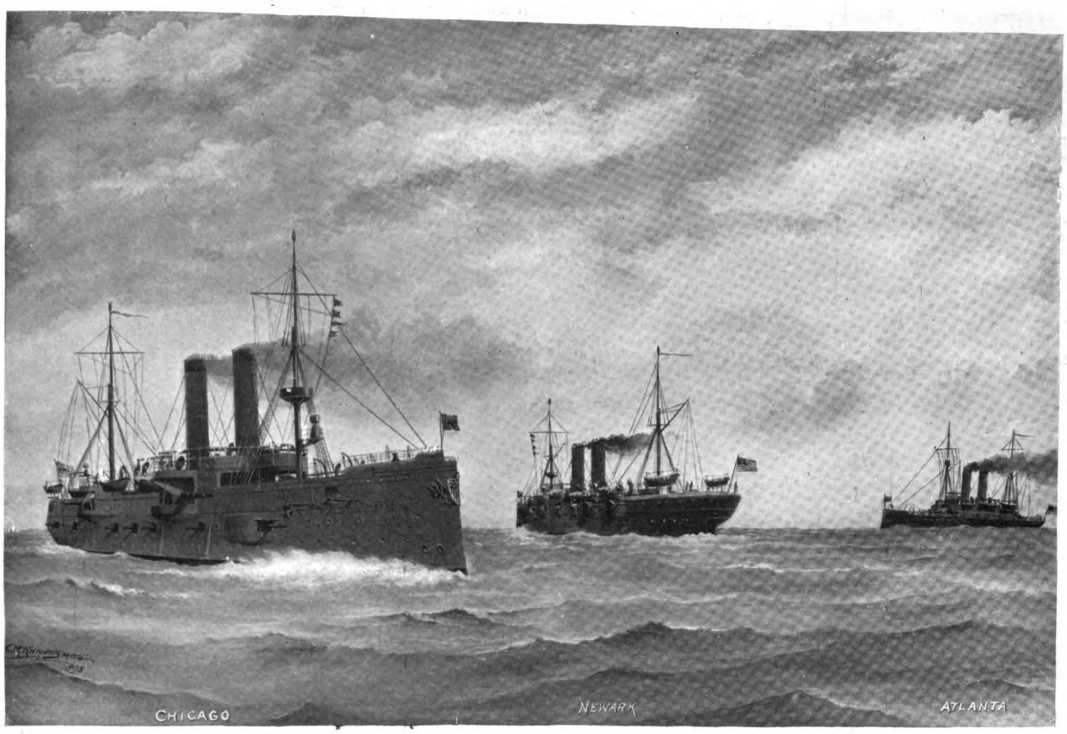
JULY 13.—SIX-INCH PLATE, MOUNTED ON 12 INCHES OF OAK, WITH ⅝-INCH SKIN PLATE.

| Round. | Projectile. | Striking velocity. | Penetration. |
|---|---|---|---|
| | | Foot-seconds. | Inches. |
| 1 | Carpenter 6-inch armor-piercing shell. | 2021 | 2½ |
| 2 | " " " " | 2237 | 5 |
| 3 | " " " " | 2350 | Through plate and backing. |
| 4 | Carpenter 6-inch shell, capped. | 1984 | |

SEPTEMBER 22.—TWELVE-INCH PLATE SIMILARLY MOUNTED.

| Round. | Projectile. | Striking velocity. | Penetration. |
|---|---|---|---|
| | | Foot-seconds. | Inches. |
| 1 | Carpenter 12-inch armor-piercing shell. | 1833 | 8½ |
| 2 | Midvale " " " | 2022 | Through plate, backing, and skin plate. |
| 3 | Carpenter " " " | 1720 | 4 to 5 |

BACK VIEW OF CARNEGIE 6-INCH FACE-HARDENED EXPERIMENTAL PLATE B-521 AFTER FOUR IMPACTS.



the objection of Congress would be met, viz., by giving the navy more for its money, but adhering to the manufacturer's rate. This statement was denied to me recently by an officer of the Carnegie Company, who told me the price would be more than $400; and Captain O'Neil, chief of the Ordnance Bureau of the Navy Department, tells me it will probably be $525 a ton. Still, Captain O'Neil thinks Congress will appropriate the money for the Krupp armor, since the tests made at Indian Head show it to be the best armor ever made. Congress, he says, cannot afford to be illiberal with the navy after the demonstration of its value made in the recent war. The increase in cost of the armor plate by 31½ per cent. does not mean a proportionate increase in the cost of a battle-ship; for, being of a higher power of resistance, the Krupp plate can be made thinner than that of Harveyized steel without lessening its protective value. Captain O'Neil figures the saving in weight at 350 tons for a battle-ship, and this estimate contemplates putting thin armor on parts of the ship heretofore unprotected. Probably

OUR TRANSFORMED CRUISERS.

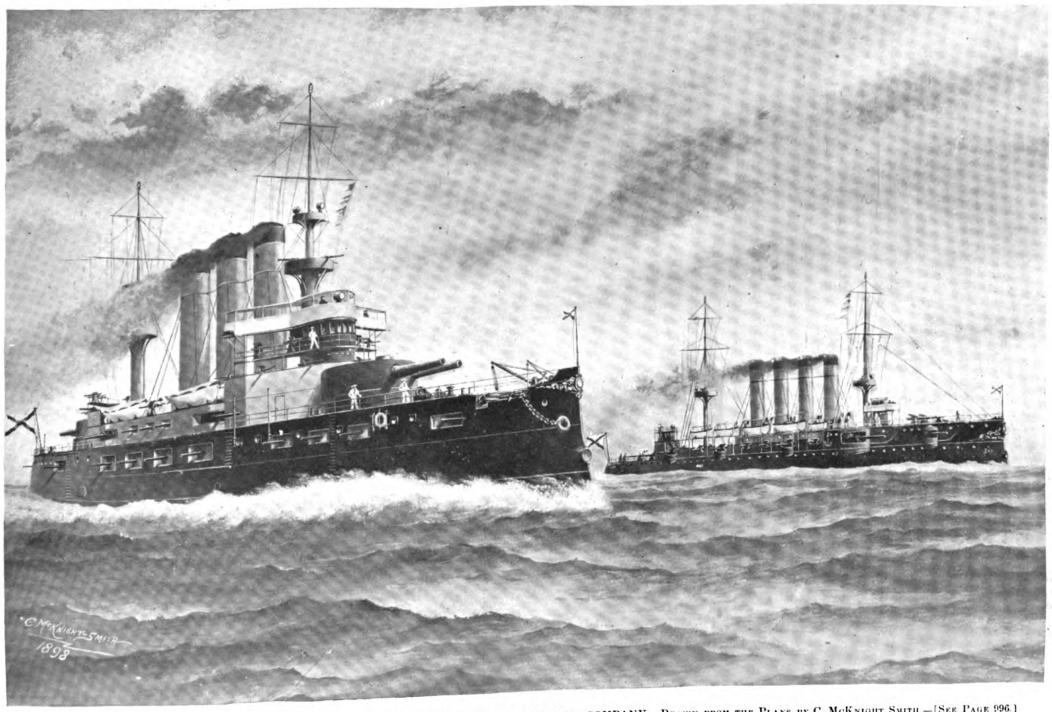
DURING the active part of the war with Spain there were three cruisers of the United States navy which were very much missed. They were the Newark, the Chicago, and the Atlanta. They were undergoing extensive alterations at navy-yards. Just before the peace protocol was signed the Newark was put into commission again. The Chicago is practically ready for her crew, and the Atlanta will probably be ready for work again in December.

Of these vessels the Chicago is practically new. Only the hull of the old Chicago remains. Her old horizontal expansion engines have been replaced by others of the triple-expansion type. Her speed has been raised from 16 to 19 knots. New ventilating apparatus has been put in. The ship has been fitted with fire-proof wood throughout, and real water-tight doors, operated from the deck, engine-rooms, or the doors themselves, have been placed in the compartments. The greatest change to the eye, however, has been the removal of the bark rig and the substitution of two modern military masts. The vessel also has an entirely new battery, consisting of fourteen 5-inch rapid-fire guns and four 8-inch guns. The 8-inch guns now in place are those the cruiser formerly had, but

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002024114 8
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google



OUR THREE RECONSTRUCTED CRUISERS.—Drawn by C. McKnight Smith.

they are to be replaced with modern 8 inch of the rapid-fire type. The new guns will probably be ready in six or eight months. After that the Chicago will be up to date in every respect, and one of the most efficient war-ships of her class—the protected-cruiser grade—in the world. It is reasonable to say that she will be 40 per cent. more efficient than she was before. It has cost about $1,000,000 to rebuild her, which was practically her original cost.

The Atlanta has also been altered greatly in appearance. She was formerly brig-rigged. Now she has two steel masts with observation tops. Very little has been done to the hull of the vessel. Her engines have been reconstructed largely. They are now of the triple-expansion type. She has new boilers, and her wood-work has been changed for other of the fire-proof variety. A large part of her joiner-work has been taken out entirely. She has a new steel pilot-house, new ports for her 6-inch guns, and new emplacements for her 8-inch guns, which are to be of the rapid-fire kind. She will have the same number and the same size guns that she had formerly, except that all of them will be of the rapid-fire kind. Her 8-inch guns will be ready sometime before those of the Chicago.

The work on the Newark was not so extensive as that on the Chicago or on the Atlanta. She had a general overhauling. She was a full-rigged ship before she went to the Norfolk Navy Yard, but all her spars have been removed, and military masts have taken the place of the former rig. She has had new wooden decks and new joiner-work put in, fire-proof wood being used throughout.

The work of repairing the Chicago and Atlanta has been done at the New York Navy Yard, and that of repairing the Newark has been done at the Norfolk Navy Yard. The Chicago has been out of commission for three years, the Atlanta for more than two. The Newark was tied up for only a few months. To the eye they are new vessels; practically they are such as to capability. No other nation has any more efficient vessels of that grade than they are.

THE NEW WAR-SHIPS BEING BUILT FOR RUSSIA BY THE CRAMP SHIP-BUILDING COMPANY.—Drawn from the Plans by C. McKnight Smith.—[See Page 996.]

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THIS BUSY WORLD

Our growing interest in folks and affairs in the antipodes has led to increased knowledge of at least two Oriental characters with whom it would interest us to become better acquainted. We have known these many years that there was an Empress in China, but our ideas about her have been vague, and we have thought of her rather as an institution than as an individual. But of late she has got thoroughly into the American newspapers, and appears as a person of the liveliest enterprise and the strongest individuality, who makes and unmakes emperors and prime ministers, and has a surprising talent for surviving all rivals whose continued existence might imperil her plans. We regret that her Imperial Majesty did not visit this country at the time of the late fair in Chicago. As a statesman it is clear that she far outdoes our Mrs. Lease of Kansas, and there is reason to believe that neither Mr. Croker, Mr. Platt, nor Mr. Quay knows anything about deals or other details of autocratic government which she needs to learn. Unless the stories about her are inharmonious with fact, it must be that she is the most powerful female person on earth, not even excepting her neighbor the Empress of India.

Our other new acquaintance is Aguinaldo. He is new in fact as well as to our knowledge, for he is only thirty years old. What we have learned about him since we became an Eastern power is certainly adapted to increase our belief in his importance. He has the advantage over our statesmen in having a demonstrated capacity to live and maintain his energy in the climate of the Philippines. There is every prospect that we shall know him much better as time goes on.

Miss Flood's gift of her father's country place and adjoining estates at Menlo Park to the University of California recalls in some particulars the gift of Chantilly to the French Institute by the Duc d'Aumale. Miss Flood's first thought in the matter seems to have been to preserve, for a time at least, in its present form, the house and park which her father created. The house is a huge structure, built of wood, out of respect to the local tendency towards earthquakes, and set in a park of 500 acres, skilfully planted and laid out. Adjoining it is a tract of 2400 acres, which is part of the gift. The house and its contents are estimated to have cost a million dollars. Though it does not shelter priceless collections, such as add to the fame of Chantilly, it is handsomely furnished, and is reported to have some treasures of art. It must be an interesting place, and an edifying reminder of the old Bonanza days in California, when dreams came true and men's imaginings took material shape.

Note was lately made in the WEEKLY of the plans of the Cornell University Medical School for a domicile in New York, and of the strong start Colonel Payne has given it with his endowment of $1,500,000. The year also begins well with the rival institution which has resulted from the union of the Bellevue Hospital Medical College and the Medical School of the University of New York. The Bellevue college has brought to the university property worth half a million dollars, and Chancellor MacCracken reports that he has received during the summer, for the new school, $100,000 more. As to the dispute between the chancellor and the gentlemen now in the service of the Cornell Medical College, who hold that he overreached them, Dr. MacCracken declares that he has published a pamphlet which states his case, and that he has offered to submit everything in dispute to arbitration.

The gentlemen most lately suggested as successors to Colonel Hay in London are Congressman Robert R. Hitt, of Ohio, and Mr. Henry Adams, of Washington. Both are accomplished men. Mr. Hitt has had long experience in public life; Mr. Adams is the son of one of the most efficient ministers we ever sent to England, is a scholar and historian of distinction, and during a long residence in Washington has grown used, by long association, to diplomats and diplomacy. It is further noted that Mr. Adams has long been next-door neighbor to Mr. Hay in Washington, and that Mr. Hitt is, like Mr. Hay, an Ohio man, and was a political lieutenant of President Lincoln. Moreover, both Mr. Adams and Mr. Hitt are credited with private fortunes of sufficient scope to make them comfortable in London.

It has been suggested that General Wilson would make a good ambassador. A document that helps to give an idea of his qualifications for such a post is the address which he made on August 31 to sundry Puerto-Ricans at the plantation of Mr. Pierinisi, near Ponce. As printed in the Sun of September 25 it seems an exceedingly judicious and statesmanlike discourse, abounding in good counsel, conveyed in an admirable spirit, and very clearly and effectively put.

Mrs. L. M. Stevenson, the acting president of the Women's Christian Temperance Union, who is described as Frances Willard's niece, lately made a fervent address at the Greenacre Summer School in favor of total abstinence, prohibition, and the stoppage of all traffic and indulgence in intoxicants. The Boston Transcript takes her to task for saying there is "no question about the blessings the State of Maine has enjoyed through the prohibitory law, for the late Mr. Blaine and other Maine statesmen have borne testimony to them time and again." The Transcript suggests that statesmen in Maine and other places find it expedient to bear testimony to a good many doubtful benefits, and avers that there are more drinking-places in Portland, in proportion to its size, than in Boston, and that the United States internal-revenue returns correct the impression that the liquor traffic in Maine has been even approximately suppressed.

It would be interesting to know whether prohibition has made as good a showing in any large city in Maine as local option has made in Cambridge, Massachusetts.

Mrs. Stevenson spoke of the 6000 suicides and 16,000 murders which were traced to drink in this country last year, of the 80,000 drunkards that we bury annually, and the $200,000,000 which we spend every year for ardent beverages. How interesting it would be if we could know in what measure alcohol is truly a cause of crime, and how far it is merely incident to it! What would the degenerate do if they could not get drunk? Undoubtedly alcohol in the evil-minded is an incentive to evil conduct, but how far John Barleycorn's responsibility extends is a complicated question. It was a Maine man who said that he had supposed rum to be the cause of all evil until he was shut up in Andersonville prison, and discovered how much iniquity could be evolved without the aid of any alcoholic stimulant whatever.

There is no question at all about the value of temperance for all persons, and the expediency of total abstinence for a good many persons, but it is by no means certain that the moral results of universal abstinence would fulfil expectations, unless, indeed, the promoters of the experiment should have the good luck to bring it on just at the time when Satan happens to have been tied up for a thousand years. Let the adversary remain at large, and it will take more than a mere dearth of rum to close him out of business.

It is excellent news that the Royal St. Lawrence and Seawanhaka yacht clubs have suppressed the unpleasantness which arose between them, and are to sail another match next year on Lake St. Louis. The reconciliation of these rivals is a welcome concession to the strong prevailing prejudice against disputes over international yachting races.

Report comes from the University of Wisconsin of a complicated case of college discipline, in which politics, athletics, and rival powers in the university are badly mixed up. The Athletic Council of the university has compassed the expulsion, for professionalism, of James Maybury, sprinter, and Henry Cochems, captain of the football team. The faculty sustains the council and proposes to rescind degrees already given to these men. The Board of Regents is opposed to expulsion, and frantic at the idea of rescinding degrees. The students of the university side with the regents. Maybury and Cochems have both been active in politics, especially Cochems, who wrote "The Truth About Money," used in Wisconsin in the last Presidential election, and spent nine weeks on the stump, so the Republican State Central Committee has interested itself in the case, and proposes to have the expulsion quashed. What the upshot will be has not yet transpired, but it seems a fine fight in a good cause, and no one can say any longer that the Western universities have not waked up to the importance of clean methods in sport.

It is a notable fact that while the rest of the American navy has won renown by sinking Spanish ships and keeping American vessels afloat, Lieutenant Hobson has gathered in large chunks of glory by precisely the opposite course—to wit, by running an American vessel to the bottom of the sea, and by his successful endeavors to bring Spanish war-ships to the surface. So far as appears, the work of raising such of the ships of Cervera's fleet as can be raised is in his charge. In the case of the Infanta Maria Teresa, his efforts came to a successful conclusion on September 23, when that vessel came off the rocks and was promptly taken to Guantanamo Bay. It was a triumph for Hobson, for the possibility of saving the ship had been seriously questioned, and at one time it had been recommended that the work on her be abandoned.

The next problem is the Cristóbal Colon, with which Hobson and his wreckers are now busy. That is a more difficult case, but Lieutenant Hobson maintains that he fully expects the Colon to carry him to New York. There is a chance also of raising the Reina Mercedes, but the Oquendo and Vizcaya are given up.

Mr. Charles Denby, who was American minister in China for thirteen years, has been talking out of the fullness of his experience about that country, and particularly about the missionaries there. He commends the missionaries, and says there are a great many of them, and that they are doing useful and important work. He thinks there are a million Christian converts among the Chinese, and believes that the great majority of them are sincere, for, he says, the missionaries detect the bogus converts and throw them out. Missionaries are of all sects, Catholic and Protestant, and come from Europe and America. There are fifty French bishops in China, Mr. Denby says, and he speaks of the Catholic orphanage at Foo-choo that shelters 1000 children, and of the Methodist church in Peking, built to hold 2000 persons, which gets 1000 children from the streets into its Sunday-school on Sunday. Mr. Denby has no sympathy with the sentiment that American missionaries had better work at home. He says that folks who sniff at missionary work in China don't know what is going on. As for himself, he says he made it his business to find out, and to that end, in 1886, soon after he went to China, he visited all the treaty ports and invited all the American missionaries to come and see him, and so he got a thorough insight into missionary work.

An interesting question which will be considered at the general convention of the Episcopal Church, which convened in Washington on October 5, will be the expediency of changing the name of the Church, and calling it simply "The Church in America." This change, if it is made, will greatly interest the other Protestant sects in America, producing smiles or frowns, according to the tempers of the observers, but inevitably giving an impression of bumptiousness and assumption. So far as the Episcopal Church alone is concerned, there are some very pretty reasons why it should change its name; but in so far as concerns its relations with other Protestant bodies in this country, there are some strong practical reasons why it should not.

No steamer list contains the name of Andrew Lang. The British Isles continue to be sufficiently salubrious for that eminent hack writer, and it is suspected that the nature of his engagements compels him to limit his migrations to points within twelve hours of London. It is a pity. We should like to see Mr. Lang, and, really, some of the American golf links afford a fair quality of sport. Mr. Robert Bage Kerr, the secretary of the United States Golf Association, has estimated that there is now fifty million dollars invested in the 500 golf clubs of this country; yet Mr. Lang hugs his native shores, and finds Abana and Pharpar good enough. A good and diligent man is Mr. Lang, but hopelessly insular.

Hamlin Garland has gone to the Klondike country, and the San Francisco Chronicle reports his arrival at Pine Creek, the newest gold camp, after a narrow escape from starvation "on the terrible Spokane route." So far this year the Klondike has been rather a disappointment, and has produced far more distress and calamity than gold or marketable copy. Now that war is over, however, its value as a literary base will begin to look up again. Whatever luck Mr. Garland has as a gold-seeker, we may hope with confidence for entertaining literature as a result of his Alaskan experiences.

Fanny Davenport, the actress, who died at Duxbury, Massachusetts, on September 26, had been on the stage in this country for forty years, and was one of the best-known members of her profession. She was born in London in 1850, and was the oldest child of Edward L. Davenport, an actor of high merit, still well remembered. Her first appearance was in 1857 as a child in her father's company at the Tremont Theatre in Boston. She appeared repeatedly in the next twelve years, and in 1869 made her début as a member of Mr. Daly's company at the Fifth Avenue Theatre in New York, where, shortly after, she succeeded Agnes Ethel. She continued in Mr. Daly's company for nine years, showing great versatility and capacity. In 1878 she left Mr. Daly and started out as a star in "Pique." In 1882 she visited England, and appeared at Toole's Theatre in "Diane de Lys." Among her later plays have been Sardou's "Fedora," "La Tosca," "Cleopatra," and "Gismonda." Last year she brought out "The Soldier of France" in Boston, but it was not successful, and the worry of it is said to have affected her health. She was twice married—first to Edwin Price, from whom she was divorced, and, in 1888, to Melbourne MacDowell, who survives her.

The commission appointed by the President to investigate the administration of the War Department began its work on September 26 in Washington. Its duties were defined by the President in an address, in which he said:

> There has been in many quarters severe criticism of the conduct of the war with Spain. It is my earnest desire that you shall thoroughly investigate these charges and make the fullest examination of the administration of the War Department in all its branches, with the view to establishing the truth or falsity of these accusations. I put upon you no limit to the scope of your investigation. I invite the closest scrutiny and examination, and shall afford every facility for the most searching inquiry. The records of the War Department and the assistance of its officers shall be subject to your call.

The commission includes nine members. Its president, Major-General Grenville M. Dodge, born in 1831, was bred a civil engineer, served with high distinction in the civil war, and left the army, in 1866, to build the Union Pacific and Texas Pacific railroads. He has been a member of Congress from Iowa, and succeeded General Sherman as commander of the Society of the Army of the Tennessee. He is now commander of the Loyal Legion for the State of New York.

Major-General Alexander McDowell McCook, born in 1831, is a graduate of West Point (1852), with a distinguished civil war record, who served long and ably in the regular army, and was retired in 1895 with the rank of Major-General.

Brigadier General John M. Wilson, Chief of Engineers, U.S.A., graduated from West Point in 1860, and served in the civil war, chiefly as inspector-general. He has been superintendent at West Point and superintendent of public buildings and grounds. He has held his present rank and place since February, 1897.

Dr. Phineas D. Connor is a prominent physician of Cincinnati, Ohio.

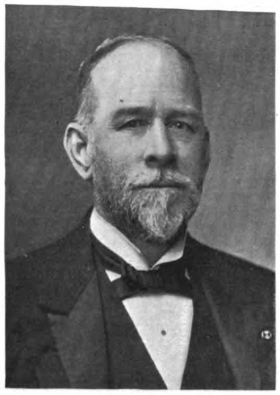
Charles Denby, born in 1830, is a lawyer of Evansville, Indiana, who served in the war, coming out a colonel, and was American minister to China from 1885 to 1898.

General Jas. Adams Beaver, born in 1837, served with great gallantry in the war, and lost a leg in the campaign against Lee in 1864. In 1886 he was elected Governor of Pennsylvania, and served until 1891. After that he practised law, and is now a judge of the Appellate Court of Pennsylvania.

Urban A. Woodbury, of Burlington, Vermont, born 1838, is a veteran of the war, and was Governor of Vermont in 1896.

Captain Evan P. Howell, of Atlanta, born 1889, served in the Confederate army. He is best known as the associate of Henry W. Grady in the editorship of the Atlanta Constitution. He sold his interest in that paper in 1897.

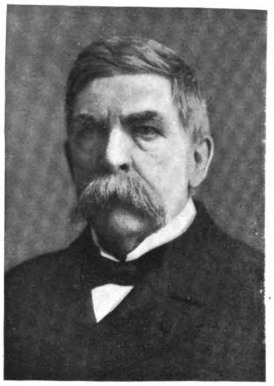
Colonel James A. Sexton, of Chicago, is a veteran of the civil war, and is the new commander-in-chief of the Grand Army of the Republic. He was postmaster of Chicago from 1889 to 1895.



Havana despatches say that on September 26 the remains of Columbus were taken out of the sarcophagus in the cathedral at Havana, in which they had rested for more than a century, and were sealed up in a proper box to be shipped back to Spain. Columbus died in 1506, and was ceremoniously buried at Valladolid. Seven years afterwards (1513) his remains were moved to Seville and deposited in a chapel of the monastery of Las Cuevas, where, in 1526, they were joined by the body of his son Diego. In 1536 both bodies were moved to Hispaniola and deposited in the principal chapel of the cathedral of San Domingo. In 1795, when San Domingo passed to France, the Spaniards moved what was believed to be the body of Columbus to Havana; but the story is that they took not Christopher, but Diego, and the proof offered is that Columbus, by his will, ordered the chains he wore in his imprisonment to be buried with him, which was done, but that the coffin moved to Havana had no chains in it. On this ground, and perhaps for other reasons, the San Domingo people have always averred that their cathedral still held all that was left of Columbus; and perhaps they are right, though their claims have never had any standing in Havana or in Spain.

There is no present indication that any serious opposition will be made to the transfer of Havana's good-enough Columbus back to Spain, though the proceedings may yet become matter for negotiation. It may be doubted whether the attachment of Columbus to Spain was sufficiently strong to make him indisposed to continue as a tenant of

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google



HON. CHARLES DENBY,
Of Indiana.
Photograph by Hatton.

HON. JAMES A. BEAVER,
Of Pennsylvania.

HON. URBAN A. WOODBURY,
Of Vermont.

HON. GRENVILLE M. DODGE,
Of New York.

Cuban soil after the departure of the Spanish flag from that island. His burials heretofore have always been occasions of great ceremony and display, and doubtless the next one will not be an exception.

It has been suggested to the WEEKLY that the American public has never been adequately informed as to the work done in the late war by the unprotected cruiser Yosemite. So far as the army was concerned, the volunteers got full credit for all they did, and if there has been ground of complaint it has been that the regulars have been comparatively slighted in the attention that has been paid to the green hands. But there has been no trouble of that kind with the navy. There the regulars have had their due, and it is possible that in the case of the Yosemite the naval volunteers have not got their full share of glory.

It is claimed for the Yosemite, manned by naval reserves from Michigan, that it fought the only sea-fight of the war against odds. The story of this feat as it comes to the WEEKLY is that the cruiser was left early in June off San Juan, Puerto Rico, to maintain the blockade for a day or two, until re-enforced. This work it did unaided for nineteen days, and on June 28 engaged three Spanish warvessels and one torpedo-boat, which it fought for four hours, with the result that it sunk the Antonia Lopans and one gunboat, damaged the torpedo-boat, and drove that and the other gunboat back into the harbor. There were two hundred men from Detroit on the Yosemite, and in Detroit and other parts of Michigan where their work is known and appreciated, the Yosemite's sea-fight is felt to be the great naval exploit of the war. The feeling in those parts is that not enough has been said about that fight, and that the services of the Michigan reserves have had by no means as much advertisement as they deserved.

E. S. MARTIN.

THE GERMAN ROYAL VISIT TO JERUSALEM.

A NEW PILGRIMAGE TO AN OLD SITE.

AN event of unique interest is the approaching visit to Jerusalem of the Emperor and Empress of Germany, with a distinguished retinue, the German princes and clergy having been invited to participate. The central event is the consecration, on October 31, of an imposing new edifice in Jerusalem, "the Church of the Redeemer," the site of which centres in itself circumstances of remarkable historic interest which we briefly outline for our readers. Of our illustrations, one shows, on the right of the picture, the new church, with its lofty and massive bell-tower personally designed by the Emperor, with much of the scaffolding still in place. On the left, the near dome is a Greek church, while the other is that of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, and the neighboring minaret is of a Moslem mosque. Another illustration shows the laying of the corner-stone, October 31, 1893, by the Emperor's representative, Pastor Barkhausen, court chaplain, in presence of a distinguished company. The corner-stone rests on the old wall which enclosed the city at the beginning of the Christian era, uncovered in digging to place the stone. The chief document deposited in the corner-stone is of such interest that we give its text elsewhere in our columns. The date was just five years prior to the day fixed for the consecration, being the anniversary of Luther nailing his famous ninety-five theses on the Wittenberg church door that kindled the fire of the Reformation in Europe.

BRIG.-GEN. JOHN M. WILSON, U.S.A.

DOCUMENT OF EMPEROR WILLIAM OF GERMANY DEPOSITED IN THE CORNER-STONE OF THE NEW GERMAN CHURCH IN JERUSALEM.

[Translated from the German.]

In the name of God the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, Amen.

Again, as in ancient times, the eyes of Evangelical Christianity in Germany are turned with pious reverence to the Holy places once trodden by the feet of our Lord and Saviour.

Long since awoke the desire that there, where the great act of Redemption for mankind was accompli-hed, a House of God might be raised, where the message of the saving grace of God in Christ Jesus might be announced clear and pure.

This wish has gained twofold weight since the number of German adherents to the Evangelical faith has increased in the Holy Land, and since the pious self-sacrifice of Evangelical Germany has founded a large number of Institutions working blessing in compassionate Love.

My august predecessors in the Throne of Prussia have, with their people, longed for the time when it would be possible to erect a house of God for the proclamation of Evangelical Christian faith. The care of my royal Grandfather, who rests in God, his Majesty the Emperor and King William I., procured the plot of ground on which the German Evangelical Church is to be built.

With a munificence worthy of thankful recognition did his majesty, the Sultan of the Osmanli, present us with the plot of ground on which the Mother house once stood, and where now lie the ruins of the Church of St. Maria.

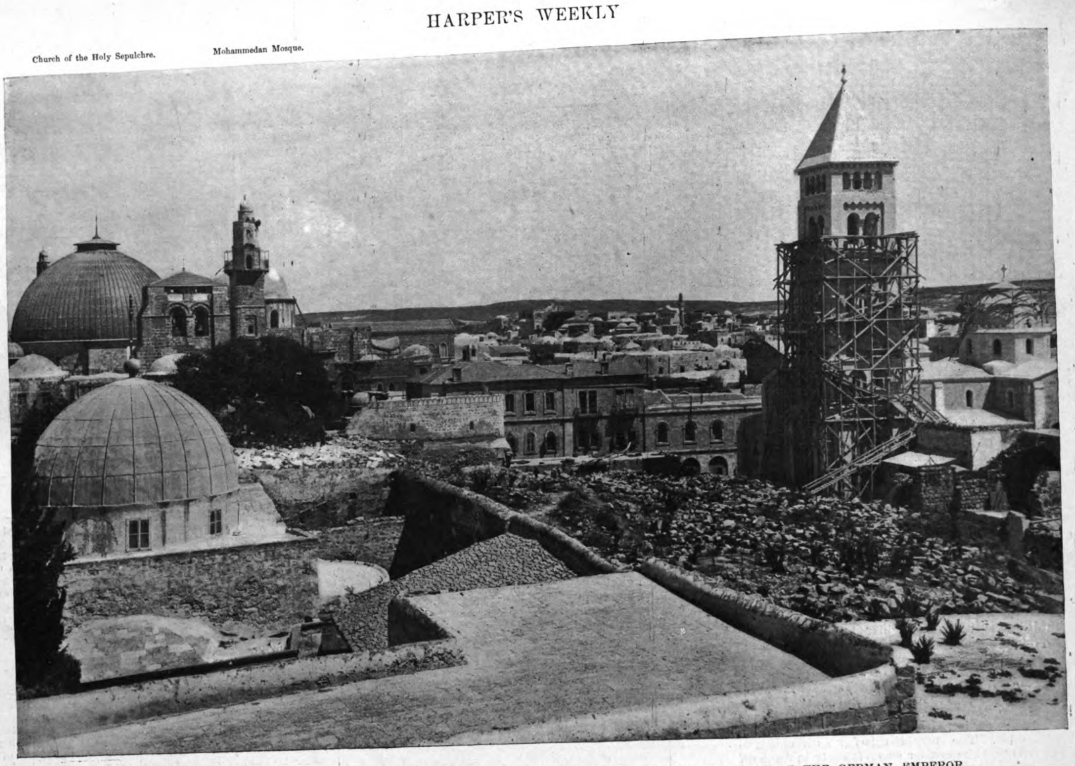
On November 7, 1869, my late beloved Father, then Crown-Prince Frederick William, later German Emperor and King Frederick III., took possession of the ground lying in the vicinity of the Holy Sepulchre; the place is at the same time consecrated by great historical memories of a knightly order, which now, newly arisen, is fulfilling its ancient traditions by works of Christian love. The prosecution of the plans for this building which my illustrious predecessors in the Throne had so much at heart was not permitted to them, and only in the present moment has it become possible to take the enterprise in hand.

Through the willing offerings of the Evangelical German Churches, the means for building have been gathered, and I have commanded the rebuilding of the ancient Church of St. Mary to be begun on its old site, and the foundation-stone to be laid on October 31 of this year. The same day on which, by God's grace, I was permitted to dedicate the restored Schlosskirche in Wittenberg, in union with the Evangelical Princes of Germany, shall the foundation-stone of this church be laid, to announce thereby that this church too shall stand as a monument of Faith in the incarnate Son of God, the crucified and risen Redeemer, as a confession of the blessed Gospel of the grace of God as it has been opened to Evangelical Christendom through the Reformers, as a visible witness to the Unity of Faith in which the Evangelical Churches of Germany are bound with each other and all outside. I thank the Lord God that He has granted me also in this respect to carry out the thought of my illustrious Forefathers. From Him I ask grace that from the place whence the joyful message of Salvation went out to all the world the Gospel pure and simple may be proclaimed, and there, where the Lord suffered for us, He may also, in the German tongue, be praised as the one Saviour and Redeemer blessed forever. God grant it. Amen.

There is much in this coming of a great Protestant Prince and his consort, and from the father-land of the Reformation to the birthplace of Christianity, connected as it is with religious ceremonies and a brilliant following, and with possible political designs, that gives the journey the flavor of a pilgrimage, and suggests the knightly character standing amid the shadowy figures of mediæval history, with its eye turned in heroic devotion towards the Holy Sepulchre, and in which were strangely mingled religious enthusiasm, warlike daring, and chivalrous devotion to woman. Notwithstanding the attempt of a section of the press of Europe to cast ridicule on this "new pilgrimage," it is the latest and a most eminent expression of that irrepressible tendency that has manifested itself throughout Europe from the third century, when Christianity became the religion of the Roman Empire in

HON. EVAN P. HOWELL,
Of Georgia.
Photograph by Schloss.

HON. JAMES A. SEXTON,
Of Illinois.



DR. PHINEAS D. CONNOR,
Of Ohio.
Photograph by Benjamin.

MAJ.-GEN. ALEXANDER McDOWELL
McCOOK, U.S.A. (Retired.)

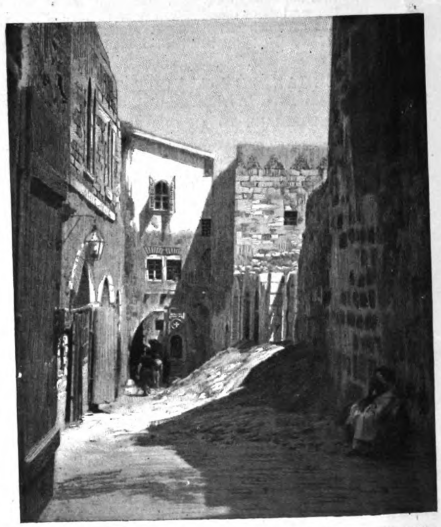
THE COMMISSION APPOINTED BY PRESIDENT McKINLEY TO INVESTIGATE CONDITIONS IN THE ARMY.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THE CHURCH OF THE REDEEMER, JERUSALEM—TO BE DEDICATED OCTOBER 31 IN THE PRESENCE OF THE GERMAN EMPEROR.

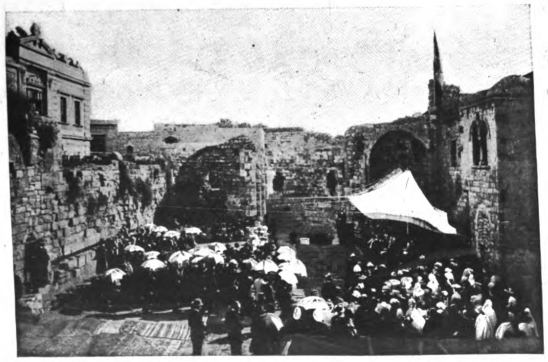
peaceful pilgrimage and warlike crusade to the Holy City. The new church is built on the north end of a large plot of ground near the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, presented to Emperor William I., grandfather of the present Emperor, in 1869, by the Sultan of Turkey, on the occasion of the visit of the Crown-Prince Frederick to Jerusalem at the time of the opening of the Suez Canal. This fulfilled a cherished desire on the part of the old Emperor, who had long sought a foothold in Jerusalem for German Protestant interests. This plot is the east half of the celebrated "Muristan," the west half being now in possession of the Greek Patriarchate.

As early as the reign of Charlemagne we find historic mention of this site as a monastery founded by this prince, and as the Church of Sta. Maria Latina, with western rites, and in charge of the Benedictines. They were destroyed in 1018, in common with all the churches of Jerusalem, by the Moslems under the Egyptian Khalif Hakim. When the persecution had subsided the ruins were purchased by Italian merchants of Amalfi, who, in 1063, built here the hospital which soon after became the birthplace and cradle of the renowned order of the Knights of St. John, which began as a simple brotherhood of hospitallers to minister to sick pilgrims, but grew quickly into a powerful order, adding warlike exploits to deeds of mercy. On this ground arose successively the Church of the Order of St. John (whose ruins, now being uncovered by the Greeks, are in the west half of the original plot), the palace of the master of the order, the dwellings of the knights, a splendid armory, and mews. Through the portal one stepped from the Street of the Holy Sepulchre into the hospital, supported by one hundred and twenty-four columns, built to accommodate one thousand pilgrims and invalids. In the northeast corner, where the new church stands, was the Church of St. Mary Major, whose ruins were uncovered when, a few years ago, the débris was cleared away by the German architects, and the present edifice is a restoration of this ancient church, built in old French style, the old double-arched northern entrance, elaborately carved with figures symbolizing the twelve months of the year, being found standing in good preservation, and which is now built into the new church as its most interesting feature. Back of the Church of St. Mary Major stood the cloister of the affiliated order of nuns, and which may be seen to-day still in good condition. This and a large space still to the south, beneath which are huge subterranean chambers, were included in the gift to Emperor William I., and there a large hospice will be built, and will replace the present hospice, which appears in one of our illustrations, showing on the entrance-door the cross of the order of the Knights of St. John, now again revived.



In 1187, after the ninety years of the rule of the Crusaders in Jerusalem, Saladin (Saleh-ed-deen) conquered the city, and converted the cloister of the sisterhood (the nuns having fled) into a mad-house, called in Arabic "Muristan," from which the whole area took and still retains its name. It afterwards became "wakuf," or endowed ecclesiastical property, and inalienable except at the will of the Sultan. So now, after seven hundred years, the eastern half has, by the gift of the Sultan, come again into Christian hands, and is to again be the site of a hospice of the same knightly order that so long ago began and flourished here, as afterwards in Rhodes, and then in Malta, from which they were dislodged by Napoleon Bonaparte in 1798.

It was a fond dream of William the Great to bring about cordial relations between the national Churches of the two great European Protestant nations. With this in view, a Bishopric of Jerusalem was founded in 1842, under the joint protection of the German and British governments, the office to be held alternately by a German pastor, to be ordained by the Archbishop of Canterbury, and an English bishop. Unhappy dissensions between the German and English sections of the Jerusalem Protestant community culminated, in 1886, in final separation and an abandonment of the joint bishopric. And now that the Germans are consecrating their new church with such imposing accompaniments, a pile of buildings, north of the Damascus Gate, in mediæval architecture, including a church, bishop's residence, schools, etc., is being completed by the English Bishop Blyth for early dedication, to be attended by the first ecclesiastical dignitaries of England. The German half of the fund deposited by the two governments for the support of the bishop went to swell the sum which the German church has cost, which has been contributed to by all the evangelical churches of Germany.



Great interest has been aroused by the prospect of this royal visit. In Palestine itself preparations are being extensively and enthusiastically made in the repairing of roads to be traversed by the imperial cortége, and the building of new roads to the Mount of Olives and Mar Saba to enable them to be reached by carriage, and alterations, repairs, and enlargement of the public works of Jerusalem itself, and the erection of triumphal arches, etc. The course of Germany in espousing the Turkish cause in the late Turco-Grecian war has given her Emperor a strong hold upon the affections of all classes here.

The royal party are to land at Haifa on Wednesday, October 26. They come by carriage by several stages to Jerusalem (the entrance of the Emperor, however, to be on horseback), arriving on the following Saturday. The consecration of the church is to take place on Monday the 31st. Visits are planned to the Mount of Olives, Bethlehem, Mar Saba, and Jericho. The offer of the Sultan to provide the expenses of the trip has been declined with thanks.

E. F. Baldwin.

JERUSALEM STREET, SHOWING ENTRANCE TO THE PRESENT HOSPICE OF THE KNIGHTS OF ST. JOHN.

LAYING CORNER-STONE OF THE NEW GERMAN CHURCH IN JERUSALEM, OCTOBER 31, 1893.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Digitized by Google

Original from
PENN STATE

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

LONDON.

September 17, 1898.

More interesting times than these we have not had since the Crimean war. Events follow each other rapidly. Perhaps the most interesting phenomenon of all is the composure and placidity of the public mind. Since my last letter the battle of Omdurman has been fought and won. The Dervish loss of life, I am assured on high authority, is considerably understated in the newspapers, and in those portions of the Sirdar's early despatch which have been made public. At least 17,000 of the Khalifa's men were slain on the 2d September. Is there another nation in Europe, or, for that matter, elsewhere, which would have received the news of the defeat of Abudalhi and the recovery of Khartoum without visible elation? On Monday, the 5th September, the detailed news became known. At the military manœuvres at Salisbury a salute was fired in honor of the victory, but in London not a flag was hoisted nor a gun discharged. No crowds of excited citizens interrupted the traffic in the streets. Even the Gordon statue in Trafalgar Square was unvisited. If a French or Russian general, after thirteen years and 219 days of anxious preparation, had recovered the Nile Valley to civilization, Paris or Petersburg would have broken out in a rash of bunting. As a matter of fact, public rejoicing over a gallant and defeated enemy, ill armed, and ill led, is looked on askance by leaders of public opinion. It is "bad form," and more serious events than Omdurman loom ahead.

The apparent public apathy does not betoken indifference. There is a deep and thankful pride in the hearts of citizens that England has been able, at last, to wipe out the infamy of Gordon's sacrifice. There are moments in the life of most nations which the people would gladly forget. England would gladly forget the sacrifice of Gordon. He has never been forgotten for a day, and his bones, lying unburied in the ruins of Khartoum, have beckoned Britain to come over and fulfil his dream of freeing the people of the Sudan from the tyranny and lust of slave-masters. After all, Gordon's death is the direct cause of the destruction of Mahdism. It is a curious people, this Anglo-Saxon race. On the 2d September some 17,000 of the enemy were killed and 18,000 wounded. On the 3d September thousands of the men who fought against Kitchener the previous day were quietly enlisted under British officers as recruits in the Egyptian army. On the 4th September a funeral service was held in Khartoum on the spot where Gordon was killed, and proposals for a memorial, which is to take the form of a college for the education of the sons of sheiks, were started by the Sirdar. There is not an Englishman, and probably not an American, who does not draw a freer breath after the victory of Omdurman. There is no nation in the world where the Anglo-Saxon race does not stand a little higher in consequence, not merely because of the success of British arms, but because, single-handed, our race has penetrated the heart of Africa, and struck home against Mahdism. The man in the street, after recent experiences in foreign affairs, appreciates a situation where England cannot be sneered at.

By the overthrow of Mahdism the work of England on the Nile is not ended, but extended. Fashoda is in every one's mouth, and all the elements for a pretty quarrel between the French and the English exist. In the West Coast difficulty the origin of the titles of the respective claimants was more or less in doubt. Compromise was wisdom. Fashoda is Egyptian territory. The Egyptian flag was hoisted at Fashoda in Gordon's time. On page 320 of Gordon's diary it is stated that in 1881 fears for the safety of Fashoda were entertained at Khartoum, and two hundred soldiers were immediately sent there by steamer. On the 13th June, 1882, four hundred men were sent by steamer to re-enforce the garrison of Fashoda, and on the 29th of the same month a battalion which had arrived at Khartoum from Senheit was also sent on there. The fact that Fashoda is Egyptian is not open to question. Fashoda was one of the places where Gordon compelled the slave-hunters to return to their homes. The occupation of Fashoda by the French (if the white men reported to be there are French) is equivalent to the occupation of a post in Madagascar by the English. General Kitchener, having sent all the newspaper correspondents back to England, has himself gone to Fashoda, and will appear on the scene as an Egyptian officer. It is significant that he has taken with him only Egyptian troops; but the gunboat on which he has embarked is commanded and manned by officers and men of the royal navy. The object of the French—if French they are—is threefold. They wish to join hands with Menelek of Abyssinia, they desire to cut the Cape Town to Cairo railway, which is now within measurable distance of realization, and they wish to prevent the Nile from becoming, like the Ganges or the Sutlej, a British river. In seizing Fashoda, if the fact be so, the French commander, Major Marchand, has shown splendid organizing capacity, dash, and courage. The march across Africa from the West Coast is a great feat, to be fully recognized by Englishmen; but even courage and dash do not justify the French in seizing territory belonging to another power. In 1895 Sir Edward Grey, Lord Rosebery's lieutenant in the House of Commons, declared that any French advance into the Nile Valley would be regarded by England as "an unfriendly act." When the present government acceded to office the same declaration was made by Mr. Curzon. There is no party question, therefore, in England, about Fashoda. The French, if serious, mean war, because, willingly or otherwise, out of Fashoda they must go, and not improbably by the time this reaches New York Major Marchand will either be a guest or a prisoner of the Sirdar. In any case, if there is a fight about Fashoda it will not be on the Nile, but in the Channel.

One awkward feature of the present situation with France is the existence of a considerable group of hot-headed Frenchmen bent on forcing the government to go and "do something." In the present state of unrest in France a mad act of adventure on the part of the French cabinet would distract public opinion from the Dreyfus affair and unite factions which are already within measurable distance of civil war. There is reason to believe that the British government has anticipated the trouble about Fashoda. More than three months ago the Sirdar named the first week in September as the time of his entry into Omdurman. He was better than his word by three days.

Ten days after the taking of Omdurman communications with Fashoda can be opened. In the course of a fortnight of the present date the controversy with France on the subject will be at its height. In these facts I think we have the real explanation of the abolition of the naval manœuvres for 1898. The Channel Squadron is stationed at Portland. The Reserve Squadron is mobilized and on a war footing. Part of it is in the Bristol Channel—our one vulnerable point. If the French, therefore, show their teeth over Fashoda, the dispute as to sovereignty on the Nile from the Great Lakes to the Delta will be settled in the Narrow Seas under circumstances highly favorable to Britain. It is inconceivable that France will fight about Fashoda. If she does, experts agree that the result will be a foregone conclusion. France will lose her colonies, her fleet, and much of her over-sea trade. England, no doubt, will lose individual actions, and commerce may be a good deal cut up during the first few days of the war. The power that evacuated Boussa, however, is unlikely to stand to its guns at Fashoda.

At the other end of Africa events are moving fast. Mr. Rhodes's electoral campaign in the Cape has not been distinguished by his usual clear-headed recognition of facts. If Sir Gordon Sprigg and Mr. Rhodes were to be believed, the accession of a ministry to power under the influence of the Afrikander Bond is equivalent to the loss of British supremacy in South Africa. With marked unwisdom, Sir Gordon Sprigg not only struck the racial note in his first campaign speech, at East London, but brought in the Queen's name as a rallying-point. The result has been a loss to the present Cape ministry of one constituency after another. The vital principle of British imperialism, and that which alone enables the widely separated British Empire to survive, is the principle of even and equal justice in dealing with the various races living under the flag of England. To begin with, the present ministry at the Cape is a mere stop-gap affair, and has not been remarkable for wisdom or patriotism. Its members have talked a good deal about loyalty, questioning that of other people, and striking the racial note, but they have done little to commend loyalty to waverers. When Sir Gordon Sprigg visited England last year, Mr. Goschen, the First Lord of the Admiralty, came down to the House of Commons and solemnly announced a great historical event—the British Empire had received the gift of a battle-ship from the Cape government. Profound impression was made on the public mind. That battle-ship, however, has not yet been laid down. Its cost is not yet voted. Sir Gordon Sprigg, it seems, had no authority to make any such promise, and whenever his ministry leaves office it will do so under the stigma of having made a promise to the empire which it is unable or unwilling to fulfil. On the other hand, should the much-despised Afrikander Bond ministry accede to power, I understand that it is extremely likely that this administration, charged with disloyalty and with all sorts of dark designs imputed to it, will make the contribution to the royal navy which its predecessors promised but did not carry out.

The average view of Englishmen, misled by newspapers conducted not in the interests of the empire, but on behalf of cosmopolitan capital, is that the Afrikander Bond is disloyal to the Queen. The ablest member of Sir Gordon Sprigg's ministry, Sir James Sivewright, himself joined the Bond, learned Dutch, and pattered the taal, with the view of bringing together the Dutch and the English colonists. If the Afrikander Bond be incompatible with imperial principles, it is evident that Sir James Sivewright, the spokesman and the brains of the present Cape ministry, could not have joined it. But, in forming an estimate of any political body, it is unwise to accept the description of political opponents as the only evidence by which they are to be judged. They should be allowed to speak for themselves. As I have some personal acquaintance with the members of both the existing ministry and that which may succeed it, I may perhaps be allowed to say that I do not think the imperial tie is likely to be much slackened if Sir Gordon Sprigg were to go out of office. Certainly the members of the new Cape ministry would be geese if they did anything to irritate Great Britain, since naval defence is a necessity to the Cape, and England is the only power that can give it and accord absolute freedom at the same time. On March 5 of the present year the local branch of the Afrikander Bond at Graaff-Reinet addressed Sir Alfred Milner in the following language:

"It is with deep sorrow that we have heard repeatedly during the last few years our loyalty to her Majesty the Queen openly doubted by certain parties, and that we have been held up to our fellow-subjects as disloyal. Therefore we may not remain silent. On behalf of the Afrikander inhabitants of this country, we wish, with the greatest indignation and contempt, to repudiate the insulting and mendacious accusations brought against us by mischief-makers. We wish at the same time to request your Excellency respectfully, but very urgently, to clear us with her Majesty of the unfounded slander with which we have been slurred. It cannot be justified—is based altogether on ignorance and misunderstanding. The grand object at which we aim is to raise that portion of the citizens of the colony to which we belong in the social, political, and moral sphere, and to make better and more worthy subjects of them of her Majesty, and to secure to our kinsmen in South Africa those rights which were kindly promised by her Majesty, our respected Queen, in the past."

In the course of his reply Sir Alfred Milner said: "Of course I am glad to be assured that any section of her Majesty's subjects are loyal, but I should be much more glad to be allowed to take that for granted. Why should I not? What reason could there be for disloyalty?" As a general rule, men are governed by their interests, and the interests of the Afrikander Bond at the Cape do not lie in the direction of any attempt to lower the British flag. Freedom, self-government, and equality are the first principles of British policy. They have secured for Britain the enthusiastic loyalty of the French Canadians, who, but a few decades back, were in open rebellion against British rule. Why should they not reach the same goal in South Africa when the anti-imperialist raid is forgotten or forgiven?

The man who may become the new Premier, Mr. Schreiner, is the brother of Olive Schreiner, and a cool, level-headed, and able man. He it was who, as Attorney-General in Mr. Rhodes's ministry three years ago, advised the Cape government to contribute half the cost of a war with the Transvaal if President Kruger insisted on closing the Drifts. This does not look like a renunciation of British supremacy, and there is nothing whatever to show that Mr. Schreiner has changed his mind on the subject of the British connection. While saying this on behalf of the possible successors of Sir Gordon Sprigg, it must of course be admitted that a wise progressive policy is the one best calculated to develop the material resources of South Africa, and to weld into federation the states and territories south of the Zambesi. The price for Mr. Rhodes's share of the Jameson raid is now being paid. "Whatsoever a man soweth that shall he also reap." The people here have forgiven Mr. Rhodes because they recognize in him the stuff of which leaders are made, and because they recognize that, whatever his faults, he has not worked selfishly for his own hand. Not so the Cape Dutch. By most of them he is suspected. Mr. Rhodes has done all that man can do to redeem his error. He has risked his life. He has spent his money like water to establish law and order in the Northern Territory. But with all his wealth and social backing he is not exempt from the consequences of wrong-doing, and the half-defeat of the British and progressive party at the Cape elections is as directly a consequence of the Jameson raid as the Jameson raid was the fruit of the British retreat after Majuba. Whatever ministry rules in the Cape, its members are aware that the freedom, self-government, justice, and equality which they enjoy are secured only by the strength of the power that gave them, and whose navy protects South African shores from attack without the contribution of a shilling. Sir Henry de Villiers, the present Chief Justice, is a possible Premier of a ministry of compromise between the two parties. Sir Henry de Villiers is a man whose intellectual standing places him high among the jurists of world-wide repute. When he was last in England I had a long conversation with him on the subject of the troubles that followed the Jameson raid, and was greatly struck with the moderation and the calm wisdom of his views. To denounce such a man as Bond-ridden is absurd. Whether, therefore, Mr. Rhodes come back to power or whether that inevitable and desirable event is postponed for a short time further, I do not think that there is the least reason to anticipate trouble from his ministerial successors.

Another great African question is advancing to the front. The isolation of the Transvaal by the establishment of a British protectorate or lease of Delagoa Bay, if not an accomplished fact, is, I understand, on the eve of completion. Germany has withdrawn her pretensions in South Africa, and in consequence a better feeling reigns between the two countries than has existed for a long time. Well-informed public opinion in Germany is strongly in favor of coming to a friendly arrangement with this country. Our friends seem to have discovered that notwithstanding all the German sympathy and kinship with the Boers, the reciprocal services which they expected to receive have not been forth-coming, and that, after all, German trade in the English Cape Colony, as in all other English colonies, is conducted under more favorable conditions than in the Transvaal. President Kruger was ready enough to invoke German aid against attack, but shows less consideration for German trade in the Transvaal than does the English Cape Colony. Germany's interest in South Africa is mainly commercial, and if she can improve her commercial position by an agreement with Great Britain she will probably do so. The acquisition of Delagoa Bay is essential to British supremacy—that is a synonym for the "open door" in South Africa—and the arrangement with Portugal, when it takes place, is understood to include certain coaling arrangements at Lisbon in time of war. This is a matter of enormous importance to the British navy. The absence of a coaling-station between Gibraltar and England would have curtailed the effective strength of the British fleet. If coaling facilities for British cruisers and torpedo-boat-destroyers are included in the next Anglo-Portuguese Convention, the result of a naval war with France will be more certain than ever.

These successive additions to British strength make for peace. No peace can be so enduring and certain as when would-be breakers of the peace know that they are inviting defeat.

The Tsar's disarmament proposals still continue to rouse interest among thoughtful men. No one doubts the perfect sincerity of the young Tsar. For a long time his thoughts have been set upon peace and the peaceful development of Siberia and the Far East. When at Balmoral, last year, I am informed that whenever Lord Salisbury began to talk of Armenia and the doings of the unspeakable Turk, the Russian Emperor would change the subject to one of two questions—international peace, or the development of the Asiatic possessions of Russia. The immediate authorship of the Tsar's rescript has not yet been given to the world, but as the personality of the Jewish gentleman whose interview with the Tsar is said to have convinced his Majesty that a disarmament conference was practicable and advisable has been hinted at, there can be no valid objection to my stating his name. It is M. Bloch, a retired banker of great wealth and benevolence, with a remarkable taste for statistics and a wide knowledge of sociology and economics. It is interesting to learn that the immediate cause of M. Bloch obtaining an interview with the Emperor was the terrible condition of the Jews of Poland and the sixteen provinces of the Pale. I have long held the opinion that the mass of misery represented by the persecuted six million of Jews in Russia and packed together in the Ghetto provinces constitutes one of the gravest political problems of the day, albeit it is scarcely ever referred to by public men. The Russian disarmament proposals may do good, inasmuch as they set men thinking on the question of peace; and they may do harm, inasmuch as they will set men thinking on the irreconcilable ambitions, jealousies, fears, and emotions that divide nation from nation.

Arnold White.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THE EXPOSITION AT OMAHA.

THE great Middle West is throwing up its hat just now because it has succeeded, at last, in solving the questions of agricultural engineering necessary to make a garden of the great plains.

This is the same hat, by-the-way, through which, in hard and discouraging times, various wild theories have been ventilated; and which, tipped on one side, once adorned the brow of the land-boomer, a character almost extinct in these days.

Now the land has taken to booming itself, and its prosperity has crystallized into the visible form of a magnificent exposition, here on the western bank of the Missouri.

The Trans-Mississippi Exposition means so much and proves so much that it ranks very closely with the Columbian Exposition as a revelation to the visitor.

The only breathing-spells—and those not of a kind desired—that the people who came out here forty years ago, to conquer this practically unknown land, have ever had were during those years when crops failed and there was no business to be done.

In those years the fittest held on, studied out the problems presented by new climatic conditions, and, by solving them, survived. One has only to meet and talk with the trans-Mississippi farmer to see that he has fought the desperate fight over the ever-rising plains, from the great dividing river to the foot of the Rocky Mountains, with the same tenacity of purpose and intelligence of effort that carried the American army up the heights of San Juan. But Mr. Franklin Matthews in his "Bright Skies in the West" has given the readers of the WEEKLY a better account of the rise, in the Western States, of prosperity founded on sound principles of farm engineering than would be possible here.

Before the exposition at Omaha closes, some one ought to start a subscription for a monument to be erected in honor of the man who introduced in this country that wonderful cousin to red clover, the alfalfa plant. When the alfalfa is set in the loose dry soil of the Western plains, it immediately begins to bore, with its roots, little artesian wells, in search of water. I have been told by many farmers that, in making excavations on their farms, roots of alfalfa have been found at a depth of fifteen feet.

A week or two ago, Iowa day was celebrated at the exposition, and no one who saw that assemblage of forty thousand men and women from the rich rolling farmlands of Iowa could contain his admiration for them as grand specimens of humanity.

The Iowan is pretty generally of old New England stock. Many an old farmer in the Berkshire Hills will tell you of his sons' prosperity out in Iowa. The strong Yankee features are greatly in evidence, but in the present generation the Iowan combines the great height of his ancestor with an ampler physique. No such colossal fellows can be found in this country, outside of the Tennessee mountains, and there is a look of rosy good health about the Iowan that is lacking often in the Tennessee mountaineer.

In a pamphlet on Iowa farms is printed a letter from a young farmer that tells a story so simple and characteristic that it is well worth quoting. He writes: "My parents came to this State in the sixties, when I was but a small child just able to remember the trip overland. My father being a poor man and having a large family, we were early taught hard work. On the morning of my twenty-first birthday my father informed me that from that time on I was my own man, and gave me the big gray team in the barn (without halter, bridle, or harness), saying, if I could not add to that in so good a country as this, he had no more to waste on me. I went out into the world, and worked by the month until I got money enough to buy a set of harness and a yearling heifer, and from that time to this I have never been without cattle.

"In about a year and a half my only brother became of age, and he received a team of bay horses on the same terms upon which I got mine. We then started out in partnership, leasing a piece of land which we got for the breaking of it. This ground produced sixty bushels of corn to the acre for our first crop, making over seven carloads of corn, for which we received thirty-five cents per bushel." He then gives an account of the purchase of four hundred acres of land, paying off a heavy mortgage at eight per cent. interest, and of the final prosperity of himself and his brother. One can read the whole history of pioneer life in that farmer's story.

It is well worth while for the visitor to drop into the Kansas Building and sit down with some old settler—or, better, with two of them, so that he may edify himself with their differences. The Kansan is born to controversy. He delights in stirring up his neighbor. If one Kansan arises and criticises matters in his own State, up rise his neighbors in wrath, and smite him, hip and thigh. In the Kansas Building a pamphlet is handed out to visitors. It bears, for its title, the now historic query, "What's the Matter with Kansas?" A careful perusal of it will convince any fair-minded man that there is nothing the matter with Kansas, and never will be so long as business "literature" is written with so much delightful freedom. Here is what a Butler County man has to say about life in his neighborhood: "'Grasshoppers,' did you say? Well, my friend, I have lived in Kansas forty-one years, and have not seen a red-legged locust or grasshopper—the migratory kind—in twenty-four years, and hardly enough of the ordinary kind for the turkeys in the fall. 'Tornados?' Never saw a tornado, cyclone, or twister in all these forty-one years. If there were any, they missed me. 'What do we live on?' If you imagine for a moment that a Kansas man don't know when pig's jowl and spinach are ripe, you greatly mistake. We stick to beef and mutton, ham and eggs, in the spring, until spring chicken, new pease and potatoes, strawberries, and the like, begin to come in. When the cows get out into the knee-deep wheat and alfalfa fields, we get butter and cream as yellow as the dome of the National Library Building at Washington. Then we have black bass and croppie in our rock-bottom streams; wild-duck, plover, prairie-chickens, 'possums, and quail; forty-pound turkeys, native wines, and every other imaginable thing that is good. Kansas people are the best-fed people in the world."

Then the financier speaks:

"It is disagreeable to appear as an alarmist, but the truth must be told: Kansas is in trouble again. This time the difficulty, from which there appears to be no immediate prospect of relief, is too much money. The banks are growing purple in the face from congestion. The accounts that come from the financial centres of Kansas are most distressing. The banker, pale but firm, sits behind his counter, while the flood of currency rises to his chin and threatens to drown him. . . . Of course it would be useless to attempt to disguise the gravity of the situation. Everything about Kansas is bound to come out. The worst is now known. The money is in the State, the deposits steadily increasing in the banks, the rate of interest is falling, and from one end of Kansas to the other the tale of woe is passed from one bank to another, 'Too much money.'"

Finally the poet takes a hand in the fray in this cheerful pamphlet:

Papers got a lot to say, sneerin' like, o' Kansas;
Every word a word of scorn, chucklin' fun at Kansas—
'Hoppers darkenin' the sun,
Dozens of 'em weigh a ton—
Seem to think it's lots of fun, crackin' jokes at Kansas.

Now it's come their time to laugh—them folks out in Kansas—
Givin' Easterners the gaff 'bout affairs in Kansas:
Barns a-bulgin' out with wheat,
Corn for all the world to eat,
Other crops that can't be beat, over there in Kansas.

Women singin' songs o' glee 'bout ol' fruitful Kansas;
Babies crowin' merrily everywhere in Kansas;
Purty gals a-buyin' clothes—
Topgin' out from head to toes.
Style! you bet your life she goes, over there in Kansas.

When the cares o' day is done on the plains o' Kansas,
An' the kids begin to yawn, sleepy like, in Kansas,
Farmer wipes his glasses, blurred,
Reads a chapter in the Word,
Then kneels down and thanks the Lord that he lives in Kansas.

The whole pamphlet is an answer to its title, "What's the Matter with Kansas?" a query propounded a few years ago by a very clever Kansas editor. You cannot help liking these controversial Kansans; they are aggressive and manly, and are going ahead like men to a Tipperary fair—with their coat tails just dragging on the ground.

In the State of Nebraska, besides a great many Americans from the older States, there is a large number of German settlers. In the northern counties, many Bohemians have come in of late years. In spite of the difficulties of farming under new conditions as to climate and soil, these people are steadily increasing in prosperity. An occasional season of dry, burning winds puts them back, but irrigation and crops adapted to a dry climate are improving the Nebraska farm-lands every year.

It is a curious fact that the mountain regions and the western portion of the great plains are settled almost entirely by town people—university men from England, city boys tired of too much civilization, and roving spirits seeking fortune and adventure. Younger sons of titled English families used to be so common in Colorado that, in choosing a cook or driver for a camping outfit, you were facetiously asked if you would have a lord or a duke.

The British element is strong enough, even in Omaha, to support a cricket club, which played in the cricket tournament at Denver last week.

One of the most interesting features of the exposition, to an Eastern man, is the congress of Indians, which was brought together at the fair through the aid and co-operation of the government.

All the principal tribes are represented, from the Apaches of the Southwest to the Assiniboins and Sioux of the North. An Indian on foot is generally a rather dignified person, but a six-foot warrior sitting back almost on the haunches of a disconsolate little pony is about the most ludicrous sight imaginable.

Many of the Indians from a distance brought their savage belongings in new tin trunks, and an ancient earthen water-jar rolled up against a new four-dollar trunk seemed to strike the sense of humor of most of the visitors. But the greatest contrast furnished by the Indian encampment is with the exposition buildings. Here is a tract of land which, up to a year and a half ago, was never disturbed by anything, except a corn-plough, since prehistoric times.

Over it, no doubt, many of the older Indians now on the exposition-grounds spent their boyhood days, shooting at birds and gophers with their bows and arrows.

To-day, towering around them are gilded domes, wonderful reproductions and adaptations of the architectural art of the Greeks and Romans, and exhibits of industrial arts such as the world never saw until the four great American expositions of the present decade.

To that particular class of persons who insist that the Americans are not an artistic people such an achievement as this—the building of a mimic city of the utmost grandeur and beauty, on this old hunting-ground of forty years ago and corn-field of two years back—ought to be a sufficient answer. Speaking of American art, it has shown itself in the past few years in an unexpected direction. Foreigners usually tell us that it is impossible for art to flourish here in these days, because this is the age and the country of invention and mechanics.

But just as Kipling found that romance and poetry had stowed themselves aboard the ocean steamer, so any intelligent observer can find art in its highest form in the work of our best mechanical engineers. You have only to contrast the tawdriness of the little locomotives of a few years back, ornamented with brass-work to hide their inherent ugliness, with the severely simple yet elegant lines of the great passenger engines of to-day, to see how the mechanical engineer has added to economy of power that highest element of Greek art, perfect proportion.

A well-known inventor and manufacturer, in answer to questions about some beautiful and shapely machines which he had turned out, has told me that it is his practice, and that of the best American inventors, to seek forms for their machines that are the most elegant in their proportions, knowing that in doing so they are choosing at the same time the strongest and most economical shapes. He studied the proportions and forms of animals and plants as his models of structure, and his ideal was to get a machine to look as though "it had naturally grown that way." One of the interesting things about the exposition is the variety of strange uniforms to be seen over the grounds. An old gentleman, who is probably the president of a country bank, and when at home dresses in most conventional attire, appears at the fair in the garb of a "Shriner," with a red fez on his venerable head and decorated with all sorts of medals and gewgaws. Then the "Woodmen of the World" and the "Modern American Woodmen," with oak leaves embroidered on their velvet sleeves, with plumed hats and white trousers, and red axes over their shoulders, are to be met at every turn. An occasional soldier is seen, just back from Cuba. Here, too, is the Mexican band, swarthy fellows with tall black caps and baggy trousers and not particularly beaming faces, looking like a lot of unhappy Spanish prisoners on parole.

Of course there is a Midway at the exposition, and the same gentlemen who expanded their lungs at the doors of the various booths and shows at Chicago, Atlanta, and Nashville are to be seen and heard at Omaha. But progress has stepped in here also, and the megaphone is saving the vocal chords of many a man who will be talking French in 1900.

It was amusing to see the delight of an elderly lady with an ear-trumpet when she got in range of one of those great funnels. No doubt she will have recommended the use of a megaphone to her minister before this gets into print. The entrance to one of the "shows" on the Midway is in the form of a dragon's head with open jaws. At night his eyes glow with red lights. The showman who got up this grim doorway knew his business, for it seems to attract all the nervous women on the grounds. The delight of all the stout old ladies and of the boys and girls is the miniature railway. Its little engines pull a tremendous load in proportion to their size, and to see an elderly lady, unmindful of cinders and smoke, beaming complacently on the world from the forward coach is really worth while.

All the Oriental people that were so familiar to visitors at the Chicago Fair are in Omaha, from the whirling dervishes to the ladies who could dance just the same if they were all fitted out with wooden legs. No Midway would be complete without its show of trained wild animals, where you extract what pleasure you can from watching a lot of scared animals in a large cage being lashed with a long whip by a man in red clothes.

In Nashville one of the most comforting details about the grounds was the "Gourd Arbor," which enabled the visitor to get from the Administration Building to one of the others without being scorched by the sun. This idea has been carried to a greater perfection here by a series of colonnades joining all the principal buildings. Architecturally these colonnades are very beautiful, and no doubt they have saved many people from serious illness and discomfort. The crowning feature of the Omaha Exposition as a spectacle is the illumination of the Grand Court at night.

Nothing has ever equalled it, and I am informed that the French government has sent men over to study it for the exposition in 1900. The outlining of the architecture is almost perfect, the general lines of the buildings appearing at night just as they do in the day; and in that respect it is a great improvement over the illumination of the buildings at Chicago in '98. The government has a building at the head of the great court that is all that an exposition building should be. It is dignified and of most beautiful proportions, and is enriched with sculpture that is well modelled and in strong decorative masses. The dome is gilded, and in the early morning is a sight to be remembered all one's days. The designs for this building were made in the government offices, and I am informed that Mr. Crane is the architect who is responsible for their great merit.

When it is considered that all this is the first glimpse that many of the visitors from the ranches and farms have ever had of the glories of architectural art, it can be readily understood that at first it overwhelms them. They see only that the buildings are a blinding, dazzling mass of white. I have seen men and women stand stupefied at the entrance of the Grand Court, blinded as they would have been by a flash of lightning. Yet in a day it all begins to take form to them, as you will find by listening to their conversation; and at night, when a great part of the detail is lost or subdued, and the grand masses of façade and dome are outlined by the soft glow of incandescent lights, they hang about the place enchanted. It was with no irreverence that a visitor to the exposition in Chicago said, while standing in the Court of Honor there, that if heaven didn't look a good deal like that he should be disappointed; and these hard-working people will carry home with them from Omaha memories that will make all the rest of their lives brighter and more hopeful.

The Omaha Exposition has been particularly fortunate in escaping all freakishness in its architecture, and the credit for this is due to the sound training and courage of the architects who got together and designed it. Such designers as Young of St. Louis, Cass Gilbert of St. Paul, Humphreys of Denver, Beeman and Dwight Perkins of Chicago, and Lawrie of Omaha, all worked harmoniously to fit with their buildings the general design laid down by Mr. Walker. There was but little disposition to make anything wild or too "new." To give an idea of the kind of men who worked in conjunction with Mr. Walker and his partner Mr. Kimball, it is only necessary to say that Mr. Lawrie, a resident architect of Omaha, had spent many years in the offices of Rowand Anderson in Edinburgh and Glasgow, and was three years with John Root in Chicago. It will be easily understood that with such men in council, and capital to back them, a group of beautiful exposition buildings was assured.

A perfect example of good taste in arrangement of exhibits is that seen in the Government Building. The beautiful models shown there of all our battle-ships is most interesting and valuable to these inland people, whose experience with vessels has been mostly confined to a ride on an old flat-bottomed paddle-wheel river steamer, dodging snags and running "riffles" in the "Big Muddy."

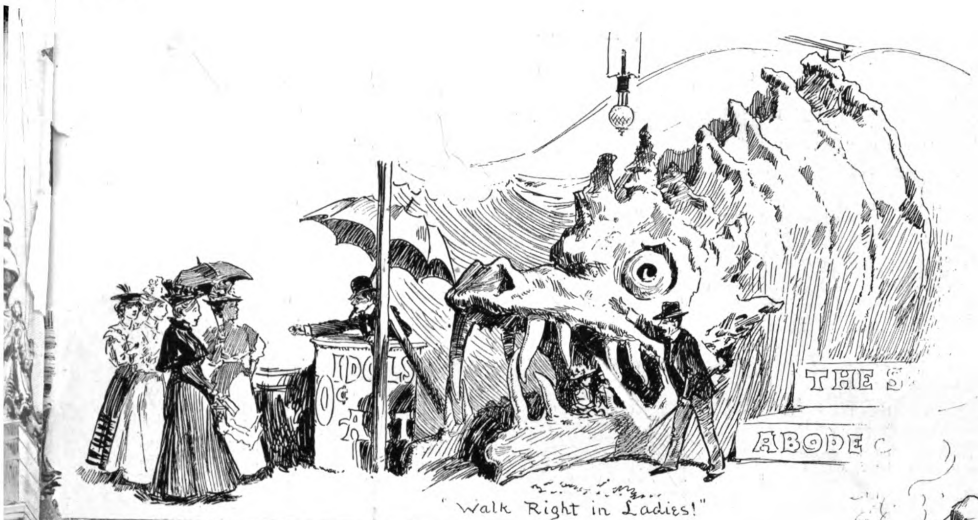
The people of the trans-Mississippi States have cause to be proud of this exposition of their success in developing the agricultural and mineral resources of the Western plains and mountains. They have much to show the President of the United States when he comes to visit the fair, much to make him feel a deeper pride in his exalted station.

W. A. ROGERS.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

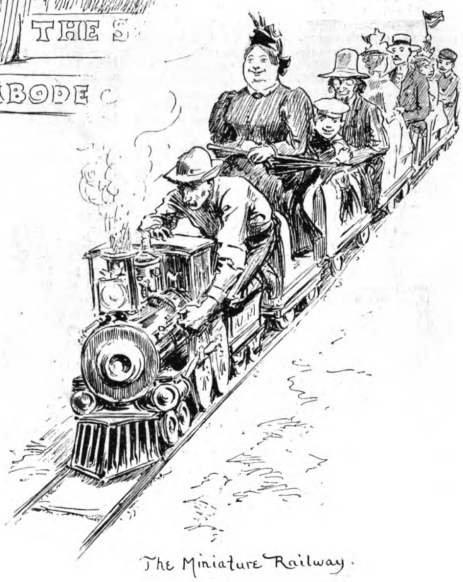
A Visitor to the Midway Recovers her Hearing.

Noon on the Midway.



A Colonnade between Buildings.

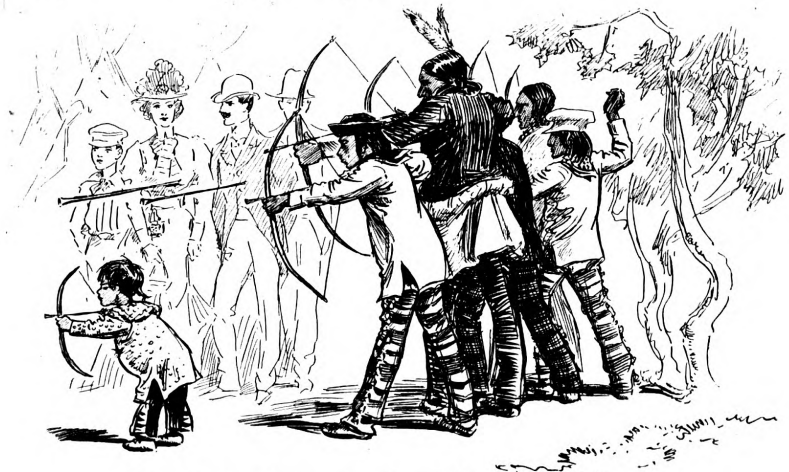
THE TRANS-MISSISS



NOTES AND OBSERVATIONS BY OUR S

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

"Walk Right in Ladies!"



The Miniature Railway.

"Shriner's Day.

The Indian Encampment.—Shooting at Coins.

PI EXPOSITION AT OMAHA.

IAL ARTIST, W. A. ROGERS.—[SEE PAGE 857.]

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THE AWKWARD AGE.*

A Novel.

BY HENRY JAMES,

AUTHOR OF "DAISY MILLER," "AN INTERNATIONAL EPISODE," ETC.

III.

VANDERBANK, at this, left his corner of the sofa and, with his hands in his pockets, and a manner so amused that it might have passed for excited, took several paces about the room while his interlocutor, watching him, waited for his response. The old man, as this response for a minute hung fire, took his turn at sitting down, and then Vanderbank stopped before him with a face in which something had been still more brightly kindled. "You ask me more things than I can tell you. You ask me more than I think you suspect. You must come and see me again—you must let me come and see you. You raise the most interesting questions, and we must sooner or later have them all out."

Mr. Longdon looked happy in such a prospect, but he once more took out his watch. "It wants five minutes to midnight. Which means that I must go now."

"Not in the least. There are satisfactions you too must give." Vanderbank, with an irresistible hand, confirmed him in his position, and pressed upon him another cigarette. His resistance rang hollow—it was clearly, he judged, such an occasion for sacrifices. His companion's view of it, meanwhile, was quite as marked. "You see, there's ever so much more you must, in common kindness, tell me."

Mr. Longdon sat there like a shy singer invited to strike up. "I told you everything at Mrs. Brookenham's. It comes over me now how I dropped on you."

"What you told me," Vanderbank returned, "was excellent so far as it went; but it was only, after all, that, having caught my name, you had asked of our friend if I belonged to people you had known years before, and then, from what she had said, had, with what you were so good as to call great pleasure, made out that I did. You came round to me, on this, after dinner, and gave me a pleasure still greater. But that only takes us part of the way." Mr. Longdon said nothing, but there was something appreciative in his conscious lapses; they were a tribute to his young friend's frequent felicity. This personage indeed appeared more and more to take them for that; which was not without its effect upon his spirits. At last, with a flight of some freedom, he brought their pause to a close. "You loved Lady Julia." Then, as the attitude of his guest, who serenely met his eyes, was practically a contribution to the subject, he went on with a feeling that he had positively pleased. "You lost her, and you're unmarried."

Mr. Longdon's smile was beautiful—it supplied so many meanings that, when presently he spoke, he seemed already to have told half his story. "Well, my life took a form. It had to, or I don't know what would have become of me, and several things that all happened at once helped me out. My father died—I came into the little place in Suffolk. My sister, my only one, who had married and was older than I, lost within a year or two both her husband and her little boy. I offered her, in the country, a home, for her trouble was greater than any trouble of mine. She came, she staid; it went on and on, and we lived there together. We were sorry for each other, and it somehow suited us. But she died two years ago."

Vanderbank took all this in, only wishing to show—wishing by this time quite tenderly—that he even read into it deeply enough all the unsaid. He filled out another of his friend's gaps. "And here you are." Then he invited Mr. Longdon himself to make the stride. "Well, you'll be a great success."

"What do you mean by that?"

"Why, that we shall be so infatuated with you that it will make your life a burden to you. You'll see soon enough what I mean by it."

"Possibly," the old man said; "to understand you I shall have to. You speak of something that, as yet—with my race practically run—I know nothing about. I was no success as a young man. I mean of the sort that would have made most difference. People wouldn't look at me."

"Well, we shall look at you," Vanderbank declared. Then he added, "What people do you mean?" And before his friend could reply: "Lady Julia?"

Mr. Longdon's assent was mute. "Ah, she was not the worst! I mean that what made it so bad," he continued, "was that they all really liked me. Your mother, I think—as to that, the dreadful, consolatory 'liking'—even more than the others."

"My mother?"—Vanderbank was surprised. "You mean there was a question—?"

"Oh, but for half a minute. It didn't take her long. It was five years after your father's death." This explanation was very delicately made. "She could marry again."

"And I suppose you know she did," Vanderbank replied.

"I knew it soon enough!" With this, abruptly, Mr. Longdon pulled himself forward. "Good-night, good-night."

"Good-night," said Vanderbank. "But wasn't that after Lady Julia?"

On the edge of the sofa, his hands supporting him, Mr. Longdon looked straight. "There was nothing after Lady Julia."

"I see," his companion smiled. "My mother was earlier."

"She was extremely good to me. I'm not speaking of that time at Malvern—that came later."

"Precisely—I understand. You're speaking of the first years of her widowhood."

Mr. Longdon just faltered: "I should call them rather the last. Six months later came her second marriage."

Vanderbank's interest visibly improved. "Ah, it was then? That was my seventh year." He called things back and pieced them together. "But she must have been older than you."

* Begun in HARPER'S WEEKLY No. 2180.

"Yes—a little. She was kindness itself to me, at all events, then and afterwards. That was the charm of the weeks at Malvern."

"I see," the young man laughed. "The charm was that you had recovered."

"Oh dear, no!" Mr. Longdon, rather to his mystification, exclaimed. "I'm afraid I hadn't recovered at all—hadn't, if that's what you mean, got over my misery and my melancholy. She knew I hadn't—and that was what was nice of her. She was a person with whom I could talk about her."

Vanderbank took a moment to clear up the ambiguity. "Oh, you mean you could talk about the other! You hadn't got over Lady Julia."

Mr. Longdon sadly smiled at him. "I haven't got over her yet!" Then, however, as if not to look too woful, he took pains to be lucid. "The first wound was bad—but from that one always comes round. Your mother, dear woman, had known how to help me. Lady Julia was at that time her intimate friend—it was she who introduced me there. She couldn't help what happened—she did her best. What I meant just now was that, in the after-time, when opportunity occurred, she was the one person with whom I could always talk and who always understood." Mr. Longdon appeared to lose himself an instant in the deep memories to which, now, he alone survived to testify; then he sighed out, as if the taste of it all came back to him with a faint sweetness: "I think they must both have been good to me. At the period at Malvern—the particular time I just mentioned to you—Lady Julia was already married, and during those first years she was whirled out of my ken. Then her own life took a quieter turn; we met again; I went, for a long time, often to her house. I think she rather liked the state to which she had reduced me, though she didn't, you know, in the least presume upon it. The better a woman is—it has often struck me—the more she enjoys, in a quiet way, some fellow's having been rather bad, rather dark and desperate, about her—for her. I dare say, I mean, that, though Lady Julia insisted I ought to marry, she wouldn't really have liked it much if I had. At any rate, it was in those years that I saw her daughter just cease to be a child—the little girl who was to be transformed by time into the so different person with whom we dined to-night. That comes back to me when I hear you speak of the growing up, in turn, of that person's own daughter."

"I follow you with a sympathy!" Vanderbank replied. "The situation is reproduced."

"Ah, partly—not altogether. The things that are unlike—well, are so very unlike." Mr. Longdon, for a moment, on this, fixed his companion with eyes that betrayed one of the restless little jumps of his mind. "I told you just now that there's something I seem to make out in you."

"Yes, that was meant for better things?"—Vanderbank gayly took him up. "There is something, I really believe—meant for ever so much better ones. Those are just the sort I like to be supposed to have a real affinity with. Help me to them, Mr. Longdon; help me to them, and I don't know what I won't do for you!"

"Then, after all"—and the old man made his point with innocent sharpness—"you're not past saving!"

"Well, I individually—how shall I put it to you? If I tell you," Vanderbank went on, "that I've that sort of fulcrum for salvation which consists at least in a deep consciousness and the absence of a rag of illusion, I shall appear to say that I'm different from the world I live in, and to that extent present myself as superior and fatuous. Try me, at any rate. Let me try myself. Don't abandon me. See what can be done with me. Perhaps I'm after all a case. I shall at any rate cling to you."

"You're too clever—you're too clever: that's what's the matter with you all!" Mr. Longdon sighed.

"With us all?" Vanderbank echoed. "Dear Mr. Longdon, it's the first time I've heard it. If you should say with me in particular, why there might be something in it. What you mean, at any rate—I see where you come out—is that we're cold and sarcastic and cynical, without the soft human spot. I think you flatter us even while you attempt to warn; but what's extremely interesting, at all events, is that, as I gather, we made on you this evening, in a particular way, a collective impression—something in which our trifling varieties are merged." His visitor's face, at this, appeared to say to him that he was putting the case in perfection, so that he was encouraged to go on. "There was something particular with which you were not altogether pleasantly struck."

Mr. Longdon, who, decidedly, changed color easily, showed in his clear cheek the effect at once of feeling a finger on his fault and of admiration for his companion's insight. But he accepted the situation. "I couldn't help noticing your tone."

"Do you mean its being so low?"

Mr. Longdon, who had smiled at first, looked grave now. "Do you really want to know?"

"Just how you were affected? I assure you that there's nothing, at this moment, I desire nearly so much."

"I'm no judge," the old man went on; "I'm no critic; I'm no talker myself. I'm old-fashioned and narrow and dull. I've lived for years in a hole. I'm not a man of the world."

Vanderbank considered him with a benevolence, a geniality of approval, that he literally had to hold in check for fear of seeming to patronize. "There's not one of us who can touch you. You're delightful, you're wonderful, and I'm intensely curious to hear you," the young man pursued. "Were we absolutely odious?" Before his friend's puzzled, finally almost pained face, such an air of appreciating so much candor, yet looking askance at so much freedom, he could only endeavor to smooth the way and light the subject. "You see we don't in the least know where we are. We're lost—and you find us." Mr. Longdon, as he spoke, had prepared at last really to go, reaching the door with a manner that denoted, however, by no means so much satiety as an attention that felt itself positively too agitated. Vanderbank had helped him on with the Inverness cape and for an instant detained him by it. "Just tell me as a kindness. Do we talk—?"

"Too freely?" Mr. Longdon, with his clear eyes, so untouched by time, speculatively murmured.

"Too outrageously. I want the truth."

The truth, evidently, for Mr. Longdon, was difficult to tell. "Well—it was certainly different."

"From you and Lady Julia, I see. Well, of course, with time, some change is natural, isn't it? But so different," Vanderbank pressed, "that you were really shocked?"

His visitor, at this, smiled, but the smile somehow made the face graver. "I think I was rather frightened. Good-night."

IV.

Mrs. Brookenham stopped on the threshold with the sharp surprise of the sight of her son, and there was disappointment, though rather of the afflicted than of the irritated sort, in the question that, slowly advancing, she launched at him. "If you're still lolling about, why did you tell me two hours ago that you were leaving immediately?"

Deep in a large brocaded chair, with his little legs stuck out to the fire, he was so much at his ease that he was almost flat on his back. She had evidently roused him from sleep, and it took him a couple of minutes, during which, without again looking at him, she directly approached a beautiful old French secretary, a fine piece of the period of Louis Quinze, to justify his presence. "I changed my mind—I couldn't get off."

"Do you mean to say you're not going?"

"Well, I'm thinking it over. What's a fellow to do?" He sat up a little, staring with conscious solemnity at the fire, and if it had been—as it was not—one of the annoyances she, in general, expected from him, she might have received the impression that his flush was the heat of liquor.

"He's to keep out of the way," she replied—"when he has led one so deeply to hope it." There had been a bunch of keys suspended in the lock of the secretary, of which, as she said these words, Mrs. Brookenham took possession. Her air on observing them had promptly become that of having been in search of them, and a moment after she had passed across the room they were in her pocket. "If you don't go, what excuse will you give?"

"Do you mean to you, mummy?"

She stood before him, and now she dismally looked at him. "What's the matter with you? What an extraordinary time to take a nap!"

He had fallen back in the chair, from the depths of which he met her eyes. "Why, it's just the time, mummy. I did it on purpose. I can always go to sleep when I like. I assure you it sees one through things—!"

She turned away with impatience and, glancing about the room, perceived on a small table of the same type as the secretary a somewhat massive book with the label of a circulating library, which she proceeded to pick up as if for refuge from the impression the boy made on her. He watched her do this and watched her then slightly pause at the wide window that, in Buckingham Crescent, commanded the prospect they had ramified rearward to enjoy, a medley of smoky brick and spotty stucco, of other undressed backs, of glass invidiously opaque, of roofs and chimney-pots and stables unnaturally near—one of the private pictures that in London, in select situations, run up, as the phrase is, the rent. There was no indication of value now, however, in the character conferred on the scene by a cold spring rain. The place, moreover, had a confessed out-of-season vacancy. She appeared to have determined on silence for the present mark of her relation with Harold, yet she soon failed to resist a sufficiently poor reason for breaking it. "Be so good as to get out of my chair."

"What will you do for me," he asked, "if I oblige you?"

He never moved—but as if only the more directly and intimately to meet her—and she stood again before the fire and sounded his strange little face. "I don't know what it is, but you give me sometimes a kind of terror."

"A terror, mamma?"

She found another place, sinking sadly down and opening her book, and the next moment he got up and came over to kiss her, on which she drew her cheek wearily aside. "You bore me quite to death," she panted, "and I give you up to your fate."

"What do you call my fate?"

"Oh, something dreadful—if only by its being publicly ridiculous." She turned vaguely the pages of her book. "You're too selfish—too sickening."

"Oh, dear, dear!" he wonderingly whistled while he wandered back to the hearth-rug on which, with his hands behind him, he lingered awhile. He was small and had a slight stoop, which somehow gave him character—a character somewhat of the insidious sort, carried out in the acuteness, difficult to trace to a source, of his smooth fair face, whose lines were all curves and its expression all needles. He had the voice of a man of forty, and was dressed—as if markedly not for London—with an air of experience that seemed to match it. He pulled down his waistcoat, smoothing himself, feeling his neat hair and looking at his shoes; then he said to his mother: "I took your five pounds. Also two of the sovereigns," he went on. "I left you two pound ten." She jerked up her head at this, facing him in dismay, and, immediately on her feet, passed back to the secretary. "It's quite as I say," he insisted; "you should have locked it before, don't you know? It grinned at me there with all its charming brasses, and what was I to do? Darling mummy, I

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

couldn't start—that was the truth. I thought I should find something—I had noticed; and I do hope you'll let me keep it, because if you don't it's all up with me. I stopped over on purpose—on purpose, I mean, to tell you what I've done. Don't you call that a sense of honor? And now you only stand and glower at me."

Mrs. Brookenham was, in her thirty-ninth year, still charmingly pretty, and the nearest approach she made, at this moment, to meeting her son's description of her was by looking beautifully desperate. She had about her the pure light of youth—would always have it; her head, her figure, her flexibility, her flickering color, her lovely, silly eyes, her natural, quavering tone all played together toward this effect by some trick that had never yet been exposed. It was at the same time remarkable that—at least in the bosom of her family—she rarely wore an appearance of gayety less qualified than at the present juncture; she suggested, for the most part, the luxury, the novelty, of woe, the excitement of strange sorrows and the cultivation of fine indifferences. This was her special sign—an innocence dimly tragic. It gave immense effect to her other resources. She opened the secretary with the key she had quickly found, then with the aid of another rattled out a small drawer; after which she pushed the drawer back, closing the whole thing. "You terrify me—you terrify me," she again said.

"How can you say that when you showed me just now how well you know me? Wasn't it just on account of what you thought I might do that you took out the keys as soon as you came in?" Harold's manner had a way of clearing up whenever he could talk of himself.

"You're too utterly disgusting, and I shall speak to your father:" with which, going to the chair he had given up, his mother sank down again with her heavy book. There was no anger, however, in her voice, and not even a harsh plaint; only a detached, accepted disenchantment. Mrs. Brookenham's supreme rebellion against fate was just to show with the last frankness how much she was bored.

"No, darling mummy, you won't speak to my father—you'll do anything in the world rather than that," Harold replied, quite as if he were kindly explaining her to herself. "I thank you immensely for the charming way you take what I have done; it was because I had a conviction of that that I waited for you to know it. It was all very well to tell you I would start on my visit—but how the deuce was I to start without a penny in the world? Don't you see that if you want me to go about you must really enter into my needs?"

"I wish to heaven you would leave me—I wish to heaven you would get out of the house," Mrs. Brookenham went on without looking up.

Harold took out his watch. "Well, mamma, now I am ready: I wasn't in the least before. But it will be going forth, you know, quite to seek my fortune. For do you really think—I must have from you what you do think—that it will be all right for me?"

She fixed him at last with her pretty pathos. "You mean for you to go to Brander?"

"You know," he answered with his manner as of letting her see her own attitude, "you know you try to make me do things that you wouldn't at all do yourself. At least I hope you wouldn't. And don't you see that if I so far oblige you I must at least be paid for it?"

His mother leaned back in her chair, gazed for a moment at the ceiling and then closed her eyes. "You are frightful," she said; "you're appalling."

"You're always wanting to get me out of the house," he continued; "I think you want to get us all out, for you manage to keep Nanda from showing even more than you do me. Don't you think your children are good enough, mummy dear? At any rate, it's as plain as possible that if you don't keep us at home you must keep us in other places. One can't live anywhere for nothing—it's all bosh that a fellow saves by staying with people. I don't know how it is for a lady, but a man practically, is let in—"

"Do you know you kill me, Harold?" Mrs. Brookenham wofully interposed. But it was with the same remote melancholy that, in the next breath, she asked: "It wasn't an invitation—to Brander?"

"It's as I told you. She said she'd write, fixing a time; but she never did write."

"But if you wrote—"

"It comes to the same thing? Does it?—that's the question. If on my note she didn't write—that's what I mean. Should one simply take it that one is wanted? I like to have these things from you, mother. I do, I believe, everything you say; but to feel safe and right I must just have them. Any one would want me, eh?"

Mrs. Brookenham had opened her eyes, but she still attached them to the cornice. "If she hadn't wanted you, she would have written. In a great house like that there's always room."

The young man watched her a moment. "How you do like to tuck us in and then sit up yourself! What do you want to do, anyway? What are you up to, mummy?"

She rose, at this, turning her eyes about the room as if from the extremity of martyrdom or the wistfulness of some deep thought. Yet when she spoke it was with a different expression, an expression that would have served, for an observer, as a marked illustration of that disconnectedness of her parts which frequently was laughable even to the degree of contributing to her social success. "You've spent, then, more than four pounds in five days. It was on Friday I gave them to you. What in the world do you suppose is going to become of me?"

Harold continued to look at her as if the question demanded some answer really helpful. "Do we live beyond our means?"

She now moved her gaze to the floor. "Will you please get away?"

"Anything to assist you. Only, if I should find I'm not wanted—?"

She met, after an instant, his look, and the wan loveliness and silliness of her own had never been greater. "Be wanted, and you won't find it. You're odious, but you're not a fool."

He put his arms about her now, for farewell, and she submitted as if it were absolutely indifferent to her to whose bosom she was pressed. "You do, dearest," he laughed, "say such sweet things!" And with that he reached the door, on opening which he pulled up at a sound from below. "The Duchess! She's coming up."

Mrs. Brookenham looked quickly round the room, but she spoke with utter detachment. "Well, let her come."

"As I'd let her go. I take it as a happy sign she won't be at Brander." He stood with his hand on the knob; he had another quick appeal. "But after Tuesday?"

Mrs. Brookenham had passed half round the room with the glide that looked languid but that was really a remarkable form of activity, and had given a transforming touch, on sofa and chairs, to three or four crushed cushions. It was all with the sad, inclined head of a broken lily. "You're to stay till the twenty-fourth."

"But if I am kicked out?"

It was as a broken lily that she considered it. "Then go to the Mangers."

"Happy thought! And shall I write?"

His mother raised a little more a window-blind. "No—I will."

"Delicious mummy!" And Harold blew her a kiss.

"Yes, rather"—she corrected herself. "Do write—from Brander. It's the sort of thing for the Mangers. Or even wire."

"Both?" the young man laughed. "Oh you duck!" he cried. "And from where will you let them have it?"

"From Pewbury," she replied without wincing. "I'll write on Sunday."

"Good. How d'ye do, Duchess?"—and Harold, before he disappeared, greeted with a rapid concentration of all the shades of familiarity a large, high lady, the visitor he had announced, who rose in the doorway with the manner of a person used to arriving on thresholds very much as people arrive at stations—with the expectation of being "met."

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

KILLING FROST.

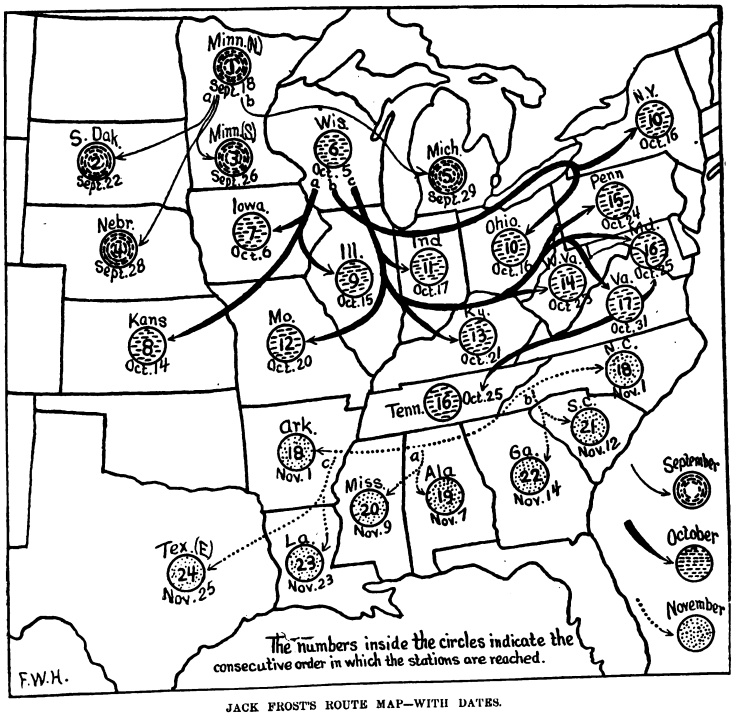
The Department of Agriculture of the United States reports that the first killing frost of the season is due in northern Minnesota September 18. That date is the average of the past twenty-five years.* Four days later (September 22) corn is frost killed in South Dakota. Again, four days later still, southern Minnesota is visited; and within the three following days, Nebraska and Michigan. This concludes the September operations.

The map shows the relative locations of these first five stations of Jack Frost's annual business travels in the principal corn-producing States. The most remarkable feature of his September journeyings is that he skips Wisconsin until six days after he has visited Michigan.

October operations are, however, begun on the 5th, with Wisconsin as headquarters. The map shows that the first October route, "a," is to the Southwest, reaching Iowa the first day out (October 6). Now Iowa is the great corn State, and it is not known whether that is the reason, or whether Jack goes to sleep there for a week and a day to gain strength for the following four days' remarkable work. At any rate, he is due in Kansas on the 14th, and in Illinois on the 15th.

Then, without stopping to take breath, he makes the "b" route complete in twenty-four hours, "doing" both Ohio and New York State on the 16th. Starting immediately on his "c" route, he makes Indiana the following day, having covered five great States in four days.

He then proceeds more leisurely, taking two weeks for the remaining seven October States, an average of just two days to each State, and brings up in the "Old Dominion" on the last day of the month.



His November campaign is opened simultaneously in Arkansas and North Carolina on the first day of the month. That date, however, is merely for record, because he does not start on his "a" route until the 7th, when he visits Alabama, and two days later, Mississippi.

It is very clear that the Southern climate takes the snap out of Jack Frost, just as it does out of other folks, for the map routes and dates show a record of but eight States in the whole twenty-five days, which is a striking contrast to the five States from October 14 to October 17 inclusive, or the twelve States from October 14 to October 31 inclusive, in his more northerly work.

It is of interest to note that the corn-killing record is closed in nine Northwestern States before Ohio and New York are called down, and that eight days more pass, and the accounts of four more States are closed, before Pennsylvania is called upon for a settlement.

A little study of the map will show several other striking geographical relations, making it clear that oceans, great lakes, large mountain systems, and extensive river valleys have a marked influence in determining the close of the vegetation season.

* All dates used herein, and on the accompanying map, are the twenty-five-year average dates of the first killing frosts of the respective localities as reported by the Department of Agriculture.

JACK FROST'S ROUTE MAP—WITH DATES.

THE MISER YEAR.

AUTUMN.

Note how the miser year clings to her gold,
Which now is spread o'er forest, hill, and field,
And not until her hands in death grow cold
With Winter's frost will she her bright hoard yield.

F. S. M.

CURTIS'S LETTERS TO DWIGHT.*

It is a genial service that Mr. George Willis Cooke has done in presenting in a neat volume by themselves the letters that George William Curtis wrote to his friend and teacher John S. Dwight, in those idyllic days of his youth at Brook Farm and at Concord. The service consists in not merely giving us the letters, but in setting up the background of life and experience that belongs to them.

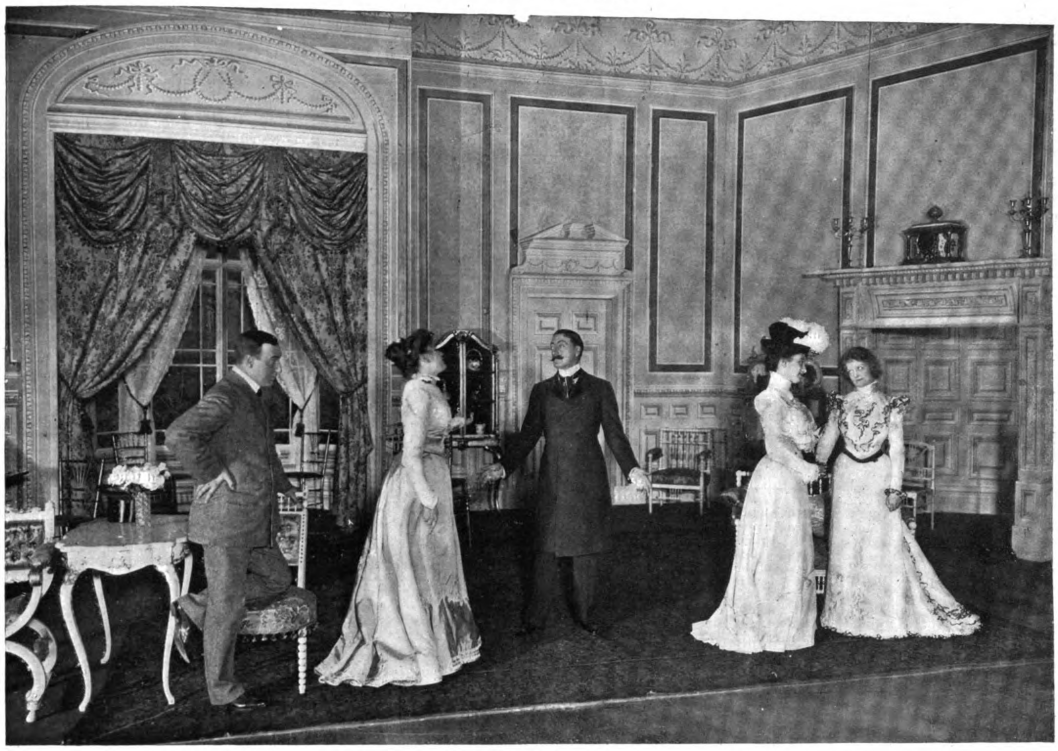
In his introductory matter the editor gives a sufficient account of Curtis's early life for his purpose, and affords distinct glimpses of that curious development of Boston transcendentalism in the early forties which culminated in the Brook Farm Association. He lets us know clearly enough what Brook Farm was and who partook of its gentle socialism, and then he reproduces the environment of young Curtis's rustic experience at Concord, where he came in contact with Emerson, Hawthorne, and Thoreau. Another service, and one perhaps more needed, consists in reminding the world of the man who for years was known simply as the editor of Dwight's Journal of Music. He began as a clergyman, and was of the transcendentalist circle, and he taught Latin and music at Brook Farm. A classical scholar and a theologian, he devoted his days mainly to disseminating musical knowledge and taste, with little profit to himself.

This editorial labor revives the atmosphere of the letters, and makes their significance fresh; and in them we find reflected the pellucid mind and character of the youth of nineteen to twenty-two, who became the vigorous champion of reform and of all good causes in the bustling world, the polished orator of the platform and the forum, and the genial philosopher of the famous "Easy Chair." An adequate biography of Curtis, with extracts from his correspondence, had been previously published; but it is well to have by itself this picture of the formative period of his manhood.

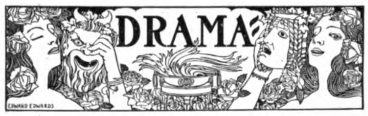
* Early Letters of George William Curtis to John S. Dwight; Brook Farm and Concord. Edited by George Willis Cooke. New York and London: Harper and Brothers, publishers, 1898.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google



Digitized by Google



THE TRANS-MISSISSIPPI EXPOSITION AT OMAHA—SCENE AT THE INDIAN CONGRESS.

Drawn by W. A. Rogers, Special Artist for "Harper's Weekly" at the Exposition.—[See Page 987.]

Original from PENN STATE

SCENE FROM "THE LIARS," AS PERFORMED BY MR. JOHN DREW'S COMPANY AT THE EMPIRE THEATRE, NEW YORK.
Mrs. Crespin. "I'm afraid I made a mistake."

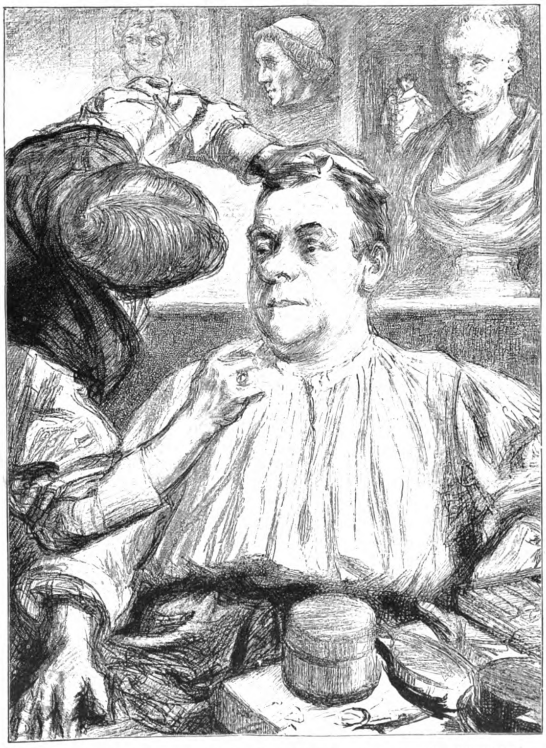
THE REAL CYRANO.

THE proverbial difference made by an inch on a man's nose was never better illustrated than in "Cyrano de Bergerac," with which Mr. Richard Mansfield has just opened at the Garden Theatre in New York, and Mr. Daly's company at the Chestnut Street Opera House in Philadelphia. The Cyrano of history had a very good nose: as Napoleon once said of his own, it was no more than enough to air his brain. Unluckily, like Falstaff, it not only aired his own wit, but was the occasion of airing wit in others. One ancient writer says it was "like the nose of those yellow-and-green babblers they bring us from America," and other equally unpleasant remarks were passed. Now it was possible in Cyrano's time (if we can trust his contemporary Touchstone) to object to the cut of a courtier's beard and not fight him short of the seventh remove, from the retort courteous to the lie direct; but with regard to his nose Cyrano left no loop-hole. If you did not like it you had to fight him on the spot; and though he was one of the most famous men of letters of his time, he was also one of the most dreaded swashbucklers. Here in the facts of history is the theme for a lofty and thoroughly legitimate romance—The Romance of the Nose. But M. Edmond Rostand was not satisfied with it: he added the proverbial inch, and made it, as the stage directions specify, le nez terrible—protruding, fiery, bulbous.

The Romance of the Nose.



On that inch of stage nose the whole play hangs; and in the touch of the grotesque it introduces one finds the theme that led M. Rostand away from the lines of what is called legitimate comedy.

But how splendid the grotesque he achieves! The Cyrano of history, if he was given time, could write a ballade with all its intricacies of rhyme and refrain; and it is related that he once fought and vanquished a hundred men. Cyrano of the nose fights a duel, and at the same time extemporizes a ballade describing, from thrust to thrust, how he does it. The refrain he chooses is, "A la fin de l'envoi je touche!" and, sure enough, when the end of the envoi comes, he stabs his man, with the refrain in his mouth announcing the fact. It would be impertinent to inquire how many hours of quiet it took M. Rostand to compose that particular ballade, or to wonder why M. Rostand did not make Cyrano compose a ballade while fighting a hundred men, or, for the matter of that, a hundred ballades, one for each man. He had other fish to fry! This episode of the duel en vers is only one of the grotesque impossibilities, the impossible heroisms, that crowd the five acts of the play.

The Inch on Cyrano's Nose.

The main grotesque impossibility—or let us call it a grotesque necessity—is that though Cyrano is a poet at heart and in love with all beauty and grace, his nose places him without the pale of woman's love—his own mother thought him ugly, and he has loved his cousin Roxane from childhood almost without hope. Yet he will not even shed a tear for the loss of it all—a tear is too beautiful a thing to be profaned by coursing down his nose! It is enough that when the spell of the blue twilight is upon him and he walks in gardens where lovers meet he has to breathe in the April air through that nose! It transpires that Roxane returns the love of one of Cyrano's comrades-at-arms, Christian. As it happens, Roxane has the æsthetic fad of the day, the preciosité which Molière has immortalized in "Les Précieuses Ridicules." Now Christian is as simple-minded as he is handsome, and badly needs some one to write acceptable love-letters for him.

The Tear and the Nose.

FINISHING TOUCHES TO THE FAMOUS NOSE OF "CYRANO DE BERGERAC." COQUELIN IN HIS DRESSING-ROOM AT THE LYCEUM THEATRE, LONDON.
A SKETCH FROM LIFE BY PAUL RENOUARD.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Poor Cyrano undertakes the task for the happiness of addressing Roxane, in whatever guise. In spite of his nose, on a letter he has written a tear is discovered! He even speaks for Christian one night beneath Roxane's balcony, and implores a kiss. The lines are so beautiful that they cannot be taken out of the French without losing the best there is in them: "A kiss? And, after all, what is it! An oath made holier, a promise more precise. . . . A rose-dot on the i of the verb aimer, an instant of infinitude that makes the sound of a bee. . . . A foretaste of the soul upon the lips." It is Christian who receives that kiss; but Cyrano has a moment of real triumph, knowing that what Roxane is kissing is the words he has just been speaking.

When the lovers are married, Roxane tells Christian that, though attracted at first by his good looks, her heart was won by the beauty of his spirit; she would love him if he were ugly, even grotesque. This rouses Christian's manhood; but before he can confess the truth, he is called away to battle, and is killed. The latest letter to Roxane, wet with Cyrano's tears, becomes stained with Christian's blood. He dies imploring Cyrano to tell the truth to Roxane and claim the love that is his. Cyrano's loyalty is little short of quixotic. He delivers the letter, refusing to let Roxane know that the man she really loves still lives, though her sorrow is so great that she has taken refuge in a cloister. And his devotion is no less than his loyalty. During fourteen years that elapse between the fourth and fifth acts he has visited her every week to bring her the news of the world, and it is only as he expires that Roxane divines his secret. In a passage of surpassing pathos she discovers that the letters are his, that the voice that wooed her beneath her balcony is his voice. The blood on the letter she has cherished is Christian's, but the tear is Cyrano's. Even here Cyrano has no word of regret; he is only grateful that one bit of womanly sympathy has come to him. "Grâce à vous, une robe a passé dans ma vie." Long before the play has reached this point le nez terrible is forgotten, and one is lost in the splendor and the beauty and the pathos of the impossible situation that it has alone made possible. It gives a touch of grotesque to the whole, yet the five long acts of "Cyrano" teem with the heroism of war and of love. It is the Romance of the Sword and the Rose.

Blood and a Tear.

The success of the play last year in Paris can scarcely be exaggerated. Coming in the wake of a series of problem plays, of attempts in realism, symbolism, and Ibsenism, and all the thousand fads of a nation in which the creative spirit is dormant, it shot across the sky like a burst of light from sunset. It is not strange that Paris mistook the play for the herald of a new dawn. Even so lucid and authoritative a critic as M. Emile Faguet declared that Rostand had opened the twentieth century brilliantly and in triumph; that Europe would be made to stare with envy, and that France would be in an ecstasy of pride and of hope. Calmer judgments now prevail. M. Jules Lemaître has pointed out clearly enough that in the main the play of "Cyrano" harks back to what is oldest and most familiar in the French drama. "Far from being an innovation, it is rather a recapitulation, or, if you prefer, the supreme flowering of an artistic growth of three centuries." The fine people of the Hôtel de Rambouillet would have delighted in its elegances of phrase; the swarming vitality of certain of the scenes has the flavor of Rabelais. And that nose! It might have been carved seven hundred years ago on any of the cathedrals of the best period in the Ile de France.

A Threatened Fad.

The play is French of the French, and one can only speculate as to how an Anglo-Saxon audience will take to it after the first weeks of its novelty are over. If we honestly follow our tastes I do not think it is likely to prove a lasting success, for the entire atmosphere is that of an exotic—and the bloom of a flower of poetry is sadly brushed off by even the best translation! Yet all the world is talking about it, and not a few are reading it. Theatrical companies all over the country are preparing to produce it the moment the tidings of success are announced from Philadelphia and New York. Most probably we are launched on the indeterminate course of a popular fad—the nose of Cyrano is heir to the publicity of Trilby's foot.

Mr. Henry Arthur Jones's new play, "The Liars," which Mr. John Drew has produced at the Empire, is a far better piece than one is permitted to appreciate. With the exception of Mr. Drew, the actors succeed mainly in obscuring the author's intention. It is essentially a drawing-room play, full of quiet shadings and innuendoes; yet every jest or repartee is launched at the audience as if from a torpedo-tube, and its explosion is awaited in theatrical suspense. Some of the more delicate jests are not launched at all, but done to death in slow and meaningless recital. Mr. Drew's manner is in sharp contrast. He is everywhere quiet and reserved. He acts less than he easily might, and leaves the difference in effect to be created in the mind of his hearer. If actors could only realize how grateful one is for the privilege of seeing a thing one's self! If I am not mistaken Mr. Drew rises even above his own high level in some of the more emotional scenes. When he does so one realizes how much force a climax gains from a well-modulated style.

John Drew and The Liars.

The plot of "The Liars" is curiously like that of Mr. Augustus Thomas's "The Meddler." In both plays a wife's indiscretion involves the friends of the family in a mesh of lies. In Mr. Thomas's play the situation is funnier because the wife is quite innocent, and the man who suffers the worst consequences of intermeddling is actuated by the sincerest motives—it is a situation filled with the eternal irony of social limitations. Mr. Jones's wife and her lover are the conventional would-be runaways—the woman shallow in her va[illegible] man an ass in his vehemence. Yet as an [illegible]g play there is no comparison. From curtain to curtain and from act to act everything in "The Liars" is adjusted with almost Gallic skill of construction. The movement never strays or flags, and though the climaxes are unobtrusive, they happen along at opportune moments; and the spectator is never for an instant in doubt as to what is going on. Much of the wit of the lines is excellent, and the situations, especially that at the end of the third act, are very amusing. Altogether the play is worthy of success, and, in spite of the crudity of several of the actors, will doubtless achieve it.

JOHN CORBIN.

MUSIC

COMIC OPERA AGAIN.

Look at its eye, look at its eye, look at its rolling eye!
—"A Runaway Girl."

FLASHING and capering, comic opera is effecting its annual sortie on New York. It is the regular season's skirmishing-line. Like Roderick Dhu's gillies, hid along Venachar, nothing is heard of it, until, presto! a whistle is blown, and, lo, all the region is alive with the clan! It fits the mood, too, in which September and October find many ordinarily sensible people. Winter is not yet here, but there is coolness and a nip in the blood. We are back in town, and at work. But until at least November let us enjoy as much of an Indian summer of carelessness and irresponsible vitality as we can through the musical stage's counterfeit of frolic and out-of-doors life—gradually rising to our duty and sober ideals.

I do not know that it is fair, however, to class with musical guerilla-work productions that are even as independent of each other, as independent of correct musical models, as careless of deference to the limits of absurdity in play-acting through music, as are "A Runaway Girl," "The Charlatan," and "The Little Corporal." Much less should one include the Castle Square's systematic repertory-work, with "Boccaccio," "Iolanthe," "Dorothy," "A Trip to Africa," and so on. Our broadest home-made creation, the sort that Mr. Wilson commands, and in which Mr. Hopper comes down upon us like a De Wolf on the fold, is scornful of the dictates of almost everything except the wishes of those jovial low-comedians who star in them. But few of the regular season's incidents are more shrewdly, intelligently, and expensively planned and carried out. There is, too, a gain in many artistic details from autumn to autumn—admitting all the perversities and shortcomings. We find more musicianly music, more real humor in the absurd plot or dialogue of drollery. There is always closer heed to avoid any shade of real impropriety. So, notwithstanding the familiar faults of the old line of comic efforts of the sort, the musical carefulness and effect advance and the ensemble work ever is better and better done.

RAYMOND HITCHCOCK,
Of the Castle Square Opera Company.

Comic opera in English and opera-comique made in English much more broadly comic than it should be—something of an accepted hybrid that irritates us, and has to be scolded as much as do other sorts of hybrids—are the direct result of those days of the Casino to which we are apt to look back rather affectionately, even to calling them good old ones. Really they were not a bit better than they should have been, year by year. The same high priests of their fun-making are the authorities of vogue in it to-day. The priestesses somehow have largely disappeared from prominence, going down unto vaudeville or into the vale of over-ripe years. Miss Lillian Russell is, I think, the only one to be called actually in wide public notice as an operatic singer still; and Miss Russell came to the Casino in its later and Offenbach period, not when we were having "Erminie," "Nadgy," "The Merry War," "Nell Gwynne," "Nanon," "The Beggar Student," "Madelon," "The Marquise," and so on. Besides that fact, Miss Russell had no ordinary voice and musical schooling. It is true that Strauss, Millöcker, Genée, and Lacome furnished operettas of graceful musicianship and quieter humor, even to sentiment really refined. But the plots and references nearly always hinted at Paris or Vienna in a license of moral situations. The dialogue was Bowdlerized into crude and hack English. The operettas once selected, they were maltreated by horse-play and "gagging" to the full. Gaudiness of mounting was a specialty, and a tiresomely frank dependence was put not on the human voice divine, but on the human form divine. Now there is certainly much to criticise, even to rebuke, as art, in such pieces as "Wang," "The Wizard of the Nile," "The Charlatan," "The Little Corporal," "A Runaway Girl," and, I dare say, in what Mr. Jefferson-Concerning-The-Angels is about to disclose to us—"The Jolly Musketeer." But they are made expressly to fit the singing low-comedians in question. No original that has been more æsthetically sound is abused in them. Their music is often excellent, as well as much more sonorous and varied than that of their imported predecessors. The plots are quintessently absurd; but they are novel in picturesqueness of situation, and the text has some share of real wit and of literary cleverness in the lyrics. Moreover, a large group of young women, the female protagonists, have studied, and studied hard, for just the species of capable work that they do, not merely depending on their personal good looks, nor drifting into such musical services as unsuccessful climbers toward serious opera or recruits from vaudeville. The choruses, too, are far better as singers and actors. Who does not shudder to remember the old—literally old—Casino chorus? The orchestra is apt to be well chosen and intelligently led. So really are the attributes of frolic opera as we hear it may cheer us as critics of music's lighter side, although we reprove the faults in it at which we—laugh!

Between the half-dozen examples of such opera, old or new, our own or imported, now bidding for their term of popular favor, there is no very distinct choice. At the Broadway and Knickerbocker theatres we find perfect instances of how local traditions that misguide are kept alive, or how far improvement marches quietly along despite them. Mr. Wilson has arrived at a higher plane of acting as Petitpas, in "The Little Corporal." But the book by Mr. Smith has an extravagance of absurdity that will hardly brook a shade of the serious in all Mr. Wilson's work as comedian, to say nothing of the highly successful aim of the librettist at a really humorous dialogue, and at a constant flash of that touch-and-go fun in which the public delight. Mr. Englander's score is full of good writing. It has at least the numbers that catch the ear strongly—the "Sons of France" chorus and the brisk seditious song against Bonaparte. But Mr. Englander has not reached a high mark of melodic invention or originality of effect in any act. Even in the two numbers named we are referred to "Tannhäuser" and "The Mulligan Guards," in funny succession. Of course, Mr. Wilson makes the most of all designed for him, in his accustomed manner; Miss Glaser is a delightful aide-de-camp; in Mr. Dennis O'Sullivan a pleasant singer and spirited operatic actor comes forward; and "The Little Corporal" is a fluent and brightly colored spectacle, if a trifle long.

Mr. Hopper has been provided by Mr. Sousa in "The Charlatan" not merely with music better calculated to show a fine barytone voice, but with three acts of no mean merit, when ideas and firm treatment of vocal or instrumental contents are examined. Miss Bergen sings artistically. Each ensemble number is quite capitally done. Mr. Hopper cannot help being the last man for us to take seriously, even in his vocalism; but I begin to expect the day when I shall hear him, and with commendation, as a Wagnerian barytone or Marcel or Mephistopheles. I have already heard him as Leonora in "The Trovatore," not to mention his appearance as Juliet! As for "A Runaway Girl," at Daly's, it is not as diverting in plot, song-text, or dialogue as was "The Geisha." Mr. Carryll and Mr. Monckton, nevertheless, have put into the piece gayety, several charming or droll lyrics, and the close is a surprise in its quickening of one's declined interest in the mirth and music. We have, as before now with these London arrivals, a stage overflowing with something like real youthfulness, true buoyancy, life, smiling good looks. The English model of comic opera inclines just now to the simplicities of the old "ballad-opera" manner. With its aristocratic names, its undercurrent of good-breeding and decorous reserves, it is attractive despite its being pitched to a quiet key as a frolic. It is more a butterfly than a bird, and it has remarkably pretty wings. It likes to build its absurdity on the yachting or travelling adventures of a lot of young persons of title, and the result is a dramatic aspect somewhere between a fashionable bazar in a shire town and a house party of charming lunatics. It does not care much more about its heroes than that they must be boyish and slim and graceful; but it does make much of scrapes of an immature heroine, who is at once as timorous as a schoolgirl and brassy as a ballet danseuse; who always wholly conceals her identity by merely letting down her back hair, and who comes out unscathed even from a Tea-House of Ten Thousand Joys or a strolling minstrel-band.

By the Castle Square forces "Patience" has been wisely and gratefully announced, succeeding to the "Trip to Africa," in which the artistic singing of half a dozen of the principals and Mr. Raymond Hitchcock's low-comedy were much relished by a houseful of regular patrons. Mr. Hitchcock has natural humor of face and style; all he needs is more discretion in his fooling.

At Wallack's "The Fortune Teller," with an amusing book by Mr. Smith and a brilliant score by Mr. Victor Herbert, is admirably sung by a strong company, headed by Miss Alice Neilsen, Mr. Eugene Cowles, and Mr. Joseph Herbert.

Let us take the good with the bad. There is much art as good as the vehicle demands, and some decidedly better. The great enemy to art in it is the gagging, especially when such a thing is thrown into a piece when it rings false to bring an insult. Mr. Hopper, Mr. Wilson, Mr. Daniels, Mr. Powers, Mr. Hitchcock, are sinners in the same kind, if by no means in the same degree. But while their gagging is the joy of the vulgar, be it noted that it is not risqué gagging. It is, too, so old a liberty that we can almost reverence it. The Greek and Roman stage was full of gaggers' echoes. On the London boards, in the seventeenth century, Pinkethman, a noted comedian, was one who "ever interpolated all manner of Jokes and Gestures not in his Part, according to the Authour." There is, too, a strongly contemporary hint in this protest: "What jumping over tables and joust stools! What ridiculous postures and grimaces! And what an excellent trick it was to straddle before an audience making a thousand d——d French faces! And yet the town was so proud of all these that they brought the greatest houses ever known!" Mr. Pinkethman is ably represented to-day, as well as the public's liking for his theory of humor.

E. IRENÆUS STEVENSON.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THE EPISCOPAL CONVENTION.

THE triennial General Convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church of this country, which has just begun its sessions at Washington, D. C., is the supreme legislature of the Church. The structure of the convention bears resemblance to the Congress of the United States, the bishops being, so to speak, Senators for life, and sitting (always in "executive session") apart from the Representatives, as we may call the House of Clerical and Lay Deputies, which is composed of not more than four clergymen and four laymen from each diocese, chosen by election in the various diocesan conventions. The two Houses must agree upon any legislation before it may pass into law; since there is no Chief Executive, like the President of the United States, no veto power anywhere exists, and the comparison with our national legislation fails at this point.

The convention charged with duties so important is of course an imposing body—imposing in mere bulk as in talent and character. The House of Clerical and Lay Deputies includes, generally speaking, the most eminent priests and the foremost laymen of the Church, and in large number; indeed, this House is now cumbrously large, containing at present about four hundred and fifty members, and constantly growing in bulk with the creation of new dioceses, so that the difficulty of clean and thorough despatch of business by the House has become great already, and some attempts at reducing the number of deputies have been made, but without result hitherto.

The convention is a wandering body, meeting in different places, according to its own appointment. In 1895 the place of session was Minneapolis; in 1892, Baltimore; in 1889, New York, in 1886, Chicago, etc. This year, for the first time, it assembles at the capital, which, since the last convention, has become the see city of the new Diocese of Washington, presided over by Bishop Satterlee, long rector of Calvary Church, New York. As must be the case in a body composed chiefly of elderly men, death commonly deprives either House of some familiar figures at each triennial meeting. Among those thus taken away who are likely to be most missed from the convention of 1898 are the late Bishop Coxe of Western New York, and the late Stephen P. Nash, senior warden of Trinity Parish, New York, whose term of service in the convention had endured for twenty years.

The presiding bishop is the senior in date of consecration, but as this rule is likely to devolve the duty of directing the deliberations of the House of Bishops upon one of the more aged and infirm of their number, provision was made sometime since for the election of a chairman, who may relieve his senior whenever he be desired so to do. It is to be feared that the venerable Bishop Williams of Connecticut, who for ten years has been presiding bishop, may be hindered by the weight of infirmity from active service during the present session. The House of Clerical and Lay Deputies elects a president at every convention. The Rev. Dr. Morgan Dix, rector of Trinity Church, New York, first chosen president in 1886, has been re-elected at every succeeding convention. He is a model presiding officer, urbane with firmness and unfailingly just, and no doubt will be chosen without dissenting voice if he shall be willing to undertake this arduous duty for a fifth time.

For near twenty years the General Convention has been chiefly occupied with large matters, of widespread interest through the Church, requiring singular labor, and absorbing most of the time at its disposal. Efforts after greater flexibility in the use of the Prayer-Book resulted finally in the tedious work of Prayer-Book revision, which, begun formally in 1880, was not finally completed till 1892. The result of the long-continued work was to leave that great treasury of devotion very little changed—certainly not impaired, but slightly enriched, and with some allowance of alternative uses. An effect not designed nor foreseen, resulting partly from the long period during which the Prayer-Book was in a state of flux, and partly from the new liberty allowed in use of the book as finally settled, has been to break down the old notions of rubrical rigidity, which, whether their absence be deplored or not, seem to have vanished never to return. Concurrently with Prayer-Book revision (during most of the time) the convention was engaged in the task—not difficult merely, but perhaps impossible, and certainly impossible by the method adopted—of producing an ideal hymn-book, to be imposed for exclusive use in the Church. The hymn-book was completed also in 1892. In that year the convention began another great task in the complete revision of its constitution and canons. Not only had long-continued patchwork brought these into disorder, but they were considered inadequate for the needs and duty of the Church.

The ungrateful and most difficult preliminary work of this revision was intrusted by the convention to a commission of seven bishops, seven clergymen, and seven laymen, appointed by the House of Bishops and the House of Clerical and Lay Deputies respectively. The strength of this commission may be inferred from the list of its episcopal members as originally appointed, who were Bishops Williams, Coxe, Doane, Dudley, Burgess, Potter, and Paret. The members of the commission were scattered from Minnesota to Georgia, their meetings involving necessarily great consumption of valuable time. Their report was, however, made ready in season for printed copies thereof to be distributed among members of the convention of 1895 some months before the meeting of that body, and was the chief topic of debate during its sessions. Nevertheless, only partial progress was made. To alter the constitution it is required that a General Convention should adopt the proposed change, which then is notified to all the diocesan conventions, after which, to become effective, it must be again adopted by the supreme legislature without the slightest alteration. A portion of the report of the commission (more or less amended after debate) was adopted by the convention of 1895, and now awaits the chance of ratification at the present session, but a considerable part of the report is less advanced, having failed of passage three years ago, and being recommitted. The report on this matter has been in the hands of deputies for several months. The Very Rev. Dr. E. A. Hoffman, of New York, was the chief official spokesman of the commission in the House of Clerical and Lay Deputies of 1895, and will doubtless appear in a like position this year.

It is apparent that this business must be the main occupation of the present convention. With the chance of non-ratification of the work done in 1895, and the certainty of much new matter now first to be dealt with, evidently the whole time of the convention would scarce suffice to complete the labor. Debate will probably run high over the proposed new canon on marriage and divorce, which it is proposed to make very stringent. The variety of views entertained concerning what really is the Scriptural teaching on this matter opens the door to wide diversity of utterance.

THOMAS F. BAYARD.

SEPTEMBER 28, 1898.

PURE-MINDED and of lofty soul,
Heart belike a woman's in its tenderness,
Aspirations ever toward the highest goal,
Principles unflinchingly "oblige noblesse."

Unselfish always, with the goodly pride
Of conscious strength of purpose; and of cant the foe.
The friend and counsellor and upright guide
Of all well-meaning men, or high, or low.

The friend of good, of wrong the enemy:
The nation mourns a true American.
A Bayard truly in his lofty chivalry—
A statesman and a gentleman!

J. K. B.

ADVICE TO MOTHERS.—MRS. WINSLOW'S SOOTHING SYRUP should always be used for children teething. It soothes the child, softens the gums, allays all pain, cures wind colic, and is the best remedy for diarrhœa. —[Adv.]

ALWAYS WATCHFUL.

THE milk used for the Gail Borden Eagle Brand Condensed Milk is from the best dairies, under contracts with farmers, guaranteeing purity and richness in health-giving constituents.—[Adv.]

SUPERIOR to Vaseline and Cucumbers, Crème Simon, marvellous for the complexion and light cutaneous affections: it whitens, perfumes, fortifies the skin. J. SIMON, 13 Rue Grange Batelière, Paris; Druggists, Perfumers, Fancy-goods stores.—[Adv.]

NEW lease of life—inheritance of subjects who use ABBOTT'S—The Original Angostura Bitters, as tonic. Not hard to take, not hard to get. All druggists.—[Adv.]

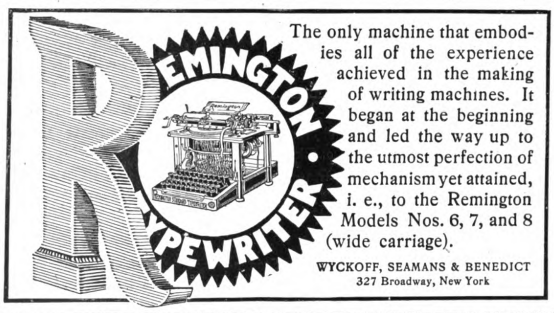
FOR looseness of bowels DR. SIEGERT'S ANGOSTURA BITTERS is a positive specific.—[Adv.]

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Pears'

To keep the skin clean is to wash the excretions from it off; the skin takes care of itself inside, if not blocked outside.

To wash it often and clean, without doing any sort of violence to it, requires a most gentle soap, a soap with no free alkali in it.



Pears', the soap that clears but not excoriates.

All sorts of stores sell it, especially druggists; all sorts of people use it.

WALLINGFORD, CONNECTICUT.
ROSEMARY HALL, a Country School for Girls.
MISS RUNTZ-REES, Principal.
Ninth year begins Oct. 1, 1898.

THE CELEBRATED
SOHMER
Heads the List of the Highest-Grade Pianos.
Caution.—The buying public will please not confound the genuine SOHMER Piano with one of a similar-sounding name of a cheap grade.
Our name spells—
S—O—H—M—E—R
New York Warerooms
SOHMER BUILDING
Fifth Ave., cor 22d St.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE

AMERICA, BELOVED LAND.

BY ABBOTT FREDERIC.

AMERICA, beloved land,
In reverence here thy children stand;
From West, from South, from East, from North,
Thy heroes show thy power forth.
Thy raging war-bolts rend and crash;
Thy foes to swift destruction dash:
Yet grant, O God, that wars may cease,
And keep us in Thy holy peace!

Our country, sacred, glorious, blest,
Defender of the poor, oppressed,
Forever may thy people be United, equal, brave, and free,—
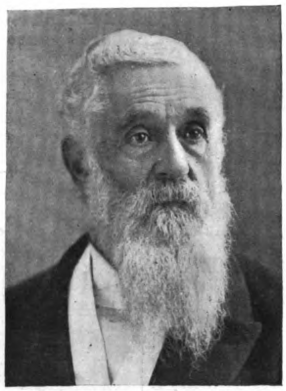
Their radiant banner never furled,
Their mission to uplift the world.
Almighty God, stretch out Thy hand,
In blessing, o'er our native land!

Her sons pledge riches, life, and fame
To keep unstained her spotless name;
Their blood has dropped like crimson rain;
Their great deeds live and shout again:
But let us not in power and pride
Forsake our fathers' Light and Guide.
Eternal God, ne'er turn Thy face
From deathless Freedom's chosen race!



[This poem was written by Mr. Frederic after listening to a performance of the "Star-Spangled Banner." The words of this familiar song seemed to him weak and inadequate, and he therefore set himself to the task of composing something worthy of the nation. It is hoped that some musician will set the words to music.—EDITOR WEEKLY.]

LORENZO SNOW.

LORENZO SNOW, the new president, prophet, seer, and revelator of the Mormon Church, is one of the most remarkable characters developed by his peculiar sect. He combines to a marked degree the spiritual devotion which has gained Mormonism its converts, and the business ability which has enabled the Church to make them prosperous. The two prominent achievements of Mr. Snow's life illustrate this statement. He travelled 150,000 miles as missionary, from 1836 to 1872, gathering converts from Turkey to Hawaii, and all the time paying his own expenses, in accordance with the rule of the Church, and also during this time guided a large body of the Mormons in the work of transforming the northwestern section of Utah from a bleak waste into a prosperous farming country.

President Snow is now eighty-four years old, having been born April 3, 1814, in Mantua, Ohio. He came from old New England stock, however, like most of the other men of strong character whom Joseph Smith gathered about him. He was converted to Mormonism by an itinerant missionary, whom he met while on his way to Oberlin College. After his graduation he joined Joseph Smith at Kirtland, Ohio, and became the tutor of the "prophet's" children. He was then steadily advanced in the Church, until he became a member of the twelve apostles because of his work in the missionary field.

During the anti-polygamy movement in Utah he demonstrated courage greater than that of most of his associates in the Church; for while they concealed themselves from the United States officials, he boldly faced the law, and served a term in the penitentiary. He married five times, and gathered a large family about him.

LORENZO SNOW,
New President of the Church of the Latter-day Saints (Mormon).

In late years, as the president of the apostles, he has been in charge of the highly important temple-work. Latter-day Saints believe that the souls of those who failed to be baptized on earth can be saved by substitute baptism in Mormon temples. Under President Snow's direction the people have been aroused to enthusiasm over this work, and now thousands of baptisms are performed in the temples every year for those who have been dead scores of years, and even centuries.

AMERICAN SHIPS FOR RUSSIA.

LARGELY as the result of the recent performances of our naval vessels, no doubt, the Russian government has placed an order for the construction of a battle-ship and a cruiser with the Cramps of Philadelphia, although this firm has already furnished Russia with four fighting-ships.

The contract for the construction of these vessels was executed on the 23d of April last, in St. Petersburg, by Charles H. Cramp, president, on behalf of the Cramp Shipbuilding Company, and by Vice-Admiral V. Verhovskoy, I.R.N., whose position in the Russian admiralty is analogous to that of chief constructor in our navy, on behalf of the Russian government. Both ships are to be completed about October, 1900, and all the material used in their construction will be of American manufacture.

The battle-ship, not yet named, is numbered 300—that is, she is the 300th ship built by the Cramps. She is to have a length of 368 feet, 72 feet 2½ inches beam, 25 feet draught, with a displacement of 12,700 tons. She will be provided with triple-expansion engines, with water-tube boilers of the Niclausse type to develop 16,000 indicated horse-power, and a speed of 18 knots for 12 hours.

The main battery will consist of four 12-inch breech-loading rifles, mounted in pairs in two turrets on the middle line, one forward and one aft, and twelve 6-inch quick-firing guns. The secondary battery will consist of twenty 3-inch, twenty 47-millimetre, six 37-millimetre, and two 2½-inch guns—all of the rapid-fire type, and she will be fitted with six torpedo-tubes.

This new Russian battle-ship will be of a distinctive type, and will represent the latest development of the art of naval architecture as applied to armored sea-going vessels. The marked distinction hitherto prevailing between what is known as a battle-ship, pure and simple, and an armored cruiser, has been here to a considerable extent modified so that the new battle-ship combines in her design some of the qualities of both, being a first-class battle-ship in battery power and armored protection, and yet having the speed, coal capacity, and sea-keeping endurance of an armored cruiser.

The cruiser under construction for Russia will be 400 feet long, 52 feet beam, 19 feet 6 inches draught, and of 6300 tons displacement—that is, about half the size of the battle-ship—and will have a guaranteed speed of 23 knots for twelve hours. She likewise is to be provided with water-tube boilers of the Niclausse type, calculated to develop 20,000 indicated horse power. Her main battery will consist of twelve 6-inch breech-loading rifles, and her secondary battery of twelve 3-inch and six 47-millimetre guns, all of the rapid-fire type. She will also be provided with six torpedo-tubes.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

New Books

Crooked Trails. Written and Illustrated by FREDERIC REMINGTON, Author of "Pony Tracks," etc. 8vo, Cloth, Ornamental, $2 00.

There are one or two departures in the present volume from Mr. Remington's accustomed haunts—departures which lead him into the storied past; but in them he remains as virile and as convincing as we have been accustomed to find him in more familiar scenes.

The Instinct of Step-Fatherhood. Stories. By LILIAN BELL, Author of "The Love Affairs of an Old Maid," "A Little Sister to the Wilderness," etc. 16mo, Cloth, Ornamental, Uncut Edges and Gilt Top, $1 25.

The various stories gathered together in this new volume have appeared from time to time in various periodicals. Several of them are veritable masterstrokes of ingenious construction, and all are well up to the standard which Miss Bell has set for her work, and to which she consistently adheres.

Wild Eelin; Her Escapades, Adventures, and Bitter Sorrows. A Novel. By WILLIAM BLACK, Author of "A Princess of Thule," "The Strange Adventures of a Phaeton," etc. Illustrated by T. DE THULSTRUP. Post 8vo, Cloth, Ornamental, $1 75.

"Wild Eelin" is a picturesque story of Scottish life, written in the author's best manner, the manner of "A Daughter of Heth" and "Madcap Violet." . . . The charm of the story is in the heroine, a sweet, capricious, unreasonable, dear, wholly inconsistent and altogether fetching girl, who has two lovers and keeps both at her feet, and leaves both broken-hearted when she dies.

Fables for the Frivolous. (With Apologies to La Fontaine.) By GUY WETMORE CARRYL. With Illustrations by PETER NEWELL. 8vo, Cloth, Ornamental, Deckel Edges and Gilt Top, $1 50.

The apologue is perhaps the oldest existing form of literary entertainment, and in his "Fables for the Frivolous" Mr. Carryl has confessedly followed in the immortal footprints of Æsop and La Fontaine. He has even dared to put new wine into the old bottles, an experiment which is generally accounted to be hazardous in the extreme, and only to be justified by its success. But Mr. Carryl has succeeded, and his new liquor makes very agreeable tipple.

Books on Sport

The Golfer's Alphabet. Illustrations by A. B. FROST. Rhymes by W. G. VAN TASSEL SUTPHEN. 4to, Illuminated Boards, $1 50.

Mr. Frost has worked con amore in picturing harmless foibles of his fellow-enthusiasts.

The Golfiade, and Other Tales of the Fair Green. By W. G. VAN TASSEL SUTPHEN. Illustrated. 16mo, Half Cloth, Colored Top, $1 00.

Lovers of King James's famous game will welcome this bright and inimitably humorous collection of golf stories.—Zion's Herald, Boston.

American Football. By WALTER CAMP. With Thirty-two Portraits. 16mo, Cloth, $1 25.

A volume which will appeal directly to the players of America's robust game.—N. Y. Tribune.

Football Facts and Figures. By WALTER CAMP. Post 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

This is altogether a unique and remarkable book.—N. Y. Times

A Primer of College Football. By W. H. LEWIS. Illustrated from Instantaneous Photographs and with Diagrams. 16mo, Paper, 75 cents.

We heartily recommend it as the best practical guide to football we have yet discovered.—Harvard Crimson.

On Snow-Shoes to the Barren Grounds. By CASPAR WHITNEY. Twenty-eight Hundred Miles after Musk-Oxen and Wood-Bison. Illustrated. 8vo, Cloth, $3 50.

This book is the result of a six month's trip through the Northwest Territory into the Arctic Circle, and back.

Riders of Many Lands. By General THEODORE A. DODGE. Illustrated with Drawings by FREDERIC REMINGTON, and from Photographs of Oriental Subjects. 8vo, Cloth, $4 00.

In this book we have the enthusiasm of an author who loves his "mounts."

Horsemanship for Women. By THEODORE H. MEAD. Illustrated by GRAY PARKER. Post 8vo, Cloth, $1 25.

It well deserves to become a household manual.—Congregationalist, Boston.

How Women Should Ride. By "C. DE HURST." Illustrated. 16mo, Cloth, $1 25.

To every woman who has to do with horses, either in riding or driving, this volume will prove to be of great practical value.

A Sporting Pilgrimage. By CASPAR WHITNEY. Studies in English Sport. Copiously Illustrated. 8vo, Cloth, $3 50.

A handsome and interesting book, and it will undoubtedly give to American readers some new ideas about sports in England.—N. Y. Times.

Track Athletics in Detail. Illustrated from Instantaneous Photographs. 8vo, Cloth, $1 25.

NEW YORK HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers LONDON

Digitized by Google
PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

MARK.

29, 1898.

refer to her as , for she repre-
nly distinction loved sincere
th hospitality,
n as the Danes
urse there was r her uncom-
cess imposed;
ition she was
o be a helpful verest man in dren advanta-other, to make eir wives and lly to the old long, like her the ablest and f Europe; and womanly fash-children marin this respect
d their annual reciated by no of Russia, Al-

Hesse-Cassel,
-five years to of Schleswig-treaty of Lon-of succession, succeed King later (Novem-
n and the heir-
1843, married
V. of Sweden
cember 1, 1844,
nce of Wales;
845, and, when reek National itle of George antina of Rus-nber 26, 1847,
rincess Thyra,
December 21,
nberland; and married the of the Duc de veral months,

prised of the Copenhagen,
leath.

HON. THOMAS FRANCIS BAYARD.

ARD.

28, 1898.

September 28,
noment to re-
ics, and upon the party of
of the chief cellent ability,
bsolute integ-

Cleveland, Clifton Breckenridge, Charles S. Fairchild, Wade Hampton, of whose services the country is deprived in order that vulgar men may serve themselves in places once filled by patriots and statesmen. Senator Caffery is on his way to them; and if Allan G. Thurman, Lucius Q. C. Lamar, and Benjamin F. Hill were alive, they too would doubtless be numbered among the giants whose political life had been struck at by the modern pygmies.

These and others like them were the kind of men with whom Mr. Bayard formed political comradeship when, on March 4, 1869, not quite forty-one, he entered the United States Senate. Not only would the statement that the Senator's ideal was patriotic and unselfish service to his country, and that his honor was as white as that of the judge, have been thought not extravagant by statesmen of Mr. Bayard's type, its utterance would have been regarded as an impertinence. Public men and law-givers had been suspected of selling themselves, it is true, but a self-confessed corruptionist would have no more been admitted to the Senate thirty years ago than would a professional pickpocket now be accepted as an ornament of general society. Patriotism and honor were so much the rule with men of Mr. Bayard's type that, in their time, every politician was either honest or a hypocrite. Ability and learning were also recognized, thirty years ago, as useful and sometimes essential to statesmanship. It will be seen, therefore, that the time when Mr. Bayard led the Democratic party in the Senate, and when his friends sought to nominate him for the Presidency, was different from the time when Murphy sits in the Senate where Tillman leads, when Croker dominates a Democratic State convention in New York, and when Bryan and Hill are Presidential possibilities.

Mr. Bayard was bred a statesman. His studies and his thoughts were of the affairs of government, and his aspirations, as well as his toil, were for the country which he loved devotedly, and which he served with a zealous loyalty and with great intelligence for nearly thirty years. His concern for the welfare of the republic endured as long as he was able to give utterance to conscious sentiment, and I think that, in proof of this, I may be pardoned in quoting from a private letter recently received from one of his daughters, in which she says, "As long as he was able to hold up his head, his heart and mind were full of interest for the good government of this country, and of the great satisfaction he felt in the attitude of Great Britain during our struggle with Spain."

Mr. Bayard's training gave him at once a place of prominence in the Senate. He was an admirable debater, in the larger sense, and while his constitutional arguments against reconstruction legislation did not stay the purpose of the Republicans, they did much to enlighten the country. He never chang[illegible] his attitude on the subject of the relations of the States to the Fed-

Empress Dowager of Russia. Princess of Wales. Duchess of Cumberland.

THE QUEEN OF DENMARK AND HER DAUGHTERS.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

eral government. If the war seemed to sweep away the legal doctrine of State rights, Mr. Bayard still contended that it was for the interest of the people and the States that localities should govern themselves, and that the general government should keep its hands off the individual citizen. More than any Democrat, Mr. Bayard brought to an end the oppression of the South, and he never compromised.

No one in public life was sounder than Mr. Bayard on economic questions. He was one of the chief and ablest opponents of the protective-tariff policy, and when the greenback and silver movements began their agitating work in the Democratic party, Mr. Bayard presented the strongest and most determined obstacle to their advance. Before 1874 he had led his party, and was among the leaders of the Senate in the struggle against the Republican inflationists, and when, in consequence of this and other sins, the Republicans were defeated, Mr. Bayard was made chairman of the Finance Committee and president pro tem. of the Senate. He was also the choice of many of the best men of his party for the nomination for President in 1876, 1880, and 1884. But notwithstanding all his patriotic services, all his labors for his party and its principles, and all his deserved honors, the silver men of his party undertook to degrade him from his chairmanship of the Finance Committee, and at last shut the door of political preferment in his face.

Although Mr. Bayard was defeated every time he was a candidate in a national convention, he never betrayed the slightest disappointment, and Mr. Cleveland had no more faithful friend and ally than Mr. Bayard when the latter was Secretary of State. Mr. Bayard's term as Secretary was comparatively uneventful, but he brought Lord Salisbury to agree to an arrangement touching the Bering Sea troubles between this country and Great Britain which, if Canada had not objected, would have made unnecessary the Paris tribunal, and the subsequent negotiations and bickerings. Mr. Bayard's last important service to the country was rendered while he was Ambassador to England, from 1893 to 1897. More than any other man, except Mr. Phelps, who has represented this country in London, Mr. Bayard was keenly alive to the community in origin and principle of the institutions of the two countries, and he did more than all other American ministers to promote good feeling between the people of the United States and of England.

Though driven by ignorance and malice into private life, he dies an honored statesman and a public servant, to whom this country owes a deep debt of gratitude.

H. L. N.

RING POLITICS IN CONNECTICUT.

Some months ago, when the chairman of the Republican State Central Committee of Connecticut was in Washington, he was asked who was to be the next Governor of his State. The inquirer, who was familiar with political conditions in Connecticut, assumed two things—first, that the next Governor would be a Republican; and second, that the chairman and his particular group of political allies would pick him out and secure the delegates necessary to nominate him, the voters, thus relieved of any responsibility or say in the choice, obligingly doing the rest. To the inquiry the chairman replied that he could not, at that early day, tell who would be the nominee, "but," he added, "I can tell you who will not be, and that is John Addison Porter."

Porter was, however, the logical candidate. For many years it was the custom in Connecticut for candidates standing second in strength in a Republican convention to receive the general support of the party two years later. In accordance with this custom, the nomination would have naturally fallen to Secretary Porter this year. But since the domination of the ring has become so complete and desperate, no custom, no tradition, and, in fact, no scruple, has been allowed to stand in the way of its purposes; and the ring and Porter are naturally incompatible.

For the benefit of those unfamiliar with political conditions in Connecticut, it should be said that there are 168 towns in the State, 12 of them having a majority of the population and of the voters. These 12 send 24 representatives to the Legislature and 48 delegates to a Republican convention. The other towns, 156 in number, but having a minority of the population, send 228 representatives to the Legislature and 456 delegates to a convention. About one-half of the people, therefore, have a representation of 10 per cent.; the other half, of 90 per cent. Litchfield and Tolland counties, with a combined population of less than that of the city of New Haven, send 63 men to represent them in the Legislature; New Haven sends two. These two counties send 126 delegates to a Republican convention; New Haven, four. There is a pseudo-popular representation in the Senate, which is a body of only 24 members, but even this extra allowance is denied the large cities in a Republican convention. The very simple rule is that each town is entitled to as many delegates as it has representatives in the Lower House, and a town with a population of less than 500, constantly growing less, and now about one-half what it was in 1850, can send four delegates to a convention to offset the delegates of a city having a population 200 times as large and rapidly increasing!

As may be supposed, such a system provides just the soil for the genesis and development of that cabal of party dictators who now dominate Republican politics in the commonwealth and largely control the affairs of the State government. In a State having a pretence of popular representation such a unique development of bossism would be absolutely impossible. It is doubtful if anything like it can be found anywhere. It is not a party machine, as in New York; its influence does not centre in a single man of national reputation like Quay. If the man who holds the chairmanship of the Republican State Committee is the leading spirit in the cabal, it is not by virtue of his chairmanship. The ring would be almost, if not quite, as efficient if a majority of the Republican Committee opposed it, for the committee, as a committee, exercises no control over nominations, and confines itself merely to a few perfunctory acts provided for in the rules and having little effect one way or the other.

The brains, or perhaps it would be more accurate to say the dominating political subtlety, of the ring is found in a group of less than half a dozen notorious lobbyists—that is, men who during legislative sessions make lobbying a business. It is difficult to furnish in a few words an adequate idea of the peculiar ramifications in the methods which enable these men to wield such enormous power, largely for their own profit. One secret of their success is that they are always organized for business, while other people are attending to their ordinary vocations. When the time for primary political action comes, this private, not party organization, has everything prepared for diverting things to itself. In nearly every small town there is usually to be found a dominating element, and generally one man among a couple of hundred voters has the reputation of being a superior "hustler." He is apt to be the chairman of the town committee. He is not exactly a local boss; he is simply tolerated by an apathetic majority. He calls a caucus by posting a notice on a sign-post somewhere in a town five or six miles square, over which are scattered the voters, who are at the time thinking less of politics than of haying. A dozen may come to the caucus, possibly more, often less. There are 77 towns in the State each having less than 200 Republican voters, even in these Republican times, and they send 200 delegates to a convention.

The ring knows every one of these successful politicians, and its strength largely consists in the fact that it has enlisted them in its service. This is done in many ways. There are many lucrative positions about the Capitol during legislative sessions; there are many local politicians who have ambitions; and the whole thing is skilfully organized on the principle, "You work for me and I'll work for you," or, "If you want anything, now or hereafter, play in with us." Gradually has grown up the idea that it is useless for any man to seek political honors unless the wishes of the ring are observed, and so very respectable members of society tolerate it for their own sakes, and some of them even come to regard it as undefiled Republicanism, though it is possible to obtain a majority of the delegates to any State convention from the primary action of less than three per cent. of the Republican votes of the State. The ring secures immunity and even the appearance of respectability, for the reason that it is allowed to wear the livery of Republicanism.

Gradually, also, has grown up the idea that no town or company or man can secure legislative action till the ring has been satisfied; in other words, bought. For it follows, in such a system so managed, that when the Legislature meets it is found to be made up of men who have been brought in through the methods of the ring, and yet so subtle is the process that few of the legislators fully realize it. They may be perfectly honest, and yet seek and take the advice of persons who have done them a political favor, or who have the reputation for superior political astuteness and influence. So far as this goes it may be commendable enough, but it is the advantage taken of the fact that causes the trouble.

The average legislator, however substantial as a citizen, was probably never in the Legislature before, and he is entirely unfamiliar with its processes. The lobby knows them from beginning to end. An innocent enough measure is introduced; it gets into the mill, and somehow does not get out. The interested parties, in trying to look it up, find that their representative in the House knows very little about it. He is referred to a lawyer who is a lobbyist, one of the ring. He knows how things can be steered. That is his business. It costs money, particularly if it is a railroad measure which some company greatly desires, and may not be as innocent as it looks; but the money does not go to the legislator, except in rare cases. The lobby's margin of profits is therefore very large, and is possible solely because of its political influence.

It naturally makes considerable difference to a combination of this kind who is Governor, not so much because of any influence he possesses over legislation, as because of the places at his disposal or at the disposal of those whom he may appoint. Even the unpaid commissioners of State institutions are of importance, for they control the purchasing officers for the institutions. If a merchant wishes to sell supplies to one of them, he will wish in vain till he becomes inspired with the idea of going to one of the ring. The door of the institution opens and he secures a good order for goods, also a complement of advices as to whom he shall use his political influence for. All these numerous avenues of influence naturally lead to the executive office with its appointive power, and the success of the ring depends upon its ability to successfully "advise" or "suggest" whom to appoint. Thus the Governor does the best thing for the ring; he is doing what enables the ring to prey upon legislation for its own emolument. The ring naturally finds the most desirable material for Governors in men who have already proved tractable under its influence, and who have passed that time of life when they would naturally show a disposition to inquire too deeply into political affairs, or to act largely according to their own ideas and on their own responsibility.

If John Addison Porter had in the beginning cast in his lot with the ring, had meekly placed his ambition to be Governor in its hands, had shown no disposition to criticise its methods, had, in fact, unconditionally surrendered his personality, he might have been Governor, but he believes that the rank and file of the party should control, and that the State administration should not be made a cruising-place for privateers in politics. He has always been ready to submit his case to the party, but not to the ring.

It was doubtless unavoidable that two such incompatible elements within the party should eventually come into sharp conflict, and for four years events have naturally led up to it. In 1894, after a brilliant service in the so-called deadlock Legislature, Porter first entered the race for Gubernatorial honors, but without creating anxiety among the old leaders till the time for the convention came. He was backed pretty solidly by his home county, Windham, and by such of the young and aggressive elements as succeeded in asserting themselves at the primaries in other sections of the State. The lobby element was at that time divided as to candidates, feeling reasonably sure of its position as a lobby in any case, and the result was that, much to its surprise, Porter had votes enough to throw to another candidate the nomination which he could not win himself. The ring at once perceived that Porter was not as innocuous as it had supposed. He had become an element of danger to ring control, and from that time it organized itself into a compact and united machine to keep Porter down, and thus to save its prestige and business in the lobby.

When the Legislature met in 1895, the ring immediately went to work to secure the party support for Lieutenant-Governor Cooke, an estimable but conveniently plastic old gentleman from Litchfield County. It should be understood that one of the customs in vogue in the State is for the towns to send as a part of their delegation to each Republican convention their representatives in the previous Legislature. In the Legislature of 1895, therefore, the ring, operating as a lobby, or, to use a softer phrase, as professional advisers for those less accustomed to legislative processes, had about fifty per cent. of the Republican convention of 1896 under its eyes and influence for five months, and Cooke was himself there as presiding officer of the Senate. This custom of sending the Legislature to the next State convention is an important element in the ring's activity and success, and, combined with the other elements already mentioned, the ring's circle of influence is as near complete as anything could be.

Meantime, or in the spring of 1896, the convention for the selection of delegates to the Republican National Convention was held, and the efforts to combine New England solidly against McKinley will be remembered. Porter, both personally and as the editor of the Hartford Post, had been using his influence for McKinley. The McKinley Club was formed at Hartford, with Porter as its president, and in the spring of 1895, at the annual dinner of the club, McKinley was its guest. It was a notable gathering. A few months later McKinley's friends organized that highly successful canvass for his nomination, and Porter was the accredited and recognized McKinley representative in Connecticut. But at the convention for the selection of delegates to the St. Louis convention, the old leaders, in sympathy with Platt of New York, who was doing his best to defeat the Ohio candidate, managed to divide the delegation, though the popular choice was for McKinley beyond question.

On the heels of this convention came Porter's contest for the nomination for Governor, against the ring, whose united efforts were being used for Cooke. Two of the three unsuccessful candidates in the convention of two years before declined to run again, their friends believing that it would be useless to make the effort against the ring, and this left Porter to fight it alone. Its operations became more open in character, and its methods more desperate and unscrupulous. It devoted itself at first, and very early, to breaking Porter's strength in his own county, and to do this it went into his own town and picked out a candidate for State Treasurer. Snap caucuses were held everywhere, and the cry that the sentiment was for Cooke, and that Porter had not even carried his own town, doubtless operated against him among those politicians who placed apparent expediency before principle. The country towns, by the processes already indicated, were brought into line by the ring; promises were made in the most reckless fashion, from the highest appointive offices down to the most subordinate places in the Capitol. Yet Porter delegates were elected in all the large cities, and although in a convention of 504 he had but 181 men, they represented nearly 75 per cent. of the Republican voters of the State. Cooke was nominated, was swept in on the Republican tide of a Presidential year, and has been faithful to the ring. A suggestion from one of the triumvirate has been sufficient to govern his actions, and when they have not suggested he has not acted, as has been apparent from the blundering fashion with which the State troops have been handled. The possible glory which Connecticut boys might win in the war being a subject not immediately appealing to the mercenary instincts of the ring-leaders, they neglected to advise till it was too late.

President McKinley's choice of Porter as his secretary, and the elevation of the office to one of so much importance, was a rather bitter pill for the ring, whose leaders predicted that he would speedily bring the administration to grief, whereas he has made an exceedingly efficient and popular official. The ring would have been glad to run Governor Cooke again, but that was made impossible by his failure as a war Governor, and it turned its influence towards Senator Lounsbury, a brother of the Governor of several years ago, who is chiefly remembered as having done nothing worth remembering. Naturally and inevitably, the anti-ring elements in the party sought the leadership of Porter, and they asked him to again make the fight. His friends seemed confident of success. They said the people were disgusted with ring rule, which was very true, but they underestimated the strength of the ring's intrenchments. The people do not choose the candidate for Governor. While the war had been going on in Cuba the henchmen of the ring had organized the campaign for themselves all over the State, and when Porter secured leave of absence a little over a month ago to come to the State, the ring had already begun to snap caucuses and secure delegates in a more high-handed manner than ever.

The majority of the delegates had already been chosen by the ring process, and, even if uninstructed, were within the circle of the ring's influence. Porter had really lost the fight before he left Washington, and while his fight was a brave one, it was hopeless because begun too late. It was just what was needed to stir up the minds of the people. It tore the garb of undefiled Republicanism from the masquerading lobby, and, whatever happens to Porter's political career, it is likely to prove the beginning of the end of the ring. Even in the convention itself there was an undercurrent of feeling for asserting some independence of the ring, whose slate for the remainder of the ticket was broken, and some of the promises it had made rendered valueless. It is generally admitted that the ring cannot carry out such a programme again.

It will not be long before another test comes, if present indications are accurate. Senator Hawley's term as United States Senator expires shortly, and the Legislature to be elected this fall will choose his successor. He is not ready to retire, and his friends insist that he shall not. At no time in his long service in the Senate has he been of greater importance to the country than as the head of the committee on military affairs during the recent war. He is a man of principle, of great abilities, and of long experience. But Samuel Fessenden wants to be United States Senator, and the ring-leaders are for Fessenden. But for the shaking up they have had they might be able to carry their programme through and defeat Hawley in spite of his personality and prestige. Few believe now that this can be done, but it will be a sharp struggle, and one that the country will watch with interest.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THE OCTOBER NUMBER

OF THE

North American Review

CONTAINS:

THE UNITED STATES AND THE FAR EAST

I. What Shall Be Done About the Philippines?
By MAYO W. HAZELTINE

II. Our Policy in China
By the Hon. MARK B. DUNNELL,
Formerly Deputy Consul-General of the U. S. at Shanghai.

The Movement for Municipal Reform, CLINTON R. WOODRUFF, Secretary of the National Municipal League
The Origin of Morality, . . . . . Professor GOLDWIN SMITH
Our National Folly and Its Victims, Major-Gen. J. C. BRECKINRIDGE, U. S. A.

THE U. S. NAVY UNDER THE NEW CONDITIONS
By Admiral P. H. COLOMB, R. N.

Manual Training and the Poor, . . . . . ELLIOTT FLOWER
The Minimum Capital of a National Bank, . . . . THORNTON COOKE
Legislative Elections in France, . . . . . WALTER B. SCAIFE
Difficulties in Assimilating Hawaii, Rear-Admiral L. A. BEARDSLEE, U. S. N.

BISMARCK AND MOTLEY—II.
With Correspondence till now unpublished
By J. P. GRUND

Organized Self-Help and State Aid in Ireland, The Rt. Hon. HORACE PLUNKETT, M. P.
Cable Cutting in War, . . . . . G. E. WALSH
Danger of Political Apathy, . . . . . SPEED MOSBY
Fancy Work or Nature Studies, . . . . . KATE GANNETT WELLS
How Can Homicide be Decreased? . . . . The Rev. W. REDE, D.D.
Boys' Clubs, . . . . . WINIFRED BUCK

50 Cents a Copy; $5.00 a Year. Sold by all Newsdealers.

THE NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW, 291 Fifth Ave., N. Y.

10 YEARS OLD.

HUNTER BALTIMORE RYE

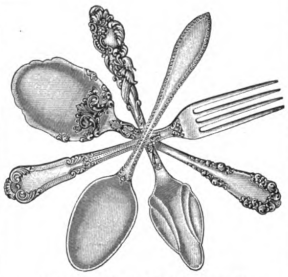
The Best Whiskey in America.

Sold at all First-class Cafes and by Jobbers.
WM. LANAHAN & SON, Baltimore, Md.



"Whose smoke like incense doth perfume."
—TITUS ANDRON.

If you smoke it in your pipe "It's Good"

Yale Mixture

A Gentleman's Smoke

"Silver Plate that Wears."

The "trade mark 1847 Rogers Bros."

on spoons, forks, etc., is a guarantee of quality the world over.

The prefix—1847—insures the genuine Rogers quality.

MERIDEN BRITANNIA COMPANY,
Meriden, Conn.; 208 5th Ave., New York City.
147 State St., Chicago.
For sale by all leading dealers everywhere.

Elastic-Ribbed UNION SUITS

are complete undergarments, covering the entire body like an additional skin. Perfectly elastic, fitting like a glove, but softly and without pressure. No buttons down the front. Made for Men, Women, and Young People. Most convenient to put on or off, being entered at the top and drawn on like trousers. With no other kind of underwear can ladies obtain such perfect fit for dresses or wear comfortably so small a corset.

Office:
ONEITA KNITTING MILLS, No. 1 Greene St., N. Y.
Send for Illustrated Booklet. Address Dept. 7.

Arnold Constable & Co.

Fall and Winter Underwear.

Cartwright & Warner's

Celebrated Underwear,

in Wool, Merino, Camel's Hair, Silk and Wool, and All Wool, for Men, Women, and Children, in all Weights and Sizes.

Cardigan and Golf Jackets.

Golf Hose.

Broadway & 19th st.

NEW YORK.

W. & J. Sloane

RUGS.

ORIENTAL AND DOMESTIC.

Largest assortment in America. Send size required, predominating color of decorations, and we will make selections subject to your approval.

Broadway & 19th St.

7,000 Guns in Stock

WE SELL GUNS of every reputable American and foreign make, and give wholesale prices to everybody. We carry in stock

Fishing Tackle and Sporting Goods amounting to a quarter of a million dollars. We can please the fancy of millionaires, or meet the demands of the poorest sportsman and angler. Write for prices, or ask us to send you our Sporting Goods Catalogue. We load and sell over

1,000,000 Hand Loaded Shells a Year Ask us to send you our price card of hand and machine loaded shells. We have

The largest Gun Repair Shop in America We make guns, re-bore, re-stock, repair—in fact, alter a gun to suit the owner, and guarantee satisfaction. Write for prices.

MONTGOMERY WARD & CO.
Originators of the Catalogue Business 111 to 120 Michigan Ave. cor. Madison St., Chicago
MENTION THIS PUBLICATION WHEN WRITING

Financial

Letters of Credit. Bills of Exchange bought and sold. Cable Transfers to Europe and South Africa. Commercial and Travellers' Letters of Credit. Collections made.

Brown Brothers & Co.,
BANKERS, No. 59 WALL STREET.

See that Hole?

To insert a pointed instrument and eject the pen from the holder. Prevents the ink from flowing back into the holder and soiling the fingers.

WHAT IS IT FOR?

Samples on receipt of return postage. Ask for Vertical No. 37.

The perfection of pens, slightly stiff, smooth points, durable, and uniform.

SPENCERIAN PEN CO.
450 Broome St., New York, N. Y.

Esterbrook's Pens Triumphant.

IN SIGNING THE PEACE PROTOCOL

Secretary Day used our

No. 048 Falcon

And Ambassador Cambon our

No. 313 Probate

We manufacture 150 other styles, Ask your Stationer for them.

The Esterbrook Steel Pen Co.,
Works, Camden, N. J. 26 John St., New York.

Reduced Rates to Pittsburg via Pennsylvania Railroad, Account Knights Templar Triennial Conclave.

On account of the Knights Templar Triennial Conclave, to be held at Pittsburg, Pa., October 10 to 14, the Pennsylvania Railroad Company will sell excursion tickets from stations on its line to Pittsburg and return at rate of single fare for the round trip, with minimum of 25 cents.

Tickets will be sold October 8 to 13, good to return until October 17 inclusive. The return limit of tickets from Harrisburg and points east thereof can be extended to October 31 upon depositing same on October 13 to 17 with the Joint Agent at Pittsburg and the payment of fifty cents.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS

| | |
|---|---|
| MAGAZINE, - | $4 00 a Year |
| WEEKLY, - | $4 00 a Year |
| BAZAR, - - | $4 00 a Year |
| LITERATURE, | $4 00 a Year |
| ROUND TABLE, | $1 00 a Year |

THE HAIR 27th Ed., 25c. (or stamps). Why it Falls Off, Turns Grey, and the Remedy. By Prof. HARLEY PARKER. A. N. LONG & CO., 1013 Arch St., Phila., Pa. "Every one should read this little book."—Athenæum.

HARPER'S CATALOGUE

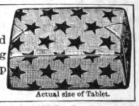
Descriptive list of their publications, with portraits of authors, will be sent by mail to any address on receipt of ten cents.

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE



Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Armour's Extract of Beef

"has that rich, beefy flavor."

For preparing soups, sauces, gravies, etc. "Culinary Wrinkles" gives many ways of using Extract. It's mailed free for the asking.

ARMOUR'S CONCENTRATED TABLETS of BEEF EXTRACT and VEGETABLES—condensed food—for home use or travelers—Sample Box containing sufficient for three meals, free, for a two cent stamp and your dealer's name.

Actual size of Tablet.

Address ARMOUR & COMPANY, CHICAGO.

BAUSCH & LOMB-ZEISS STEREO FIELD GLASSES

STEREO GLASS

By an arrangement of two double reflecting prisms of superior quality the ray of light is bent upon itself four times without the slightest loss of brilliancy, making it possible to place the object-lenses far enough apart to obtain perfect stereoscopic effect, and affording optical powers hitherto unobtainable.

The eye-pieces are the same as those used in the most powerful astronomical telescope, do not tire the eyes, and, where the eyes are not mates, can be adjusted separately. When once adjusted, they are set for objects at practically all distances.

For sale at all opticians'.

Booklet free. Address Dept. L.Q. Also Photographic and Microscopic Catalogue.

ORDINARY BINOCULAR

FIELD OF STEREO

MANUFACTURERS

BAUSCH & LOMB OPTICAL CO.,

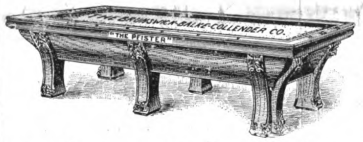
ROCHESTER, N. Y.

NEW YORK:
Townsend Building, Broadway and 25th St.

CHICAGO:
Stewart Building, State and Washington Sts.



FIELD OF BINOCULAR

The Brunswick-Balke-Collender Co.

The most extensive manufacturers of

BILLIARD AND POOL TABLES IN THE WORLD

Newest and most elegant styles, with unequalled Monarch cushions. Billiard materials, cloth, balls, cues, etc., of our own manufacture and importation. Also Refrigerators, tile or wood lined, for hotel and household purposes, made under the celebrated Wickes Patents.

860 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

Chicago, Cincinnati, St. Louis, San Francisco; Paris, France; Mexico City, Mexico.

Books by Richard Malcolm Johnston

OLD MARK LANGSTON. A Tale of Duke's Creek. 16mo, Cloth, $1 00.

American literature can fully care for itself when it contains such a novel as this.—Hartford Post.

MR. ABSALOM BILLINGSLEA, and Other Georgia Folk. Illustrated. 12mo, Cloth, $1 25.

These stories illustrate phases of rural life in middle Georgia previous to the War of the Rebellion.—N. Y. Sun.

OGEECHEE CROSS-FIRINGS. 8vo, Paper, 35 cents.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers, New York and London.

BRASS BAND

Instruments, Drums, Uniforms, Equipments for Bands and Drum Corps. Lowest prices ever quoted. Fine Catalog, 400 Illustrations, mailed free; it gives Band Music & Instructions for Amateur Bands.

LYON & HEALY 17 Adams St., Chicago.

TRADE E. & W. MARK

EARL & WILSON'S LINEN COLLARS & CUFFS BEST IN THE WORLD.

Nathan B. Goodnow & Co.,

BANKERS.

ESTABLISHED 1873.

2 Post Office Sq., Boston, Mass.

Transact a General Banking Business, including the Purchase and Sale of Stocks, Bonds, and Grain, for Investment or on Margin.

Dealers in Government and Railroad Bonds.

Books contain Long Year Range of Prices, Dividends, and Information free on request.

A Permanent Trust Guaranteed Fund of over TWO HUNDRED AND SEVENTY-FOUR THOUSAND DOLLARS [illegible] a Guaranteed Security for all persons having business with us.

Correspondence solicited.

Chicago—Via NEW YORK CENTRAL.

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

HARPER'S WEEKLY

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. XLII.—No. 2182.

Copyright, 1898, by HARPER & BROTHERS.
All Rights Reserved.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 15, 1898.

TEN CENTS A COPY.
FOUR DOLLARS A YEAR.

THE FALL OF MANILA.

THE DETACHMENT OF 1ST COLORADO VOLUNTEERS ADVANCING TO THE ATTACK ON FORT SAN ANTONIO ABAD, AUGUST 13, 1898.

DRAWN BY T. DE THULSTRUP AFTER A SKETCH BY JOHN T. MCCUTCHEON, SPECIAL ARTIST WITH GENERAL MERRITT'S FORCES.—[SEE PAGE 1007.]

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

HARPER'S WEEKLY

(TWENTY-FOUR PAGES)

NEW YORK CITY, OCTOBER 15, 1898

Terms: 10 Cents a Copy—$4 00 a Year, in Advance

Postage free to all Subscribers in the United States, Canada, and Mexico

Subscriptions may begin with any Number

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS

New York City: Franklin Square

London: 45 Albemarle Street, W.

Also for sale at Brentano's, 37 Avenue de l'Opéra, Paris

WE are beginning to play a part in Eastern affairs even before we have obtained any foothold there. The rumored outbreak in Peking furnished excuse for solicitude on the part of our government, and the administration was right in sending war-ships to Tien-tsin for the protection of the American minister and American citizens. It is to be regretted, however, that some of our friends in England look upon our anxiety to protect our own people as evidence that we are to participate in the plunder and division of the territory of a friendly power. We cannot do that without violating the essential and fundamental principles of our government, or without inflicting immense damage upon ourselves. We trust that the prophets of ill will be disappointed.

THE Tammany city government of New York is doing its utmost to create a scandal from which Mayor STRONG's government shall suffer. Mr. VAN WYCK has charged fraud in the letting of asphalt contracts by the city, and has sent the matter to District-Attorney GARDINER, with instructions to pursue the guilty parties until some of "our most honored citizens" shall be placed behind the iron bars of the penitentiary. It is apparent on the face of the Mayor's case that too much has been paid for paving the city streets with asphalt. Perhaps there is an answer to this, and perhaps it will be forth-coming. At any rate, not one particle of evidence exists as to fraud on the part of the city officials, and not a single reformer's name is yet involved in the Mayor's so-called exposure.

THERE is an element of both tragedy and comedy in the curious position occupied by Major MARCHAND at Fashoda. Recent accounts would seem to show that if the enterprising French officer reached the Nile a little too late to enable his government to make much political capital out of the fact that he got there at all, it was exceedingly lucky for him that he did not get there any earlier. A hundred and forty negroes and five Frenchmen make but a small army of occupation for a new empire of central Africa, but when they are confined to narrow intrenchments and in danger of being cut off from necessary supplies of food the matter grows too serious for a joke. The arrival of the Anglo-Egyptian expedition at Fashoda would seem to have saved the little party of French explorers, and it is to be hoped they will be content with their good luck. There is something ludicrous in the feverish anxiety with which France is stretching out to grasp new territories which can only be a burden to her people; but of all the instances of this national folly, none can be more foolish than that which strives for a precarious and isolated footing on the upper waters of the Nile. Experience shows that distant possessions, unless colonized by the intruding race, are never profitable possessions to any nation; but when they necessarily involve hostility to powerful neighbors, it is little short of insanity to seek them. France has promoted Captain MARCHAND to be major; she will now do wisely to order him home.

IS China profiting by the Russian alliance to the extent of drawing lessons from the history of her somewhat overshadowing neighbor? It may be so; indeed, it is not inconceivable that some friendly Russian diplomat may have suggested to the Empress mother of the Celestial Empire a study of the career and methods of another Empress mother, who flourished in Russia some two centuries ago. Recent events at Peking have a certain rich Russian flavor about them suggestive of some, at least, of the methods of the Empress CATHERINE, and their occurrence at a time when St. Petersburg and Peking are so closely in sympathy is curiously suggestive. How far the moon-faced dowager, who has supplanted her son at Peking is capable of the rôle of the great but unamiable Empress of Russia must be as yet a matter of doubt, but it would almost appear as if she were ambitious of making the attempt. The robe of Cæsar, however, fits not every one; and if the revolution at Peking has indeed been suggested by Russia, there are many reasons for supposing that the Dowager Empress will meet with many difficulties which were absent from the path of her imperial prototype who lorded it so proudly on the banks of the Neva. It may be, indeed, doubted whether China is exactly the place, and, still more, whether the close of this century is precisely the time, for a successful repetition of the great career of CATHERINE of Russia.

RIOTS—and Sunday riots as a matter of choice—are an old and favorite amusement in Paris, and the fact no doubt tends to lessen their significance; yet the widespread disorder of last Sunday affords one more sign of times that are threatening indeed for France. It was but the other day, indeed, that mobs, consisting probably of very much the same people as those who distinguished themselves by shouts of "vive la liberté" and "vive la révision," were yelling "à bas ZOLA" and "vive l'armée" till they were hoarse; but the fact takes hardly anything from the gravity of the situation. The indications all point to the arrival of another of those periods of general unrest and excitement which, for more than a century past, have always been followed by tragic events in the French capital. Nor can any observer fail to see that there exist ample reasons for the popular agitation which makes the surface of French political life to-day resemble the thin crust of a smoking volcano. A century has done little for the political education of the French people, and the experience of many revolutions has not taught them the A B C of national reform. "La liberté" is as little understood, indeed, to-day by the masses who shout for it in the streets of Paris as it was in the days of ROBESPIERRE, or in the glorious times of the First Empire, or as it is to-day by the so-called republican statesmen and rulers of France who cringe at the feet of the army.

IT is evident from the news which already reaches us from southeastern Europe, while Mr. STRAUS is still on his way to his mission at Constantinople, that the relations between the United States and Turkey are likely to become interesting. Mr. STRAUS has several questions of moment to deal with. In the first place, he is going to try to compel the Sultan to pay the indemnity which he owes for American property destroyed during the Armenian outbreak. The Sultan has persistently refused to pay the amount which he owes, and he is a very obstinate man. Mr. STRAUS, however, has had more success in dealing with him than any other American minister who has represented us at the Porte during ABDUL-HAMID's reign. Perhaps, then, he will prevail upon him to pay over the few thousand dollars which he owes Americans; but it cannot be denied that the situation, for a small one, is difficult, and may involve this country in a war with Turkey. Mr. STRAUS has, however, also to deal with difficulties placed in the way by Turkey to the recognition of American citizens. This problem is not wholly one-sided. A good many Armenians and other restless subjects of the Sultan secure American citizenship for the sake of going back to plot against the government. On the other hand, the Sultan's government is not averse to taking advantage of this fact for the purpose of harassing real American citizens who are perfectly innocent of any hostile or treasonable thought against him. It may be that Mr. STRAUS's mission will be elevated to an embassy, for the purpose of enabling him to carry out the instructions of his government. It is clear, at all events, that the government has determined to do its utmost to settle its differences with Turkey. It is for this reason that Mr. STRAUS, who is a Democrat, was appointed to represent it, and it is for this reason also that he has been authorized to negotiate for the elevation of the mission to an embassy.

IN the issue of the WEEKLY of October 1, in an article entitled, "The Revolt against QUAY," doubts were expressed as to the possibility of the defeat of QUAY by the independent movement which has made Dr. SWALLOW its candidate for Governor. QUAY'S power in Pennsylvania thus far has been almost absolute. He has not only dominated, but controlled the Republican party. He has placed his creatures year after year in the Gubernatorial chair and in the legislative branch of the government. Nor has his power been confined to the control of the Republican party. By agreement with corrupt Democratic leaders he has dominated that organization. The legislation of Pennsylvania has been such as he directed. He has made laws to meet the wishes and gratify the cupidity of himself and his followers. The public funds have been at his disposal; the public property has been at his mercy; even some of the judges have been his obedient servants. The federal patronage has been his, and he is accused by his political opponents of actually selling post-offices for money and for votes. Under his rule, politics in the State of Pennsylvania has been a vulgar debauch; and thus far the public conscience of the State has not sufficiently awakened to drive this man from power. He and some of his henchmen are now under arrest for using funds of the State that were deposited in the People's Bank, of Philadelphia, for purposes of private speculation. The charges which have been made against QUAY, and the WANAMAKER exposures, ought certainly to help Dr. SWALLOW. These charges, it ought to be added, are supported by written evidence, and are pressed by the Republican District Attorney of Philadelphia. It is now asserted, indeed, by the friends of Dr. SWALLOW, that they expect to defeat QUAY'S candidate for Governor at the coming election. They say that even the leading Republicans in many localities hazard the opinion that Dr. SWALLOW will be elected. Without doubt the enemies of QUAY are more active and energetic this year than they have ever been before, and we are glad to hear from one of their leaders that the outlook seems to him to be exceedingly hopeful. We trust devoutly that his fondest hopes will be realized, for we can imagine no greater good that can happen to the country than the defeat of this impersonation of all that is vile and vulgar and corrupt in our politics. The defeat of QUAY will not only be good for Pennsylvania, but will immensely benefit the whole nation.

OUR UNCROWNED KINGS.

IT will be well for the whole country to consider the condition of politics in the State of New York. Not that it is wholly exceptional, for the boss is almost everywhere, and his power is extending. He has not yet made his appearance in New England, but from the account of the Connecticut machine which was published in the last issue of HARPER'S WEEKLY, it is clear that the conditions exist in that State for his production in his most odious form. Apparently he is not there now, because there is no one of especially distinguished ability among the leaders of the Connecticut machine. He exists at his best in New York and Pennsylvania, but he is also to be found in New Jersey, Ohio, Illinois, California, and in many other States. For the moment he is under an eclipse in Maryland, but those who believe him to be dead there are hugging a delusion. He appeared first in the city of New York. Thence he has assumed control of State affairs. Finally he is seeking to control the making of Presidents, to direct the very occupant of the White House, and to influence legislation. It is high time that the whole country was taking careful observation of this product of our politics.

In the State of New York there are two bosses. One is the head of the Republican, and the other that of the Democratic party. Mr. PLATT and Mr. CROKER are absolute rulers, and will divide between them the authority over the affairs of the State. The people have the power to vote, and they may beat one boss at one time and the other boss at another time, but they can never, under existing conditions, defeat both bosses at the same time; and they can never influence nominations, except as they have compelled Mr. PLATT to nominate ROOSEVELT, under the threat of defeating the Republican party at the polls and electing the Democratic ticket. As Mr. PLATT happened to desire a Republican victory this year, and as he probably knew that such a victory would profit him personally, he obeyed the popular wishes. Yet Mr. PLATT could have refused the nomination to Mr. ROOSEVELT in spite of the clamorous demands of the Republican party, and might have made a bargain with Mr. CROKER by which the Democratic candidate would have been elected, to the profit of both of them—and it is for the profit of the boss, and of the machine by which his power is maintained, that party politics is now managed. The Republican convention registered Mr. PLATT's decree. But PLATT was omnipotent in the Republican convention, as CROKER was in the Democratic convention. Each indicated his wishes, and was implicitly obeyed by the delegates to his party convention. These delegates may have been voted for by some innocent persons in the belief that they would deliberate and express their own opinions, or the opinions of their constituents. They did nothing of the kind. In

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

the State of New York the political convention as a deliberative body is as defunct as the old-time notion of the electoral college. There is no more real need of the one than of the other. Both are maintained as dry husks, because of a law which contemplates a living entity. A delegate to a New York convention would no more vote against the command of the boss of his party—the boss by whose selection or consent he is a delegate—than a member of the electoral college would vote against his party's candidate for President. The delegate is a mere tool of the general or the local boss, as he is a legal part of local or State machinery, and, therefore, the more ignorant and brutal he may be, the happier he is in his degradation. But how of the voters of the party? How do they enjoy being denied all participation in the task of nominating candidates? It would have been an admirable lesson for them if PLATT had exercised his power and had refused a nomination to Mr. ROOSEVELT. On the other hand, CROKER certainly exercised his power, and named whom he would; more than this, in naming Judge VAN WYCK he nominated a man who did not want to be a candidate, who did want a renomination for judge, but whom he compelled to accept as his humble henchman. Here is power indeed, and good citizens are wondering whether PLATT can equal it after Mr. ROOSEVELT shall have been chosen Governor.

These absolute rulers of these respective parties also rule the State, either by turns or together. The boss whose party has succeeded commands the legislative branch of the government as he commands the convention of his party. Generally he commands the Executive also, unless he slips up in his choice, as PLATT did in nominating BLACK—not for the advantage of the State—and as it is to be hoped that he may—for the advantage of the State—in nominating ROOSEVELT. As a rule, however, he is omnipotent. He directs what laws shall be enacted, and what moneys shall be expended. He selects the agents who disburse and steal the public revenues. He chooses the manner in which these laws of his shall be executed. If he finds a law on the statute-book which he does not like, he orders that it be not enforced. If he finds a law that will injure his enemy, he directs that it be put in operation against the obnoxious person. He permits his followers to prey upon the trade and commerce of the State by threatening or enacting injurious legislation. He also permits his followers to increase their incomes by the sale of special privileges, of the right to violate the laws for the preservation of public order and for the suppression of vice. If he finds a law pressing too heavily on himself or his followers, he has it amended or repealed. In fact, he governs by decrees. Under his rule deliberation has ceased, not only in political conventions, but in legislative bodies. He is a despot as powerful as any ruler in the world, limited in his power, however, both as to its extent and as to its endurance, by the necessity under which he is of keeping his janissaries well fed at the public expense.

This is the kind of rule which New York is enduring to-day. Whether PLATT or CROKER win makes little difference. The individual citizen has no voice in the management of his party, and he is not represented in the government of the State. New York is no longer a democracy. At the best it is an oligarchy. Like a free city of the Middle Ages, it is sometimes under the heel of one baron and sometimes under the heel of the other. These barons make hay while the sun shines, and do their utmost in that direction. They are in politics for their own interests, and look after them with an intelligence and a diligence that offer an example to better men. The question for the people of the State of New York is, How long are they to endure this usurpation? They, at least some of them, think that they live in a self-governing community. They do nothing of the sort. They live under the rule of a boss, now under PLATT, now under CROKER, in either case under the rule of a man who has not been chosen by themselves, or by any other power having the legal right to make the selection of a ruler; who has not inherited the right to rule; who is not entitled to rule by native or acquired capacity; who, from his character, has no right to sit on the humblest bench of government. Another question is, What does the nation think of the prospect of the expansion of boss rule throughout the Union? Have we seen the end of the day when conventions everywhere shall be servants of the boss—when a national convention, for example, shall register the decree of a national boss, as the recent State conventions of New York registered the decrees of PLATT and CROKER? Are the voters to cease entirely to have any voice in the selection of candidates? Must they remain content to choose between candidates who are put up by bosses in private, and with a view to the interests of the boss alone? If so—if the rule of PLATT and CROKER is to be adopted throughout the country—if the self-appointed boss is to be king over us—then our democracy is perilously near being a failure.

We are confident, however, that boss rule is only a passing phase of democratic government, and that the remedy is working already. We think that Mr. ROOSEVELT'S election will aid in breaking the power of one boss at least, for we cannot imagine him as the subservient creature of Senator PLATT, or of any other man. We think that PLATT, if he has any illusions, will be disappointed, and that the vigorous morality which has heretofore animated Mr. ROOSEVELT will declare itself when he shall be seated in the Governor's chair. Moreover, he is the one of the two candidates who can be counted on to overthrow the boss of his party, and thus do much for the relief of the country from the rule of the uncrowned kings who now regulate our affairs and dominate us, and who will, in our distant lands, represent and disgrace us before the world, and bring upon us, we fear, much trouble and suffering.

PECULIAR PEOPLES.

THE little and irrelevant episode of the appearance of the French at Fashoda should not divert attention from the steady advance of the British from the Cape northward and from the Mediterranean southward. Possibly excepting the Russian and British struggle in Asia, this double and convergent advance is the most important movement that is going on in the world to-day, and it is much more intelligible than that struggle. That struggle, indeed, in its present aspect, recalls the saying in which MILTON summed up the wars of the Saxon Heptarchy. It is "the confused cawing of kites and crows." It is possible that, after the bickering has died away, we may be able to discern just what has happened in Asia. But we can discern what has happened and what is happening in East Africa without having to make any allowance whatever.

The really important thing in Africa is the concession, which now seems inevitable, from the Portuguese to the British of the railroad inland from Delagoa Bay. The Boers of the Transvaal are a far more formidable obstacle in the way of the "Cape to Cairo" scheme than a party of casual Frenchmen at Fashoda. And nothing could tend more to remove this one serious obstacle than British control of the railroad inland from Delagoa Bay. "Oom PAUL" and his Boers may lament and expostulate, perceiving their doom in the transfer. They may even appeal to Germany to prevent the consummation of the outrage. But all the consolation they are likely to get is foreshadowed in a rumor from Berlin, published in the London Times, that the Kaiser himself has described his egregious telegram of congratulation to President KRUGER upon killing the Englishmen engaged in the JAMESON raid as "most unfortunate."

"Other times, other manners." Doubtless the Kaiser just now regrets that effusive message, whether he has said so or not. But it is true that the Boers command a large share of the sympathy of disinterested mankind, and they command it on what may be called picturesque grounds. They are the descendants of the Dutchmen who settled South Africa in the seventeenth century, at the same time when other Dutchmen, like-minded with themselves, were settling New York. The Yankees, "the cunning men of Pyquag," undermined the American Boers before the seventeenth century was out. It was not until the nineteenth that the British threatened the African Boers. The African Boers are, as the poet observes, "remote, unfriended, melancholy, slow." They have been building up a patriarchal and pastoral semicivilization upon the models of the Old Testament. That semicivilization is in direct opposition to the civilization of our time. It has been protected up to now merely because it was "remote." But when the territory that it occupied in its slow and melancholy way began to yield gold and diamonds, the state of patriarchal isolation was doomed. What has happened, is happening, and is about to happen to the Boers is what has happened to the Mormons. It is what must happen to every people which cherishes a notion of civilization widely different from the accepted European standard. Such a people can maintain itself only by isolation. When civilization grows up to it, it must yield or die. That is what has happened in Utah; that is what is happening in the Transvaal; that is what must happen in China. Nothing can save the "peculiar people" when civilization catches up to them but a fresh migration. They must "inspann and trek." That is what the Boers did, until they could do it no longer. That is what the Mormons did, until the Union Pacific Railroad overtook them and undermined them. But the Boers and the Mormons, and, for that matter, the Chinese, are now at the end of their tether. They must be assimilated to what the progressive nations regard as civilization, or they must disappear from the earth.

THE CRISIS IN AUSTRIA-HUNGARY.

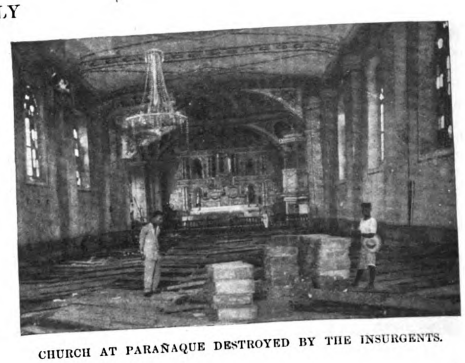
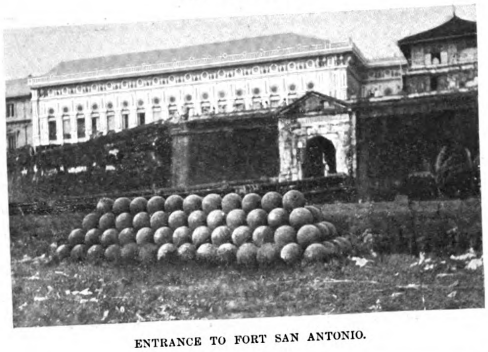
THE session of the Austrian Reichsrath that began on the 26th of last month is destined to produce results of the first consequence to the Dual Monarchy, and ultimately to Europe. Austria and Hungary are two sovereign and independent states, with absolute freedom in the management of their domestic affairs, and bound to one another only by the tie of loyalty to the HAPSBURGS and by a formal agreement to act in common on matters of imperial concern. This agreement, or Ausgleich, was entered into in 1867, and made renewable every ten years by a two-thirds majority in the Parliaments of Vienna and Pesth. It includes a commercial and tariff union, fixes the quota to be paid by each state to the imperial treasury, and provides for the joint regulation of military, naval, and diplomatic affairs. It is, in fact, the corner-stone of the Dual Monarchy. Without its presence the two halves of the realm would lapse into separate and possibly hostile entities, with no bond of union but such as comes from acknowledging a common sceptre.

When the Ausgleich came up for renewal, at the end of last year, it failed to secure the necessary two-thirds majority in the Austrian Reichsrath. The Germans voted against it, not so much because they objected to its terms as in the hope that by opposing a measure of such supreme moment they could force the repeal of Count BADENI'S language ordinances. These ordinances, issued in the spring of 1897 on the personal authority of the Premier, placed German and Czech on a par as the official languages of Bohemia. The political situation in Bohemia is a somewhat exaggerated duplicate of the Irish difficulty. The Czechs resemble the Irish nationalists not only in their character and historical position as the original owners of the land, but in their ceaseless struggle for home-rule. The Germans along the borders of Bavaria play the part of the English "garrison" in Ulster, despising the race by which they are surrounded, and resisting everything that threatens to weaken their ascendency. If the Irish still spoke Erse, and a proposal were made to place English and Erse on an equal footing in all the government offices and law courts of Ireland, the English at Westminster would adopt very much the same tactics as the Austrian Germans. That is to say, they would drop mere party differences, and stand as a racial unit in the way of all legislation till the proposal was withdrawn.

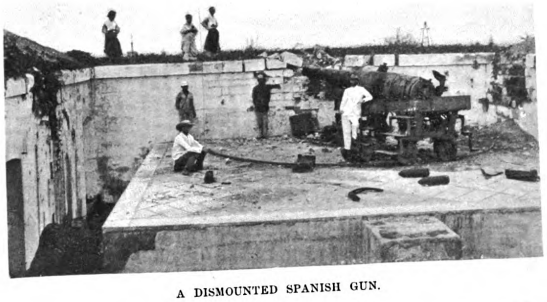


Attempt after attempt has been made during the past twelve months to arrange a compromise between the leaders of the German and Czech parties, but without success. Both sides stand obstinately to their guns, and even the assassination of the Empress, followed by the Emperor's plea for peace, has not changed their resolution. Meanwhile the time limit for the renewal of the Ausgleich has expired. If the Reichsrath is unable to ratify it during the present session, it must fall to the ground, and dualism be sacrificed with it. The Hungarians have drawn up a tariff schedule of their own, and will undoubtedly put it in force if the Ausgleich fail to pass. The formal union between Austria and Hungary will thus come virtually to an end, and a long stride have been taken towards the disruption of the realm of the HAPSBURGS.

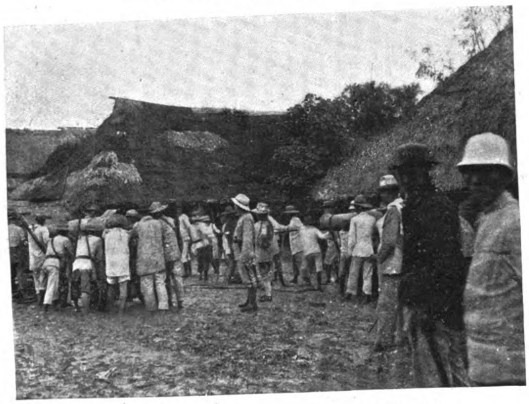
On the other hand, the Ausgleich can be preserved if the Emperor will only take matters into his own grasp and repeal the language ordinances by royal decree. On no other terms will the Germans consent to support it. The expedient, however, is one of considerable danger. The Czechs will not tamely suffer their hopes of the last fifty years to be crushed at a stroke, and BADENI'S ordinances can only be annulled at the risk of provoking a long series of riots and disorders. The Czechs are of Slav extraction, and the Slavs number twenty-two millions, or over half the population of the Dual Monarchy. It is therefore no light matter to offend them, especially when their demands are backed up by their Russian kinsmen across the border. The repeal of the language ordinances would leave the Bohemian question as unsettled and perilous as it has been any time during the last half-century. Whichever way the Reichsrath decides, a fresh impulse will be given to the forces of disintegration, and the breaking up of the Dual Monarchy is not an event that can be contemplated without the gravest anxiety.



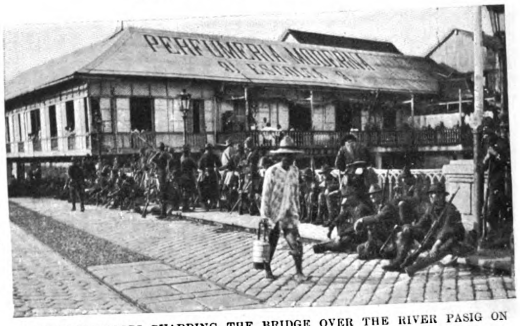
Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google



SPANISH GUNS ON THE LUNETA.



CHURCH AT PARAÑAQUE DESTROYED BY THE INSURGENTS.

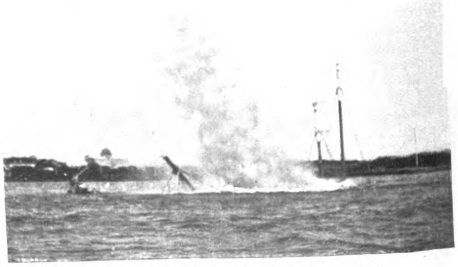


ENTRANCE TO FORT SAN ANTONIO.

A DISMOUNTED SPANISH GUN.

IN THE INSURGENTS' TRENCHES—FIRING A BIG GUN.

AMERICAN TROOPS GUARDING THE BRIDGE OVER THE RIVER PASIG ON THE AFTERNOON OF THE SURRENDER.



NATIVES TRANSPORTING STORES ALONG THE BEACH FROM CAMP DEWEY TO MANILA.

OLD MONASTERY, NEAR MALATE, JUST INSIDE THE AMERICAN LINES, USED BY GENERAL GREENE AS HIS HEADQUARTERS.

SPANISH GUNS ON FORT SAN ANTONIO, WHERE AMERICAN FLAG WAS FIRST RAISED.

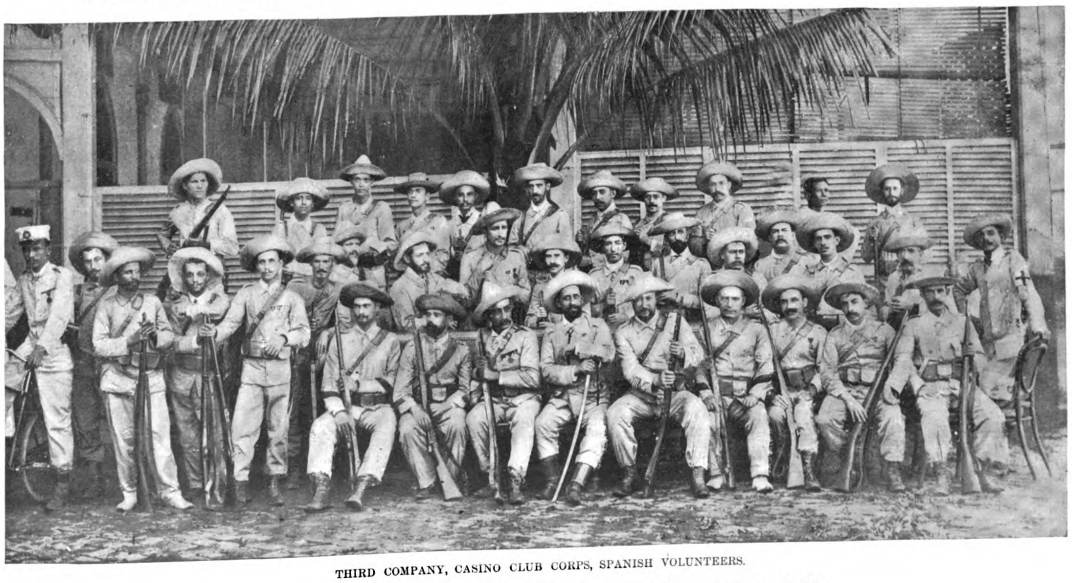
BURNING OF THE SPANISH GUNBOAT "SUBIG."

SCENES ATTENDING THE SURRENDER OF MANILA.—[See Page 1007.]

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

AMERICAN SHIPS OFF MANILA.—From a Sketch by John T. McCutcheon.

OUR TROOPS MARCHING INTO MANILA.



AMERICAN FLAG RAISED BY LIEUT.-COL. McCOY, 1st COL. VOLS.

GROUP OF AMERICAN OFFICERS BEFORE THE WALLS OF MANILA.

DESERTED SPANISH TRENCHES

THIRD COMPANY, CASINO CLUB CORPS, SPANISH VOLUNTEERS.

SCENES ATTENDING THE SURRENDER OF MANILA.—[See Page 1007.]

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THIS BUSY WORLD

DOCUMENTARY evidence, in the form of pictures in this issue of the WEEKLY, attests how, in spite of the protests of sundry officers of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, Miss Nancy Leiter smashed a bottle of champagne at the launching of the Illinois, on October 4, and named the ship as she did so. The attempt to induce her to use spring water or buttermilk failed; and a great many persons who have no interest whatever in promoting the consumption of champagne were glad it did fail, because it seemed to them inexpedient and inappropriate to try to make the proceedings on such an occasion weigh at all either in favor of abstinence or against it. It may be proper now to warn all persons who are unduly convivial in their dispositions that it would be highly fallacious and unbecoming in them to assume that, because champagne may be safely used at the christening of a battle-ship, the government or any one else encourages its use as a beverage, or that the consumption of it can proceed except on the old, familiar terms, to wit, that every consumer shall consume at his own personal risk, and shall be responsible for all effects and results of such indulgence. Champagne was not spilled on the Illinois because it is an exceptionally beneficial fluid, or because the use of it is particularly exemplary, but merely because it is a custom of very long standing to christen a ship with a bottle of wine, and there seemed no good reason to depart from it in the case of the Illinois.

On the stand with Miss Leiter at the launching were Governor Tanner of Illinois, Governor Tyler of Virginia, Commodore Hichborn, the members of Miss Leiter's family, Mayor Harrison of Chicago, and Mrs. John A. Logan. After the deed was done, Governor Tanner presented to Miss Leiter a miniature model of the ship, of beaten gold and white enamel, three inches long, showing all the guns and life-boats and the ship's flag.

A movement is afoot to build a memorial gateway at the south entrance to the Harvard College yard, in Cambridge, in memory of the Harvard men who died in the war with Spain. The tablets in the Harvard Memorial Hall are reserved exclusively for the names of soldiers of the civil war, and some new monument is necessary for these later patriots. There were three of them, all members of the Rough Riders' regiment. Stanley Hollister, '97, died of typhoid fever at Fort Monroe after being severely wounded at San Juan; N. B. Adsit, 1900, died at Buffalo of typhoid caught at Tampa; W. H. Sanders, '97, died of fever at Santiago.

American farmers who raise wheat, and who erstwhile were so vociferous in their lamentations but now feel better, may be thankful that their reliance is on wheat and not on cotton. Very dismal reports prevail about the prospects of cotton. The United States has quadrupled her production of cotton since 1872, and the price has fallen to little more than a quarter of what it was twenty-six years ago. The price of cotton cloth has fallen proportionately. In 1872 cotton "printing cloths" brought 7.88 cents a yard, and this year they bring 2.17. That is too little, and one reads in the newspapers that planters in Arkansas are threatening not to gather their crops, on the ground that at present rates cotton, or at least mortgaged cotton, is not worth gathering. The whole trouble is with over production in this country. Elsewhere in the world the production is very little greater than it was twenty years ago.

Sir William Crooke's declaration before the British Association that the world is fast outgrowing its wheat-supply has not been everywhere accorded the respectful credence that the calculations of so eminent a scientist might be expected to obtain. Sir William's opinion is that in another thirty-three years population will have so increased that, unless agricultural processes are greatly improved, a good many persons will have to go without bread. His figures are disputed in two particulars. It is held that the population of the earth won't increase as fast as he fears, and it is also held that his estimate of the total possible wheat lands of the earth is a great deal too small. There will be a great deal more wheat, his critics say, than he thinks, and very much fewer folks to eat it. Secretary Wilson, of our Agricultural Department, is one of the experts who dispute his conclusions, on the ground that he has underrated the capacity of the United States for producing breadstuffs to meet any demand.

Sir William's scientific prophecies are especially interesting because the time of their fulfilment is so near at hand. The majority of us grown-ups will be careless of wheat crops before 1931, but general scarcity prevailing as soon as that will be a matter of real importance to our children. But, after all, most of the worry in the world is about things that don't happen. There is enough wheat to last us another year, anyhow, and prospects of more after that. Thirty years! What shall we care for wheat then? By that time the Standard Oil Company will have acquired control of such parts of the universe as it still lacks, and all of us who are at all capable will be working for it, and the responsibility for keeping us alive will rest with our employer. Let Mr. Rockefeller brood over Sir William Crooke's predictions; it's no funeral of ours.

The secretary of the Eugene Field Monument committee reports that during the last six months the war and the hot weather have made it impossible for the committee to add to its fund, but that its endeavors are now to be resumed. The committee's purpose is to raise money enough both to build a monument and to provide a considerable fund for Mr. Field's family. It reports that its affairs are promising, and that only a few thousand dollars remain to be raised. The address of the fund is 180 Monroe Street, Chicago.

The National Council of Women of the United States holds its annual executive session this year at Omaha, under the auspices of the Woman's Department of the Trans-Mississippi Fair, and will sit for six days, beginning October 24. The president of the council is Mrs. Mary Lowe Dickinson, of New York, and its secretary Mrs. Louise Barnum Robbins, of Adrian, Michigan. It describes itself as the largest organization of women in the country—a federation of many organizations concerned with charity, reform, education, or religion. Its sessions, of which there will be two every day, will be enlivened by discourse and discussion upon a very large number of important social subjects. The council is ambitious in its name and scope, and has arranged an imposing programme for its meeting. It will be interesting to observe how large a splash it will be able to make when it jumps in, and how far the resulting eddies will travel.

The Ancient and Honorable Artillery Company of Boston went to Quebec last week on its annual excursion. It was received with brass bands and hospitable demonstrations by officers of the Canadian militia, and was quartered at the Château Frontenac. It is painful to record that the commander of the company, the gallant Colonel Henry Walker, who led the historical descent upon London, was severely hurt on the night of his arrival (October 3), in a sudden action with a one-horse cab. Almost in front of the hotel, it seems, the cab bore down on the colonel back end foremost, and felled him to earth, giving him two bad cuts, one of them on the nose. His injuries, though severe, were not dangerous, however, and next day the company was reviewed by Canadian Major-General Hutton, was entertained at lunch by Lord Aberdeen, and had a banquet in the evening at its hotel.

Colonel Joseph M. Bennett, merchant and philanthropist of Philadelphia, who died on September 29, was the proprietor of the store in which John Wanamaker first meditated the achievements which have since made him famous. Bennett & Co. were in the clothing trade, and in the fifties put up a remarkable store, called Tower Hall, which in its equipment and adornments was unlike any store ever seen up to that time. It had, in particular, a great spiral stairway in the middle of it running from the first to the fifth floor, which was considered a great curiosity, so that architects and builders came from afar to view it. Colonel Bennett believed in novelty and in advertising, and managed to gain for his business a very wide and profitable notoriety. For a good many years he maintained a poet, known as The Bard of Tower Hall, who sang voluminously, and with cleverness and success, of the triumphs of the retail clothing business, and the opportunities of a lifetime that it offered. Colonel Bennett made a fortune in his business, and greatly amplified his winnings by fortunate investments in real estate. He gave very liberally to the charities of the Methodist Church, and, among other things, founded a Methodist orphanage, to which he gave a tract of land and $156,000 in money. John Wanamaker entered his employ in 1854, and staid five years, during which the famous Tower Hall was built. No doubt, as an aspiring young clerk, he was strongly and permanently impressed by the methods and character of his successful employer. In 1859, when he left Bennett & Co., he set up for himself.

Bishop Potter heartily disapproves of expansion, and said so at his diocesan convention. The same convention chose Captain Mahan, who is an exceedingly sanguine and confident expansionist, to be a lay delegate to the general convention at Washington. In this action the Chicago Inter-Ocean finds a sign that the convention repudiated the bishop's views. It is more likely that questions of national policy did not at all affect the selection of Captain Mahan as a delegate. It is well known that he is a churchman in good standing and personally pious, and a man of very high distinction besides. He would be a very likely man for lay delegate, without any regard to his views about Hawaii, Puerto Rico, or the Philippines, and he was probably chosen entirely irrespective of the discrepancy between his political sentiments and those of Bishop Potter. Men can differ as yet about the Philippines and still esteem one another. It is not like the silver-coinage question, which the community in general felt that it knew something about. Scarcely any one assumes to know much about the Philippines, and the clouds of ignorance and uncertainty which envelop the question of their destiny help to make us tolerant of one another's views.

Hampton (Virginia) Institute has been raising its standard of admission, and has started its thirty-first year with an entering class slightly smaller than last year's, but of unusually good material. The class includes about seventy negro boys and fifty-five girls, and twenty Indian boys and eighteen girls. About one-third of all the applicants were accepted. All the Indians in the present entering class have had primary instruction in the reservation schools. The work at Hampton now is altogether a work of secondary education. This term, for the first time, the institute uses its new building for the agricultural and domestic science courses. It is described as one of the finest school-buildings in the country, admirably provided with class-rooms and laboratories, with a model kitchen, laundry, and bedrooms for the domestic-science department at one end, and, at the other, a creamery and dairy and arrangements for the study of the use of farm machinery and the care of live-stock.

There is a new interest in life, with the characteristics and dimensions of which it becomes all contemporaneous Americans to become promptly familiar. It is Edmond Rostand's prodigious play, "Cyrano de Bergerac," which Coquelin acted from December to July in Paris, and which Richard Mansfield brought out the other night at the Garden Theatre in New York. This is not the department of the WEEKLY in which attention is paid to plays, but prevailing sensations may be noticed here, and "Cyrano de Bergerac" is a sensation which seems bound to prevail. So far as one may judge from the chatter of folks who have seen persons who have seen the play, Cyrano, the hero of it, had many qualifications which entitled him to rank as the Theodore Roosevelt of his day. At any rate, one hears of him as a man of superlative belligerency, who would rather fight than do anything else whatever, and who in the intervals of pugnacious activity endears himself to his associates by the display of valuable traits. He is an ugly man, with a huge uncontrollable nose, and in that of course he differs from Colonel Roosevelt, who is pretty, whatever contrary impression unscrupulous caricaturists may have given. An idea of the virulence with which this play has attacked the public may be gathered from the suggestion of an evening newspaper that the nose of Cyrano will soon be as familiar as the foot of Trilby. It is a delightful token of the return of peace that such a thing should be conceivable.

Dr. David Jayne Hill, late president of Rochester University, who has been appointed Assistant Secretary of State to succeed Mr. Moore, is a close personal friend of Ambassador White, and it is possible that it is through Dr. White that his fitness for a diplomatic post has been brought to the attention of the President. He is forty-eight years old, the son of a Baptist minister, and himself a Baptist minister, though his energies have long been diverted from the practice of his original profession. He is a graduate of Bucknell University, of which he was chosen president in 1879. In 1887 he was elected president of Rochester University, and held that office for eight years. He resigned it, partly because the university was a little more sectarian than he liked, but largely for personal reasons, and much to the regret of the majority of the university trustees and of the friends of the institution in Rochester. He is an able man, very agreeable, highly accomplished, and exceedingly well qualified, both by natural talent and acquirements, to be the right-hand man of the Secretary of State. Dr. Hill has the gift of speech in an unusual degree, and has few equals in the art of standing on his feet and speaking at short notice.

Barnard College, so often saved at the last moment from impending mischance, has been saved again this fall. The mischance that impended in this latest instance was the possibility that her friends would not succeed in raising $95,000, the procurement of which was a condition precedent to her receiving $135,000 to go with it. The undertaking of her friends, as announced last spring, was to raise $100,000 to pay some bills for furnishing new buildings and for other things. When a good beginning had been made in the way of thousand-dollar subscriptions towards this sum, Mrs. A. A. Anderson agreed to give $25,000, provided the rest of the money should be raised before October 3, and Mr. John D. Rockefeller promised $10,000 on the same condition. Then a donor, whose name has not been divulged, offered $100,000 as an endowment fund, provided the college was out of debt on October 3. That called for $180,000, and when October 1 came with $58,000 still to be conjured out of pockets as yet unlocated, there had to be some very energetic begging and running about. But Mr. Plimpton, the treasurer, was equal to the emergency. The money was raised—it always seems to come when Barnard must have it—and now New York has a girls' college, beautifully situated, with a handsome group of buildings, with no debt at all, and with a clear endowment of $100,000. Barnard's properties are now worth nearly a million dollars, and she starts the year with 308 students. That is pretty good for a college that is only twelve years old and that has had to work hard for everything it has got. Almost all this money, too, has been raised within three years, since Barnard determined to follow Columbia up town.

It was noted in this department of the WEEKLY last week that the Royal St. Lawrence and the Seawanhaka-Corinthian yacht clubs had settled the differences that arose out of their sail-boat match this year, and would sail another race next year. It is worth recording that there was an element of misapprehension in the dispute between the clubs, which was at length happily eliminated. It is true that the American club was displeased because the Canadians entered a double-hull boat, but it was not true, as stated in the newspapers at the time, and also in the WEEKLY, that the Racing Committee of the American club telegraphed its official representatives in Montreal not to accept the hospitalities of the Canadian club after the race. Such a despatch was sent, but it was sent by two individuals on their own responsibility, and was not authorized by the American club's committee, which disavowed all responsibility for it. When that was made clear to the Canadians, the new challenge and its acceptance promptly followed.

Elsewhere in this issue of the WEEKLY is a picture of the trial of Lieutenant-Colonel Picquart, on September 21, at Paris, in the Eighth Correctional Tribunal, on the charge of revealing documents concerning the national defence. The trial was cut short by the public prosecutor, who asked for an adjournment on the ground that the Minister of War had ordered the prosecution of Colonel Picquart on the charge of forgery and using forged documents. The practical effect of adjournment on this ground was to take Colonel Picquart's case out of the civil courts and hand it over to a military tribunal. His counsel, M. Labori, the same who defended Zola, vigorously opposed adjournment, but fruitlessly, as the judges, after a brief deliberation, adjourned the case indefinitely. After his counsel had spoken, and when the intention of the court was manifest, Colonel Picquart rose and said: "This may be the last time I shall speak in public. I shall, perhaps, sleep to-night in the military prison of Cherche Midi. I wish therefore to declare that if I find there the strangling rope of Lemercier Picard, or the razor of Lieutenant-Colonel Henry, it will be a case of assassination, for I have not the least idea of committing suicide." The audience, as may be supposed, was intensely moved by this declaration, judges, officers, and spectators giving signs of profound emotion. The cause was ample, for Colonel Picquart had virtually made a charge of assassination against the military authorities. Colonel Picquart's real crime is that he believes that Dreyfus was wrongfully convicted, and has endeavored to have the injustice that he considers was done him set right.

There seems to be some distrust in London and other foreign parts of the veracity of that M. Louis de Rougemont who claims to have had extraordinary adventures in Australia and thereabouts, and who lately read a paper anent them before the British Association. One school of Britishers now speaks of him as the French Robinson Crusoe, another as the French Ananias. There are three black pearls of enormous value and an octopus of huge size in his story, but both the pearls and the octopus got away. It is clear, however, that M. de Rougemont is either a great adventurer or a great romancer, and in either case he is a valuable man.

E. S. MARTIN.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THE FALL OF MANILA.

LETTERS AND ILLUSTRATIONS FROM JOHN F. BASS, SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT FOR "HARPER'S WEEKLY."

MANILA, August 13.

IT was delay, delay, delay; no one knew why. The days dragged. Some said it was because the Monterey was expected. But when the Monterey came, and still there was the same inaction, the wiseacres shook their heads and talked about expected peace and the uselessness of sacrificing the lives of our soldiers in an attack upon Manila if terms of peace were already agreed upon. General Merritt smiled and said nothing; Admiral Dewey smiled and said a great deal, but no one seemed any the wiser. Then, when we all thought that we should never see the inside of Manila, as a clap of thunder from a clear sky came the general order: The troops to move up into the trenches at 6.30 on the morrow—the First Brigade, under General McArthur, on the right; the Second Brigade, under General Greene, on the left down to the beach; brigade headquarters in the trenches; reserves 800 yards behind—the combined attack by sea and land to take place at ten o'clock, Saturday, August 13.

Long before the appointed hour the men were up and eager to move. Those detailed for camp service sat glum and disconsolate in their tents. One rheumatic old corporal, when told that he must stay behind, cried and begged so hard that the captain's heart softened, and he shouted, gruffly, "Well, fall in!" Such scenes were common enough. With a rousing cheer "Jimmy Green" shouldered his rifle and his knapsack, heavy with two days' rations and 200 rounds of ammunition. Regiment after regiment splashed through the swashy fields or floundered in the mud along the miry road on to the trenches. Then the heavens opened, and it rained as it never rained before, even in the Philippines, and the fields became shallow lakes and the road an oozing mire.

In the trenches by the sea it was bad enough, but out to right, in the swamps, the men lay like drowned rats in the slimy water. They did not mind it. "Sort of wet and muddy," drawled "Jimmy Green," as he lighted his pipe. I never saw troops so quiet and self-composed. No ripples of excitement; no craning of necks over the breastworks to catch stray glimpses of Spaniards. They would see enough of the Spaniards by-and-by. Meantime there was quiet. Only the company wag got off an occasional dry joke.

The captains were busy placing their men. On the right, where the brush was thick, some of the officers went ahead of their trenches to mark the way they would take their men in case of a charge. Captain Wood and Lieutenant Fiske of the Eighteenth regulars were going forward, and invited me to join them. Through the rice-swamp we flounder over fallen trees and hedges as far as the open space before the Spanish trenches, 200 yards distant. Not a Spaniard was to be seen. Were the enemy's trenches deserted? Lieutenant Fiske thought so, and ventured forward seventy-five yards into the open. Suddenly a dozen Spaniards came over the wall and ran for the lieutenant. It was a race for life through the mire. Two volleys followed us, and on our right a dull boom from the water notified us that the fight was on. At last we were safe again in the trenches.

On the shore, in an old hulk at the end of our trenches, was the signal station, at which messages were to be sent to and received from the fleet and General Merritt's headquarters on one of the transports. One hundred yards from the shore, in an old monastery, through which our earth-works run, General Greene issued his orders and watched the fleet, which slowly, in a quarter-moon, steamed up toward the city. On top of this building Major Bell, head of the bureau of information, was stationed. It was the best point of observation. Nearest the shore the little Callao, a gunboat captured from the Spanish, came steaming along, and next to her the Petrel, firing slowly at the Spanish trenches in front of Malate, 1300 yards from our lines. Their fire was especially directed at the fort on the shore, San Antonio. The Utah Battery opened fire from our embrasures. Their 3-inch guns jumped to their work, the shells tore the air, and the white puff of smoke of the exploding shell on the wall of the fort told of good gunnery. Nearer and nearer came the fleet, and now their big guns began to bellow. Some of the shells struck in the sea near the shore, and sent up fifty feet into air a geyser of water.

All this time the guns in the fort and on the Luneta were silent, and the trenches seemed deserted. A great shell came pulsing like an express train over our heads, and smashed into the bridge before the Spanish trenches, leaving a wide gap. As the smoke cleared we saw Spaniards for the first time, and they were making for the rear at top speed. "What is that?" asked Major Bell. A dry sound, like the clappering of storks, came from the sea. It was the quick-firing guns from the military tops on our ships pouring bullets into the enemy's trenches. Suddenly the batteries in our trenches stopped firing.

"First Company, Colorado, forward!" With a cheer the men went over the trenches, and we after them. At 100 yards from our works the company halted and lay down in the swamp. From the water our fleet continued to pound the Spanish fort and trenches. After a time our signal station notified them to stop fire. Colonel Hale and Lieutenant-Colonel McCoy, First Colorado, joined the one company in the swamp.

"Up and on!" shouted the colonel. Before the fort could be reached there was a stream to ford. The men went up to their chests in water, holding their rifles well over their heads to keep them dry. Were the Spaniards waiting to annihilate this handful of men? On our right, in the direction of the First Brigade, there was heavy firing. At 100 yards from the fort the company kneeled and fired. Just then the magazine in the fort blew up with a flash and a puff of smoke. Another series of short rushes, and the company was within twenty-five yards of the fort. At that moment the flag-ship Olympia, about three thousand yards from shore, sent a single shell from one of her 8-inch guns. It was a splendid shot; it cut along the back of the Spanish wall, which ran from the sea to the fort, and drove out any Spaniards that were left there. There was a dash for the wall and a scramble to get to the door of the fort. Outside lay a wounded soldier on a stretcher, abandoned by his companions in their haste. Inside the fort no one stopped to notice the few dead, but climbed over the débris to get the Spanish flag. To Lieutenant-Colonel McCoy belongs the honor of pulling it down, and up went the stars and stripes.

Back of the fort lay the town of Malate, protected by rows of breastworks and sand-bags. The officers' house at the entrance of the town was deserted. Horses and saddles were still in the stable. Demijohns of wine were smashed on the first floor, and the liquid ran down the stairs to the front door; furniture was overturned, papers were scattered over the floor, so hasty had been the flight. Suddenly, from our left, the Spaniards opened a brisk fire, and our men took refuge behind garden walls as best they could. Stray shots came from houses where Spanish sharp-shooters had secreted themselves. Re-enforcements kept coming up. Down the long street leading to the walls of Manila we could see the Spanish soldiers retreating. Occasionally they stopped to fire a volley at our men, who crept cautiously along from house to house at the edge of the road. The sharp-shooters continued to peck at us from windows, and one or two of our men were wounded.

General Greene and staff, at the head of the Second Brigade, came up. As he crossed the river before Malate he was in imminent danger, for the Spanish forces on our right opened a sharp fire on our columns. On the brigade went, with advance-guard well to the front. Gallopers came and went, carrying the general's orders. This was a dangerous occupation, for the Spanish sharp-shooters were still at work.

The rumor spread that the white flag had been raised on the walls of Manila, and, sure enough, as the advanced regiments broke into the open before the city walls, there on one corner a white flag streamed to the wind. Cheer after cheer rose from our men.

On our right the Philippine insurgents had broken through and were coming on in mass. Major Jones, division quartermaster, single-handed, faced this mob and held them in check until help came up. In the confusion that followed, either the Spaniards or the insurgents opened fire again, and volleys came pelting from the fort at the back of Manila, and this while the white flag was flying at the front of the town. Order was at last restored, and some of the Spanish troops outside the walls began to collect to surrender. The adjutant of the Captain-General came out to discuss methods of negotiations for surrender with General Greene. His bickerings annoyed the general.

"Surrender or no surrender," said the general, "I have come to take the town, and take it I will."

There was a long delay while General Greene rode in to see the Captain-General. Then at last the Second Brigade, with flying colors and sounding brass, marched into new Manila. The road was lined with natives, who threw cigars and cigarettes to our men, while Spaniards leaned from the windows and watched with hostile eyes our advance.

All honor to our generals; all honor to our soldiers; all honor to our country! Such a thing has never happened before in the history of wars. One hour after the city was taken the tram-cars were driving about and women were walking unmolested in the street. As I write, our men—wet, tired, and hungry—lie about the streets in the rain as a safeguard to the property and lives of our conquered enemy.

August 17.

In the "bloodless" fight before Manila the First Brigade lost four men killed and thirty-eight wounded; the Second Brigade, one killed and five wounded. The First Brigade were well in the interior in the brush where the great guns of the fleet could not reach, and here the Spaniards offered some resistance. The trenches of our men were separated from those of the enemy only by 200 yards of bamboo-covered ground, an almost impassable tangle. From the Spanish block-house, which rose above their earth-works, sharp-shooters played into our lines. One gun of the Utah Battery pounded this block-house to pieces in short order. The Twenty-third United States Infantry charged the position, and the Spaniards withdrew to their second line of defence. Here they made a stubborn stand, and Colonel French called for volunteers to dislodge the enemy. In response to this call the Astor Battery, who had been stationed out on the left, and had not been able to use their guns with effect on account of the thicket and swamp, offered their services. A few minutes later these brave men charged the Spanish position, armed only with revolvers. It was a desperate chance, and bravely taken. Two men were killed and a number wounded. In such an unequal struggle, revolvers against Mauser rifles, the result would have been inevitable annihilation for the battery had not re-enforcements come up. Again the Spaniards were dislodged, and again they rallied, in and about an old church. About this time help, which had been sent for by General McArthur, came up from the Second Brigade in the flank and rear of the enemy, and the latter broke and fled. An hour after the Second Brigade, the First arrived before the walls.

In the mean time, when the white flag was raised over Manila, Lieutenant-Colonel Whittier and Lieutenant Brumby, the flag-lieutenant of the Olympia, landed in the city to negotiate terms of surrender with the Spanish Governor-General. The flag-lieutenant soon went back to the flag-ship, and left Colonel Whittier for a short time the only American in the city. It was not for long, however, for the Oregon volunteers, held on a transport before the city for the purpose, were put on shore on the sea-front, and marched triumphant through the streets, and soon after General Greene, at the head of the Second Brigade, rode into town and lowered the Spanish colors. It was a sight long to be cherished to see the stars and stripes run up and stream out and flutter in the wind, while from thousands of throats a good American cheer rang out.

That afternoon and next day the Spanish forces kept assembling in the square before the Governor's palace in old Manila, and giving up their arms, which were thrown in great piles in the hall of the palace. The officers were allowed by courtesy to keep their side-arms, and to-day they strut about the streets of Manila clanking their swords over the cobblestones more like conquerors than prisoners of war. These Spanish troops look far from ill fed, and there can be no doubt that the stories of their suffering have been grossly exaggerated. In the trenches our men found bottles of gin and wine scattered everywhere. One of our companies lunched off a gross of boxes of sardines found in the officers' quarters near the fighting-line.

What the loss was on the Spanish side during the bombardment will probably never be known. It is variously estimated by the Spaniards from thirty-five to three hundred. One thing is certain, there are few wounded in the hospital, and our troops in coming in found only a few dead in the trenches. Inside the walls of Manila not a man was killed, as the bombardment was confined to shelling the trenches outside the city, where the Spaniards blocked the advance of our troops. The great 10-inch disappearing guns on the Luneta did not fire a single shot, and consequently the Monterey lay voiceless opposite the town, ready to use her guns only in case the batteries in the town showed fight.

What did this inaction on the part of the enemy mean? Merely this, that the Spaniards did not dare to return home after a peaceful surrender. They demanded some show of force on our part. The gloves were padded. They agreed not to hurt us if we did not hit too hard. The only trouble was that some of the Spanish troops, especially those out of sight and range of our guns, did not fall in with the views of their commander, and tried to show the Yankees what they could do.

On our side, we kept our agreement to spare the city and defend the Spaniards against the insurgent mob. In the latter task we were greatly aided by the Spanish forces in the trenches about the town. In no place did the insurgents succeed in breaking the line of defence, and only got in back of our troops, who easily held them in check, and disarmed those forcing their way too far into our lines. The Filipinos were greatly disappointed at not getting into the town to loot, as they did at Cavité. They begin to look on the American with hostility. Aguinaldo has agreed to hold his forces outside of the city; at the same time he has offered large sums to several shippers to bring him down rifles from Hong-kong. Are these weapons meant to use against the Spaniards in case we give up the Philippines, or against us for refusing to recognize the Philippine Republic? I am inclined to think that the insurgents intend to fight us if we stay, and Spain if we go.

August 30.

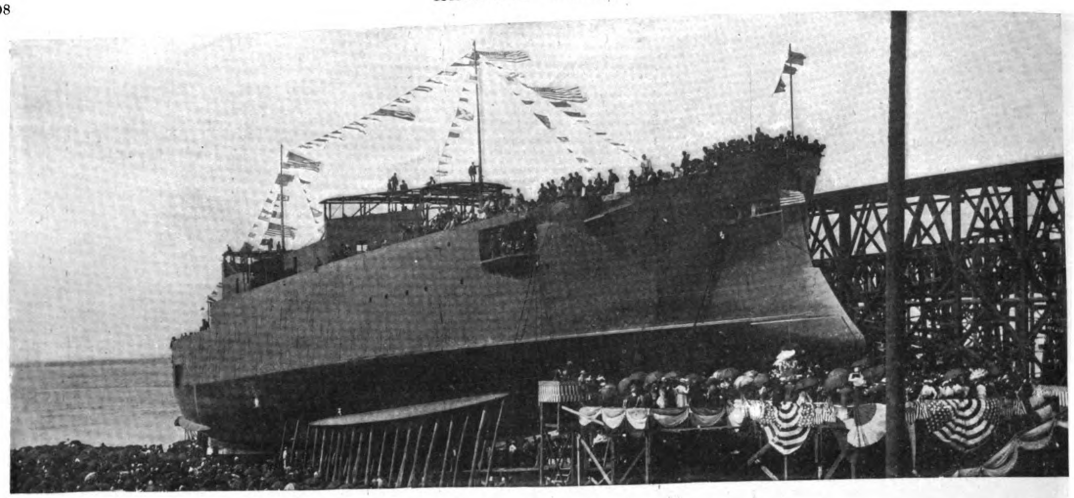
The wisdom of following the strategy which, it is understood, Admiral Dewey favored, of dropping a few shells into Manila and then landing troops from transports on the water-front to occupy the city, is proved by the experience of the Second Oregon Volunteers. Company E, acting as escort to General Merritt on board of the Zafiro, and the rest of the First and Second battalions of the Second Oregon on the steamer Kong Hoi, proceeded out with the squadron from Cavité at 7 A.M., making for Manila. During the day the two steamers lay just back of the fleet in action, but well within the range of the silent guns on the Luneta. At four o'clock in the afternoon the Belgian tug which, after the white flag had been raised in the city, had brought out the Belgian consul, through whom terms of surrender were negotiated, came alongside of the Kong Hoi, with orders for Colonel Summers to make a landing with the two battalions of the Second Oregon and proceed to the walled city. The Kong Hoi went aground near the entrance of the Pasig River, and Colonel Summers was obliged to collect all the small boats in the river to effect a landing. In the remarkably short time of forty minutes the two battalions were on shore, marching up into the walled part of Manila. Company A was ordered to lower the Spanish garrison flag and to raise the American colors. As Lieutenant Pobey raised the American flag the whole fleet saluted, and the Oregon band, which came marching up the Luneta, struck up "The Star-Spangled Banner." At the mouth of the Pasig River the Spanish gunboat Subig, set afire to prevent our capturing her, blazed heavenward, as if in a last salute to the yellow and red of Spain, while in the west the setting sun streaked the clouds with gold. The day of Spanish glory and misrule was at an end in the Philippines.



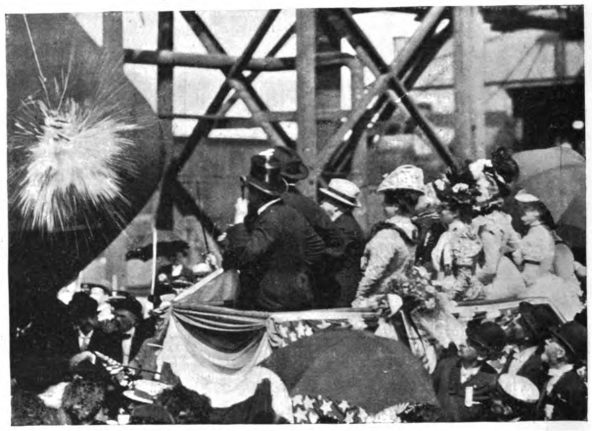
The town was crowded with Spanish troops. These marched slowly into the square before the palace, the headquarters of General Merritt, and between two files of Oregon soldiers dropped their arms in great heaps. The disarming went on till one o'clock at night. Four thousands stands of arms were taken that night. The Spanish men accepted the situation philosophically enough, but the women wept, and filled the air with their cries of distress.

For sixty hours 400 out of 500 Oregon troops in Manila were on guard duty. They seized, in the different churches, immense stores of provisions of the Spanish government. In the Church of St. Augustine alone they found 7100 sacks of rice, each sack containing 150 pounds. Sardines, beans, olive oil, coffee, bacon, and dried fish were there in plenty, indisputably proving that the garrison might have held out indefinitely, so far as food-supply went. In the treasury 850,000 Mexican dollars were taken. This capture gave rise to a great deal of talk among the Spanish officials, a delegation of whom visited General Merritt and requested that the wages of the Spanish officers and soldiers be paid out of this sum. It is unnecessary to say that the general politely referred them to Spain for the payment of their soldiers. The money captured from the Spanish treasury is to be used to defray the expenses of our government here. It is an interesting fact that it was necessary to count 243,000 pennies before the exact sum captured was ascertained.

During the occupation of the walled city by the Oregon troops, not a single incident occurred which necessitated the use of force. Indeed, every one seemed glad that the long siege was over, and that we had so peacefully entered the town.

As I intimated in my previous letter, the Spaniards expressed their desire before the fight to only put up a show of fight, and this policy they faithfully carried out. They kept their large guns in the city quiet, in the hope that by so doing we would spare the city. It seems to have been otherwise with the officers and men in Fort San Antonio Abad and the trenches immediately in front of our troops, for these men up to the very last expressed

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google



THE SHIP ON THE WAYS JUST BEFORE THE LAUNCH.

Governor J. Hoge Tyler, of Virginia.

MISS NANNIE LEITER, READY TO NAME THE BATTLE-SHIP WITH A BOTTLE OF CHAMPAGNE.

THE BATTLE-SHIP IS NAMED.

LAUNCH OF THE UNITED STATES BATTLE-SHIP "ILLINOIS" AT NEWPORT NEWS, VIRGINIA, OCTOBER 4, 1898.—[SEE PAGE 1006.]

Photographs Copyright, 1898, by George Prince.

their conviction that even in face of a bombardment by sea they could keep out our troops. These over-confident Spaniards discovered their error very early in the day, and took flight long before our fleet had really made their position untenable.

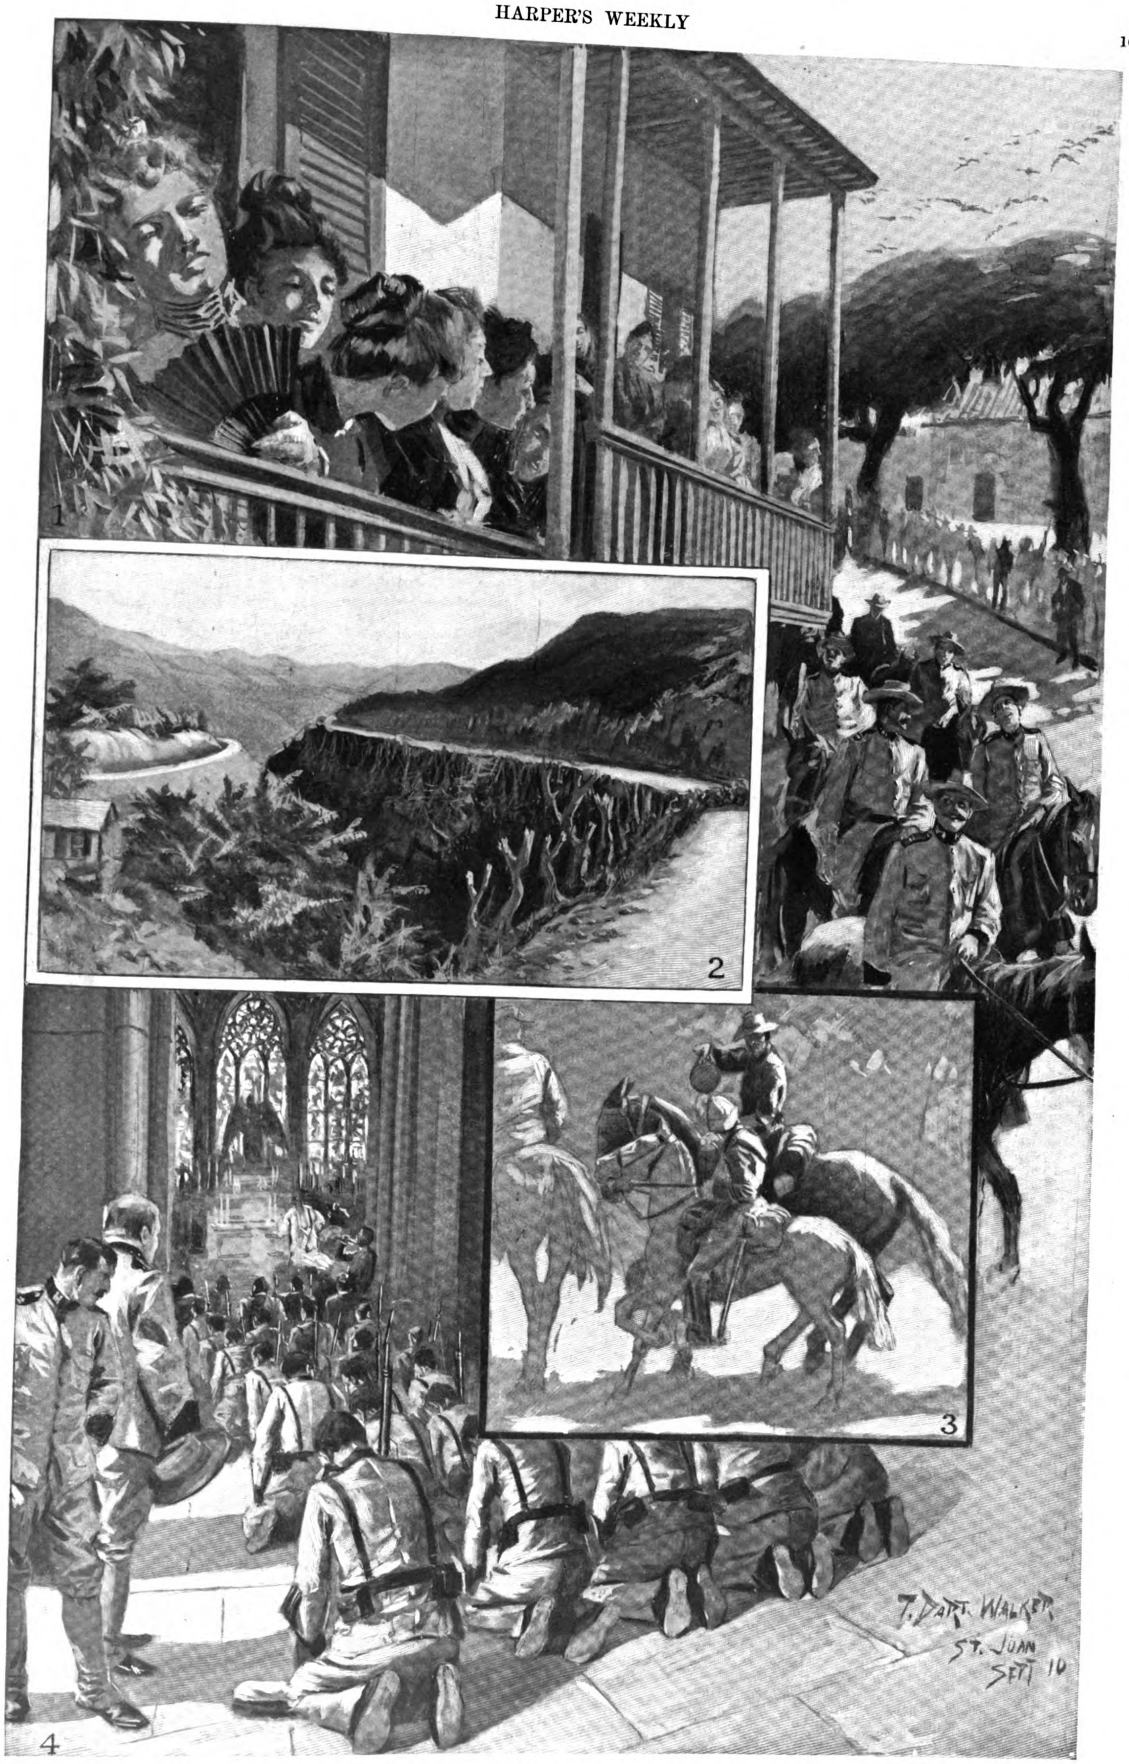
In all of this the army had a much less important part to play than no doubt they would now like to admit. The land forces were of use simply to police the city after it was reduced to submission by our gallant fleet. There can be no doubt that the strategy of this campaign will be severely criticised by military students, because the men were exposed to the hardships of occupying for a week a line of trenches in a swampy and malarious country unnecessarily, and that men were wounded and killed in unnecessary fights, when the fleet might have brought the city into submission, and troops could have been landed in the Pasig River without the loss of a single man. Indeed, from the side of mere good policy our land movement was a mistake, for it brought our troops in conflict with the insurgents, and began the unpleasant feeling which now exists between the Filipinos and our men.

The march of the army was full of dramatic incidents. The detachment of the First Colorados, who were the first to advance along the beach against Fort San Antonio, passed through a stream and had advanced to the fort, kneeling and firing by platoons, to keep in any of the enemy who might be still in the fort without drawing their fire. It was only after we passed the fort that the enemy concealed in the wood on the right opened fire on us. Quickly we took to the line of trenches very conveniently run by the Spaniards from the fort to the outskirts of Malate. This trench faced the fire of the enemy, and bullets immediately hissed over our heads or imbedded themselves in the earth-works. Suddenly we heard the sound of martial music, and turning around, what was our astonishment to see the Colorado band coming around the corner of the fort, the fat band-master blowing his cornet with might and main in the lead, while in the hubbub of hissing bullets and shouted orders arose the strains of "There'll be a hot time in the Old Town to-night," etc. With difficulty the valiant band was persuaded to take refuge behind the earth-works and stop their patriotic but dangerous blowing, which drew the enemy's fire.

A little further towards our right, where the Eighteenth Regular Infantry awaited in the mud the signal for advance, the coffee-carriers, laden with a four-foot-long boiler strung on a pole from shoulder to shoulder, waited also, and when the attack was sounded these conscientious men went over the trenches too, still carrying their boiler full of coffee. It was literally coffee and bullets for two.

On our right, at the critical moment, General McArthur was left without orders. Unable to see what was going on at other points on account of the dense jungle where his troops had to manœuvre, he ordered an advance before our left wing had flanked the enemy. It is lucky, considering the resistance offered and the ground they had to advance over, that the first brigade did not suffer a greater loss. At one point the Astor Battery, which was stationed along a narrow road, were momentarily driven from their guns, with the loss of several wounded and two men killed. It is noteworthy that both these men had served in the English army; one of them, the first sergeant of the battery, had been a captain.

The colonels of each regiment have been requested to send in the names of those who distinguished themselves for gallant and meritorious service. Some have sent in long lists of men, while others refuse to send in a single name. Among these is Colonel Van Voltzen. He said that the occasion for gallant and meritorious action had not been offered, and that he saw no one who did anything beyond his duty. This view seems sound, at least so far as the second brigade is concerned, for although the troops were ready enough to perform gallant deeds, the rapid flight of the enemy prevented the possibility of extraordinary bravery. It would cheapen the army, which deserves collectively the greatest praise for the uncomplaining patience with which they have endured a month's campaign in a swamp, to give honorable mention to any one for the day's work on the 13th of August.



All the shops have now reopened. Natives, Spaniards, and half-breeds, in white suits, and the American soldier, in dirty duck overalls or hot blue uniform, move about in the usual course of business. One notices, for the first time, the black robe of the priest, and wonders where they have been all this while to spring so suddenly into public view. On investigation it comes to light that the priests, uncertain what treatment they would receive at our hands, had put on civilian's dress, and only after seeing the justness and impartiality—indeed, one might say leniency—of our rule over the city, have dared to resume their clerical costume. Now that we are here, every one seems satisfied—at least on the surface. Spanish, German, and English merchants constantly repeat that if the United States are to retain the islands they will remain in business; but if the burden of reconquering them from the natives is to fall back upon Spain, they will withdraw their capital and leave Manila. Our relation with the indigenous Filipino is a problematic matter.

The insurgents still remain in possession of all parts of Luzon, except Cavité and Manila. After the first glamour which surrounded our troops, a glamour due to an exaggerated and almost childish idea of the liberty and freedom we were bringing to the Philippines, the race differences have made themselves felt, which antagonize the native and exasperate our men. The Filipino is the true child of the East. His moral fibre is as flimsy as the web of the pineapple gauze of which the women make their dresses. He will cheat, steal, and lie beyond the orthodox limit of the Anglo-Saxon. His unreliability and the persistency with which he disobeys orders are irritating beyond description; besides this, his small stature and color invite abuse. There can be no doubt that our soldiers are spoiling for a fight. They hate and despise the native for the manner he has lied to and cheated them, and on the whole they are inclined to treat the Filipino the way a burly policeman treats a ragged street urchin. The native is like a child, unreasonable, and easily affected by small things. Unable to appreciate the benefits of a good government, he fiercely resents the rough manner in which the soldier jostles him out of the way.

In establishing our government over the city, General Merritt has followed as much as possible the old Spanish régime. Former clerks have been temporarily retained where they were willing to remain in the service. The old Board of Aldermen have resumed their duties. At the head of each department an American has been placed, and gradually Americans are being put into the minor offices. The investigation of the different branches of the government has now proved beyond a doubt the corruption of Spanish rule.

To-day the China carries off General Merritt and the three officers of his staff for Paris, General Greene for Washington, and Murat Halstead, after a three days' visit, to write on the Philippine Islands. Everybody regrets the departure of all these gentlemen. General Merritt's mild rule here has made him beloved by all save the fire-eaters. With the departure of General Greene, the Philippine expedition loses its keenest man. It will be difficult to find a successor so able in the management of the fiscal affairs of the government. It is greatly to be regretted that with General Merritt, no one is going to Paris who has had a long residence in the islands and understands the resources of the country and nature of the people.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

OUR OCCUPATION OF PUERTO RICO.

DRAWN FROM LIFE BY T. DART WALKER, SPECIAL ARTIST FOR "HARPER'S WEEKLY" WITH THE AMERICAN FORCES.

1. General Brooke and Staff entering a Village—the fair Portorriqueñas watching "los Americanos." 2. Spanish Earthworks (on the Left) commanding the Military Road. 3. A comparison of American and Spanish Cavalry. 4. Spanish Soldiers at Mass—American Officers as interested Spectators.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

FROM GUAYAMA TO ST. JOHN.

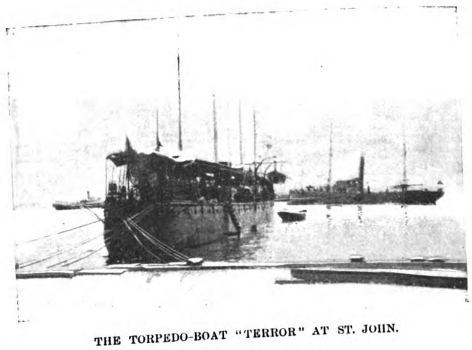
THE military road that winds among the mountains, and leads over them to join North with South—St. John with Ponce and (by a branch from Cayey) with Guayama—is broad and hard, and substantial withal. One is reminded that the Spaniard got his early instruction in the very important matter of road-making from that past master the Roman. It was not built to fade out from the hill-side and to be ploughed over eventually, like a New England highway. Day after day, forever, it may seem to be replying mañana to every destructive suggestion of the elements. And surely we should hope it will always be there, to lead many people to a wonderful point of view, near Cayey, where one stops if one is coming from the north, or turns if one is coming from the south, and looks down and out over intensely green plain and hill to the gray sea—to Guayama's two harbors, Arroyo and Jobos, beyond fields of sugar-cane like rich grass; beyond forests of hard-wood trees, among which palms bend like a vine to make their way upward to light and air above their sturdy companions, and then lift still higher a spear that, the natives say, is a natural lightning-rod; beyond groves where thousands of parrots in a flock are like a hovering green cloud. And perhaps you may stop or turn near Cayey, for the view, when it happens to be all hidden in mist; but in a moment the cloud lifts, not like a drop-curtain, but rather with such a disclosure as certain faces make in a smile of recognition.

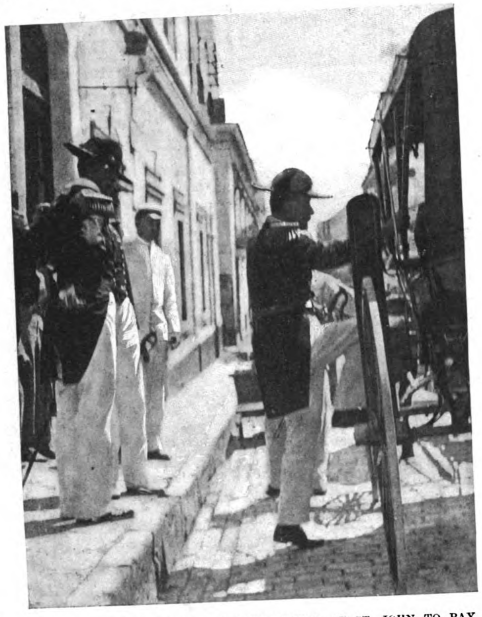
No doubt when the Indians called this island Borinquen the view was as fair; but long life to a good road, I say, that leads easily to beautiful points, and leads many.

General Brooke preferred to go northward by the military road, rather than by sea, when his duties as president of the Puerto Rico Evacuation Commission called him to the neighborhood of the capital city, St. John.* Whether he chose the land journey for its greater convenience or for his greater pleasure is a question that does not concern us now; but certainly it was a trip worth taking and well worth description, if one only could dwell upon its interest. Just before he set out, a cloud that had hidden at least some things for centuries had at last lifted from the whole island....



He was at Guayama, it will be remembered. At half past eight in the morning, on September 3, he started with his personal and general staff—about twenty-five members—and Company F of the Eighth Regiment of regulars and one troop of regular cavalry. About thirty army wagons carried supplies and baggage.

The first stop was made at noon on that day, when the peaceful cortége reached the Pablo Vasquez fortifications, which, less than three weeks before, our men had been about to attack, and did not attack merely because a message announcing the cessation of hostilities came in the nick of time. Here those who rode dismounted and those who drove alighted, and all were received by the Spanish troops drawn up in line, as shown in our first illustration. General Brooke, in the foreground, looking down the ranks that he fortunately had not been obliged to decimate, had his own thoughts, and kept them; seemed to admire the men, whose condition offered a striking contrast to that of the under-fed Spanish regiments in Cuba; walked the length of the line, as though the more fully to realize the change a fortnight had wrought.



This point, between Guayama and Cayey, is as strong as possible for defensive purposes, and was strongly held. It is not too much to say that the principal battle of the war might have occurred there (certainly the principal battle of the Puerto Rico campaign) if the message of peace had arrived a few minutes later, when the fight had once gained headway. About one thousand Spaniards, with their Mausers and modern artillery, were posted with the utmost skill. The road winds about so that our advance would have been made for six miles up hill, and all the way in range. Our artillery was in a position to shell the first intrenchments easily, but not to reach still stronger intrenchments beyond the crest of the mountain, where the main body of the enemy waited, practically concealed. Our officers did not even know of the existence of the latter force. One whose word should have great weight—Colonel Goethals of the Engineer Corps—said that we could not have captured the position within a week, if at all, with the force that was so eager to make the attack on August 13. "I'd like to have had one hundred men there [in the Spanish trenches], and I could have staved off any army"—such was his comment.

Now, instead of such a battle, see this exchange of hand-shakes and of gifts....

As soon as General Brooke had passed, the Spanish soldiers gathered on bluffs overlooking the road and waved good-by to the cavalry. Such gluttons for a view of their enemy were they! The visit was all too short; in fact, they would probably never have ceased being amazed at the size of the American horses, for their own were so small as to be almost covered up with the equipments.

THE TORPEDO-BOAT "TERROR" AT ST. JOHN.

ADMIRAL SCHLEY GOING FROM THE HOTEL AT ST. JOHN TO PAY AN OFFICIAL VISIT.

Striking northward, now on across the mountains.

At all the towns a certain uniformity of behavior; for the inhabitants of each had been instructed by a proclamation of Captain-General Macias to make no demonstration either for or against the Americans, but to receive them with the utmost courtesy. Accordingly, there was no cheering, but all the way through the heart of the island one might learn, on taking the trouble to talk with the people, that the sentiment was favorable to the new order of things, and to those who were to make the new order effective.

The townsmen of Cayey could be seen scurrying about to make hospitable preparation as the visitors approached; and when General Brooke arrived (this was at four in the afternoon, September 3) he found at his disposal the house of the principal citizen, and remained there overnight, while the troops went into camp on the outskirts.

At nine o'clock the next morning Cayey was left behind, and the way led to Caguas, a town in a valley that is said to contain about ten thousand persons. If that estimate is correct, then it may be stated that at least several thousand (to be quite moderate and well within the fact) were chiefly concerned to know "when the North Americans were going to get the Spanish troops out.... Why couldn't they be made to go immediately?"

At Caguas there were about two thousand Spanish troops, well paid, and with plenty of food, and yet anxious to get back to Spain. In the friendliness they manifested towards the visitors it was easy to distinguish a certain sense of relief, for they had had an idea, during the first two weeks of August, that twenty thousand men were to be sent against them. They had all expected to be killed. In the evening some of the American officers were entertained at the local club, while for the younger members of the staff there were music and conversation and refreshments at a private residence, and it was shown that Spanish throats are not incapable of American melodies, when the guitar accompanies them.

The third day's journey was from Caguas to Rio Piedras, from a region that is famous for its tobacco into a region that has more oranges—I was about to say, more than it knows what to do with, but that would be incorrect. The peasants would fill the carriages of correspondents and the officers' saddle-bags with oranges. A timid fellow would spill his basketful at a soldier's feet and run away in alarm. Approaching Rio Piedras, the cortége was met at five o'clock in the afternoon, September 5, by representatives of Captain-General Macias—a colonel and subordinate officers—who extended polite greetings, and conducted General Brooke to the Captain-General's summer home, which forthwith became headquarters. Spanish troops were drawn up all along the streets—an evidence of that concentration of forces near the capital mentioned in despatches during the campaign. It is fully eight miles from Rio Piedras to St. John, and, near the former, strong fortifications were seen in course of erection.

The Seneca, bringing the other members of the Evacuation Commission, Admiral Schley and General Gordon, arrived at the capital on September 6, and the commissioners' meeting with Macias took place promptly. The only Spanish officials present in the hall where the meeting occurred were two members of Macias's staff and the Captain-General himself.

The destroyer Terror, which was built in England, and was supposed to have a speed of about thirty-five miles an hour, is shown among our illustrations; and the story told by one of her crew gives a new version of her famous encounter with the St. Paul.

"There were articles in the papers for several days," he says, "announcing the intention of the brave Spanish commander to go out and sink the blockading vessel. On the day when she started on this errand regimental bands from the Plaza played inspiring airs and a great crowd of citizens hurrahed. And so she cast off and passed around Morro Castle, the crowd accompanying her as well as it could along the shore. Then the Terror made straight for the St. Paul under full speed—alone, although there were three gunboats in the harbor at the time. She was hit at a distance of about three miles, by a six-pounder once, and again by a five-inch shell. The latter crippled her, killing four (among these the chief engineer) and wounding seventeen. Then the Terror returned to the harbor; but the bands still played, for it was claimed that instead of finding one boat she had engaged the American fleet. The survivors were heroes."

MARRION WILCOX.

GENERAL BROOKE EYING CRITICALLY THE TROOPS THAT OPPOSED HIM NEAR CAYEY.

GENERAL BROOKE ARRIVES AT RIO PIEDRAS, AND IS RECEIVED BY SPANISH OFFICERS.

* "St. John," and not San Juan, the town has long been called by some of the Spanish-Americans when speaking English.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THE AWKWARD AGE.*

A Novel.

BY HENRY JAMES,

AUTHOR OF "DAISY MILLER," "AN INTERNATIONAL EPISODE," ETC.

V.

"GOOD-BY. He's off," Mrs. Brookenham, who had remained quite on her own side of the room, explained to her friend.

"Where's he off to?" this friend inquired with a casual advance and a look not so much at her hostess as at the cushions just rearranged.

"Oh, to some places. To Brander to-day."

"How he does run about!" And the Duchess, still with a glance hither and yon, sank upon the sofa to which she had made her way unaided. Mrs. Brookenham knew perfectly the meaning of this glance: she had but three or four comparatively good pieces, whereas the Duchess, rich with the spoils of Italy, had but three or four comparatively bad. This was the relation, as between intimate friends, that the Duchess visibly preferred, and it was quite groundless, in Buckingham Crescent, ever to enter the drawing-room with an expression suspicious of disloyalty. The Duchess was a woman who so cultivated her passions that she would have regarded it as disloyal to introduce there a new piece of furniture in an underhand way—that is without a full appeal to herself, the highest authority, and the consequent bestowal of opportunity to nip the mistake in the bud. Mrs. Brookenham had repeatedly asked herself where in the world she might have found the money to be disloyal. The Duchess's standard was of a height—! It matched, for that matter, her other elements, which were as conspicuous as usual as she sat there suggestive of early tea. She always suggested tea before the hour, and her friend always, but with so different a wistfulness, rang for it. "Who's to be at Brander?" she asked.

"I haven't the least idea—he didn't tell me. But they've always a lot of people."

"Oh, I know—extraordinary mixtures. Has he been there before?"

Mrs. Brookenham thought. "Oh yes—if I remember—more than once. In fact her note—which he showed me, but which only mentioned 'some friends'—was a sort of appeal on the ground of something or other that had happened the last time."

The Duchess was silent a moment. "She writes the most extraordinary notes."

"Well, this was nice, I thought," Mrs. Brookenham said—"from a woman of her age and her immense position to so young a man."

Again the Duchess reflected. "My dear, she's not an American and she's not on the stage. Aren't those what you call positions in this country? And she's also not a hundred."

"Yes, but Harold's a mere baby."

"Then he doesn't seem to want for nurses!" the Duchess replied. She smiled at her friend. "Your children are like their mother—they're eternally young."

"Well, I'm not a hundred!" moaned Mrs. Brookenham as if she wished with dim perversity that she were. "Every one, at any rate, is awfully kind to Harold." She waited a moment, to give her visitor the chance to pronounce it eminently natural, but no pronouncement came—nothing but the footman who had answered her ring and of whom she ordered tea. "And where did you say you're going?" she inquired after this.

"For Easter?" The Duchess achieved a direct encounter with her charming eyes—which was not, in general, an easy feat. "I didn't say I was going anywhere. I haven't, of a sudden, changed my habits. You know whether I leave my child—except in the sense of having left her an hour ago at Mr. Garlick's class in Modern Light Literature. I confess I'm a little nervous about the subjects and am going for her at five."

"And then where do you take her?"

"Home to her tea—where should you think?"

Mrs. Brookenham declined, in connection with the matter, any responsibility of thought; she did indeed much better by saying after a moment: "You are devoted!"

"Miss Merriman has her afternoon—I can't imagine what they do with their afternoons," the Duchess went on. "But she's to be back in the school-room at seven."

"And you have Aggie till then?"

"Till then," said the Duchess cheerfully. "You're off, for Easter, to—where is it?" she continued.

Mrs. Brookenham had received with no flush of betrayal the various discriminations thus conveyed by her visitor, and her only revenge, for the moment, was to look as sweetly resigned as if she really saw what was in them. Where were they going for Easter? She had to think an instant, but she brought it out. "Oh, to Pewbury—we've been engaged so long that I had forgotten. We go once a year—one does it for Edward."

"Ah, you spoil him!" smiled the Duchess. "Who's to be there?"

"Oh, the usual thing, I suppose. A lot of my lord's tiresome supporters."

"To pay his debt? Then why are you poor things asked?"

Mrs. Brookenham looked, on this, quite adorably—that is most wonderingly—grave. "How do I know, my dear Jane, why in the world we're ever asked anywhere? Fancy people wanting Edward?" she quavered with stupefaction. "Yet we can never get off Pewbury."

"You're better for getting on, cara mia, than for getting off!" the Duchess blandly returned. She was a person of no small presence, filling her place, however, without ponderosity, with a massiveness indeed rather artfully kept in bounds. Her head, her chin, her shoulders were well aloft, but she had not abandoned the cultivation of a "figure," or any of the distinctively finer reasons for passing as a handsome woman. She was secretly at war, moreover, in this endeavor, with a lurking no less than with a public foe, and thoroughly aware that if she didn't look well she might at times only, and quite dreadfully, look good. There were definite ways of escape, none of which she neglected and from the total of which, as she flattered herself, the air of distinction almost mathematically resulted. This air corresponded superficially with her acquired Calabrian sonorities, from her voluminous title down, but the colorless hair, the passionless forehead, the mild cheek and long lip of the British matron, the type that had set its trap for her earlier than any other, were elements difficult to deal with, and were all, at moments, that a sharp observer saw. The battle-ground then was the haunting danger of the bourgeois. She gave Mrs. Brookenham no time to resent her last note before inquiring if Nanda were to accompany the couple.

"Mercy, mercy no—she's not asked." Mrs. Brookenham, on Nanda's behalf, fairly radiated obscurity. "My children don't go where they're not asked."

"I never said they did, love," the Duchess returned. "But what then do you do with her?"

"If you mean socially"—Mrs. Brookenham looked as if there might be in some distant sphere, for which she almost yearned, a maternal opportunity very different from that—"if you mean socially, I don't do anything at all. I've never pretended to do anything. You know as well as I, dear Jane, that I haven't begun yet." Jane's hostess now spoke as simply as an earnest, anxious child. She gave a vague, patient sigh. "I suppose I must begin!"

The Duchess remained for a little rather grimly silent. "How old is she—twenty?"

"Thirty!" said Mrs. Brookenham with distilled sweetness. Then with no transition of tone: "She has gone for a few days to Tishy Grendon's."

"In the country?"

"She stays with her to-night in Hill Street. They go down together to-morrow. Why hasn't Aggie been?" Mrs. Brookenham went on.

The Duchess handsomely stared. "Been where?"

"Why, here—to see Nanda."

"Here?" the Duchess echoed, fairly looking again about the room. "When is Nanda ever here?"

"Ah, you know I've given her a room of her own—the sweetest little room in the world." Mrs. Brookenham never looked so happy as when obliged to explain. "She has everything there that a girl can want."

"My dear woman," asked the Duchess, "has she sometimes her own mother?"

The men had now come in to place the tea table, and it was the movements of the red-haired footman that Mrs. Brookenham followed. "You had better ask my child herself."

The Duchess was frank and jovial. "I would, I promise you, if I could get at her! But isn't that woman always with her?"

Mrs. Brookenham smoothed the little embroidered tea-cloth. "Do you call Tishy Grendon a woman?"

Again the Duchess had one of her pauses, which were indeed so frequent in her talks with this intimate that an auditor could sometimes wonder what particular form of relief they represented. They might have been a habit proceeding from the fear of undue impatience. If the Duchess had been as impatient with Mrs. Brookenham as she would possibly have seemed without them, her frequent visits, in the face of irritation, would have had to be accounted for. "What do you call her?" she demanded.

"Why, Nanda's best friend—if not her only one. That's the place I should have liked for Aggie," Mrs. Brookenham ever so graciously smiled.

The Duchess, hereupon, going beyond her, gave way to free mirth. "My dear thing, you're delightful. Aggie or Tishy is a sweet thought. Since you're so good as to ask why Aggie has fallen off, you'll excuse my telling you that you've just named the reason. You've known ever since we came to England what I feel about the proper persons—and the most improper—for her to meet. The Tishy Grendons are far from the proper."

Mrs. Brookenham continued to assist a little in the preparations for tea. "Why not say at once, Jane"—and her tone, in its appeal, was almost infantine—"that you've come at last to placing even poor Nanda, for Aggie's wonderful purpose, in the same impossible class?"

The Duchess took her time, but at last she accepted her duty. "Well, if you will have it. You know my ideas. If it isn't my notion of the way to bring up a girl to give her up, in extreme youth, to an intimacy with a young married woman who is both unhappy and silly, whose conversation has absolutely no limits, who says everything that comes into her head, and talks to the poor child about God only knows what—if I should never dream of such an arrangement for my niece I can almost as little face the prospect of throwing her much, don't you see? with any young person exposed to such an association. It would be in the natural order certainly"—in spite of which natural order the Duchess made the point with but moderate emphasis—"that, since dear Edward is my cousin, Aggie should see at least as much of Nanda as of any other girl of their age. But what will you have? I must recognize the predicament I'm placed in by the more and more extraordinary development of English manners. Many things have altered, goodness knows, since I was Aggie's age, but nothing is so different as what you all do with your girls. It's all a muddle, a compromise, a monstrosity, like everything else you produce; there's nothing in it that goes on all-fours. I see but one consistent way, which is our fine old foreign way and which makes—in the upper classes, mind you, for it's with them only I'm concerned—des femmes bien gracieuses. I allude to the immemorial custom of my husband's race, which was good enough for his mother and his mother's mother, for Aggie's own, for his other sisters, for toutes ces dames. It would have been good enough for my child, as I call her—my dear husband called her his—if, not losing her parents, she had remained in her own country. She would have been brought up there under an anxious eye—that's the great point: privately, carefully, tenderly, and with what she was not to learn—till the proper time—looked after quite as much as the rest. I can only go on with her in that spirit and make of her, under providence, what I consider a young person of her condition, of her name, of her particular traditions, should be. Voilà, ma chère. If you put it to me if I think you're surrounding Nanda with any such security as that, I can't help it if I offend you by an honest answer. What it comes to, simply stated, is that really she must choose between Aggie and Tishy. I'm afraid I should shock you were I to tell you what I should think of myself for packing my child, all alone, off for a week with Mrs. Grendon."

Mrs. Brookenham, who had many talents, had none perhaps that she oftener found useful than that of listening with the appearance of being fairly hypnotized. It was the way she listened to her housekeeper at their regular morning conference, and if the rejoinder ensuing upon it frequently appeared to have nothing to do with her manner, that was a puzzle for her interlocutor alone. "Oh, of course I know your theory, dear Jane, and I dare say it's very charming and old-fashioned and, if you like, aristocratic, in a frumpy, foolish old way—though even upon that, at the same time, there would be something too to be said. But I can only congratulate you on finding it more workable than there can be any question of my finding it. If you're all armed for the sacrifices you speak of, I simply am not. I don't think I'm quite a monster, but I don't pretend to be a saint. I'm an English wife and an English mother, and I live in the mixed English world. My daughter, at any rate, is just my daughter—thank heaven, and one of a good English bunch; she's not the unique niece of my dead Italian husband, nor doubtless either, in spite of her excellent birth, of a lineage, like Aggie's, so very tremendous. I've my life to lead, and she's a part of it. Sugar?" She wound up on a still softer note as she handed the cup of tea.

"Never! Well, with me," said the Duchess with spirit, "she would be all."

"'All' is soon said! Life is composed of many things," Mrs. Brookenham gently rang out—"of such mingled, intertwisted strands!" Then still with the silver bell, "Don't you really think Tishy nice?" she asked.

"I think little girls should live with little girls, and young femmes du monde so immensely initiated should—well," said the Duchess with a toss of her head, "let them alone. What do they want of them 'at all, at all'?"

"Well, my dear, if Tishy strikes you as 'initiated,' all one can ask is 'Initiated into what?' I should as soon think of applying such a term to a little shivering shorn lamb. Is it your theory," Mrs. Brookenham pursued, "that our unfortunate unmarried daughters are to have no intelligent friends?"

"Unfortunate indeed," cried the Duchess, "precisely because they're unmarried, and unmarried, if you don't mind my saying so, a good deal because they're unmarriageable. Men, after all, the nice ones—by which I mean the possible ones—are not on the lookout for little brides whose usual associates are so up to snuff. It's not their idea that the girls they marry shall already have been pitchforked—by talk and contacts and visits and newspapers, and the way the poor creatures rush about and all the extraordinary things they do—quite into everything. A girl's most intelligent friend is her mother—or the relative acting as such. Perhaps you consider that Tishy takes your place!"

Mrs. Brookenham waited so long to say what she considered that, before she next spoke, the question appeared to have dropped. Then she only replied, as if suddenly remembering her manners: "Won't you eat something?" She indicated a particular plate. "One of the nice little round ones?" The Duchess appropriated a nice little round one, and her hostess presently went on: "There's one thing I mustn't forget—don't let us eat them all. I believe they're what Lord Petherton really comes for."

The Duchess finished her mouthful imperturbably before she took this up. "Does he come so often?"

Mrs. Brookenham hesitated. "I don't know what he calls it; but he said yesterday that he'd come to-day. I've had tea earlier for you," she went on with her most melancholy kindness—"and he's always late. But we mustn't, between us, lick the platter clean."

The Duchess entered very sufficiently into her companion's tone. "Oh, I don't feel at all obliged to consider him, for he has not, of late, particularly put himself out for me. He has not been to see me since I don't know when, and the last time he did come he brought Mr. Mitchett."

"Here it was the other way round. It was Mr. Mitchett, last year, who first brought Lord Petherton."

"And who," asked the Duchess, "had first brought Mr. Mitchett?"

Mrs. Brookenham meeting her friend's eyes, looked for an instant as if trying to remember. "I give it up. I muddle beginnings."

"That doesn't matter, if you only make them," the Duchess smiled.

"No, does it?" To which Mrs. Brookenham added: "Did he bring Mr. Mitchett for Aggie?"

"If he did they will have been disappointed. Neither of them has seen, in my house, the tip of her nose." The Duchess announced this circumstance with a pomp of pride.

"Ah, but with your ideas that doesn't prevent."

"Prevent what?"

"Why, what you call, I suppose, the pourparlers."

"For Aggie's hand? My dear," said the Duchess, "I'm glad you do me the justice of feeling that I'm a person to take time by the forelock. It was not, as you seem to remember, with the sight of Mr. Mitchett that the question of Aggie's hand began to occupy me. I should be ashamed of myself if it were not constantly before me and if I had not my feelers out in more quarters than one. But I've not so much as thought of Mr. Mitchett—who, rich as he may be, is the son of a shoemaker and superlatively hideous—for a reason I don't at all mind telling you. Don't

* Begun in HARPER'S WEEKLY No. 2180.

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

FORGOT

TROOP C, 9TH U. S. CAVALRY, CAPTAIN TAYLOR, LEADING

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

HEROES.

Charge at San Juan.—Drawn by Fletcher C. Ransom.

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

be outraged if I say that I've for a long time hoped you yourself would find the right use for him." She paused—at present with a momentary failure of assurance, from which she rallied, however, to proceed with a burst of earnestness that was fairly noble: "Forgive me if I just tell you once for all how it strikes me. I'm stupefied at your not seeming to recognize either your interest or your duty. Oh, I know you want to, but you appear to me—in your perfect good faith, of course—utterly at sea. They're one and the same thing, don't you make out? your interest and your duty. Why isn't it as plain as a pikestaff that the thing to do with Nanda is simply to marry her—and to marry her soon? That's the great thing—do it while you can. If you don't want her downstairs—at which, let me say, I don't in the least wonder—your remedy is to take the right alternative. Don't send her to Tishy—"

"Send her to Mr. Mitchett?" Mrs. Brookenham unresentfully quavered. Her color, during her visitor's allocution, had distinctly risen, but there was no irritation in her voice. "How do you know, Jane, that I don't want her downstairs?"

The Duchess looked at her with an audacity confirmed by the absence from her face of everything but the plaintive. "There you are, with your eternal English false positions! J'aime, moi, les situations nettes—je n'en comprends pas d'autres. It wouldn't be to your honor—to that of your delicacy—that with your impossible house, you should wish to plant your girl in your drawing-room. But such a way of keeping her out of it as throwing her into a worse—"

"Well, Jane, you do say things to me!" Mrs. Brookenham blandly broke in. She had sunk back into her chair, her hands, in her lap, pressed themselves together, and her wan smile brought a tear into each of her eyes by the very effort to be brighter. It might have been guessed of her that she hated to seem to care, but that she had other dislikes too. "If one were to take up, you know, some of the things you say—" And she positively sighed for the fulness of amusement at them of which her tears were the sign.

Her friend could quite match her indifference. "Well, my child, take them up; if you were to do that with them, candidly, one by one, you would do really very much what I should like to bring you to. Do you see?" Mrs. Brookenham's failure to repudiate the vision appeared to suffice, and her visitor cheerfully took a further jump. "As much of Tishy as she wants—after. But not before."

"After what?"

"Well—say after Mr. Mitchett. Mr. Mitchett won't take her after Mrs. Grendon."

"And what are your grounds for assuming that he'll take her at all?" Then as the Duchess hung fire a moment: "Have you got it by chance from Lord Petherton?"

The eyes of the two women met for a little on this, and there might have been a consequence of it in the manner of the rejoinder. "I've got it from not being a fool. Men, I repeat, like the girls they marry—"

"Oh, I already knew your old song! The way they like the girls they don't marry seems to be," Mrs. Brookenham mused, "what more immediately concerns us. You had better wait till you have made Aggie's fortune, perhaps, to be so sure of the working of your system. Excuse me, darling, if I don't take you for an example until you've a little more successfully become one. The sort of men I know anything about, at any rate, are not looking for mechanical dolls. They're looking for smart, safe, sensible English girls."

The Duchess glanced at the clock. "What is Mr. Vanderbank looking for?"

Her hostess appeared to oblige her by anxiously thinking. "Oh, he, I'm afraid, poor dear—for nothing at all!"

The Duchess had taken off a glove to appease her appetite, and now, drawing it on, she smoothed it down. "I think he has his ideas."

"The same as yours?"

"Well, more like them than like yours."

"Ah, perhaps then—for he and I," said Mrs. Brookenham, "don't agree, I think, on two things in the world. You think poor Mitchy then," she went on, "who's the son of a shoemaker and who might be the grandson of a grasshopper, good enough for my child."

The Duchess appreciated for a moment the superior fit of her glove. "I look facts in the face. It's exactly what I'm doing for Aggie." Then she broke into a certain conscious airiness. "What are you giving her?"

But Mrs. Brookenham took without wincing whatever, as between a masterful relative and an exposed frivolity, might have been the sting of it. "That you must ask Edward. I haven't the least idea."

"There you are again—the virtuous English mother! I've got Aggie's little fortune in an old stocking, and I count it over every night. If you've no old stocking for Nanda, there are worse fates than shoemakers and grasshoppers. Even with one, you know, I don't at all say that I should sniff at poor Mitchy. We must take what we can get, and I shall be the first to take it. You can't have everything for ninepence." And the Duchess got up, shining, however, with a confessed light of fantasy. "Speak to him, my dear—speak to him!"

"Do you mean offer him my child?"

The Duchess laughed at the intonation. "There you are once more—vous autres! If you're shocked at the idea, you place drôlement your delicacy. I'd offer mine to the son of a chimney-sweep if the principal guarantees were there. Nanda's charming—you don't do her justice. I don't say Mr. Mitchett is either beautiful or noble, and he hasn't as much distinction as would cover the head of a pin. He takes, moreover, his ease in talk—but that," added the Duchess with decision, "is much a matter of whom he talks with. And after marriage, what does it signify? He has twenty thousand a year, an excellent idea of how to take care of it and a good disposition."

Mrs. Brookenham sat still; she only looked up at her friend. "Is it by Lord Petherton that you know of his excellent idea?"

The Duchess showed she was challenged, but also that she was indulgent. "I go by my impression. But Lord Petherton has spoken for him."

"He ought to do that," said Mrs. Brookenham—"since he wholly lives on him."

"Lord Petherton—on Mr. Mitchett?" The Duchess stared, but rather in amusement than in horror. "Why, hasn't he a—property?"

"The loveliest. Mr. Mitchett's his property. Didn't you know?" There was an artless wail in Mrs. Brookenham's surprise.

"How should I know—still a stranger as I'm often rather happy to feel myself here, and choosing my friends and picking my steps very much, I can assure you—how should I know about all your social scandals and things?"

"Oh, we don't call that a social scandal!" Mrs. Brookenham inimitably returned.

"Well, if you should wish to, you'd have the way that I told you of to stop it. Divert the stream of Mr. Mitchett's wealth."

"Oh, there's plenty for every one!"—Mrs. Brookenham kept up her tone. "He's always giving us things—bonbons and dinners and opera boxes."

"He has never given me any," the Duchess contentedly declared.

Mrs. Brookenham waited a little. "Lord Petherton has the giving of some. He has never in his life before, I imagine, made so many presents."

"Ah then, it's a shame one has nothing!" On which, before reaching the door, the Duchess changed the subject. "You say I never bring Aggie. If you like, I'll bring her back."

Mrs. Brookenham wondered. "Do you mean to-day?"

"Yes, when I've picked her up. It will be something to do with her till Miss Merriman can take her."

"Delighted, dearest; do bring her. And I think she should see Mr. Mitchett."

"Shall I find him too, then?"

"Oh, take the chance."

The two women, on this, exchanged, tacitly and across the room—the Duchess at the door, which a servant had arrived to open for her, and Mrs. Brookenham still at her tea table—a further stroke of intercourse, over which the latter was not, on this occasion, the first to lower her lids. "I think I've shown high scruples," the Duchess said, "but I understand, then, that I'm free."

"Free as air, dear Jane."

"Good." Then just as she was off, "Ah, dear old Edward!" the visitor exclaimed. Her kinsman, as she was fond of calling him, had reached the top of the staircase, and Mrs. Brookenham, by the fire, heard them meet on the landing—heard also the Duchess protest against his turning to see her down. Mrs. Brookenham, listening to them, hoped that Edward would accept the protest and think it sufficient to leave her with the footman. Their common sense, not devoid of satisfaction, that she was a kind of cousin, was quite consistent with a view, early arrived at, of the absurdity of any fuss about her.

VI.

When Mr. Brookenham appeared his wife was prompt. "She's coming back for Lord Petherton."

"Oh!" he simply said.

"There's something between them."

"Oh!" he merely repeated. But it would have taken many such sounds on his part to represent a spirit of response discernible to any one but his wife.

"There have been things before," she went on, "but I haven't felt sure. Don't you know how one has sometimes a flash?"

It could not be said of Edward Brookenham, who seemed to bend, for sitting down, more hinges than most men, that he looked as if he knew either this or anything else. He had a pale, cold face, marked and made regular, made even in a manner handsome, by a hardness of line in which, oddly, there was no significance, no accent. Clean-shaven, slightly bald, with unlighted gray eyes and a mouth that gave the impression of not working easily, he suggested a stippled drawing by an inferior master. Lean more over and stiff, and with the air of having here and there in his person a bone or two more than his share, he had once or twice, at fancy balls, been thought striking in a dress copied from one of Holbein's English portraits. But when once some such meaning as that had been put into him it took a long time to put another, a longer time than even his extreme exposure, or anybody's study of the problem, had yet made possible. If anything particular had finally been expected from him it might have been a summary of the things he had not said, but there was something in him that had long since pacified impatience and drugged curiosity. He had never in his life answered such a question as his wife had just put him and which she would not have put had she feared a reply. So dry and decent and even distinguished did he look, as if he had positively been created to meet a propriety and match some other piece, his wife, with her notorious perceptions, would no more have appealed to him seriously on a general proposition than she would, for such a response, have rung the drawing-room bell. He was none the less held to have a great general adequacy. "What is it that's between them?" he demanded.

"What's between any woman and the man she's making up to?"

"Why, there may often be nothing. I didn't know she even particularly knew him," Brookenham added.

"It's exactly what she would like to prevent any one's knowing, and her coming here to be with him when she knows I know she knows—don't you see?—that he's to be here, is just one of those calculations that are subtle enough to put off the scent a woman who has but half a nose." Mrs. Brookenham, as she spoke, appeared to testify, by the pretty star-gazing way she thrust it into the air, to her own possession of the whole of such a feature. "I don't know yet quite what I think, but one wakes up to such things soon enough."

"Do you suppose it's her idea that he'll marry her?" Brookenham asked in his colorless way.

"My dear Edward!" his wife murmured for all answer.

"But if she can see him in other places why should she want to see him here?" Edward persisted in a voice destitute of intonation.

Mrs. Brookenham had plenty of that. "Do you mean if she can see him in his own house?"

"No cream, please," her husband said. "Hasn't she a house too?"

"Yes, but so pervaded all over by Aggie and Miss Merriman."

"Oh!" Brookenham observed.

"There has always been some man—I've always known there has. And now it's Petherton," said his companion.

"But where's the attraction?"

"In him? Why, lots of women could tell you. Petherton has had a career."

"But I mean in old Jane."

"Well, I dare say lots of men could tell you. She's no older than any one else. She has also such great elements."

"Oh, I dare say she's all right," Brookenham returned as if his interest in the case had dropped. You might have felt you got a little nearer to him on guessing that, in so peopled a circle, satiety was never far from him.

"I mean for instance she has such a grand idea of duty. She thinks we're nowhere?"

"Nowhere?"

"With our children—with our home life. She's awfully down on Tishy."

"Tishy?"—Brookenham appeared for a moment at a loss.

"Tishy Grendon—and her craze for Nanda."

"Has she a craze for Nanda?"

"Surely I told you Nanda's to be with her for Easter."

"I believe you did," Brookenham bethought himself, "but you didn't say anything about a craze. And where's Harold?" he went on.

"He's at Brander. That is he will be by dinner. He has just gone."

"And how does he get there?"

"Why, by the South Western. They'll send to meet him."

Brookenham appeared to view this statement, for a moment, in the dry light of experience. "They'll only send if there are others too."

"Of course then there'll be others—lots. The more the better for Harold."

This young man's father was silent a little. "Perhaps—if they don't play high."

"Ah," said his mother, "however Harold plays, he has a way of winning."

"He has a way, too, of being a hopeless ass. What I meant was how he comes there at all," Brookenham explained.

"Why, as any one comes—by being invited. She wrote to him—weeks ago."

Brookenham was discoverably affected by this fact, but it would not have been possible to say if his satisfaction exceeded his surprise. "To Harold? Very good-natured." He had another short reflection, after which he continued: "If they don't send, he'll be in for five miles in a fly—and the man will see that he gets his money."

"They will send—after her note."

"Did it say so?"

Mrs. Brookenham's melancholy eyes seemed, from afar, to run over the page. "I don't remember—but it was so cordial."

Again Brookenham meditated. "That often doesn't prevent one's being let in for ten shillings."

There was more gloom in this view than his wife had desired to produce. "Well, my dear Edward, what do you want me to do? Whatever a young man does, it seems to me, he's let in for ten shillings."

"Ah, but he needn't be—that's my point. I wasn't at his age."

Harold's mother took up her book again. "Perhaps you weren't the same success! I mean at such places."

"Well, I didn't borrow money to make me one—as I have a sharp idea our young scamp does."

Mrs. Brookenham hesitated. "From whom do you mean—the Jews?"

He looked at her as if her vagueness might be assumed. "No. They, I take it, are not quite so 'cordial' to him, as you call it, as the old ladies. He gets it from Mitchy."

"Oh!" said Mrs. Brookenham. "Are you very sure?" she then demanded.

He had got up and put his empty cup back upon the tea table, wandering afterwards a little about the room and looking out, as his wife had done half an hour before, at the dreary rain and the now duskier ugliness. He reverted, in this attitude, with a complete unconsciousness of making for irritation, to a question they might be supposed to have dropped. "He'll have a lovely drive for his money!" His companion, however, said nothing, and he presently came round again. "No, I'm not absolutely sure—of his having had it from Mitchy. If I were, I should do something."

"What would you do?" She put it as if she couldn't possibly imagine.

"I would speak to him."

"To Harold?"

"No—that might just put it into his head." Brookenham walked up and down a little with his hands in his pockets; then, with a complete concealment of the steps of the transition, "Where are we dining to-night?" he brought out.

"Nowhere, thank Heaven. We grace our own board."

"Oh—with those fellows, as you said, and Jane?"

"That's not for dinner. The Baggers and Mary Pinthorpe and—upon my word I forget."

"You'll see when she comes," suggested Brookenham, who was again at the window.

"It isn't a she—it's two or three he's, I think," his wife replied with her indifferent anxiety. "But I don't know what dinner it is," she bethought herself; "it may be the one that's after Easter. Then that one's this one," she added with her eyes once more on her book.

"Well, it's a relief to dine at home"—and Brookenham faced about. "Would you mind finding out?" he asked with some abruptness.

"Do you mean who's to dine?"

"No, that doesn't matter. But whether Mitchy has come down."

"I can only find out by asking him."

"Oh, I could ask him." He seemed disappointed at his wife's want of resource.

"And you don't want to?"

He looked coldly, from before the fire, over her pretty, brown, bent head. "It will be such a beastly bore if he admits it."

"And you think poor I can make him not admit it?" She put the question as if it were really her own thought too, but they were a couple who could, even face to face and unlike the augurs behind the altar, think these things without laughing. "If he should admit it," Mrs. Brookenham threw in, "will you give me the money—?"

"The money?"

"To pay him back."

She had now raised her eyes to her husband, but, turning away, he failed to meet them. "He'll deny it."

"Well, if they all deny it," she presently remarked, "it's a simple enough matter. I'm sure I don't want

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google them to come down on us! But that's the advantage," she almost prattled on, "of having so many such charming friends—they don't come down."

This again was a remark of a sweep that there appeared to be nothing in Brookenham's mind to match; so that, scarcely pausing in the walk into which he had again fallen, he only said: "Who do you mean by 'all'?"

"Why, if he has had anything from Mitchy, I dare say he has had something from Van."

"Oh!" Brookenham returned, as if with a still greater drop of interest.

"They oughtn't to do it," she declared; "they ought to tell us, and when they don't it serves them right." Even this observation, however, failed to rouse in her husband a response, and, as she had quite formed the habit of doing, she philosophically answered herself. "But I don't suppose they do it on spec."

It was less apparent than ever what Edward supposed. "Oh, Van hasn't money to chuck about."

"Ah, I only mean a sovereign here and there."

"Well," Brookenham threw out after another turn, "I think Van, you know, is your affair."

"It all seems to be my affair!" she exclaimed with too dolorous a little wail to have other than a comic effect. "And of course then it will be still more so if he should begin to apply to Mr. Longdon."

"We must stop that before he applies," said Brookenham.

"Do you mean by warning Mr. Longdon and requesting him immediately to tell us? That won't be very pleasant," Mrs. Brookenham sighed.

"Well, then, wait and see."

She waited only a minute—it might have seemed that she already saw. "I want him to be kind to Harold, and I can't help thinking he will."

"Yes, but I fancy that that will be his notion of it—keeping him from making debts. I dare say one needn't trouble about him," Brookenham added. "He can take care of himself."

"He appears to have done so pretty well all these years," his wife mused. "As I saw him in my childhood I see him now, and I see now that I saw then even how awfully in love he was with mamma. He's too lovely about mamma," Mrs. Brookenham pursued.

"Oh!" her husband replied.

This delicate past held her a moment. "I see now I must have known a lot as a child."

"Oh!" her companion repeated.

"I want him to take an interest in us. Above all in the children. He ought to like us"—she followed it up. "It will be a sort of 'poetic justice.' He sees, himself, the reasons, and we mustn't prevent it." She turned the possibilities over a moment, but they produced another soft wail. "The thing is that I don't see how he can like Harold."

"Then he won't lend him money," said Brookenham.

This contingency too she considered. "You make me feel as if I wished he would—which is too dreadful. And I don't think he really likes me," she went on.

"Oh!" her husband again ejaculated.

"I mean not utterly really. He has to try to. But it won't make any difference," she next remarked.

"Do you mean his trying?" Brookenham inquired.

"No—I mean his not succeeding. He'll be just the same." She saw it steadily. "On account of mamma."

Her husband also, with his perfect propriety, put it before himself. "And will he—on account of your mother—also like me?"

Mrs. Brookenham weighed it. "No, Edward." She covered him with her loveliest expression. "No, not really, either. But it won't make any difference." This time she had pulled him up.

"Not if he doesn't like Harold, or like you, or like me?" Brookenham, clearly, found himself able to accept only the premise.

"He'll be perfectly loyal. It will be the advantage of mamma!" Mrs. Brookenham exclaimed. "Mamma, Edward," she brought out with a flash of solemnity—"mamma was wonderful. There have been times when I've felt that she's still with us, but Mr. Longdon makes it vivid. Whether she's with me or not, at any rate, she's with him—so that when he's with me, don't you see—?"

"It comes to the same thing?" her husband intelligently asked. "I see. And when was he with you last?"

"Not since the day he dined—but that was only last week. He'll come soon—I know from Van."

"And what does Van know?"

"Oh, all sorts of things. He has taken the greatest fancy to him."

"The old man—to Van?"

"Van to Mr. Longdon. And the other way too. Mr. Longdon has been most kind to him."

Brookenham still moved about. "Well, if he likes Van and doesn't like us, what good will that do us?"

"You would understand soon enough if you felt Van's loyalty."

"Oh, the things you expect me to feel, my dear!" Edward Brookenham lightly moaned.

"Well, it doesn't matter. But he is as loyal to me as Mr. Longdon to mamma."

The statement produced on Brookenham's part an unusual vision of the comedy of things. "Every Jenny has her Jockey!" Yet perhaps—remarkably enough—there was even more imagination in his next words. "And what sort of means—?"

"Mr. Longdon? Oh, very good. Mamma wouldn't have been the loser. Not that she cared. He must like Nanda," Mrs. Brookenham wound up.

Her companion appeared to look at the idea and then meet it. "He'll have to see her first."

"Oh, he shall see her!" Mrs. Brookenham affirmed. "It's time for her, at any rate, to sit downstairs."

"It was time, you know, I thought, a year ago."

"Yes, I know what you thought. But it wasn't."

She had spoken with decision, but he seemed unwilling to concede the point. "You admitted yourself that she was ready."

"She was ready—yes. But I wasn't. I am now," Mrs. Brookenham, with a fine emphasis on her adverb, proclaimed, as she turned to meet the opening of the door and the appearance of the butler, whose announcement—"Lord Petherton and Mr. Mitchett"—might, for an observer, have seemed immediately to offer support to her changed state.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

AN AMERICAN RAILROAD IN CHINA.

A COMBINATION of British and American capitalists is to take an important part in the opening of China. A syndicate, headed by Calvin S. Brice and F. P. Olcott, has obtained a concession to build a railroad from Han-kow, at the head of navigation on the Yang-tse-kiang River, south to Canton, and thence to the sea. The company has coal-mining privileges and other concessions, and it plans to develop trade between England and the United States and all the southern part of China, much of which has been until this time inaccessible to the white man. The surveying party, which sails from San Francisco for the Orient about the 10th of October, will carry on much of its work on ground heretofore unexplored, and in provinces which have furnished much of the seed of rebellion in China.

This concession, following quickly on the concession to a Belgian syndicate to complete the line from Peking to Han-kow, promises to give China, within five or six years, means of communication between the capital and the most southerly province of the empire by a railroad which will be so far inland as to be protected from a foreign foe except at its termini. It will afford a means of sending troops into the rebellious provinces to the south, and in that way will help assure the security of the reigning dynasty. But, what seems more important, this concession, providing for the construction of a road by American capitalists through the chief British sphere of influence, may give China that guarantee of the integrity of her empire which she has hoped to achieve by a combination of British and American trade interests, and through the joint influence of British and American diplomacy. This feature of the arrangement is one which will probably not be made public in detail. The concession will be a matter of public record in this country as soon as the report of our minister at Peking is received. Already it has been made public there through an imperial decree.

The concession has been granted to the American China Development Company, T. Sanford Beatty secretary and treasurer, an organization incorporated under the laws of New Jersey, with a capital of a million dollars; the stock of this company is owned by the Chinese Railway Syndicate. The chief members of this syndicate are representatives of the Standard Oil Company, the American Sugar-Refining Company, the Arbuckle Coffee Company, the Carnegie Steel and Iron Company (Limited); George F. Baker, president of the First National Bank; F. P. Olcott, of the Central Trust Company; E. R. Harriman, of the Union Pacific Railroad; C. A. Griscom, of the American Line; Arthur Sewall, of Maine; Edward R. Adams, John G. Moore, Grant B. Schley, Levi P. Morton, J. Pierpont Morgan, Sheldon & Company; Kuhn, Loeb, & Company; Maitland, Coppell, & Company; J. I. Waterbury, Henry W. Cannon, and James Stillman.

This syndicate has been in negotiation for a Chinese concession for three years, but some hitch has always occurred at critical moments, and nothing was accomplished. After $30,000 had been paid out for cable despatches, arrangements were made to carry on the negotiations at Washington instead of at Peking. The Chinese government gave authority to the minister at Washington, Mr. Wu Ting-Fang, to make a contract with the American China Development Company. The company authorized Mr. A. W. Bash to represent it at Washington. Mr. Bash went to Washington, accompanied by Mr. Thurlow Weed Barnes, and, sitting at a table in the Chinese Legation, with pad of paper and a pencil before him, he negotiated with the representative of 400,000,000 people a contract involving the expenditure of $40,000,000.

The Chinese minister sat opposite Mr. Bash. No intermediary was needed. Mr. Wu speaks English fluently. He was for some years a member of the English bar. He is a man of keen intelligence, with a thorough knowledge of Western civilization, and perhaps better informed as to the needs of his country than any other of her people.

As soon as Mr. Wu and the representative of the Brice syndicate agreed to a proposition, it was written down. On the 14th of April the contract was completed and signed; on the 21st of April it was ratified by the Emperor. One of its requirements was that a forfeit of $100,000 should be deposited by the syndicate. The declaration of war with Spain intervened to prevent the performance of the contract, but the Chinese government granted the syndicate an extension of time. Recently the forfeit was deposited, and preparations were made for sending the first party of engineers to China, headed by General William Barclay Parsons, recently chief engineer of the Rapid Transit Commission. At the same time arrangements were begun for floating the bonds which the Chinese government will issue for the construction of the road.

The concession negotiated at Washington grants to the syndicate the exclusive privilege of building a railway from Han-kow, which is 700 miles west of the mouth of the Yang-tse-kiang River, to Canton, and thence to the sea. There will be two southern termini, one at each side of the mouth of the Chu-kiang, or Canton River.

It is stipulated that the American company shall lend the money for the construction of the road, the amount depending on the report of the American engineers now be ing sent out. The cost is estimated at about $40,000,000, as the railway is to be built in a thoroughly substantial manner, on modern lines, and the company is to furnish docks and warehouses, and many connections to important towns. The main line will be about 900 miles long; the branches, 100 miles or more. The loan is to be based on an issue of imperial Chinese government guaranteed bonds, bearing five per cent. interest in gold. These bonds are issued to the syndicate at a small discount. They are to run for fifty years. At the expiration of that time the Chinese government has the privilege of cancelling the mortgage and taking possession of the entire property. It can retire the bonds in the interim in instalments at a fixed price above par. The work of survey is to be done at once, and the road is to be completed within three years of the time the survey is approved by the Director-General of Chinese Railways of the Southern District, Sheng Tajen.

Sheng is a very rich, able, and progressive Chinaman, a native of Canton, which is also the native city of Wu, and of Chang Yen-Huan, who was arrested just after the abdication of the Emperor, a few days ago. The progressive feeling in China seems to be centralized in Canton. Mutual loyalty in China is strong among the citizens of the same province or town. There is a strong Canton coterie in Peking, and it was through this influence that the American concession was obtained. Though Chang is in disgrace, Sheng is in favor with the Empress-Dowager, and Wu is a strong friend of Li Hung-Chang, whom he once served as legal adviser, so there seems little reason to fear that the change of administration will affect the standing of the American syndicate.

As to the security of the bonds, the members of the syndicate believe that is assured by the fact that all the great nations have now lent money to China, and are equally interested in preserving the integrity of her national debt.

The profits of the American company are to consist in part of preferential debenture bonds, which will be issued in consideration of the work of supervision, and the advance of capital for the building of the road. General Parsons's party, which will leave Han-kow in January or February to survey the route, will consist of about two hundred persons. There will be a military escort of more than one hundred soldiers, as the contract calls for government protection in the survey as well as during maintenance and operation. Sheng will co-operate with General Parsons, and will have Chinese delegated for this purpose. The American engineering force proper will consist of about ten men. Mr. Henry Frazier, late of Baltimore, the first assistant engineer, has preceded General Parsons. A. W. Bash, of Seattle, accompanies Mr. Frazier in a general advisory capacity as agent of the syndicate.

Chinese labor is to be used in the work of construction, and the American company is to establish a school for the education of Chinamen in railway management and operation, so that natives eventually can participate in positions of trust and responsibility. As they have good heads for mathematics, the natives will be used chiefly as station agents, bookkeepers, etc., not in the mechanical operation of the road.

The concession provides that the American company shall carry government troops, arms, and munitions of war at half rates in time of war or insurrection, and China stipulates that no interference or aggression from natives or any foreign source shall be permitted in the survey or operation of the road. A small commission is allowed the American company on the purchase of materials and the work of construction, except in respect to earth-work, which is to be done by natives.

The Belgian concession provides for a five-per-cent. loan of $21,712,500 at a discount of ten per cent., and gives the contractors the right to furnish supplies "at the lowest prices," but without the addition of any commission. The supplies are to be ordered equally from French and Belgian firms. In the case of the American contract, the business of furnishing supplies will be divided between England and America in proportions not determined. The Belgian line is to be completed to Han-kow in 1903. At present there are in operation in the Chinese Empire only a line from Tien-tsin to Peking, and a coal railroad fifteen miles long from Han-kow to Han-yang.

The provinces through which the railroad will pass contain nearly 120,000,000 inhabitants, and with improved sanitary regulations, which will follow civilization, this should increase greatly, as has the population in India under British rule. GEORGE GRANTHAM BAIN.

THE BATTLE OF OMDURMAN.

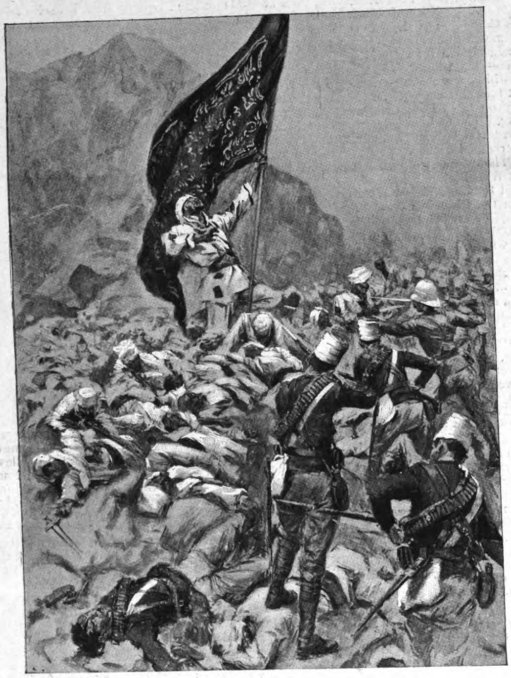
To get the full dramatic force of the event, one must turn back in the records of the Sudanese campaign to the page which tells of the battle of the Atbara, on the 8th of April (Good-Friday) of this year; for, in spite of the public interest in the Anglo-Egyptian advance, the fact has not been realized, until within the last few days, that the advance was unopposed. From a point just beyond the confluence of the Atbara River with the Nile, Sir Herbert Kitchener's army, proceeding southward, expected the enemy from week to week, almost from day to day, but the enemy did not appear. There was no opposition at the head of the Shabluka Cataract, nor even at Kerreri. Twenty-seven thousand men were suffered to draw near to the great city; at last they were in sight of it; then came the savage onslaught of the Khalifa, his son, his generals, and thirty-five thousand—or, as some of the estimates have it, fifty thousand—of his fanatic followers. The whole armed strength of Mahdism was disclosed at once, at last, at the gates of the capital. The Khalifa's choice was to leave no middle ground; to conquer and to annihilate the invaders as Hicks's army was annihilated in Kordofan in 1883; or, through defeat, to see the downfall of his religion, government, and country in one day.



And so, on another Friday, September 2, we find the Sirdar's army of Egyptian and Sudanese—but with a nucleus of British troops, all perfectly trained in every detail of the military art, with modern artillery, and with the support of five gunboats on the river—drawn up in a semicircle, resting on the west bank of the Nile just below Omdurman. The Dervishes confronted him with a much larger army; and they, too, had their own military art, which proved itself terribly effective little more than a decade ago, when the Mahdi conquered at pleasure and held vast districts, from the Blue Nile to the unexplored interior of the continent, against all comers.

Early in the morning the English general's scouts reported that the entire Dervish army was advancing. They had not cared to wait behind the strong walls of the city; they came on and on with an impetuosity which they believed nothing could withstand. But "we received their bold and determined attack in position," writes the Sirdar, "and after an hour's fighting, during which they endeavored to envelop both our flanks, we drove them off, about 6.30 A.M." This is the victor's very modest reference to the first charge of the Dervishes, which forms the subject of the largest drawing on page 1016. From the ranks of the invaders, British and Sudanese, poured a fire, beginning with section volleys at 2000 yards, that simply slaughtered line after line, until there were no more in that division of the Khalifa's army to come on. When the plain was covered with bodies of slain or wounded, and, as one English observer puts it, the linen garments of the dead made "a still carpet of white in front," General Kitchener ordered an advance against Omdurman, but was again heavily attacked on the right by a great force under the personal command

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

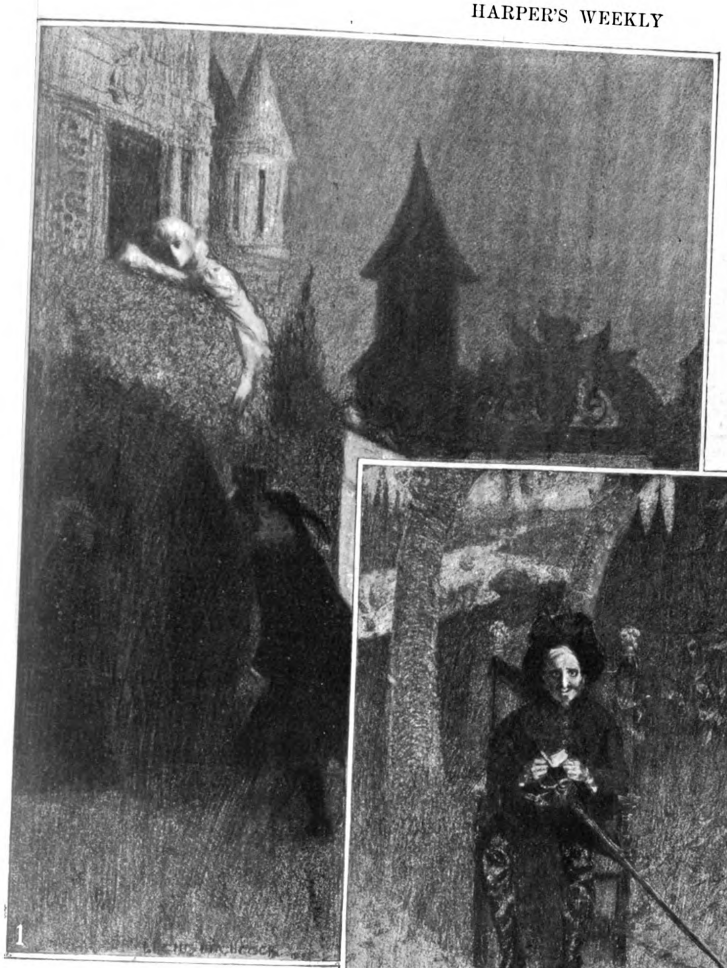
THE FIRST CHARGE OF THE DERVISHES.

THE FIGHT FOR THE KHALIFA'S STANDARD.

THE CHARGE OF THE 21st LANCERS.

THE BATTLE OF OMDURMAN, SEPTEMBER 2, 1898.—[See Page 1015.]

of the Khalifa. The charge of these men, "with sword and spear, with banners flying, and the war-cries 'God is most great!' and 'The Mahdi is God's prophet!' on their lips," is described as the most impressive spectacle that Europeans ever witnessed. But the sternly significant feature of it all is in danger of escaping observation. The men who showed this reckless unavailing courage were largely Arabians—of a conquering strain; the men who repulsed the rushes were largely Sudanese—blacks who had never been able to resist Arabians, until British officers took them in hand and made soldiers of them.



They were Sudanese who captured the Khalifa's black flag, at that crisis in the engagement when the standard-bearer's heroic conduct became conspicuous, even among a thousand examples of perfectly unshaken courage and savage daring. "His comrades all around him had been mowed down," writes one who was looking on, "and he himself alone was standing erect and unarmed, until, apparently riddled with bullets, he sank slowly to the ground, his master's flag still floating proudly over his mangled body."

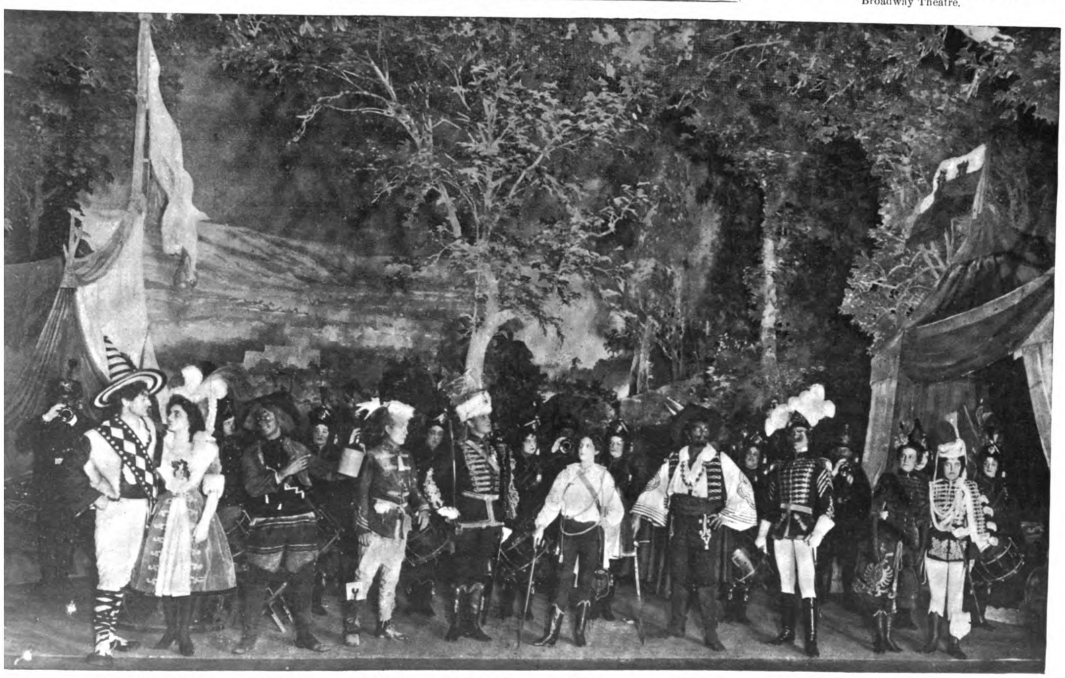
A splendid charge of the Twenty-first Lancers has been singled out for special praise, by universal consent; and with excellent reason, because, to speak truth quite plainly, it was a conspicuous demonstration of pure bravery on a day which gave the honors, so far as courage alone is considered, aside from achievement and organization and equipment, to the barbarians. The Dervishes got twelve or fifteen thousand of themselves killed, and never flinched; again and again, from sunrise to high noon, they charged with mounting fervor; not upon an enemy that they had a fair prospect of routing—no, but upon Death itself made visible. The Twenty-first Lancers, however, when they were caught in a position for which neither rule nor plan provided, did develop an instinctive joy in an unequal fight for the fight's own sake—a courage like Beówulf's. They also could be savages at a pinch.

The orders to Colonel Martin, who commanded the regiment, were to prevent the Dervishes from returning to the city. Now, in their zeal, they fixed their attention upon a small body of the enemy, about three hundred, and overlooked three thousand hidden in a ravine. Riding ahead so intently, they rode straight into the ambush. It was not then a question of turning the Dervishes back: they must get back themselves: they must go through. And so they did, plunging, slashing, thrusting till lances broke, shooting—employing every trick of horsemanship, using every weapon, laying about them with bent sword or stump of lance—until they got through.

And then they wanted to go back and through once more.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

"CYRANO DE BERGERAC" AT THE GARDEN THEATRE.



1. Act III., The Kiss. "Must I then bid thee mount?" Miss Margaret Anglin as Roxane. 2. The Death-Scene, Act V Mr. Richard Mansfield as Cyrano reading his last Letter to Roxane, supposed to have been written by Christian.

FRANCIS WILSON AS PETITPAS IN "THE LITTLE CORPORAL."

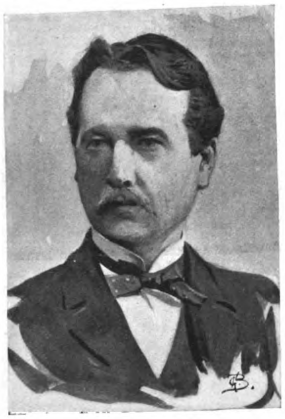
DENIS O'SULLIVAN AND LILLIAN BERRI IN "THE LITTLE CORPORAL,"
As performed by Francis Wilson's Company at the Broadway Theatre.



Mr. Herbert. Miss Sylva. Mr. Cawthorne. Mr. Golden. Mr. Rushworth. Miss Nielsen. Mr. Cowles. Mr. Nicholson.

THE CAMP TABLEAU IN ACT III. OF "THE FORTUNE-TELLER" AT WALLACK'S THEATRE.

AT THE PLAYHOUSES OF NEW YORK.—[See Page 1018.]

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

MUSIC

GEORGE W. CHADWICK.

THE WORCESTER FESTIVAL—"THE FORTUNE-TELLER."

A GENEROUS-MINDED pleasure should stir the hearts of many musical people besides those resident in that cheerful Massachusetts city, Worcester, in reading the critical record of its Forty-second Annual Festival. The occurrence occupied, according to custom, pretty much the whole of September's closing week. The audiences often were overflowing, and the usual influx of guests from New England in general was large. The deliverance of the fine old institution from the ignorances, from the prejudices, from the cant of a false attitude to their community's intelligence, on the part of the festival's ancient generalissimi, has been carried far. The judicious can regard the present policy not only as stable, but as honored by the city's hearty endorsement. The present festival directory have shown how clean a new broom can sweep, even where heavier refuse than cobwebs and dust must be sent flying. Last year a beginning was made, but with a qualified result. The festival lost money, too, and the conservative party—to give it as amiable a name as possible—in the town stood like Job's war-horse among the trumpets and said, "Ha, ha!" This year they are not neighing.

The Festival's Progress.

The changes made by the present management of the festival are surprisingly radical, when the apparent hopelessness of effecting them, even three or four seasons ago, is measured. They extend to the lessening of the festival's cumbersomeness—its crowded scheme of rehearsals and concerts. A high-handed rejection has gone forward as to music that is time-worn and trivial—so distinct a policy of putting into the programmes works less familiar and more dignified (especially in the purely orchestral numbers) that those of us who remember the old Worcester programme-books rub our eyes, and ask, "Can that be Worcester that delighted in Rossini's 'Moses in Egypt,' that rescued Spohr's 'Consecration of Tones' symphony from its harmless desuetude, that loved Tosti's ballads at a matinée, and de Kontski's 'Réveil de Lion' as a pianistic encore?" The festival is fairly in train to catch up with the music of the fullest modernity. Before long we shall expect to see Rimsky-Korsakov, Perosio, Bourgault-Ducoudray, Franck, and Bungert on its lists. Mr. Carl Zerrahn has been retired to that repose, so far as concerns Worcester, due to so patriarchal a conductor. Mr. George W. Chadwick, a sterling American composer and a conductor of decisive abilities, reigns in Mr. Zerrahn's stead. The festival's course has been redeemed also from its old office as a trial trip for new and ambitious youthful talent, or a dry dock in which leaking and ancient musical vessels were taken in to receive a critical overhauling. The soloists are selected from the ranks of authoritative or really rising artists; in any case competency and a proper ensemble are kept in view. The encore nuisance is discouraged—discouraged successfully in Worcester, where audiences of old always expected double work for their pay, and if they could have done so would have taken pattern from Leopold II. of Austria, who, when "The Secret Marriage" was produced, commanded "supper to be served to the artists—and the opera to be repeated."

The Improvements under the New Board.

It would appear by the consensus of trustworthy reports of the festival of 1898 that the chorus needs further pruning and building up, a more effective and leisurely system of private rehearsing, and many lessons in refinement and in self-dependence. These Mr. Zerrahn did not enough inculcate. There seems to be also the need of—what will surely come—a finer understanding of the spirit and methods of Mr. Chadwick. His own graceful cantata "The Lily Nymph" is spoken of as especially a victim of circumstances. I cannot see why the festival committee chose that work rather than Mr. Chadwick's stronger one, "Phœnix Expiranus," which has a high place among American scores, any more than I can understand the cause of their selecting Grieg's utterly unattractive "Olaf Trygvason." In that slate-colored score, Grieg's limitations as a composer in the largest forms are irritatingly plain. But the choral misfortunes of the conductor's own music were liberally expiated in the concerts which brought forward "Elijah" and Mr. Horatio Parker's "Hora Novissima." The orchestral repertory of the whole week was of an eloquence novel at Worcester. It spoke a volume in praise of the reformists—of what Schumann has called the March of the Davidites against the Philistines.

What the Festival still Needs.

The singers at this festival were, especially, Mesdames Johanna Gadski and Carl Alves; the Misses Marie Dow-ney, Gertrude May Stein, Sara Anderson, Minna Molka-Kellogg; Messrs. Ffrangcon Davies, Evan Williams, Mac-kenzie Gordon, Gwillym Miles, and Dudley Buck, Jr. The pianist was that sterling player and interpreter Miss Adele aus der Ohe, lately absent from America; the violinist was Mr. Ovide Musin, and the organist was Mr. J. Wallace Goodrich. The chorus was in numbers slightly below the announced four hundred. The orchestra was, as hitherto, from the Boston Symphony's force, and Mr. Franz Kneisel again acted as the assistant conductor. The work of Madame Gadski, Miss aus der Ohe, and Mr. Davies is spoken of by the Boston and New York reviewers with a warmth that leaves no doubt of the dignity with which those artists sustained their responsibilities. But it is of especial interest to New-Yorkers to read of a most particular success gained by one of the younger and relatively little-known soloists. This was Miss Anderson. Her Worcester appearances may be said to have suddenly directed to her the notice of the Eastern musical public as not before—almost to a youthful artist's "making a reputation" in an evening and afternoon of song. She is only about twenty-one. From this festival, she is likely to be a personality of distinction on the American concert-stage. Miss Anderson is a daughter of Mrs. Sarah Baron Anderson, one of our own city's local choir-singers, and an instructress of ability.

The Festival's Artists.

What, pray, are the objects and duties of a music festival, whether it be at Birmingham, or along the Lower Rhine, or in Yankee Worcester? To raise and to keep on raising the standards of local taste; to maintain in healthful movement the currents of sound musical feeling that make for art's righteousness; to publish, by the best possible performances, the new works of merit and mark, or to deal worthily with old ones of perennial life and undiminishable value. In a word, a music festival must educate and confirm. On these commandments hang such minor ones as are proper to one or another community's special musical tutelage. The mistake that the old government of the Worcester Festival made (and was determined to make in perpetuo) was its undervaluation of a great city's intelligence; the idea that a musical initiative was successful in proportion to its pecuniary profits; and, regretfully be it added, the mistake of loving charlatanism and of leaning toward inner personal considerations in the matter of a public performance. But the spirit of a new existence has been breathed into the Worcester Festival almost at an eleventh hour. There is yet much to be remedied, many elements of change to be demonstrated that will advance on its present aid toward health. But the outlook is bright for a new era in a large New England city's chief musical concern—one that can be potent far beyond Worcester—and for a gracious estate that by no possibility could have come to it under the former control.

What any Festival should Mean.

SARA ANDERSON.

Copyright, 1898, by Rockwood.

In operatic jottings, a word more should be given the merits of Mr. Victor Herbert's "The Fortune-Teller" at Wallack's. Musically, "The Fortune-Teller" is incomparably the best of the five or six comic operas now in the local notice. Mr. Herbert is a composer of no ordinary invention and much technical security. He has shown this in at least one serious concert-work. The libretto of "The Fortune-Teller," by Mr. Harry B. Smith, is sufficiently amusing, but it is not a firm enough basis for the musical structure that Mr. Herbert builds. Mr. Smith's muse is not one of fire, and in making up its pages of text it ascends no nearer to the highest realms of libretto invention than an ordinary two pair front. The subject, as a fact, goes back to the early growth of comic-opera plots, and though it still diverts, it is of the Sandstone stratum of libretto geology. But Mr. Herbert has written a first act, and much of a second one, with a richness of melodic contents and with a solidity in his orchestration and voice-writing unusual in such a piece—worthy of a more serious subject. Only in the last act do cheapness and indeed vulgarity of operatic utterance betray themselves. "The Fortune-Teller" being nominally Hungarian in scenes, Mr. Herbert has imitated or imported a Magyar accent to several of his numbers with beautiful success, though, oddly enough, he has failed, quite, in giving a genuine cast to a little negro-melody episode later in the score. "The Fortune-Teller" is likewise the best done of all its fellowship now with us. Principals, chorus, and a really artistic mounting unite in this effect. Miss Alice Nielsen has not merely beauty, piquancy, and a great deal of gaminerie, but a fresh and trained voice. Doubtless her provincialisms of accent will pass away in time. Mr. Frank Rushworth, who, along with Mr. Eugene Cowles, has most of the singing allotted to the male voices, is as agreeable and manly an English tenor as we have heard in many seasons—a singer hitherto identified with the musical pieces at Daly's Theatre, whither he came from London. Furthermore, scenery that has actual composition, that looks like the landscape of a particular foreign land, and shows "atmosphere" is so rare an embellishment of operatic pieces here that "The Fortune-Teller" may be praised for standing out from the crowd in this detail. The humor of the piece, after its opening scenes, is more dependent than it should be on skill to make bricks without straw. Mr. Joseph Herbert, Mr. Joseph Cawthorne—item, his concertina—and Mr. Richard Golden jointly and severally show great good-will in their labors, Mr. Cawthorne in especial.

"The Fortune-Teller."

E. IRENÆUS STEVENSON.

DRAMA

"CYRANO DE BERGERAC" at the Garden Theatre was so interesting in all respects, and so excellent in many, that it deserves to be judged by the highest poetic and dramatic standards. So judged, it had marked defects.

Mr. Mansfield made his initial mistake in the nose. It will be remembered that M. Coquelin and M. Rostand staged the play in conference and in harmony, not to say mutual adoration. That bulbous nose of Coquelin's, then, is double half-marked. Why did Mr. Mansfield make it long and thin? Apparently to make it agree with the lines. It surely comes nearer to preceding him by a quarter of an hour; it would dip in his cup when he drank; little birds could light on it—as they could not on Coquelin's nose. But what has become of that splendid rhetoric of Cyrano's—that wonderful speech in which he instructs the Viscount as to what flowers of hyperbole the nose might have inspired in a man of imagination? It has become plain fact. The little birds could have lighted on that nose; to mention the fact is to be almost as literal as the Viscount was when he called it "very big." Or perhaps Mr. Mansfield had another reason. In the full-face view the nose is scarcely noticeable, and in the most affecting passages Mr. Mansfield kept his nose to the front. Unfortunately, in making it fit the lines, or his convenience, Mr. Mansfield has departed so far from the possibilities of nature that the nose has ceased to be legitimately grotesque. It is neither hideous nor amusing. It is not the nose of Cyrano, the nose to hang a play on.

A Prosaic Nose.

To carry off Coquelin's nose requires an actor so full of force and exuberance that the grotesque becomes a normal mode of expression. Every syllable of the original spits fire; every speech moves like a rocket. The part has the mental exaltation of France in it, that runs wild at times in Gascon madness. Mr. Mansfield lacks the gayety and valor of the South, the ebullient virtue of irresponsibility. At vital moments in the play the vital touch is lacking. One wonders why one is not amused and cheered when Cyrano is cheering the hungry cadets, why one does not shed tears outright when Cyrano dies. Mr. Mansfield's manner is quite British. He has repose, but it is not the repose the fulness of nature brings; it is a sort of triple-expansion repose that makes his voice sharp and choppy. In the death-scene it fairly barks. There is scarcely a gleam of the fire that burns and blazes; one looks in vain for the oil and wine of the South. His performance is clever, interesting, stirring in places; but unless one is forced to give himself over to the intoxication of the play, he has not known that impossibly splendid thing Cyrano de Bergerac, the Gascon soldier-poet.

Cyrano de Piccadilly.

Having made detractions, the mind turns irresistibly to the extenuations. A drama that is also a poem must inevitably lose much on the stage—Shakspere loses almost as much as he gains. Not a few of Mr. Mansfield's shortcomings are chargeable to the translation. The original is of course in rhymed Alexandrines, which has been the conventional dramatic form in France for centuries, and is used for the lightest modern comedy as well as for the heaviest tragedy. In the English drama, rhyme has always proved a failure. Shakspere worked away from it early in his apprenticeship, and Dryden acknowledged, near the end of his life, that it was a mistake. Even blank verse, our national form, is in its last throes. If Mr. Mansfield's translator had tried to put into English the varied swing, the edge and the fire, of M. Rostand's verse, that would have been interesting; if he had tried to translate the traditional French form into the traditional English form, that would have been respectable. It is probable, however, that a skilfully modulated prose, such as our ears are used to on the stage, would have succeeded in preserving most of the quality of the original. Mr. Mansfield's translator has jumbled prose, blank verse, and rhymes into unspeakable chaos. The rhymed passages, when they occur, sound like improvisations of the kind Cyrano indulges in during the duel. And part of the audience, at least, naïvely construed them as such! And that doggerel crops out throughout the death scene!

Cyrano, thou art translated!

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google
Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE

As for the poetry of the lines, when Cyrano says:

"Grâce à vous, une robe a passé dans ma vie,"

Mr. Mansfield's translator ambles into—

"Thanks to you, I have at least a friend."

That is literary slaughter. Pope's rhymed version of Homer reminded Macaulay of Peter Quince's outcry when he saw bully Bottom with an ass's head: "Bless thee, Bottom! bless thee! thou art translated." ....Bless thee, Cyrano! bless thee!

Yet, in spite of his limitations, Mr. Mansfield triumphed. His scenes were truly gorgeous, and the multitudes that thronged the stage were marvellously well drilled. It is probable that no more thoroughly artistic staging has been done by an American manager. Mr. A. G. Andrews conceived the part of Ragueneau with admirable sympathy, and played it with thorough command of his powers. As Roxane, Miss Margaret Anglin has established herself as an unusually competent leading lady, playing with a certainty of effect far beyond her meagre experience. In the Balcony scene and at Christian's death there was a fulness of passion thoroughly adequate to the part. As for Mr. Mansfield, his many and varied services to our stage make it easy for us to forgive him for not being a Gascon! Whatever his limitations, there is no actor in America that could approach him in the part, and the English stage would have to prove its superiority. He is virile always, and always expert in his effects. And we all owe it to the dignity of his ambition that we are reading and seeing the most beautiful poem and the best play in many a year.

A Dignified Ambition.

The production of "Cyrano" in America has raised certain most difficult and delicate questions of professional etiquette and honor. The fact that the text of the play had been published and not copyrighted made it impossible for M. Rostand to guarantee protection against piracy. When Mr. Mansfield was negotiating for the authorized production this fact was made clear. Nevertheless, Mr. Mansfield paid a thousand dollars in advance royalties, and contracted to pay M. Rostand five per cent. on the first five thousand dollars gross weekly receipts, and ten per cent. on all sums above. These terms M. Rostand's representative, Miss Elizabeth Marbury, officially characterizes as "liberal." Miss Marbury relates that when she warned Mr. Mansfield that M. Rostand could not guarantee him against piracy, he replied, "I should not dream of presenting the play without paying the author, and I do not believe there is a manager in this country who will not respect M. Rostand's rights and mine in accordance with every rule of professional etiquette, courtesy, and honor." With this opinion M. Rostand, if we can trust a rumor, does not agree. He is quoted as saying: "My play can be stolen by Yankees in spite of my moral ownership. They will steal it, for they are a nation of thieves."

Professional Etiquette and Honor.

When Mr. Daly decided to produce the play, he heeded professional etiquette to the extent of assuring Mr. Mansfield's manager that he would not produce it in competition with Mr. Mansfield. On hearing of Mr. Daly's intention, Mr. W. A. Brady, who is known to fame for many things, notably his management of Mr. James J. Corbett, and who has not for some time been on good terms with Mr. Daly, decided to put six companies on the road—6 Cyranos 6. Mr. Brady did not promise to heed the professional courtesy even to the extent of avoiding Mr. Daly's towns. It rather appears that he is to get up his six Cyranos chiefly to annoy Mr. Daly. Mr. Daly and Mr. Brady are of course both shielded by the law. Mr. Mansfield is suffering from the fact that he did not choose to live up to the name M. Rostand has given us.

Give a Dog a Name.

Some of the features of the Daly-Brady combinations are almost humorous. "Cyrano" is perhaps the most wonderful example extant of a play in which a multitude of scenes and characters are calculated to throw into prominence a single figure. Whenever Cyrano appears he is the dominating character, and he appears in about seven out of every ten pages. Mr. Daly has altered the book so that the leading figure is Miss Ada Rehan, who takes the part of Roxane. He has cut the famous speech describing a kiss out of Cyrano's part and given it to Miss Rehan, and has eliminated the great death-scene. One can only hope that M. Rostand does not share Cyrano's repugnance to having his verse tampered with—"My blood freezes at the idea of any one changing a comma!" Mr. Brady has surpassed even this. Not satisfied with six Cyranos six, he has announced that if Mr. James J. Corbett pulls off his fight with Mr. Kid McCoy, he will cast Mr. James J. Corbett in the part of Cyrano. When M. Rostand hears of the honors thrust upon his work in America, he may perhaps revise his opinion of us as a nation. I say perhaps.

Cyrano de James J. Corbett.

It is announced that W[illegible] & Fields will burlesque Cyrano in the manner of "Tess of the Weberfields" and "The Corn-Curers."

Cyra-nit uf de Weberfields.

When a humble member of Mr. Daly's company heard of this, he is said to have quietly remarked: "Thank Heaven! We are two weeks ahead of them." JOHN CORBIN.

THE "BROOKLYN" AT SANTIAGO.

LIEUTENANT A. C. HODGSON, U.S.N., the navigator of the U.S.S. Brooklyn, writes to say that HARPER'S WEEKLY has done an injustice to that ship in the statement that during the chase of Cervera's fleet she was "so far out at sea....that the distance between her and the Colon was five miles, so that her 8-inch shots could not reach the Spanish ship. Indeed, the only shots that carried to the Colon were the 13-inch shots of the Oregon." Lieutenant Hodgson says that, instead of this being true, the Brooklyn was within range of the Colon after 12.45, and until she hauled down her colors. He also says that the Brooklyn had drawn to within eight thousand yards of the Spanish ship at that time, and that the last gun fired from her was from the forward 8-inch gun at a range of 6800 yards—"not quite three and a half miles." He adds that this shot carried to the Colon. We do not wish to be guilty of any injustice to the Brooklyn, nor to any other ship that participated in this splendid action, but we are inclined to think—although Lieutenant Hodgson is firmly convinced of the accuracy of his observation—that he is mistaken. No one has claimed that the Brooklyn was at any time inside the Oregon during the run which ended in the destruction of the Spanish ships. Indeed, she has always been stated to have been outside the Oregon from eight hundred yards, which is the estimate of some of the officers of the Brooklyn, to fifteen hundred or two thousand yards, which is the estimate of other officers in a position to judge. She was, by all accounts, a little forward of the Oregon's port beam when the Colon turned inshore. The statement that was made by the WEEKLY is supported by the official report of the Oregon, which is to be read in connection with the fact already mentioned as to the relative positions of the two ships. The Oregon reports that her 8-inch guns did not reach, and that she fired her 13-inch guns first at 8500 yards, then at 9000 yards, then at 9500 yards, and finally at 8900 yards. The last shot is reported generally as falling near the starboard quarter of the Colon. If the Oregon fired at such ranges—and it is to be presumed her officers knew the distances, as they had fired several times—it would hardly seem possible that a ship considerably further seaward could be as close as Lieutenant Hodgson thinks the Brooklyn was.

ADVICE TO MOTHERS.—MRS. WINSLOW'S SOOTHING SYRUP should always be used for children teething. It soothes the child, softens the gums, allays all pain, cures wind colic, and is the best remedy for diarrhœa. —[Adv.]

MODERN CIVILIZATION.

IT is observed that nature's supply of food for infants is lacking in the higher civilization; but the deficiency is perfectly supplied by the use of the Gail Borden Eagle Brand Condensed Milk.—[Adv.]

THE best appetizer, the surest aid to digestion: ABBOTT'S—The ORIGINAL ANGOSTURA BITTERS.—[Adv.]

NO well-regulated household should be without DR. SIEGERT'S ANGOSTURA BITTERS.—[Adv.]

USE BROWN'S Camphorated Saponaceous DENTIFRICE for the TEETH. 25 cents a jar.—[Adv.]

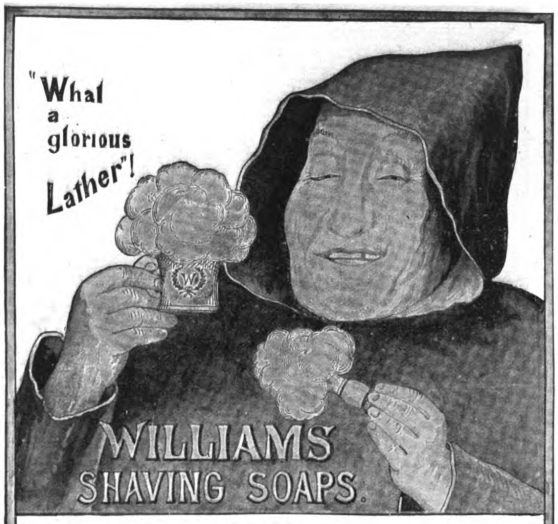
ADVERTISEMENTS.

The Improved BOSTON GARTER

Is the recognized STANDARD for MEN'S WEAR.

Keeps the Stocking Free from Wrinkles

DOES NOT BIND



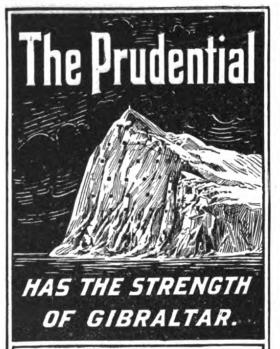
THE Velvet Grip CUSHION BUTTON CLASP

Lies flat to the leg. Does not tear the stocking, and will not unfasten accidentally.

SOLD EVERYWHERE

Sample Pair by Mail { Silk, 50c. Cotton, 25c.

GEORGE FROST CO. BOSTON, MASS.

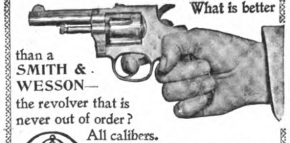


IT'S THIS GLORIOUS, rich, creamy lather—so softening, soothing and refreshing, so delicately fragrant and invigorating—that robs shaving of all its terrors, and has given Williams' Shaving Soaps world-wide fame.

Williams' Shaving Soaps are sold everywhere, but sent by mail if your dealer does not supply you.

Williams' Shaving Stick, 25 cents. Luxury Shaving Tablet, 25 cents.
Genuine Yankee Shaving Soap, 10 cents. Swiss Violet Shaving Cream, 50 cents.
Williams' Shaving Soap (Barbers') 6 round cakes, 1 lb., 40 cts. Exquisite also for Toilet.
Trial Cake for 2c. Stamp.

THE J. B. WILLIAMS CO., GLASTONBURY, CONN.
LONDON, 64 Great Russell St., W. C. SYDNEY, AUSTRALIA, 161 Clarence St.
Williams' Glycerated Tar Soap, 15c.



LIFE INSURANCE POLICIES
$15 to $50,000
Furnish absolute Protection to the Whole Family
Write for Information
THE PRUDENTIAL INSURANCE CO.
...OF AMERICA...
John F. Dryden, Pres. Home Office: Newark, N. J.

Invented by the well-known authority on diseases of the scalp, Dr. P. J. Eichhoff, Professor of Dermatology, Elberfeld, Germany.
Experience has shown that all other specifics recommended for these purposes have proved failures.
Send for circular.
SOLE U. S. AGENTS,
MÜLHENS & KROPFF, . . NEW YORK.

An Ounce of Prevention

What is better than a SMITH & WESSON—the revolver that is never out of order?
All calibers.
Write for descriptive catalogue.
SMITH & WESSON,
15 Stockbridge St., Springfield, Mass.

BOKER'S BITTERS
The oldest and best Specific against dyspepsia; an appetizer and a promoter of digestion.
Ask your Grocer, Liquor Dealer, or Druggist.

WALLINGFORD, CONNECTICUT.
ROSEMARY HALL, a Country School for Girls.
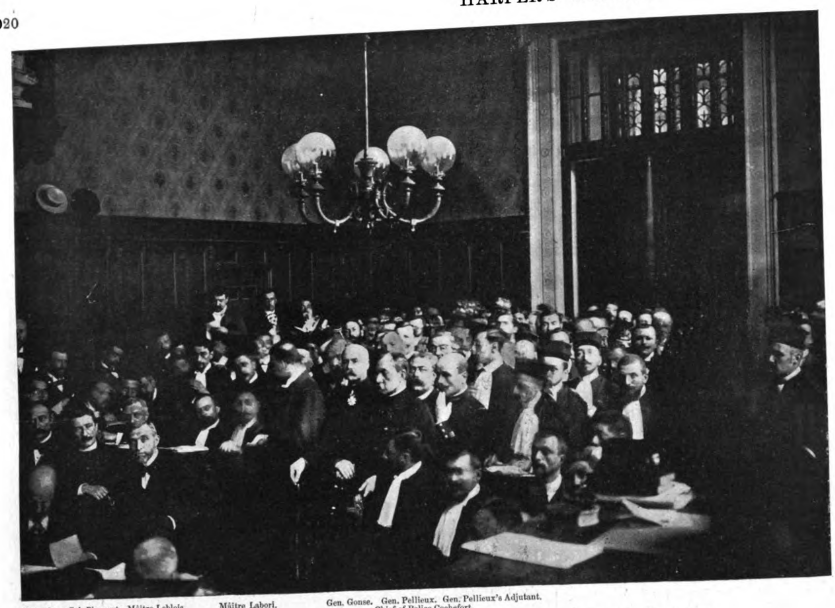
MISS RUNTZ-REES, Principal.
Ninth year begins Oct. 1, 1898.

Financial

Letters of Credit.



Bills of Exchange bought and sold. Cable Transfers to Europe and South Africa. Commercial and Travellers' Letters of Credit. Collections made.

Brown Brothers & Co.,
BANKERS, No. 59 WALL STREET.

THE HAIR, 27th Ed., 25c. (or stamps). Why it Falls Off, Turns Grey, and the Remedy. By Prof. HARLEY PARKER. A. N. LONG & CO., 1013 Arch St., Phila., Pa.
"Every one should read this little book."—Athenæum.

THE CELEBRATED
SOHMER
Heads the List of the Highest-Grade Pianos.
Caution.—The buying public will please not confound the genuine SOHMER Piano with one of a similar-sounding name of a cheap grade.
Our name spells—
S—O—H—M—E—R
New York Warerooms
SOHMER BUILDING
Fifth Ave., cor 22d St.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Detective. Col. Picquart. Maître Leblois. Maître Labori. Gen. Gonse. Gen. Pellieux. Gen. Pellieux's Adjutant. Chief-of-Police Cochefort.

COLONEL PICQUART'S HEARING ON THE CHARGE OF SLANDERING THE FRENCH ARMY.
PHOTOGRAPH TAKEN ESPECIALLY FOR "HARPER'S WEEKLY."—[SEE PAGE 1006.]

THE FUNERAL OF AN EMPRESS.

IT was night in Vienna when the body of the murdered Empress was brought home to the old palace; flaming torches lighted the open space between the black lines of people, held back by soldiers.

A troop of Hungarian horsemen in their brilliant uniforms, a broad open space, and then came the great hearse, drawn by eight black horses. Silk-stockinged grooms in black cocked hats walked at their side. Astride the front left horse was another servant, and, on either side of the hearse, two mounted bearers of torches. The giant household guards walked in two lines on each side, broadening out the front of the procession to the curbs; mounted guards brought up the rear; and so, darkly, the Empress was brought home to the walls which, for more than three hundred years, have looked upon the sorrows and joys of the royal family. "Nothing has been spared me. I had hoped that the jubilee year would pass in peace," said the Emperor, when this last grief came to him.

Early upon the morning after the arrival of the funeral train the streets about the palace were busy with preparations for the crowd, which had begun to gather in line to file past through the chapel where the body lay in state. The sidewalk was blocked with people held in by mounted policemen; for hours they stood packed tightly, the sun burning down on their heads; women fainted, as usual, and the struggle continued all day and part of the next. Inside the chapel the air was still and heavy with the perfume of flowers and the smoke of dozens of large candles arranged about the coffin and throwing into relief the figures of the guards, who stood like statues, with spear and sword. The Hungarians were given the post of honor at the head of the coffin, and in their bewildering splendor looked unreal; with large fur busbys from which rose a great plume, a leopard-skin thrown over the left shoulder, red uniform completely covered with gold lace and decorations, a crape sash across the breast, and glittering sword held rigid, they were like two wax-work figures, as far as movement was discernible.

Giants with long spears, immense white-plumed helmets, red tunics with white facings, tight white leggings with enormous boots half-way up the thigh—the inner palace guards—stood next in rank; and the outer palace guards, in black-plumed helmets, black tunics, and swords, completed the picture. The plain people wound around in solemn line, passing without pause, and gazing their fill at the splendors relieved in the candle-light against the jet black hangings of the chapel.

The final funeral procession wound out of the palace at four o'clock in the afternoon, after a great deal of elaborate preparation and coming and going of priests and nobles, lackies and civil functionaries.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

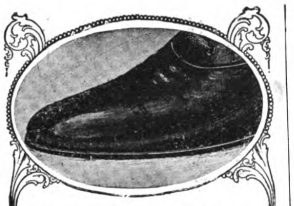
GREAT WESTERN Champagne is more acceptable to palate and stomach than imported wines because of its

UNQUESTIONED PURITY.

Touches the pocket lightly—yet fills the bill.



Served at all first class Clubs, Cafes and Buffets everywhere.

The vintage now marketed is especially pleasing and very dry.

Pleasant Valley Wine Co.,

SOLE MAKERS,
Rheims, - N. Y.

Sold by { H. B. Kirke & Co., New York. S. S. Pierce Co., Boston.

A Well-Kept Shoe

is a comfort and credit to the wearer. A soft, pliable, comfort-giving shoe looks better and wears better than one that's stiff and unyielding.

VICI Leather Dressing

will not only polish your shoes but make them soft. It's a medicine for leather. The ingredients of VICI LEATHER DRESSING are used in finishing the most famous shoe leather in the world—Vici Kid. That's a little secret you didn't know before. There's a book full of just such secrets about shoes and their care, that you can have if you will send us your name and address.

ROBERT H. FOERDERER, Philadelphia, Pa.

A Genuine Protection—
KNOX HAT

LOOK FOR ABOVE TRADE-MARK.

A NEW POCO.
The Folding Gem.

The neatest, smallest, most carefully built of all the low-priced cameras. A marvel of compactness weighing one pound, and only an inch and a-half thick, closed. Automatically locks itself at proper focusing distance. Closes by touching a spring.

TAKES A PICTURE 4 X 5
As perfect at edges as at centre.

COMPLETE, $7.00.
ROCHESTER CAMERA CO.
43 ELIZABETH ST., ROCHESTER, N. Y.

Arnold Constable & Co.

Autumn Styles.

Ladies' French Gowns.

Dinner, Ball, and Street Dresses, Tailor-made Costumes, Carriage, Street, and Opera Wraps.

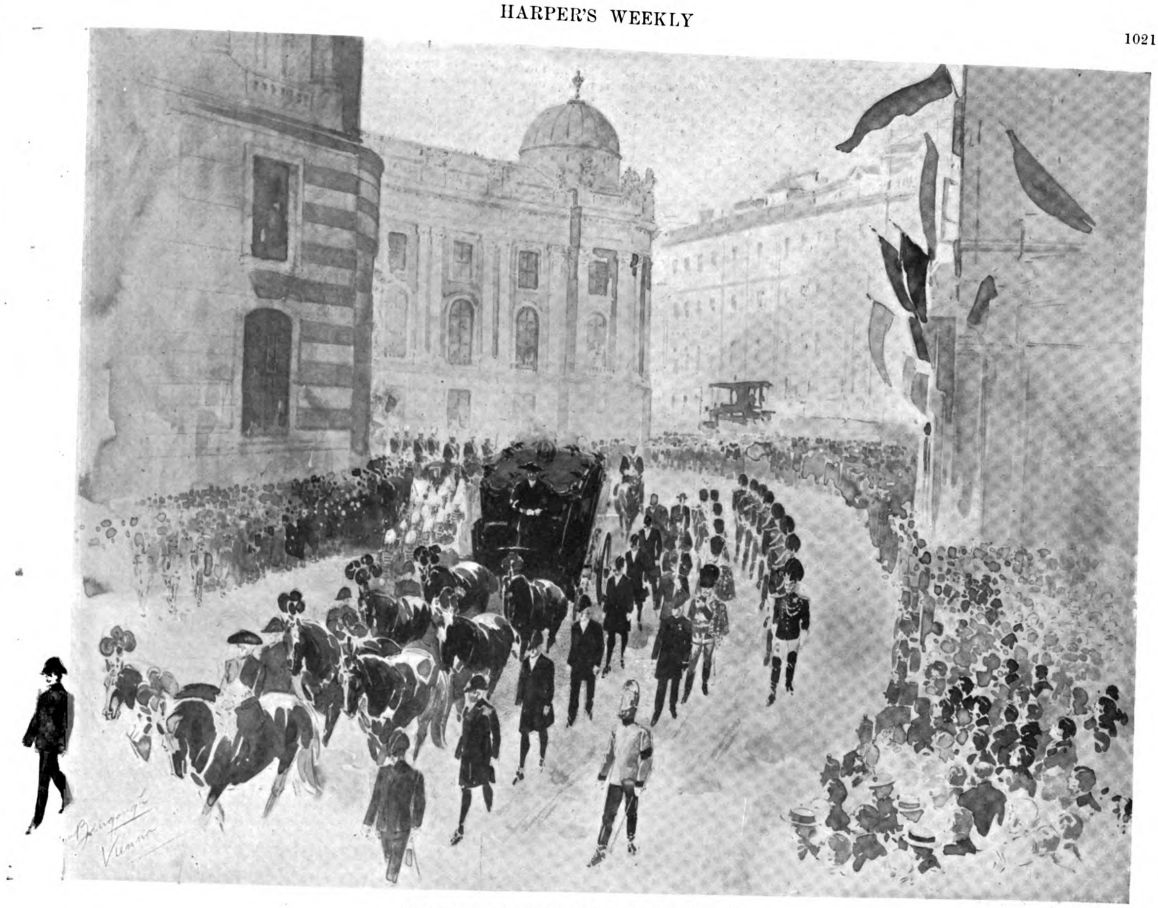
Imported Evening Waists.

Broadway & 19th st.
NEW YORK.

SO SIMPLE A CHILD CAN USE THEM.

28 Styles from $5.00 to $100.00
All Cameras Sold under a Positive Guarantee
Send 2c. stamp SUNART PHOTO CO.
for Catalogue. 92 Aqueduct St., Rochester, N.Y.

CHINA IN TRANSFORMATION



By Archibald R. Colquhoun

The present extraordinary situation of the Emperor of China indicates the mysteries of court life in the Celestial Empire, of which Mr. Colquhoun, who spent several years in Pekin, gives a comprehensive and interesting account.

With Frontispiece, Maps, and Diagrams. 8vo, Cloth, $3 00.

New York HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers London

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THE FUNERAL PROCESSION LEAVING THE PALACE.

THE BODY LYING IN STATE IN THE CHAPEL OF THE HOFBURG.

SOME PICTURESQUE FIGURES AT THE FUNERAL.

THE CLOSING CHAPTER IN THE STORY OF AN EMPRESS—SCENES AT THE FUNERAL OF ELIZABETH OF AUSTRIA.

DRAWN BY WILLIAM BENGOUGH, SPECIAL ARTIST FOR "HARPER'S WEEKLY" IN VIENNA.

As the route was a very short one, there was a dense mass of people packed at every accessible point. I was fortunate enough to secure an excellent view, through the courtesy of Consul-General Hurst and the Mutual Insurance Company officials. Large sums were offered for points of view, and the police insisted upon having the record of every one allowed at any window overlooking the procession. The formation was similar to the night arrival, except that there were added a great number of church dignitaries, who led the line, followed by representatives of the city guilds, dressed in evening clothes and carrying ancient banners. The most picturesque figures of all were the Hungarians—the nobles in their black flowing gowns, and the officers in their brilliant uniforms. As a rule, the royal visitors rode in closed carriages, as the Emperor did. His was covered with crape, and was guarded by two footmen, who stood behind. The most impressive feature was the company of palace guards—those giants with spears. In their great boots and towering plumes, they moved along with an even, deliberate stride, and were the admiration of the populace, as indeed they had a right to be, for no man enters their ranks who has not distinguished himself by some act of bravery. Vienna streets were draped in black. The magnificent city seemed paralyzed by this last great sorrow to their sovereign. Only the necessary business was carried on. All amusements were given up, theatres closed. Groups of sad-faced people gathered around the simple proclamation from the Emperor, which was pasted on the walls of the public buildings, addressed to "All Vienna Folk," and announcing in the quaint old style the bereavement which had befallen him.

The body of the Empress rests in one of the plainest whitewashed old churches in the city. Indeed, all the surroundings of the old palace here are extremely plain, but the new unfinished palace is a magnificent pile, and will be finished soon; but the dream of the royal couple to occupy it in the year of their jubilee has melted away, as even the dreams of kings will vanish, and now from the flag-staffs in front of the unfinished splendor the black banners of mourning are flying.

WILLIAM BENGOUGH.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

TAKE THE ARMY OUT OF POLITICS.

BY FREDERIC REMINGTON.

This grand nation is working out its immortal purposes, and I sometimes believe it contains the great hope of mankind. We have been slowly and reluctantly dragged into a war with Spain—one which we have averted for many years, but which was sure to come.

It came, and we grappled with it. After a severe struggle Spain was whipped into seeking peace terms, and now that we can mop our heads and breathe easier for a few moments, what do we find? We find we have a small modern navy which is better and more efficient than our wildest hopes could dream. Very well; it is not tinctured with politics. At least there has not appeared on the surface any of the scheming of politics. Its operations have been characterized by straightforward professional work on the part of every one connected with the Navy Department. Every possible detail seems to have been thought out, every want anticipated. The Secretary pressed the button, and the war-ships did the rest.

We found our army in different shape. We find nothing but disappointment, nothing to be proud of except the fighting ability of the line-officers and the enlisted men. The staff corps lay peacefully down on their backs at the beginning, and generals and colonels commanding troops had to detail line lieutenants to "hustle" up necessities in the open market to keep troops from starving to death. The volunteers have had a most destructive summer in the camps of instruction, and they now clamor to be mustered out. A victorious army comes home "on its back." The administration of the War Department is hopelessly discredited before the people. The deadening hand of selfish politics is laid over all.

We are enjoying an armistice at present, and with our newly acquired islands, which we desire to hold, we have almost unanimously concluded that we must have an army.

Now what will our new army be like? Will it be built along the lines dictated by military minds thinking only of effectiveness, or will ignorant and selfish politicians create it along their own lines? I am in great doubt about this matter. I only know for certain that a politico-military system will bring disaster.

However, if we are to have an army which is to do the work expected of it properly, we must at least do the following things, and doubtless many others, or we will not have such an army. Of which fact you can be absolutely sure.

The general of the army, or whatever major-general commands it from Washington, must be the head of the army—not in theory, but in fact. He must be the responsible head of the army—one whom we can praise if things go well, or one whom we can condemn if things go ill.

At the beginning of this Spanish war, when we should have had so much, we had nothing. The press and Congress turned hysterically on General Miles, the head of the army. It bitterly denounced him, and bade him come forward and tell them why.

He laughed at both. He could afford to do it. There was nothing else to do. Then he explained that he knew nothing more of the administration of the army than any Congressman could find out by applying to the Secretary of War. All the heads of the staff corps reported to that quaint creature, and not to him. This has been so since Grant laid down his complete control at the end of the civil war. Sherman had, as general of the army, gone to live in St. Louis because he regarded his presence in Washington as useless and humiliating. Sheridan fought various Secretaries of War with all his ardor during his incumbency; and so it has gone on to the present time despite protests and recommendations. The generals commanding our armies, after arriving at that distinction—the result of a life-long service in every grade of the establishment—after surviving fights, marchings, hunger, disease in a dozen climates, and with characters as clean as new-washed linen, come to Washington only to find themselves thrust aside by a powerful intrigue.

The high-water mark of this condition was reached when the general commanding the army had to reply to a corps commander before Santiago that he did not supersede him; he could not supersede a subordinate! So used have our soldiers become to the political head of the army that they become grotesquely mixed in their military relation; they have lost the unities. From a military standpoint the thing is funny.

The Secretaries of War have been always prominent working politicians—to a greater extent than other cabinet members. They have, with one exception since the civil war, used the department along political lines, and even this exception jealously guarded the department prerogatives. The adjutant-general has been responsible to the Secretary alone, and has come to be regarded in the army as the real working head. The fact that the adjutant-general should be the private secretary of the general in command is a long-forgotten truth.

During all these years the generals of the army have been "jollied" into making an annual report to Congress, but they were compilations of the reports of heads of staff corps, with which the generals may have had sympathy or not. In General Miles's case, he has made many recommendations to Congress which it did not act on, but which will relieve him from responsibility in cases like the present war.

The initiative of the general of the army, its natural head, is lost. For the solicitude of the tried soldier is substituted the ignorance of politicians—men who would not know a government wagon if they saw one; men who conserve their own well-being in time of peace, and who in time of war are in a state of frantic bewilderment. The adjutant-general readily succumbs to the powers he finds at his disposal in being the under-study of the Secretary, and is usually a mere tool. A tool he should be—he is nothing else, anyway—only he serves the wrong master, if you consider the well-being of the army.

So if we are to have a proper army in the future, it should have a proper head, and to him should go the heads of staff corps, utterly subservient to his orders, and the adjutant-general should be at his elbow, performing the proper functions of an adjutant. The Secretary of the War Department should be the political head and the intermediary head between the army and the President and Congress. Then the people will know who to blame if the army is not effective.

The next important thing which must come to pass before we have a good army is "an interchangeable line and staff." This should be true of every staff corps except the medical one and possibly the paymaster's.

In regard to a general staff—or more properly a war board—it is an institution which prospers best under a czar or kaiser. It needs a monarch over it who is the head of the army above all else, and who is so independent of all hampering, and so vitally solicitous of its effectiveness, that he, kinglike, can demand the "best." To a czar or a kaiser the general staff is second only to God.

We Americans remark that the generals and admirals do best who have the worst signal-service staff-officers at their command. A wire to Washington is the bête noire of our commanders. It is an open secret that the best generals England sends out have always good communications, perfectly established, with the home government, but always, unfortunately, two days ahorseback in the rear. They consequently are two days away from interfering politicians who are at any time liable to become hysterical, and who, under such conditions, would not hesitate to sacrifice the reputations and lives of soldiers.

England has suffered from all the afflictions which we are going through, but time has taught her to let Kitchener go ahead in his own way. She only demands that he be successful, and not sacrifice troops unnecessarily. She has learned to let her tried soldiers do their duty without tricky little political pups getting under their legs when they are performing.

At present the heads of the staff are not responsible to the general of the army, and indeed things have so arranged themselves that they are responsible to no one, in a true sense. They do not and cannot be made to work together as the interests of the army dictate. So we have a lot of staff establishments going it higgledy-piggledy, and the poor line gets along as best it can. The idea that a staff is nothing but an arrangement to do the business of the army and to administer to its necessities is almost lost sight of. It is utterly independent of the fighting line, which it ignores, in fact. It is not necessary in these days to try and demonstrate that, for every day brings instances to our notice. It is inefficient; it does not do what is expected of it, and it sits up on its hind legs and tenders its excuses, and even tells us that it is doing what it should do very well, knowing that if it were under the direction of a commanding general he would break every "head" in Washington.

Generals who come from the "fighting line" do not know anything about "excuses." Such conveniences are unknown in that part of the army. If you do not do, you will not do, there.

If a general commanded the whole army, a President of the United States would not have to go to camps asking sick soldiers if they had food enough or medical attendance. He would be kept busy in Washington signing new commissions to the successors of the men whom a general would remove.

If a man came from Fort Adobe to do his three years' detail in a Washington staff corps, he would not go into a trance or a Rip Van Winkle nap. He would, in case he was in the Ordnance Bureau, take a most active interest in the introduction of smokeless powder. He would expect to have to personally use powder in the future, and he would bestir himself about the thing. Of course there could be no "close corporation"—it could not be "Ordnance Company (limited)"—because there would not be time to arrange that. He would not send Maxim, Whitehead, Lee, and the Lord only knows how many other geniuses, abroad to help fight us while trying to adopt their inventions for a close corporation to which he belonged. In short, he would be active instead of passive, and he would be in sympathy and in touch with the men who fire the powder, eat the pork when the thermometer is 100°, get lugged wounded from battle-fields on improvised poles instead of proper litters. He would know what it is not to be paid promptly, and if he got a quartermaster detail, he would think out some of the problems which are in the future to confront the army. If he were in the inspector-general's department, he would inspect, and "boards of survey" would be sitting on many an incompetent officer's case who should go on the retired list for physical or mental incapacity. In short, the staff would look after the line, which it does or does not at present, as the spirit moves it. Also, favoritism would have had its day, and a big bunch of coffee-cooling cripples would find their way into private life. And he would wear his uniform in Washington as a matter of pride.

These two changes would insure us effectiveness in our army, as every good and experienced soldier with whom I have talked has told me.

There should be, either at West Point or elsewhere, an infantry and cavalry school, if we are to increase our army, where officers could be turned out for those branches. It is quite unnecessary to make engineers out of such, and for many reasons I believe it is a bad thing. I know many a fellow who is ideally fitted by instinct and physique to command infantry or cavalry who would not and could not be an engineer. I could never see even a remote connection between building an iron bridge and jockeying a troop of cavalry into form.

I might go on into a hundred details regarding a proper army organization; but let a general command an army, the staff of which is alive, and they would straighten out these things, because they would be responsible, and if let alone they would know how.

Herein lies the rub. The best foreign military experts have said that we could never have a good military administration, because of the selfish and unintelligent interruption of our legislators. Dozens of men doing dozens of things at different times cannot have a policy, nor could they maintain one if they had it.

Congress is charged by the Constitution with the duty of making rules and regulations for the government of the army and navy; and it has made such rules and regulations, especially touching the care and the distribution of government property, that red tape and inefficiency are quite inevitable. The strongest executive genius that ever lived could not administer the affairs of the army of the United States in a satisfactory way unless he disobeyed the laws which were passed by Congress. The first thing that must be done in securing such a reform in military administration as will make an efficient army will be the elimination of Congressional rule. Congress must abdicate; it must give up its power over the army, which it maintains now by making such rules and regulations that efficient administration in any staff corps is impossible. Besides that, Congressmen insist upon filling the staff corps with their favorites; so that they not only prevent proper executive action through their laws, but weaken the staff by forcing improper persons upon it.

Before this war there was an apathy on the part of the people concerning the army, which was reflected in Congress, living as it did in Washington, with nothing but an inanimate staff to remind it of the army's existence; but they have seen now that we have not 125,000 militia available for war at the drum-tap; they have seen inexperienced volunteer officers let hundreds of volunteer soldiers die uselessly or become insubordinate in camps of instruction; they have seen medical, quartermaster, ordnance, and commissary staffs standing stupidly helpless in the middle of what would have been a "licking" for us had Spain been some live power; they have seen our best two generals—Miles and Merritt—shipped off to unimportant side tracks while a "king's favorite" was allowed to puff and sweat over the only important military problem thus far presented; they have seen the politician Alger set the soldier Miles aside, while he ran the war; they have doubtless observed the cunning, the astute Secretary do his own undoing, and they will conclude that there is nothing in allowing a politician to run so important a function as a foreign war when he knows nothing about such things.

It is greatly to be hoped that when Congress takes up the new army, it will not let this discredited staff influence it. What Miles and Merritt and Wade and Henry and Lawton and Chaffee and men of that kind recommend will be right.

Another fact might as well be recognized—for it is a great truth. Militia is a broken reed. History will prove to any one who cares to go into the matter that militia has never done what was claimed for it. The extreme war-like function of which militia is capable is a "month's riot duty." This statement will doubtless come as a shock to many people, but if they go carefully over the books they will reach this conclusion, upon which all soldiers, both here and abroad, are agreed. In our case, however, they must not consider our early frontier population of Indian-fighters, because these men were born, raised, and died in forest warfare, and had nothing in common with peaceful communities.

I think probably we would best retain our militia, or State police, but I deprecate the idea that it is in any sense to be taken into account when real soldier duty is to be expected.

When Congress meets, this problem must be grappled with, and if any ignorance or peanut politics gets into the consideration of it, you can bet all your personal property that "the chickens will come home to roost." An army which has to operate in our new tropical possessions must have the decayed fingers of selfish intrigue taken from its throat, or national disaster and national disgrace will come to us, in the shape of either a foreign repulse or a killing distrust at home.

In the case of volunteer regiments having incompetent officers, which generally is bound to happen, a proper inspector-general's department reporting to the general of the army will bring forth the inevitable court martial, and all such will get their "final statements" on the spot. This is one of those matters which, I said before, will take care of itself if politics are eliminated.

I have no sympathy with idle complaining of soldier suffering which one sees so much of in the pervading newspaper. A soldier gets what God sends him. Soldiers are bound to suffer, and the most elaborate system—even the German military perfection—cannot and does not expect to remove the stones and thorns from the paths of glory. That is a part of the very hard business of war; but America will be a bad ground for the recruiting sergeant if it is not thought that good generals and good staffs are going to alleviate what God sends.

I do not intend in this paper to specifically arraign either the staff or the present administration of the army. They are both dead, and I respect the dead. All soldiers—yes, and many of them in the staff corps—have known for years that everything would break down in the event of war. They knew also that it was useless to struggle for reforms until the people had witnessed and suffered from the collapse. The poor old neglected "line" has gone on doing its duty despite every discouragement. It is more cheerful nowadays. It knows the people will not let Secretaries or mummy staff heads or Congressmen—yea, even Presidents—trifle with an institution charged with the lives of the boys which mothers lay down on the altar of the republic.

THE AVERAGE MAN.

When it comes to a question of trusting
Yourself to the risks of the road,
When the thing is the sharing of burdens,
The lifting the heft of a load,
In the hour of peril or trial,
In the hour you meet as you can,
You may safely depend on the wisdom
And skill of the average man.

'Tis the average man and no other
Who does his plain duty each day,
The small thing his wage is for doing,
On the commonplace bit of the way.
'Tis the average man, may God bless him,
Who pilots us, still in the van,
Over land, over sea, as we travel,
Just the plain, hardy, average man.

So on through the days of existence,
All mingling in shadow and shine,
We may count on the every-day hero,
Whom haply the gods may divine,
But who wears the swarth grime of his calling,
And labors and earns as he can,
And stands at the last with the noblest,
The commonplace average man.

MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

"Your Friends with fine and discriminating taste always serve the best of everything when they entertain you.

Londonderry Lithia Water

is the best." The verdict of the American people after years of testing is in favor of this one great gift of nature. Endorsed and prescribed by leading physicians, and sold everywhere. (Both still and sparkling.)

WONDERFUL TRIËDER BINOCULARS

Have 8 to 10 times the power of the best of the old-style field and opera glasses.

Pocket size—invaluable for Army and Navy, War Correspondents, Race Meets, Regattas, Travel, and the Theatre.

Send for Descriptive Catalogue. For sale by leading jewelers and opticians throughout the United States. Among them:

New York—Theodore B. Starr, F. G. Schmidt, Gall & Lembke, Queen & Co., Ga Nun & Parsons.
Brooklyn—J. B. Hoecker, 312 Fulton St.
Chicago—C. D. Peacock, Spaulding & Co., Hyman, Berg & Co., N. Wattry, H. Borsch.
Philadelphia—Queen & Co., Bonschur & Holmes, Williams, Brown & Earle.
Washington—Franklin & Co., Moore & Leding, D. N. Walford.
Boston—Pinkham & Smith.
St. Louis—A. S. Alee Co., Irker Bros.
San Francisco—Hirsch & Kayser, Henry Kahn & Co., Geo. H. Kahn.

½ Actual Size.
Prices Range from $44.50 to $72.50.
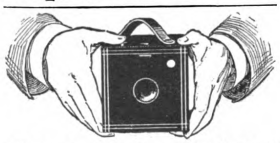
C. P. GOERZ, 52 Union Sq. (East), N. Y. City

Gold Seal Champagne

is a natural sparkling wine produced in America under the supervision of expert foreign wine-makers.

It is equal in flavor to many brands of imported wines with inflated reputations, and for purity is unexcelled.



The difference is only in the price, the foreign article costing two and one half times as much as Gold Seal.

Why pay the difference?

A trial case will convince you of the excellence of this genuine American product. For sale by all wine-dealers and grocers. Send for illustrated booklet on wine-making.

URBANA WINE CO., Urbana, N.Y.

There is no Kodak but the Eastman Kodak

Half the charm of a photographic outing is lost if one carries along several pounds of glass plates and holders and has every moment filled with anxiety for their safety.

Kodaks

use non-breakable film cartridges, which weigh ounces where plates weigh pounds.

KODAKS $5.00 to $35.00.

Catalogues free at agencies or by mail.

EASTMAN KODAK CO.
Rochester, N. Y.

The Berkshire Hills Sanatorium, FOR THE SCIENTIFIC TREATMENT OF CANCER

Tumors, and all Forms of Malignant and Benign Growths,

Without the use of the Knife

THE LARGEST AND BEST EQUIPPED PRIVATE INSTITUTION IN THE WORLD.

We have never failed to effect a permanent cure where we have had a reasonable opportunity for treatment.

Please state your case as clearly as possible and our book with complete information will be mailed free. Address,

Drs. W. E. Brown & Son, North Adams, Mass.

WORKS EASILY

THE Remington Standard Typewriter

WYCKOFF, SEAMANS & BENEDICT
327 Broadway, New York

MAGIC LANTERNS WANTED AND FOR SALE OR EXCHANGE. HARBACH & CO. 809 Filbert St. Phila. Pa.

10 little cigars for the price of 1

Very few smokers realize what a great convenience it is (and economy also) to have always at hand a few

Van Bibber Little Cigars

They are perfect little cigars and are in every way as satisfactory for a short smoke as part of a larger cigar.

Have you ever tried them?

A minute:—25 cents (in stamps) and you will receive 10 VAN BIBBER LITTLE CIGARS by return mail—wherever you live, and it may mean a saving of $25 in your year's smoking.

H. Ellis & Co., Baltimore, Md.
The American Tobacco Co., Successor

The Pennsylvania Railroad's Magnificent Service between New York and Washington.

Nowhere in America can be found a superior train service to that on the Pennsylvania Railroad between New York and Washington. The most magnificent equipment which American genius has produced is in constant use on this line, and all that the Pennsylvania Railroad stands for in safety, in comfort, in speed, and in general superiority is exhibited here. The "Congressional Limited," which is acknowledged to be the finest Pullman parlor train in the world, leaves West Twenty-third Street Station daily at 3.20 P. M. The New York and Washington Limited, another example of Pennsylvania Railroad excellence, leaves, week-days, at 9.50 A. M. Additional fast express trains leave West Twenty-third Street Station at 8.20, 9.20, 10.50 A. M., 4.20, 4.50, 8.50 P. M., and 12.05 night, daily, and 7.50 A. M., 12.50 and 1.50 P. M. week-days, affording a service as convenient as it is superior. Trains leave Cortlandt and Desbrosses Streets ten minutes later than Twenty-third Street. Pullman parlor or sleeping cars are attached to all the above trains, and Pennsylvania Railroad dining-cars are attached to the "Congressional Limited," the New York and Washington Limited, and to trains leaving at 10.50 A. M., 4.20 and 4.50 P. M. daily.

The return service is equally complete and convenient. In fact, the matchless train service between New York and Washington presents the "Standard Railroad of America" in its best light, and shows on what a solid foundation the fame of the Pennsylvania Railroad rests.

REDUCED RATES TO PHILADELPHIA VIA PENNSYLVANIA RAILROAD, ACCOUNT PEACE JUBILEE.

For the grand Peace Jubilee at Philadelphia, October 26 and 27, the Pennsylvania Railroad Company will sell excursion tickets from all ticket stations on its line, to Philadelphia, at rate of single fare for the round trip (minimum rate, 25 cents). Tickets will be sold and good, going, October 24 to 27, and returning, leaving Philadelphia to October 31, inclusive.

This jubilee will be one of the greatest events in the history of Philadelphia. The rededication of Independence Hall, recently restored; the unveiling of the Grant Equestrian Monument, Fairmount Park; a monster civic and industrial parade, and a grand military and naval pageant, led by General Miles and other distinguished heroes of the late war, will be prominent features. The President and his Cabinet are also expected to be present.

A TRIP TO JAMAICA,

the QUEEN of the WEST INDIES ISLANDS, is highly recommended to those desiring to avoid the severity of our American winters, or in search of rest and recreation. About $5.00 per day is sufficient to defray ALL expenses. Send for illustrated pamphlet "K" for full particulars.

PIM, FORWOOD & KELLOCK, Gen'l Agts.,
24 State Street, - - NEW YORK CITY.

Gettysburg, Luray, Natural Bridge, Hot Springs, Richmond, and Washington.

The next and last eleven-day personally-conducted tour of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company to the Battlefield of Gettysburg, Luray Caverns, Natural Bridge, Virginia Hot Springs, and the cities of Richmond and Washington will leave New York and Philadelphia in a special train of parlor cars on Wednesday, October 19. The party will be in charge of a tourist agent and an experienced chaperon. A whole day will be spent on the Battlefield of Gettysburg, a carriage drive with lectures by an able guide being included in the ticket. Ample time will be allowed at Luray and Natural Bridge to view the wondrous natural formations, and at the Hot Springs over three days will be spent. The season at this great Autumn resort in the beautiful mountains of Virginia will be at its height. At Richmond and Washington opportunities will be presented to visit all the points of interest under intelligent guidance.

The round-trip rate, including all necessary expenses, is $65 from New York, $63 from Philadelphia, and proportionate rates from other points.

For detailed itinerary apply to Ticket Agents; to Tourist Agent, 1196 Broadway, New York; 789 Broad Street, Newark, N. J.; or address Geo. W. Boyd, Assistant General Passenger Agent, Broad Street Station, Philadelphia.

Continuance of the Through Express Train between New York and Atlantic City, via Pennsylvania Railroad.

On account of the heavy Autumn travel between New York and Atlantic City, the Pennsylvania Railroad Company will continue its through express train during the Fall and Winter seasons. It has always been customary heretofore to withdraw this train about the first of October, but the travel has continued so heavy this year that for the first time it has been found necessary to keep it in service throughout the Fall and Winter months. This train leaves West Twenty-third Street Station at 1.50 P. M. (Cortlandt and Desbrosses Streets, 2.10 P. M.) week-days. It is a vestibuled train composed of Pullman buffet parlor cars and Pennsylvania Railroad standard coaches.

Atlantic City was never so attractive at this season. The weather is superb. Outdoor exercise, which has always been a feature of its Fall and Winter life, has received a new impetus from the splendid golf links of the new Country Club. The links rank very high and are attracting a great deal of attention among Eastern players.

All the large beach-front hotels will remain open through the Winter.

"Foremost American Institution."

"Of all the handsomely equipped roads" says the Albany, N. Y., Journal, "that great example of the foremost American institution, the Lake Shore & Michigan Southern Railway is not surpassed n ny point both for speed and comfort and with a fine eye to the safety of the public traveling in ts care."

"The trains furnished by the Lake Shore"—between Chicago, Toledo, Cleveland, Buffalo, New York and Boston,—"are widely known as the finest in regular operation."

To learn about this route send for free copy of "Book of Trains," to

A. J. SMITH,
G. P. & T. A., Cleveland, O.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

PROOF CONCLUSIVE.

THE LEADING MAN. "What makes you think Stormer is only getting about forty dollars a week?"

THE COMEDIAN. "Why, he told me himself that he was only getting a hundred."

A delicious drink and a piquant relish.

Vigoral

"Concentrated Beef"

Represents all the nutriment and flavor of prime roast beef in a condensed form. It builds up the invalid. Strengthens the convalescent.
Our Chafing Dish Recipe Book sent upon request. It gives fifty ways of using Vigoral.
ARMOUR & COMPANY, CHICAGO.

All dealers can show you

Archarena Combination Boards.

JOCKO WANTS TO LEARN TO PLAY.

CUESS, Is he playing with Man, Boy or Monkey?

Greatest of all Parlor Game Boards, because you have on our No. 2, Crokinole, Ten Pins and Carrom Games. 10 in all for $3.50, express paid. No. 1 board 4 games $2.00.

Write for description and rules, sending your GUESS, with 2c stamp and we will send souvenir picture answer.

T. M. JEFFORDS, Prin. of School, Winchester, Ill., under date of March 26, 1898, writes: "SIRS:—Some of my pupils called on us after the Board came and were so delighted that they requested the dealers to bring on a supply. An Archarena-Carrom Club has been organized. Everybody, from children to gray-headed men, pronounce it the best Game they ever played. The Rings are much nicer than solid Discs used in Crokinole."

Peoria, Ill.

ARCHARENA CO., Manufacturers,

A better Cocktail at home than is served over any bar in the World.

THE CLUB COCKTAILS

MANHATTAN, MARTINI, WHISKEY, HOLLAND GIN, TOM GIN, VERMOUTH and YORK.

We guarantee these Cocktails to be made of absolutely pure and well matured liquors and the mixing equal to the best cocktails served over any bar in the world. Being compounded in accurate proportions, they will always be found of uniform quality.

Connoisseurs agree that of two cocktails made of the same material and proportions the one which is aged must be the better.

Try our YORK Cocktail made without any sweetening—dry and delicious.

For Sale on the Dining and Buffet Cars of the principal railroads of the U. S.

AVOID IMITATIONS.

For Sale by all Druggists and Dealers.

G. F. HEUBLEIN & BRO., Sole Props.,
39 Broadway, N. Y., Hartford, Conn. 20 Piccadilly, W. London, Eng.

"A PERFECT FOOD—as Wholesome as it is Delicious."

Walter Baker & Co.'s Breakfast Cocoa

Trade-Mark.

The Standard for Purity and Excellence....

Costs less than one cent a cup.

Our Trade-Mark on Every Package.

Walter Baker & Co. Ltd.
DORCHESTER, MASS.
ESTABLISHED 1780.

IT ONLY WEIGHS 10 POUNDS

Makes a small package when deflated, and can be carried anywhere by anybody.

"PERFECTION" Air Mattresses

are a modern invention for Campers and Yachtsmen—they are waterproof, never become musty—and make a most comfortable and luxurious bed. Made to fit any irregular shape of bunks or cockpits.

Send for our illustrated catalogue.
MECHANICAL FABRIC CO.
Air Goods Department. Providence, R. I.

Pepsalt...

is the best of table salt, into every grain of which is incorporated digestive substances natural to the stomach. Fill your salt-cellar with Pepsalt and use it in place of salt at your meals. If you have indigestion your stomach does not supply the necessary amount of the dissolving or digestive juices. Pepsalt taken in place of salt at your meals makes good this deficiency, as you take with every mouthful of your food a similar substance to that which is required and at the right time, and your indigestion is a thing of the past.

Send for sample in salt-shaker bottle and try it.

Price 25 cents, postpaid.

THE VAUPEL SAMARITAN CO.,
45 Sheriff St., Cleveland, Ohio.

Indigestion Has No Terrors For Him
That salt-shaker is filled with Pepsalt

PEPSALT CURES AND PREVENTS INDIGESTION

Nathan B. Goodnow & Co.,
BANKERS.
ESTABLISHED 1873.
2 Post Office Sq., Boston, Mass.

Transact a General Banking Business, including the Purchase and Sale of Stocks, Bonds, and Grain, for Investment or on Margin.

Dealers in Government and Railroad Bonds.

Books containing Four-Year Range of Prices, Dividends, and Earnings sent free on request.

A Permanently Invested Fund of over TWO HUNDRED AND TWENTY-FOUR THOUSAND DOLLARS is held as a Guaranteed Security for all persons having business with us.

Correspondence solicited.

Joseph Gillott's STEEL PENS.
GOLD MEDAL, PARIS EXPOSITION, 1889, AND THE CHICAGO EXPOSITION AWARD.
THE MOST PERFECT OF PENS.

TRADE E&W MARK
EARL & WILSON'S LINEN COLLARS & CUFFS
BEST IN THE WORLD.

CHEW

Beeman's

The Original

Pepsin Gum

Cures Indigestion and Sea-sickness.

All Others Are Imitations.

HARPER'S CATALOGUE
A descriptive list of over 3000 volumes, will be sent to any address on receipt of Ten Cents in stamps.

The Best is the Cheapest

Rae's Olive Oil is both the best and cheapest, quality considered.

The Chemical Analysis of S. Rae & Co.'s Finest Sublime Lucca Oil, made Sept. 15th, 1896, by the Ledoux Chemical Laboratory, declares it to be "unadulterated by admixture with any other oil or other substance. It is free from rancidity and all other undesirable qualities, and it is of Superior Quality and Flavor."

S. RAE & CO., Leghorn, Italy.
Established 1836.

Those Fine English Tobaccos

Capstan
Bird's Eye
Westward Ho
Three Castles
Gold Flake, etc.

Put up by W. D. & H. O. WILLS of Bristol, England.

and famous the world over for their superb flavor and exquisite aroma, can be obtained for you by your dealer. If he will not get them, write to us for price-list of the well-known brands,

J. W. SURBRUG, Sole Agent, 159 Fulton Street, NEW YORK.

"Defender of the Rails—The New York Central."—Utica Herald

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

"WIDE-OPEN" NEW YORK.—[See Page 1045.]

HARPER'S WEEKLY
A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. XLII.—No. 2183.
Copyright, 1898, by HARPER & BROTHERS. All Rights Reserved.
NEW YORK, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 22, 1898.

TEN CENTS A COPY.
FOUR DOLLARS A YEAR.

THE DISTURBANCES IN CHINA.

PEKING—THE FORBIDDEN CITY, AS SEEN FROM THE IMPERIAL CITY.

DRAWN BY HARRY FENN FROM THE ONLY PHOTOGRAPH KNOWN TO HAVE BEEN TAKEN OF THE PROHIBITED ENCLOSURE.—[SEE PAGE 1031.]

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

HARPER'S WEEKLY

(TWENTY-FOUR PAGES)

NEW YORK CITY, OCTOBER 22, 1898

Terms: 10 Cents a Copy—$4 00 a Year, in Advance

Postage free to all Subscribers in the United States, Canada, and Mexico

Subscriptions may begin with any Number

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS

New York City: Franklin Square

London: 45 Albemarle Street, W.

Also for sale at Brentano's, 37 Avenue de l'Opéra, Paris

WHETHER we are in a position to govern distant peoples is a serious question, and one on which a good deal of light is thrown by the insurrection of the Pillagers in Minnesota and the reasons for their uprising. A careful reading of our article on this subject, on another page, will be instructive to such expansionists as desire to have a rational basis for their creed.

THE beauties of militarism in a republic are being strongly manifested in Paris. The army has been called into the city, to the number of sixty thousand or more, for the purpose of preventing violence. But the army is under a cloud. It has been accused of committing a grave injustice, and sustaining it by forgery and perjury. If the Court of Cassation finds in favor of a revision of the DREYFUS case, the army will need friends, for it seemingly intends to vindicate its honor by an appeal to force, and forty thousand strikers will not make bad allies in such case. At any rate, the peace of Paris seems to be at the mercy of violent strikers and a discredited army, and republican France has apparently built up an armed force which has the power to overthrow it, and to the exercise of which power all who love justice are giving an incentive.

THERE should be great care manifested by the voters this year in choosing Congressmen. It does not follow that because one supports Mr. ROOSEVELT for Governor he should therefore vote for the Republican candidate for Congress in his district. Mr. ROOSEVELT may be voted for on State issues. In other words, one need not vote against him because he has so little faith in the American character as to believe that we will become Chinamen unless we spend our nights in plotting war and our days in fighting battles. But if any Republican candidate for Congress believes in this sort of nonsense, he ought to be opposed, and especially if his opponent is a Democrat who believes in sound money. Many of the Republican candidates for Congress in New England and in some other parts of the country are opposed to the expansion policy, and, other things being equal, it is to be hoped that they will be elected. In the State of New York we fancy that gold Democrats are the safest. There is, in fact, a great good to be gained possibly by the election of non-expansionist, sound-money Democrats to the House of Representatives, and that is that we may through them secure a thorough investigation of army administration during the war.

IT is altogether too early to say that the investigation of army administration will turn out valueless. There are some officers of volunteers who apparently are too grateful for their commissions, but their ignorance or blindness cannot possibly overcome the effect of authentic stories of hardship, cruelty, indifference, and incapacity which have come to us from officers of the line and from the men. General F. V. GREENE struck a true note the other day in his testimony when he said that the army was organized for peace, and could not move in an emergency. Major GALLAGHER also told some wholesome truths about the inefficiency of civilian officers and the inadequacy and unfitness of the rations. The fact is that no testimony like that of General WHEELER, intended to show that conditions were good, can square with the reports of the general and other officers from the field, nor with the effort of the heads of the War Department to turn the blame of the hasty movement from Tampa upon Admiral SAMPSON and the navy. It will be impossible for General SHAFTER and those who are supporting him to make the country believe that the navy, which did everything itself so well, is responsible for his own incapacity, or for the incapacity and ignorance of the men under whose immediate orders he was. If they are to try this experiment, it will be, as an officer of the navy has already remarked, a very dangerous one for them.

THE sole excuse that can be offered—or that is offered—for taking the Philippines is that their people are not fit for self-government. The revolutionary constitution adopted by AGUINALDO and his followers, however, which provides for fairly effective executive and legislative government, does not seem to warrant the fear that the affairs of the Philippines would not be well administered in the hands of their own people. It is true that we know nothing that would lead us to believe that the savages of the smaller islands of the archipelago could govern themselves; but neither could we govern them without constant war upon them, and, furthermore, without constant difficulties growing out of their piracies and other outbreaks. They would be our subjects, at all events, and we would be responsible for their international conduct. While there is no evidence either that these Malays and Tagals would be peaceable citizens under the rule of the Filipinos, why would it not be better for the Filipinos or the Spaniards to undertake to keep them in order than to assume that responsibility ourselves? As to the rights and the safety of Europeans (including Spaniards) and Americans under Filipino rule, we fancy that the powers would look after them with the same interest and vigor that they and we have just displayed in meeting the storm supposed to have arisen in China. In a word, we do not suppose for a moment that our presence in the East will remove or prevent any difficulty that is now likely to spring up. It will simply make us a participant in and a sufferer from all the international dangers, troubles, wars, and oppressions that are likely to accompany the transformation of eastern Asia.

PENNSYLVANIA'S OPPORTUNITY.

THE commonwealth of Pennsylvania is on trial. The question at issue in the pending campaign, which is to determine primarily her State officers, her Legislature, and the return of QUAY to the United States Senate, concerns the virtues of her people. Is there character enough in the State to defeat QUAY? If there is, Dr. SWALLOW will be elected Governor, and a Legislature will be chosen which will not return QUAY. From what we hear from Pennsylvania, we are confident that there is such an awakening of the public conscience as the State has not known for years. Surely it is high time that this should be. Surely it is high time that this freebooting boss should be tumbled ignominiously out of the high places which he has soiled so long, and so greatly to the disgrace of the State.

The people of Pennsylvania who are supporting Dr. SWALLOW and endeavoring to compass the overthrow of QUAY are struggling for the restoration of self-government, as well as for the punishment of a corrupt boss and his corrupt gang of public plunderers. For twenty years or more QUAY has dominated the politics of Pennsylvania. Before him were SIMON CAMERON and his son DON CAMERON, but the pupil and follower has not only bettered their instruction, but has retired the son to private life. QUAY nominates whom he will in both parties. This year, for example, both the Republican and the Democratic candidates are of his own selection. The Legislature is composed for his profit, and the State's delegation in Congress obeys his commands. The people of Pennsylvania have nothing to say in the selection of their candidates, and up to this time they have not had sufficient public virtue or their consciences have not been sufficiently aroused to defeat their ruler at the polls. Apparently they are at last waking up to the fact that QUAY has made their government a blot on civilization, and a strong count in the indictment which has been drawn by its critics and enemies against democracy.

Not only is QUAY omnipotent in the politics of Pennsylvania, he wields a great influence at Washington, so that the whole nation is interested in the contest that is going on for his downfall. Not only does he exercise a power which no man ought to possess in this republic, a power which destroys self-government and threatens personal liberty, but he is himself an odious creature of odious conditions, and his rule is the rule of a bandit. Not so many years ago, the New York World published an account of QUAY'S life, which, if true, should have consigned him and some of his political associates to prison. It was particularly charged that he had embezzled the public moneys for his own use. The accusation was made with great particularity, and QUAY was boldly challenged to bring an action for libel. When he replied that he could not procure justice in the State of New York or in the United States courts, the offer was made to him that the editor of the World would go to Pennsylvania in order to be served with process, so that the case might be tried in the courts of the State which was ruled by QUAY as absolutely as Russia is ruled by the Tsar. But QUAY did not take advantage of this confidence of the editor in the justice of his cause.

QUAY is now before the courts of his State by process—a criminal process—issued against him. He is prosecuted by District-Attorney GRAHAM, [illegible] many years the Republican district attorney of Philadelphia. Once more the charge against him is the use of the public funds for his private gain; and, on the evidence which was produced before the magistrate on the preliminary hearing, he and the other defendants, including his son RICHARD, were held in bonds of $5000 each to appear for trial before the November term of the court. The charge, in brief, is that QUAY and his friends have used the funds of the State which were deposited in the People's Bank of Philadelphia, which is now in the hands of a receiver. The evidence was obtained from the private desk of JOHN S. HOPKINS, the cashier of the bank, who committed suicide. It consists largely of letters and telegrams written by Senator QUAY to HOPKINS, and one letter at least written by State-Treasurer B. F. HAYWOOD to JAMES McMANES, president of the bank, but directed by and evidently received by HOPKINS. HAYWOOD is one of the accused, and he is one of QUAY'S political followers. This letter from HAYWOOD to McMANES encloses a check for $100,000, which added to the public money already in the bank made the State's deposit at the time of writing the letter $600,000. The letter concludes as follows: "The understanding is that I am not to draw against any part of this $600,000 deposit until the Hon. R. R. QUAY [Senator QUAY'S son] has paid or arranged satisfactory [sic] to you, the loan of $100,000 which you are to make to him next week." Other letters and telegrams from QUAY to HOPKINS seem to show that the dead cashier was in the habit of buying stock for QUAY, and the character of the stock ordered by the Senator, sugar figuring in the list, recalls the charges that have been made against United States Senators of legislating in the interest of their own speculations. In one telegram to HOPKINS, QUAY says, "If you buy and carry a thousand Met. for me, I will shake the plum-tree." This phrase is likely to become as famous as some others in the current history of public scandals. Where did HOPKINS get the money "to carry" stocks for QUAY? The district attorney contends that memoranda made by HOPKINS in a private book, called the "Red Book," show that by the connivance of the bank QUAY had the use for 184 days of $200,000 of the amount of the public funds on deposit in the People's Bank, that amount ranging from $525,000 to $50[illegible] 000. In other words, this Senator of the United States, his son, and some of his henchmen are charged with conspiracy to embezzle the money of the State of Pennsylvania, and the evidence against them is strong enough, in the opinion of the magistrate, to warrant their commitment. It is an interesting fact that the capital of the People's Bank was only $150,000.

QUAY is charged with other offences. Dr. SWALLOW charges that in the last fifteen years he and his henchmen have stolen $3,000,000 interest on the public moneys. It is charged that the [illegible] which upholds QUAY has held back the school appropriations for a year or more before paying them over to the school authorities. It is charged that the old Capitol was burned by an incendiary, and that the State was robbed at every step of rebuilding, and in arranging temporary quarters for the government's accommodation. Dr. SWALLOW challenged his opponent, QUAY'S candidate, to meet many of these charges, and to defend the negation of them. But as QUAY remained silent under accusations and taunts of the World, as he produced no evidence before the magistrate in answer to the charge that he has used the public money deposited in the People's Bank for his own profit and for the profit of his son and his friends, so STONE, QUAY'S candidate for Governor, declined the challenge of Dr. SWALLOW.

We have mentioned but part of the charges made against QUAY and his party. It is only necessary to add that he is accused of crimes against the Federal government as well as against State government, not the least among them being the sale of Federal offices for money and for votes. His silence under the charges is significant. He entertains a cynical contempt for the people of his State. He believes that they have not virtue enough to punish him. He feels safely intrenched in his castle of vice. We hope that he is about to find himself mistaken, and we believe that the beginning of his end has come.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THE POLICY OF EXPANSION—CUBA AND THE PHILIPPINES.

LETTERS FROM EX-SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY J. G. CARLISLE, CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSIONER JOHN R. PROCTER, EX-ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF STATE G. L. RIVES, AND SENATOR DONELSON CAFFERY.

BY the terms of the protocol all the territorial questions growing out of the war with Spain are substantially settled, except that which relates to the disposition of the Philippines, but concerning them the United States may soon be confronted with a problem of the gravest character. The sole avowed purpose for which the war was commenced has been accomplished by the agreement to abandon Cuba, and in addition Puerto Rico is to be surrendered to the United States. If our representatives in Paris should also demand the abandonment or cession of the Philippines, or any part of them, and the Spanish representatives should refuse to comply, the question of reopening the war for the sole purpose of conquest would be directly presented for the consideration of our government and people.

Ought we to make such a demand, or, if made and rejected, ought we to resume hostilities, and make further sacrifices of life and property in order to acquire these remote and semicivilized islands for ourselves, or to free them from the domination of Spain? We are under no obligations whatever to either emancipate or annex the islands. The fortunes of a war, prosecuted for the single purpose of securing the independence of Cuba, have given us military possession, for the time being, of a city and harbor in a distant part of the world; but until the armistice was established they were held subject to the right of the other belligerent to retake them by force, and resume its original authority over them. Our occupation was hostile at the beginning, and is so still, though military operations have been suspended in order to afford opportunity for negotiation. By this hostile act we incurred no obligation to the inhabitants, who were then and still are subjects of Spain. Their condition, politically or otherwise, did not have the least influence one way or the other in determining the question of peace or war, and we have made no promises to them. It is true they are badly governed, but so are the people of many other countries, even in our own hemisphere, and if it is our duty to overthrow all the bad governments in the world, we had better begin on our own side of the globe.

That the present inhabitants of the Philippines are not qualified for self-government is generally conceded, and that the hot and unwholesome climate will prove fatal to a very large percentage of emigrants and colonists from this latitude seems also to be admitted; but, in fact, we do not need new lands for colonization, no matter how fertile or salubrious they may be. Our own country affords ample space for an enormous increase of population, and ample opportunities for the investment of capital and the employment of labor for many years to come. Even if our people could go to the Philippines with their capital and labor, the effect would be to diminish our industrial forces at home and retard the development of our own resources. But they will not go, and if the islands are acquired we will simply have on our hands, for such governmental control as we may be able to exercise under our political system, a cluster of about fourteen hundred tropical islands, six or seven thousand miles away, inhabited by eight or ten millions of ignorant, superstitious, and slavish people, who have no interests in common with us, no knowledge of our institutions, no appreciation of our civilization, no sympathy with our ambitions and aspirations, and no capacity to materially improve their own condition under any plan of government that might be devised for them.

Such an acquisition would not strengthen us in any respect. On the contrary, it would be a constant drain upon our resources without any substantial compensation for the outlay. Even when not in a state of actual insurrection, the people are turbulent, cruel, and unmindful of the rights of person and property, and it will require a most vigilant administration of the law by honest and capable officials to preserve order among them, even in the most enlightened parts of the islands, while in some parts it is at least doubtful whether this can be done at all. Spain has tried it for more than three centuries, except in the Sulu group, and has signally failed. Millions of dollars have been expended and thousands of lives have been lost in a vain effort to enforce obedience to the laws and customs of a country having a form of ecclesiastical and civil government which they were at least partially able to understand, and yet, when the hour of trial came, Spain found them her most malignant and savage enemies. If we acquire the islands we may have the same experience. Being incapable of self-government, they must be controlled for a long time, even as to their local concerns, by legislative and executive authorities of a government six thousand miles distant. No matter what name may be given to the system established, it will be quasi-military in its character; an army must be employed to assist the civil authorities in the administration of the laws; and in order to provide effectually against aggressions from the outside, a strong naval force must be always ready for active duty.

They will constitute the most exposed parts of our national domain, and will require a much larger expenditure for protection than any other equal area within its limits. In all great wars the nations having colonies and outlying dependents have found them to be their most vulnerable parts; and nearly every island in the seas has passed, at some period in its history, from one sovereign to another by the operations of war, most of them having changed masters many times. If we acquire the Philippines, we will find it more difficult to defend them against any great European naval power than it will be to defend the whole coast of the United States against the same power. They will add comparatively nothing to our strength or prosperity in time of peace, and they will be a positive weakness to us in time of war.

JOHN G. CARLISLE.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

Having been requested to give my opinion as to whether this country should retain all of the Philippines, or a part of them, and if a part, how much and for what purposes, I submit the following suggestions:

If the entrance to the harbor of Manila had been successfully defended by the Spaniards, the American fleet under Dewey would have had no harbor of refuge for repair and coaling nearer than San Francisco. This effective object-lesson has taught the absolute necessity of a coaling and repair naval station in Asian waters. The necessity will increase from year to year with our increasing commercial relations with China and other Eastern countries, and because of the complications growing out of European aggressions in the Far East. The most virulent opponents of expansion now admit the necessity of retaining the harbor of Manila as a naval station, and the only question now to be decided is how much contiguous territory is necessary to make secure this holding. Should we retain the entire Philippine group, our only neighbors would be Japan on the north at Formosa, and Great Britain on North Borneo, Labuan, and the Straits Settlements, and Holland on the Dutch islands. We have along the northern border of the United States, from ocean to ocean, the British territory of Canada, and on this border it is not necessary to retain a single regiment or an armored war-ship for the purposes of defence. The English and Dutch get along peacefully as neighbors and control the native tribes of Borneo with a small military force, and so long as Holland and Great Britain are our only European neighbors in the Far East, a like condition will prevail should we assume the responsibility of good government over the entire Philippine group. Should we, however, retain only one or more of these islands, the remainder will inevitably fall to the possession of one or more of the European powers, and a disturbing element will be the result, necessitating the keeping of a larger military force on the portion retained. It would be folly to retain a coaling-station and be forced to carry coal across the Pacific Ocean to this station in times of war, while surrendering to other powers the islands of Cebu, Negros, Batan, and Masbate, on which coal is known to exist, and other islands on which it is believed future explorations will develop coal.

Should we retain all of these islands, then this country, Great Britain, and Japan can control all the coal easily accessible to the Pacific and Indian oceans, and these powers can, by proper co-operation, confine hostile naval movements of European powers to European waters. There will be less danger of foreign complications and less danger of wars in retaining the entire group of islands than there will be should we retain only a part.

These islands should be retained, not with a view of incorporating them into our system of States, but with a determination to give to them good government, opening their ports to all the world on equal terms, and expending every cent of revenue collected on the islands for the improvement and benefit of the native population, and when, in the future, the natives have been educated in the principles of self-government, allowing them to organize local self-government, remaining always subject to the protection and control of this country. For years the Philippines, Puerto Rico, Hawaii, and Cuba will have to be governed as England governs her numerous crown colonies—under the entire control of the home government. Gradually some of these may be merged into colonies possessing representative institutions, the home government retaining a veto on legislation; but later some may become self-governing colonies, like New Zealand, the home government having no control over any public officer—save the appointment of the governor—and being only responsible for the conduct of all relations between the colonies and foreign powers. It would be unwise for the United States to ever surrender the right to control the foreign relations of each of the above-named islands. The great success of our vast industrial enterprises has demonstrated that we have in abundance men of large administrative ability. The services of such men can be secured by placing our diplomatic service on a basis of stability of tenure for efficient service, and abandoning altogether our idiotic, unbusinesslike spoils system.

It has been suggested that colonial expansion will give opportunity for "carpet-bag" misrule, such as was imposed upon the Southern States during the "reconstruction" period following our civil war. The fact that this evil was cured from within by the aroused conscience of the American people, and was not permitted to last more than ten years, notwithstanding the political passions incident to a civil war, is a sufficient evidence that any party responsible for misrule in colonies will be hurled from power by the voters of this country. Misrule and oppression of her colonies have existed in Spain for nearly four hundred years, with no power to correct the abuses from within, and no political party in this country will dare to return any territory to the evils of Spanish misrule.

The people of Maine and Texas feel no personal responsibility for municipal corruption in Philadelphia and New York, but the people of the entire country will feel a sense of personal responsibility for the good government of Manila, Havana, Santiago, and other cities coming under our protection. I believe the increased responsibilities will have a most beneficial effect upon our home government, and provincial politics will give place to a broader statesmanship.

JOHN R. PROCTER.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

I am asked what, in my opinion, ought to be the policy of our government with reference to Cuba and the Philippines. The true inquiry is rather what our policy must be; for we are not any longer free to accept or to reject a national policy concerning the acquisition of these islands. In the first place, the war is not over, and as yet we are by no means masters of either Cuba or the Philippines; and in the second place, we have incurred certain obligations which we cannot now honorably refuse to discharge.

It seems to be generally assumed by our people that a treaty of peace has already been signed, under which we are to have possession of Cuba at once, and are to get just so much of the Philippines as we choose to ask for. No idea can be more fallacious. Hostilities are suspended, not ended. Spain has indeed promised that she will evacuate all her West Indian possessions, but she has given no guarantees of performance, and the time and manner of evacuation are still the subjects of discussion. Thus far matters have proceeded pleasantly and promptly enough, so far as published reports indicate; but it needs no great knowledge of Spanish history to appreciate the unrivalled capacity of her officials in protracting such negotiations whenever delay shall seem desirable.

And as to the Philippines, is it not possible that the Spanish commissioners in Paris may try to delay and haggle and drive a hard bargain? And what reply can we make if they refuse our demands? Have we now at hand that final argument of nations, a powerful army ready and eager to take the field? Our navy is indeed obviously equal to any demands that can be made upon it; but our troops are broken with sickness, and the government seems bent on rapidly disbanding such forces as still we possess. Once scattered, these same men can never be collected again. Nor can it be supposed that the country—horrified by the apparently well-authenticated stories of awful and utterly needless suffering in camps of instruction—will be ready to supply recruits or to accept cheerfully a renewal of hostilities. These facts must, of course, be quite as well known to the Spanish Foreign Office as they are to every one of us; and although the Spanish policy concerning the Philippines is not yet declared, it may well be that they will not cede any more of those islands than the point we now occupy, unless, indeed, we can show ourselves really ready for a resumption of the war in the West Indies as well as the East. It follows, therefore, that the question which has interested so many people here and abroad, as to whether we ought to take the whole or only a part of the Philippines, is, to say the least of it, somewhat premature.

It may, however, be assumed that we shall not surrender Manila. We are probably in no humor to begin fighting again for the sake of Panay or Mindanao; but, weary and sickened as this nation is with our recent experiments in foreign warfare, public opinion will sustain the government in going to any extremity for the retention of the territory we actually hold. Our fleet might have steamed away from Manila with honor on the 2d of May; but since that course was not adopted, it will hardly be possible now to withdraw and leave the city to its fate.

If, however, we are to establish ourselves in a sort of Asiatic Gibraltar at Manila, or even if we get the whole of Luzon, Spain retaining the other Philippines, the Carolines, and all but one of the Ladrones, certain consequences may be pretty clearly foreseen. For one thing, insurrection in all the Spanish islands will become chronic, and Manila—in spite of the sincerest efforts on our part—will always and inevitably be a base of operations for filibusters. We may thus shortly find ourselves again compelled to interfere by force, just as public opinion compelled intervention under analogous circumstances in Cuba. On the other hand, if we do not intervene, some of the colonizing nations will be very apt, under such conditions of persistent anarchy, to find "humanitarian" or other reasons for acquiring islands or ports in unpleasant and dangerous proximity to our establishments. The acquisition of Manila or Luzon alone will therefore tend to bring about a condition of unstable equilibrium; so that if we do not obtain the whole of the islands now (which at present seems unlikely) we may be driven into fighting for them later on, and perhaps against more formidable opponents.

Cuba, of course, we are publicly pledged to surrender to its inhabitants as soon as they have formed a stable government. It is perfectly plain that we are also bound, by every dictate of prudence and humanity, to administer that unhappy island until a government really stable is secured. How long that may be, nobody can guess. If we reasoned from the analogy of the other Spanish American republics, a century would not be too much to allow; but a firm and honest administration by us will doubtless shorten the period of apprenticeship. Before that period is ended, both countries may perhaps prefer annexation.

Whatever the extent of our insular possessions ultimately proves to be, it is at any rate apparent that we must very soon decide upon some general policy as to the method of administering them. Examples of colonial policies during the past three hundred years, some good and mostly bad, are numerous. Spain, still retaining almost unchanged the typical colonial policy of the eighteenth century, represents one extreme, embodying a ghastly record of misery and disaster. England, successful after many trials and many calamities, and prompt to profit by the lessons of experience, represents the other extreme. If we wish to emulate the example of England and not the example of Spain, we must begin with an earnest and honest and unswerving determination that the three fundamental features of the Spanish colonial policy shall not be applied to our possessions, and these three fundamentals are the spoils system, the navigation laws, and the protective tariff.

G. L. RIVES.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

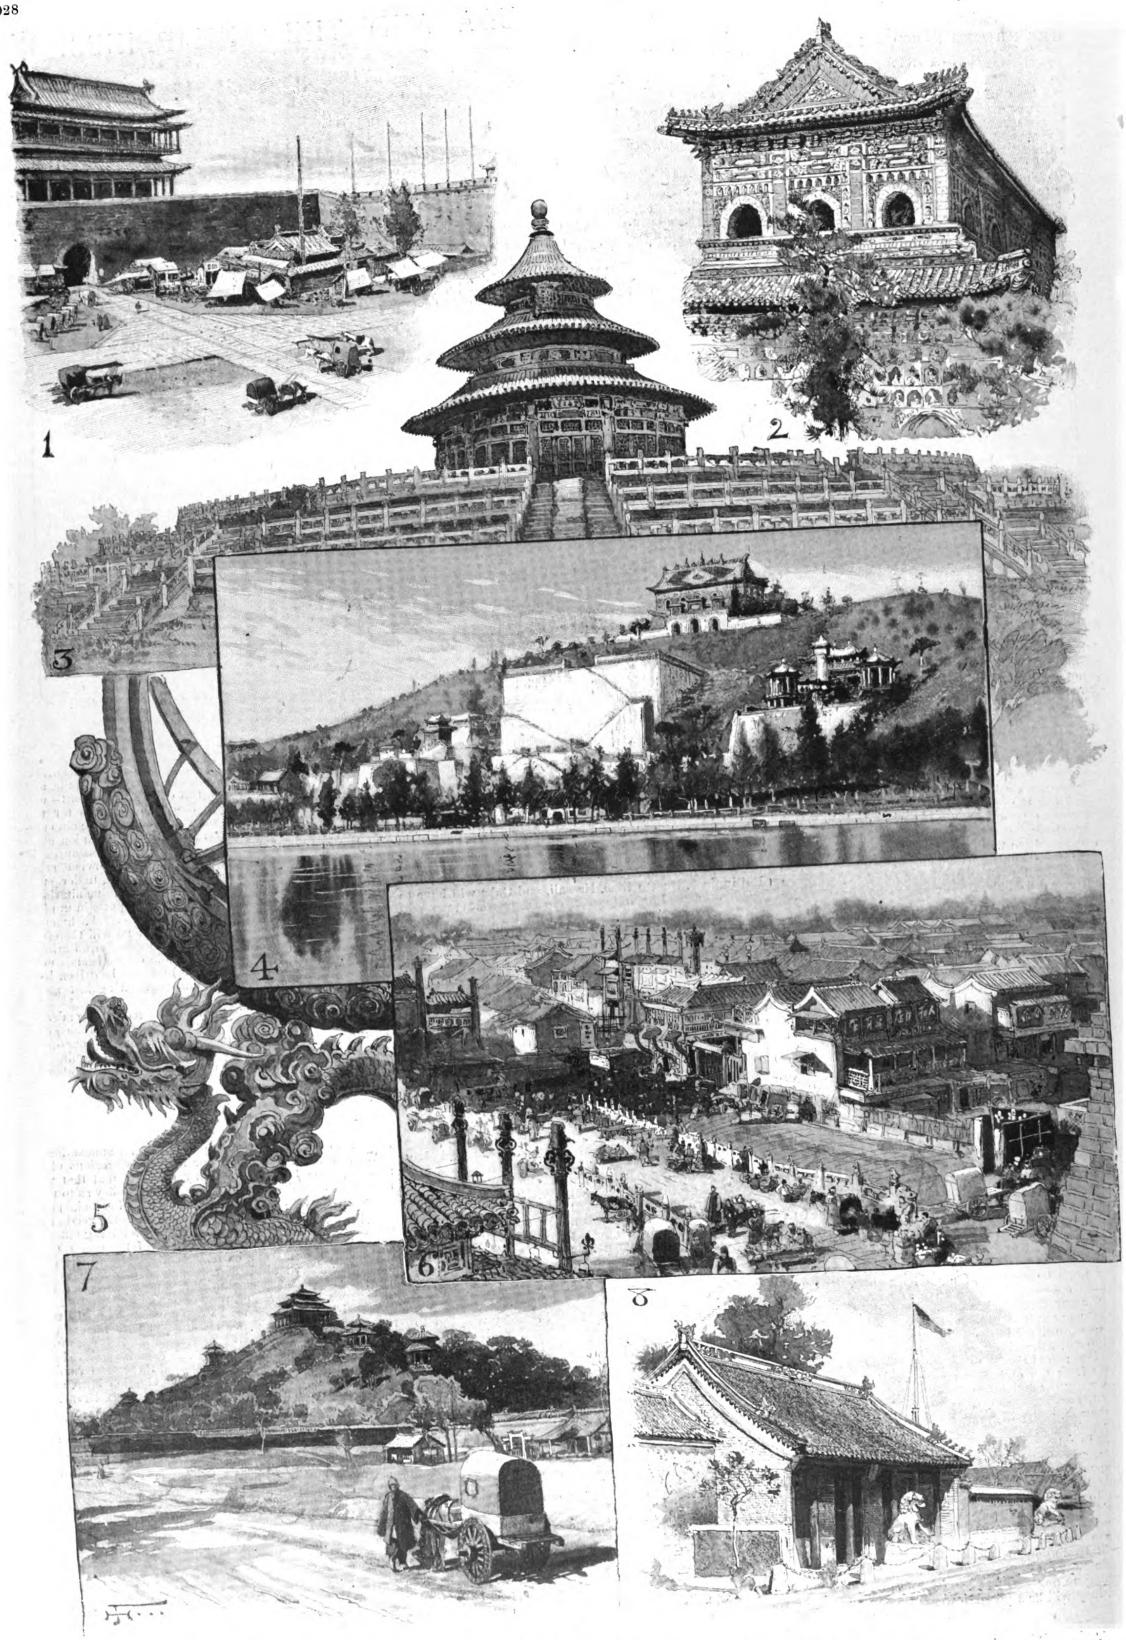
You ask whether, in my opinion, "we should retain all the Philippines or part of them, and if a part, how much?"



I answer that we should retain no part of the Philippines, except a coaling-station, with the free consent of Spain. It is necessary to go back to the declaration of war against Spain as the foundation of our right to retain the Philippines. That declaration was made on the sole ground of the inhumanity that characterized the war between Spain and a part of her subjects in the island of Cuba. We disclaimed, ex industria, any intention of acquiring the island. Our purpose was to pacify it, and establish then a free government for its people.

Being a war unique in its kind, one of humanity, undertaken to put a stop to war and butchery, and not for conquest, or defence, or revenge, or glory, its results must be determined by the principle on which it was waged.

We stand on high ground of disinterestedness to justify our intervention between the parent country and its rebellious subjects. We invite the intelligent judgment and approval of mankind as to the purity of our motives.

(Continued on page 1016.)

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

PEKING—PLACES OF INTEREST IN AND ABOUT CHINA'S CAPITAL.—Drawn by Harry Fenn from Photographs.—[See Page 1031.]

1. Chien-Mën, from Gate of Northern City. 2. Temple of Universal Fragrance, on Summit of Wan-Sho-Shan—Hill of Myriad Ages. 3. Temple of Heaven—Covered Altar. 4. Present Residence of Empress Dowager, 16 Miles north of City, showing Hill of Myriad Ages and Temple of Universal Fragrance. 5. Instrument at the Observatory on the City Wall. 6. Market Square—the Centre of City Life. 7. Coal Hill of the Imperial Palace. 8. American Legation.

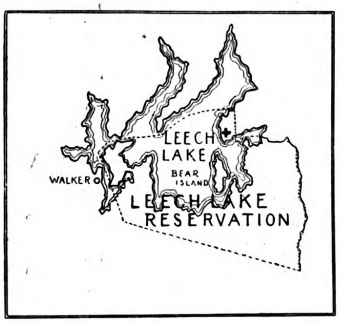
Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

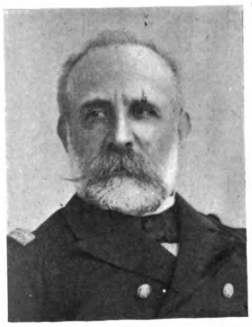
BRIG.-GEN. JOHN M. BACON, U.S.A.,
Commanding U. S. Troops at Leech Lake.

MAJOR MELVILLE C. WILKINSON, U.S.A.,
Killed by the Pillagers.
Photograph by Zimmerman.



CAPTAIN T. J. SHEEHAN,
The famous Indian Fighter Wounded in the Encounter.

BOGONAGESHIK,
Whose resistance to Arrest was the immediate Cause of the Uprising.

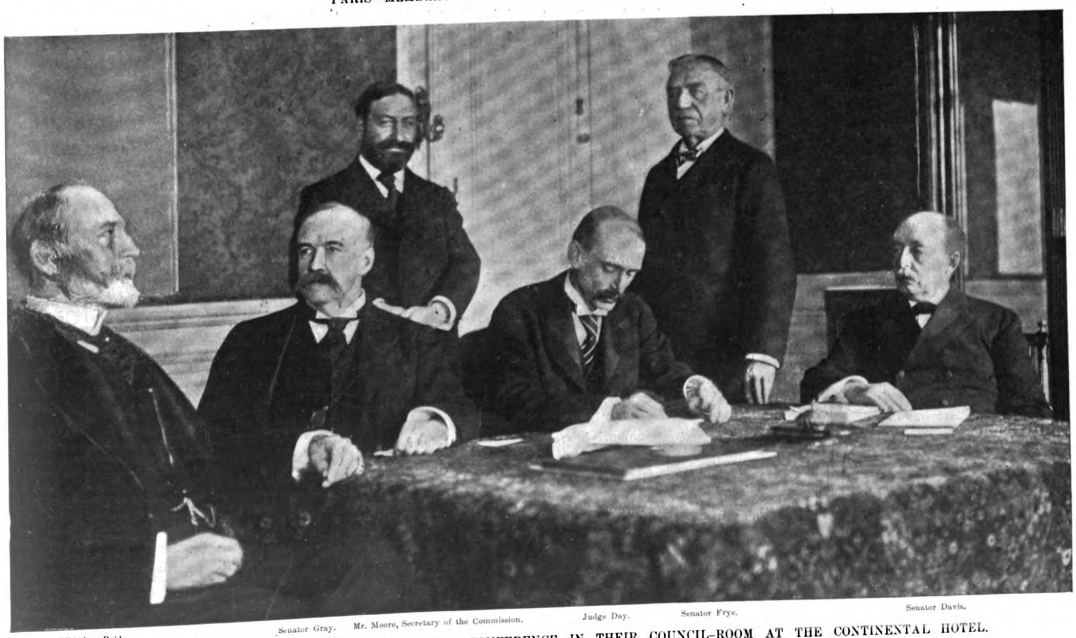


DRAWING BY A CHIPPEWA, SHOWING HOW THE FIRST WHITE MAN MET A CHIPPEWA INDIAN.

LEECH LAKE RESERVATION.

THE PILLAGER INDIAN OUTBREAK AT LEECH LAKE, MINNESOTA, OCTOBER 5, 1898.

ADMIRAL PASTOR Y LANDERO.



SEÑOR MONTERO RIOS. SEÑOR GUARMIA Y DIAZ.

MARQUIS MONTORO.

PARIS—MEMBERS OF THE SPANISH PEACE COMMISSION.

Whitelaw Reid. Senator Gray. Mr. Moore, Secretary of the Commission. Judge Day. Senator Frye. Senator Davis.

PARIS—THE AMERICAN PEACE COMMISSION AT A CONFERENCE IN THEIR COUNCIL-ROOM AT THE CONTINENTAL HOTEL.
PHOTOGRAPH TAKEN ESPECIALLY FOR "HARPER'S WEEKLY."

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THIS BUSY WORLD

Massachusetts seems to lose more than her share of promising young men who have made a start in public life. Russell, Andrew, Butler, and others have died prematurely within the last three years, and now Sherman Hoar is taken from her. He died at Concord on October 7, of typhoid fever contracted during his visits this summer to the military camps as agent of the Massachusetts Volunteers' Aid Association. One of his Harvard classmates, who writes to the WEEKLY about him, speaks of him as one of the heroes of the war, and says:

> He used to be a captain in the National Guard, and was as keen for this war as any schoolboy. He organized two companies for it in Concord, but at last promised not to go himself, on account of his four little children. The oldest is only ten. There was no keeping him back from the hospital service later, though. To many it would seem finer to die saving the lives of American soldiers than to die killing Spaniards, but fame gives fewer bays for it. I hope his name will be on the Harvard memorial gate.

Mr. Hoar was the son of Ebenezer Rockwood Hoar, Attorney-General in Grant's first cabinet, and was born in 1860. He distinguished himself in Harvard College (where he graduated in 1882), studied law, and after a year of practice joined the firm of Storey, Thorndike, & Hoar, of which Moorfield Storey was the senior partner. He was sent to Congress as a Democrat in 1890, and when his term expired President Cleveland appointed him United States District Attorney for Massachusetts. He served with exceptional ability and distinction in that office, and when he left it settled down to the practice of law in partnership with his brother. He was regarded as one of the ablest of the younger lawyers in the State, and his death has been mourned in Massachusetts as a serious public loss. Some verses he wrote five years ago, in memory of a friend who died, are remembered now as applicable to himself. They begin:

> God, give unto Thy servant rest!
> Who, finding sorrow all around,
> Gave of his strength, until he found
> He'd given of it all he had
> To make the sorrowing less sad.
> Yes, give unto Thy servant rest!

There must be some millions of Americans still alive who remember A. Oakey Hall as one of the men who gained permanent publicity from Thomas Nast's pictures in HARPER'S WEEKLY of the Tammany Ring in the days of Tweed. He was Mayor of New York from 1869 to 1872, and his portrait was grouped by Nast along with those of Tweed, Connolly, and Sweeny. He was tried for complicity in the Tweed frauds and acquitted, and he lived long enough to have it admitted by men who knew —by Judge Noah Davis, for one—that he was not a guilty accomplice of Tweed. At all events, he kept bad company, and paid a heavy penalty for it, for the men with whom he was associated in Nast's pictures are those with whom every one has associated him ever since.

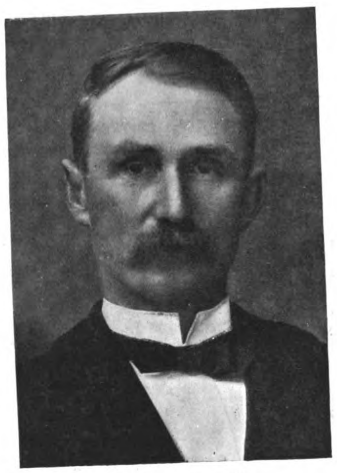
He was an interesting man, and lived a checkered and eventful life. He was born in 1826, the son of a New York merchant, who died of yellow fever when his boy was three years old. The lad, as he grew up, insisted on having a classical education, and earned money by newspaper writing to pay his way through the New York University, where he graduated in 1844. Then he studied law zealously, in spite of poverty, and was admitted to the bar in New Orleans in 1846. Two years later he came back to New York, and worked for a time at newspaper writing, but practised law also, won reputation at it, and became a member of the firm of Brown, Hall, & Vanderpoel. From 1850 until 1854 he served as assistant district attorney. For many years after that he had an excellent law practice. After Lincoln beat Seward for the Republican nomination for President, Hall joined the Democratic party, and fought Tammany hard until it made terms with him. Three times he was elected district attorney on the Tammany ticket, and in 1868 and again in 1870 he was chosen Mayor. His political career ended with the collapse of Tweed. For a time he disappeared, and it turned out that he went to England. He came back to New York, and occupied himself with newspaper work, playwriting, and to some extent with the practice of law, until his death on October 7.

Blanche Willis Howard, who died in Germany on October 7, wrote a successful story when she was twenty-six years old, which made her literary fortune and determined the course of her life. The story was One Summer, published in 1874. The Boston Transcript says that 54,000 copies of it were sold, and paid the author twenty-five cents each. The next year Miss Howard, abetted by her publishers, and encouraged by a contract to write weekly letters for the Transcript, went abroad to continue a literary career. Most of her life after that was spent abroad. Among her later books were Aunt Serena, Guenn, Aulnay Tower, and a book of travels. In 1890 she was married to Baron von Teuffel, a German physician of note, who died two years ago. For several years she edited an English magazine published in Stuttgart. Besides her other interests and abilities she had a strong bent for music, and herself became an accomplished musician. At the time of her death she was about starting for her winter home on the island of Guernsey. It is told of her that her home life was delightful, and that she had great enjoyment in all out-of-door pleasures—walking, bicycling, swimming—and loved the sea. She was born in Bangor, Maine, in 1847.

A reader of the WEEKLY who believes in high license, and has been to Maine and seen how prohibition works there, suggests these new definitions for Maine's next speller and definer: License—the privilege of selling liquor, obtained by the payment of money; Prohibition—the right to sell liquor without any payment.

Booker T. Washington's Tuskegee Institute has $300,000 worth of property, of which $58,000 came to it during the year ending June 1. It needs at present $24,000 for heating, lighting, and an increased water-supply, and about $60,000 for new buildings and equipments. Most of all, it needs an endowment fund of $500,000. So says Principal Washington in the Seventeenth Annual Report.

Columbia University starts her 145th year richer and more populous than ever before, with about 2800 students on her rolls. The Freshman class of about 135 is twenty-five per cent. larger than its predecessor. There is a large gain, too, in the university's medical school, and increased attendance in all departments. The new gymnasium, which has just been opened, is exceedingly satisfactory.



Columbia intends to erect on Amsterdam Avenue a memorial gate to her sons who died in the war. The list includes Sergeant Hamilton Fish, Dr. John Blair Gibbs, Dr. Lindheim, and perhaps others.

Mr. T. Thomas Fortune, who is known to newspaper-readers as a frequent contributor to the Sun of articles about our colored brethren and their interests, is a representative colored citizen, and is president of the Afro-American League, and editor of the Age. In a speech made in Rochester the other day, at the time of the dedication of the monument to Frederick Douglass, he said:

> "The management of the colored people of the South has been a conspicuous failure. The race has been educated, but race prejudice has not abated. I see other black and yellow peoples about to come under the care of this government. If you rule the black and yellow people in Cuba, Puerto Rico, and the Philippines as the South has been and is being ruled, you will have revolution upon revolution, and you ought to have it."

It is the open season for prophets, and Mr. Fortune's forebodings are worth recording.

The summer brought many examples of the friction between blacks and whites in the South. One of the most interesting cases was that of the Second Texas Volunteers, who refused for a time to accept their pay from Major Lynch, a colored paymaster, but presently relented, and found by a practical test that the money lost none of its value in passing through a negro's hands. A few days ago there was a clash in color lines at the camp at Huntsville, Alabama, which cost three lives; and in Illinois there has been serious fighting over a question of negro labor, as elsewhere told.

HON. THEODORE T. GEER,
Oregon's Farmer, Gold Standard Republican, Governor-Elect.

A great many persons besides Mr. Fortune feel that the future of the negro in this country is a problem that is yet to be solved, and many minds are busy with it all the time. Bishop Turner of Georgia is strongly in favor of negro emigration, and believes that there will presently be a great exodus of American negroes to Africa, where, he thinks, the black men will have a fairer chance, and will prosper better than will ever be possible for them here. An obstacle to the exodus is that few of our negroes have any inclination to go to Africa, but much prefer to stay at home. A correspondent of the New York Evening Post, who writes from Birmingham, Alabama, believes that relief for such of the Southern negroes as are not content with their social condition will come presently in the form of counties here and there in the South which shall be owned, populated, and administered exclusively or almost altogether by negroes. This reasoner objects strongly to a negro State, but thinks that negro counties would be very useful in providing refuges for negroes who dislike contact with the whites, and want to get out of the shadow of the dominant race. The suggestion is interesting, though its originator admits that it will be long before it is put into practice, as the transfer of the property of any Southern county into negro hands would necessarily be a slow process.

Newspaperdom is interested in the resolution of the New York Times to bestow itself daily (except Sundays) upon New York readers for a consideration of one cent. The Times of late has been a three-cent paper, and reports a constant gain of readers at that price. But it says that it would prefer to see its circulation increase still faster, so, for the benefit of Greater New York alone, it has reduced its price. It is supporting the Democratic candidate for Governor, and that brings it into competition, so far as politics are concerned, with the World and the Journal, both one-cent papers. Undoubtedly it will get many more readers at one cent than it can at three, and as it does not intend that any change in its character shall follow the change in its price, the public is to be congratulated in getting a newspaper of so good a quality for so little money. All the same, one cent is not enough to pay for a first-rate morning paper, and possibly the movement of the Times may prove to be the first step towards putting that journal and its two competitors aforesaid on a two-cent basis.

There are old business houses in New York, but not many that have been able as yet to celebrate the hundredth anniversary of their establishment in business. The firm of Oelrichs & Co., which achieved that distinction on October 12, was started on that date in 1798 by Casper Meier, who came from Bremen to New York, then a city of 30,000 inhabitants, with a modest stock of goods, mostly consigned to him for sale by friends at home. He began business in Gouverneur Lane, and prospered, in time becoming the American agent of the North German Lloyd Steamship Company, whose president and founder, H. H. Meier, had been his first partner. On Casper Meier's death, in 1839, the firm name had, under the State laws, to be changed, and became L. H. von Post & Oelrichs. The firm has always been engaged in transatlantic commerce, and for years its chief business has been the importation of wool and hides. For a time it was the agent of the German post-office department for the payment of money-orders issued by the German post-offices. The present senior member of the firm, Herman Casper von Post, is a grandson of Casper Meier, the other members being Gustav and Benjamin Schwab, great-grandsons of Meier, and Herman Oelrichs, nephew and namesake of one of his partners.

What with Indian fights in Minnesota and battles with striking miners in Illinois, we hardly miss the excitements of the late war. Late developments in Illinois have been exceedingly grave. There has been trouble at two points —at Pana, forty-two miles southeast of Springfield, and at Virden, twenty-one miles southwest of Springfield. The basis of the rioting is the same at both points. Miners have demanded better wages, have been refused, and have struck. Mine-operators have then attempted to bring in negro laborers from the adjacent States. The striking miners have objected, and fighting has ensued. At Pana, on September 1, the miners captured the president of the mining company and his brother, and held them for some hours as prisoners. On September 30 they stopped a railroad train bringing negro laborers from Indiana, and compelled its return to that State. On October 2 one hundred masked miners from Pana went over to Washington, Indiana, and attacked negroes working in a mine there. Then Governor Tanner reluctantly sent a battery of militia to Pana to keep order.

At Virden the miners struck for an increase of pay from twenty-eight cents to forty cents a ton. The mining company refused the advance, and prepared to bring in negroes. President Louch of the company asked for military protection, and not getting it, employed armed guards of his own. On October 12 a train bringing negro laborers from Alabama was attacked, on its arrival at Virden, by armed miners. A brief but very brisk engagement followed, in which miners, guards, deputy-sheriffs, and negroes took part. Eight men were killed, at least four were mortally wounded, and not less than twenty others were hurt. Four companies of the First Illinois Volunteer Cavalry and other troops were immediately ordered to Virden from Springfield. Governor Tanner has expressed strong sympathy for the strikers, has denounced the policy of the coal companies in importing laborers from outside the State, and has been unwilling to furnish troops to aid in carrying that policy out. The mine-owners blame him for the loss of life. He declares that the trouble is due to "avaricious mine-owners, who have forgotten their duty to society."

Last winter the newspapers in New York made game very freely of the lady whose whim it was to have herself crowned Queen of the Holland Dames. "Queen" was thought to be a somewhat absurd title for an American woman to assume. They seem less squeamish in the boundless West, for one reads that President McKinley, who has been visiting the Omaha Fair, was received, on his arrival at Omaha, by King Ak-Sar-Ben IV. and the board of governors of the King Knights of Ak-Sar-Ben. The festival of the Knights of Ak-Sar-Ben was prevailing at the fair at the time, and the King seems to have been for the time being the head man in the community.

The President had an interesting journey to Omaha, and made many speeches, which were received with boundless enthusiasm. The fair is a very successful show. The buildings and their setting are praised as exceedingly beautiful. There is much to see, and there are great crowds of visitors.

An element of personal interest has been lent to Chinese politics by the belief that for weeks past the Emperor of China has been hiding under a bed, while the Dowager Empress has paraded through the palace with a bowl of poison and a dirk. To most of us the personality of Chinese dignitaries used to be very vague. The only Chinaman that the average newspaper-reader feels that he knows is Li Hung-Chang. Lately we have begun to understand that the Dowager Empress is a real person and an exceedingly effectual one. We would like, at a safe distance, to know her better. News which comes by way of London, dated October 11, says that the Dowager has set up a new Emperor in place of Kuang Hsu, recently discharged. What Kuang Hsu's fate was does not yet appear.

On October 12 the Emperor of Germany started from Berlin on his journey to Constantinople and Jerusalem. He seems to have arranged for a junket besides which the most elaborate Congressional funeral seems simple and insignificant. The Empress goes with him, and his outfit includes a dozen eminent state officers, three ladies of the court, eighteen equerries, a squad of gendarmes armed with cameras, six horses, one hundred and ten trunks, many of them of large size, and a big box containing $800,000 worth of jewels, decorations, and valuable gifts. The Sultan has made exceedingly elaborate and costly preparations to receive him in Constantinople, and forward him by way of Damascus and Joppa to the Holy City. We read of roads two thousand years old being

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google widened and rebuilt in Palestine, and of a tremendous furbishing up at Jerusalem, even to the replacing of old buildings with new ones that will look better. Banks in Judea are being stocked with money for William. Horses, tents, camels, hotels, silver plate, carpets, and every sort of supply have been made ready beforehand. He is going to Bethlehem, doubtless, with a brass band. He is the one eminent man on earth who could go to Bethlehem with a brass band and feel that he had honored the place.

It will be remembered that his ostensible errand in Jerusalem is to dedicate a German chapel there. His real purpose, folks say, is to start a German colony in Syria. His journey should be vastly interesting, especially on its comic side. One wishes that Mark Twain and Richard Harding Davis might go with him.

Mr. John M. Forbes, who died at the age of eighty-five, on October 12, at his home at Milton, Massachusetts, would have been amply justified in living much longer, since he had shown himself exceedingly competent in his management of the affairs of this world, and in promoting his own comfort and happiness and the prosperity of persons associated with him. He was a notable American, and acquaintance with the incidents of his career really helps to make one feel that success is a pretty good thing even in this world. The Forbes family is of Scotch origin, but Mr. John M. Forbes's grandfather was a Massachusetts clergyman, and his father a merchant. He himself was born in Bordeaux, France, in 1813, but started for home when he was three months old, and eventually reached Boston after being in one successful sea-fight, and being captured by the British next day. He was successful as a merchant, and later grew very rich by able management of railroads and other large concerns. About fifty years ago he bought the island of Naushon, between Buzzards Bay and Vineyard Sound, and made it his summer home. The island is famous for its harbors, its yachts, its deer-shooting, and its hospitalities. The family of which Mr. Forbes was the head has great renown in the worlds of business and of sport, being strong in yachtsmen, horsemen, patriots, fighting-men, and men of affairs.

E. S. MARTIN.

THE PILLAGER INDIAN OUTBREAK.

ON Wednesday, October 5, a fight occurred on the Leech Lake Indian reservation, in northern Minnesota, between a number of Pillager Indians and a party of whites composed of a company of regulars and a marshal's posse. The immediate cause of the trouble is still involved in some doubt, no two persons concerned giving just the same version of it; but most accounts agree in ascribing the collision, in general terms, to an attempt by the United States marshal, R. T. O'Connor, to arrest an Indian named Bogonageshik, belonging to the Pillager band of Chippewas inhabiting Bear Island and the neighboring mainland. The portrait here given is reproduced from one taken several years ago, when Bogonageshik was much more under white influence than now, and shows him in Caucasian clothing. He never, however, ceased to cling to the blanket, even when it had to be used as an adjunct to the costume of civilization. Bogonageshik was one of several Indians required in court as principals or witnesses in prosecutions under the liquor laws. The others had surrendered themselves; but he had first proved very hard to arrest, and then had been forcibly rescued from the marshal's custody by a party of his friends and followers. In trying to capture him a second time, the marshal encountered resistance so formidable that he applied for military aid. General John M. Bacon responded, on orders from the War Department, with Company E, Third United States Infantry, led by Major Melville C. Wilkinson. The posse and soldiers left Walker, the only railroad town on the edge of Leech Lake, and proceeded by boat to a promontory on the mainland just north of Bear Island. Landing in the midst of a heavy snow-storm, they found and captured one Pillager who had been identified as a member of the rescuing party, but saw no signs of a hostile force anywhere. After a march about the shore of the promontory they were about preparing for dinner, when they were surprised by a fusillade from Indians concealed in the woods near by. A sharp exchange of shots followed, but the Indians were able, as a rule, to keep out of sight among the timber, and it is supposed that they carried off most of their dead and wounded, so as to hide the extent of their loss.

The official reports telegraphed to Washington, describing this fight and the skirmishes which followed during the next two days, were so meagre that neither the authorities of the War Department nor of the Interior Department could extract from them a complete story of the trouble. All they could learn positively was that Major Wilkinson, five soldiers, and one Indian policeman had been killed, and nine soldiers, one Indian policeman, and one deputy marshal wounded. The white settlers scattered through the country near Leech Lake were, as usual in such cases, utterly panic-stricken, most of them deserting their homes and making their way to the nearest towns, in fear of a general Chippewa outbreak. General Bacon sent word to Washington on Friday that he considered the insurrection subdued, but neither the Governor of Minnesota nor the terrified settlers agreed with him. Orders were therefore sent him to put the regulars of his command, and also the volunteer troops at Minneapolis, at the service of the State, if, on consultation with the Governor, he found such extra force necessary.

The Bear Island outbreak has caused much surprise in Washington, as the Chippewas have been from time immemorial the friends of the whites. The impelling grievance, it is thought, must have been much more serious than appears on the surface. The Commissioner of Indian Affairs was so impressed with this idea that he was unwilling to trust the handling of the matter to Indian-Agent Sutherland and Inspector Tinker, who had hastened into the Leech Lake country at the first alarm, but started at once for Minnesota to take personal charge of it. Those persons who know most of the conditions prevailing among the Minnesota Chippewas believe that we will find the causes of friction cumulative. The origin of the whole difficulty probably dates back to a purchase of land made by the government from the Pillagers in 1847. The tract contained nearly 700,000 acres, and the Indians let it go for $15,000, with the understanding that the government was buying it to make a home for the Menominee Indians, who were friends of the Pillagers, and also of the hereditary foes of the Chippewa nation, the Sioux. The reason the Pillagers were willing to part with the land was that it lay between their home and the home of the Sioux, so that the presence of the friendly Menominees there would serve as a barrier against the predatory raids of the Sioux, and insure a permanent peace for all parties concerned.

But the government had, as so often before and since, made a promise it was unable to fulfil. The Menominees refused to remove to their proposed new reservation. Instead, they relinquished their claim upon it in consideration of receiving back a part of their old lands in Wisconsin and a generous sum of money. It has never been possible to make the Pillagers believe that they were not shamelessly cheated in this labyrinth of bargains. As they accepted the $15,000 agreed upon, their strict legal rights in the land have of course been extinguished, though their moral claim survives against the government for its failure to carry out what they deemed the most important feature of the agreement of 1847. Their more progressive men, who have adopted the ways of civilization, and consented to let bygones be bygones for the sake of keeping the peace with the whites, have held the smaller restless element in check, but the sense of injustice has never ceased to rankle sorely even in their breasts.

The tract purchased for the Menominees, when rejected and ceded to the government by the latter tribe, was thrown open to white settlement, with the usual result. Lawless men swarmed into the villages and small towns, and opened dram-shops for the sale of "Indian whiskey," in contemptuous defiance of the statutes. The white man's whiskey is bad enough in its effect upon the red man, but "Indian whiskey" is a compound of crude alcohol, strychnine, and a variety of other ingredients, which, united, make a fiery but quickly stupefying drink. Indians who came into town with something to sell would, as soon as they had got their money, spend a quarter or a half dollar for this liquor, and, when overcome by it, be robbed of whatever they had still in their pockets.

But the outrage did not end here. Deputy marshals of the United States, often recruited from behind the illicit bars, made a fat living by arresting men engaged in the Indian whiskey traffic, subpœnaing Indian witnesses by the dozen, and carrying both prisoners and witnesses off to St. Paul, where the Federal courts were held. The largest part of this business was collusive. One dram-seller would be fined or sentenced to a brief imprisonment; another would be discharged for lack of competent evidence against him; in both cases the officers would pocket large sums of government money under the guise of mileage, witness fees, charges for hotel accommodations, and the like, sharing their plunder with their friends the prisoners. The Indian witnesses were encouraged to respond to their subpœnas by being given a free excursion to the city, a "good time" while there, and perhaps a trifle in cash by way of a makeweight. At one time this abuse became so gross that the Secretary of the Interior felt compelled to protest against it to the Attorney-General, some three hundred Indians being simultaneously absent from their reservations and in charge of deputy marshals at St. Paul, to their own demoralization and the downright robbery of the government.

The older and soberer Indians realized that the lives of their young men were being wrecked by this practice, but their earnest appeals counted for little. At last, however, the marshals overreached themselves by trying to make too much money out of their speculation in witnesses. A member of the Bear Island band of Pillagers was carried off as a witness, and when he returned was sick and famished, having walked 160 miles without food. He explained that the deputy who had taken him away and made use of his testimony had refused him the money necessary to pay his fare back by the cars or buy meals on the journey. This aroused great indignation among the Indians, and is said to have been at the bottom of the recent resistance to the authority of Marshal O'Connor. The marshal denies the Indian's story, but the outbreak will undoubtedly bring about an investigation, which may not be wholly barren of good results.

The Minnesota Chippewas at large have another grievance against the government in the way the Department of the Interior has permitted them to be robbed right and left under the pretence of disposing of their timber. The outrages perpetrated upon the Chippewas of the Red Lake country were exposed a year ago last winter, when it was discovered that the so-called expert estimators appointed by the government to appraise their growing timber, preliminary to its purchase by white lumbermen, were not experts at all, but were political heelers who knew nothing about the business, and wasted the Indians' money in salaries and expenses while making worthless guesses at the quantities, varieties, and values of the timber. Sitting in the bar-room of a backwoods hotel, or while playing cards in a comfortable camp, they would make up their reports out of nothing tangible. As typical of these frauds may be cited one case where they reported 65,000 feet of pine as growing on a tract which, on investigation, was found to contain 782 feet; or another, where the report showed 25,000 feet and investigation showed 75,000; or a third, where the estimators reported 45,000 feet, and the tract was found to contain none at all! Swindling as bad in kind, though possibly somewhat modified in degree, has been, and probably still is, in progress in other parts of the Chippewa country.

In the mind of the educated white man one grievance does not necessarily lap over upon another, and wrongs perpetrated by individuals are not charged up against a whole race. The Indian's mind works differently. His patriarchal system has trained him to regard the family, the band, the tribe, or the race as a unit, and to regard all the men of one color, or all representatives of one government, as sharing responsibility for the sins committed by a single element or a single person in the same category with them. Keeping this difference in view, it will be easier to understand why one of the less progressive bands of Pillagers, cherishing memories of the broken compact of 1847, seeing their fellow-tribesmen turned over to the spoilers in the logging-camps, and being themselves victims of the rapacity of dram-sellers and law officers, should reach a point of desperation where they are willing to resort to the one remedy which seemed open to them—the shedding of white blood.

FRANCIS E. LEUPP.

THE SITUATION IN CHINA.

A CHINESE phrase, for which we shall hardly find an exact equivalent in the English language, will help us to separate truth from error—or at least the probable from the unlikely—when we read such despatches as those recently published in regard to the flight, assassination, or suicide of the Chinese Emperor. The phrase may be literally translated, "to save his face." Any high official of the empire may apply it to himself in certain contingencies, and may think that he defends his personal credit and that of his office by committing suicide when threatened with removal. In the case of the Emperor his sense of propriety and the rule of etiquette would leave him no choice. If his successor has been chosen, or it becomes quite certain that a successor is to be appointed immediately, he must "save his imperial face." It will not be necessary to murder him.

In his Forbidden City, which is surrounded by the Imperial City, and that in turn by the walled town commonly known as the Tartar City, the Emperor has less real security than the poorest Canton fisherman, who can at least foresee a danger, if he cannot control his surroundings.

The towers and larger buildings of the Purple Forbidden City are shown in the illustration on the first page of this number of the WEEKLY—a view which will have the added interest of complete novelty for our readers. On another page the Market Square, the busy centre of the city's life, contrasts with the residence of the Dowager Empress, which, although in a sense the central point of the Orient, is about sixteen miles north of the capital, on Wan-sho-shan (the "Ten Thousand Years Hill"); and the drawing of the "Coal Hill" of the Imperial Palace recalls one of those extraordinary stories which may be repeated without apology. Briefly told, it is this: The city was besieged, on a time; the supply of fuel gave out; it became impossible to boil the drinking water, and a pestilence carried off soldiers and simple folk with that prodigality which seems to be strictly Asiatic. So, then, when the protocol had been signed, a mountain of coal was taken from the greatest mine in the world, little by little, and by cart-load and basketful placed where you see it—covered with rich earth, planted, decorated, and still a coal-mine, aboveground, and at hand for use in future sieges. It seems to be rather queer, but that is because our point of view is Occidental. The Temple of Heaven, of which we see the characteristic part in the illustration No. 8, is in the centre of the southern or Chinese city, which does not grow around the other cities which we have mentioned. The little diagram given herewith has a political significance that should not be missed. The Chinese and their conquerors have not amalgamated. If you travel into the heart of the continent, after having mastered the language of the capital, you must master dialects like distinct languages. It is a country now to be broken up, not merely because it is unprogressive, but because it has been rent and riven by successive invasions.

DIAGRAM OF THE CITY OF PEKING.
Showing the Point of View from which the Front-Page Illustration in this number was taken.

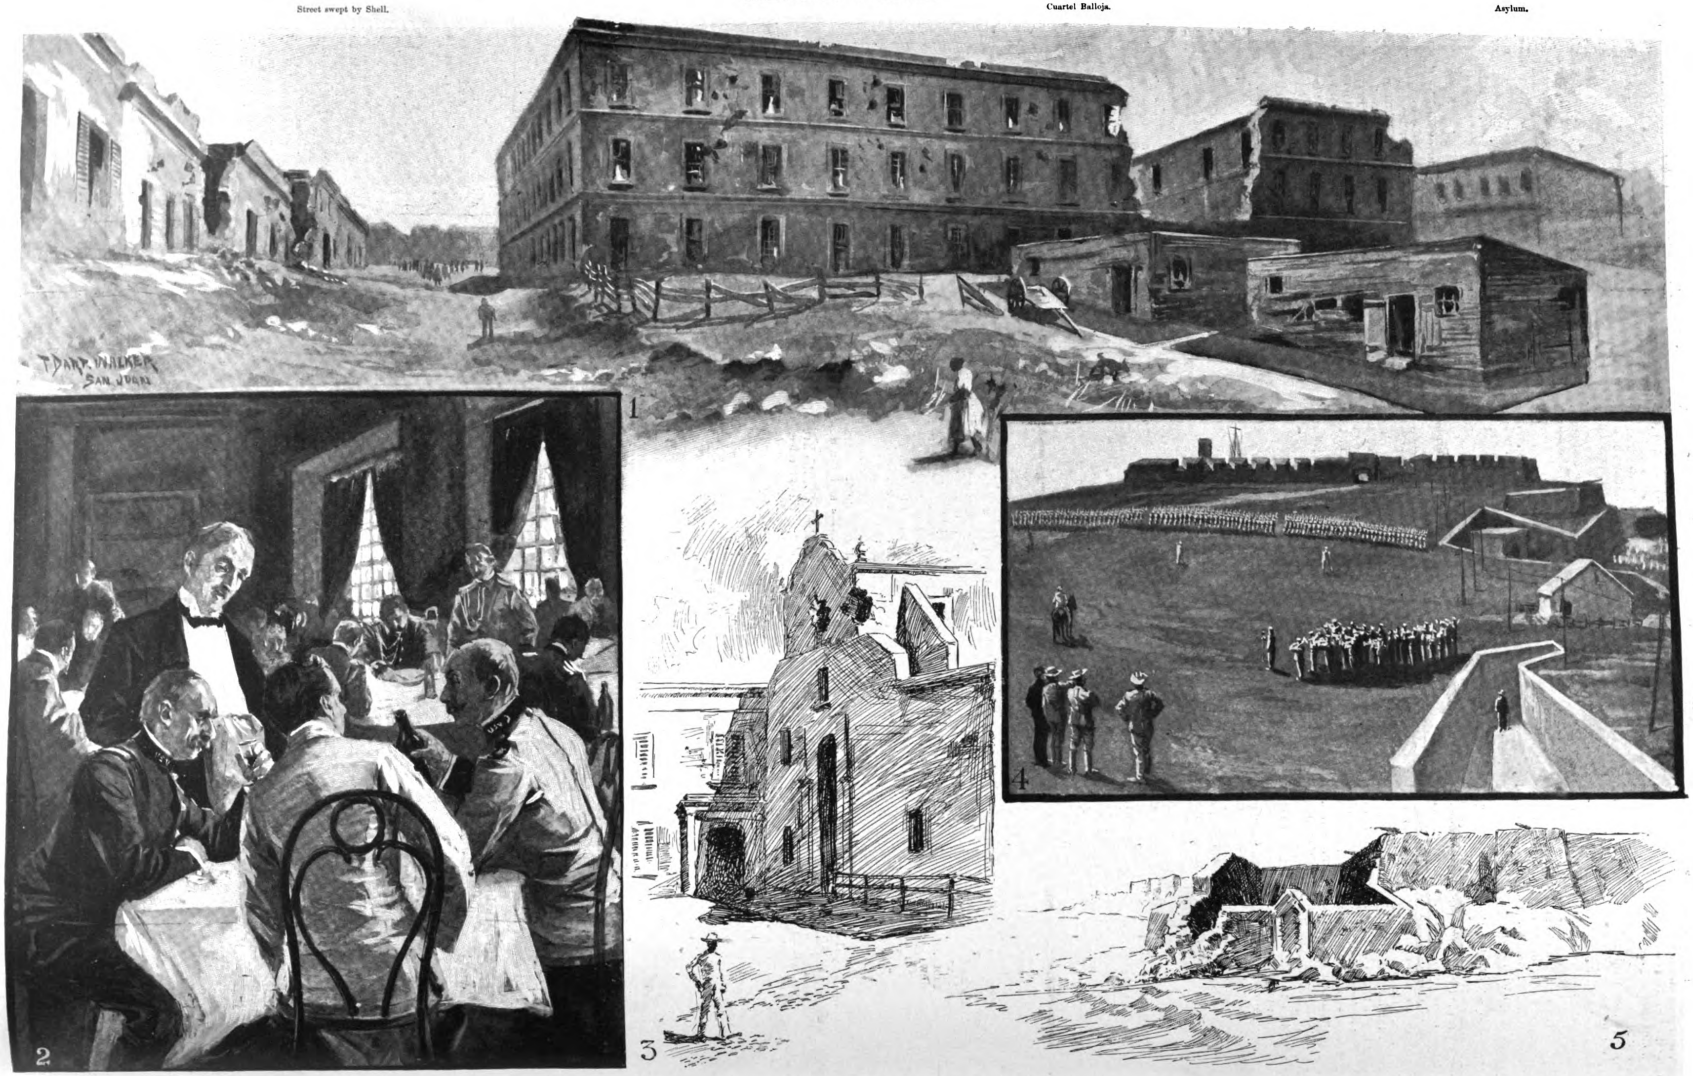
An American long resident in Peking, who secured these uncommon views, has had opportunities for acquainting himself with the true sentiment of the ruling class in China at the present time. He asserts that the Chinese do not love Russia, but regard America as their natural ally, and prefer England to the sullen neighbor on the north—from which quarter the kingdom's enemies have come from time immemorial. Li Hung-Chang and Prince Kung, the Prime Minister and substitute for Li in the latter's absence, have coquetted with Russia in order to bring England to the point—that is, a substantial guaranty of the integrity of China against Russian aggression; and no arrangement that has been entered into would be allowed to stand in the way of a favorable convention with the United States. The ninth Emperor of the Manchu dynasty of Tsing, a young man of twenty-seven years, was gravely indiscreet when he let it be known that he entertained opinions in regard to the development and modernization of his nation. The Dowager Empress and Li were engaged in certain preliminary matters that appeared to have a wholly different tendency. The crisis had reached the diplomatic stage, when this licensed idler, from within his triple walls, where the most pampered existence out of Christendom seemed absolutely secure, lifted a puny voice in favor of reforms in the fashion of the West.

With this situation in mind, it is worth while to re-read the conflicting despatches which were sent out to those regions visited by the sun after it has spent its force upon the Celestial Empire. Toward the end of last month an imperial edict regretted the increasing ill health of the Emperor, and the fact that the succession had been provided for was not long withheld. Three weeks later the world was still in doubt as to his fate, the report on October 14 being that he lay at the point of death in a small building near the palace of the Empress.

The old Empress Dowager has virtually ruled China, as well as controlled the young Emperor, during half a lifetime. She had appointed him to succeed to the throne on her son's death, had supervised his education, and chosen his wives for him. He had no contact with the outside world, and was supposed not to know or care what happened beyond the Tartar City walls, which are sixty feet thick.

M. W.



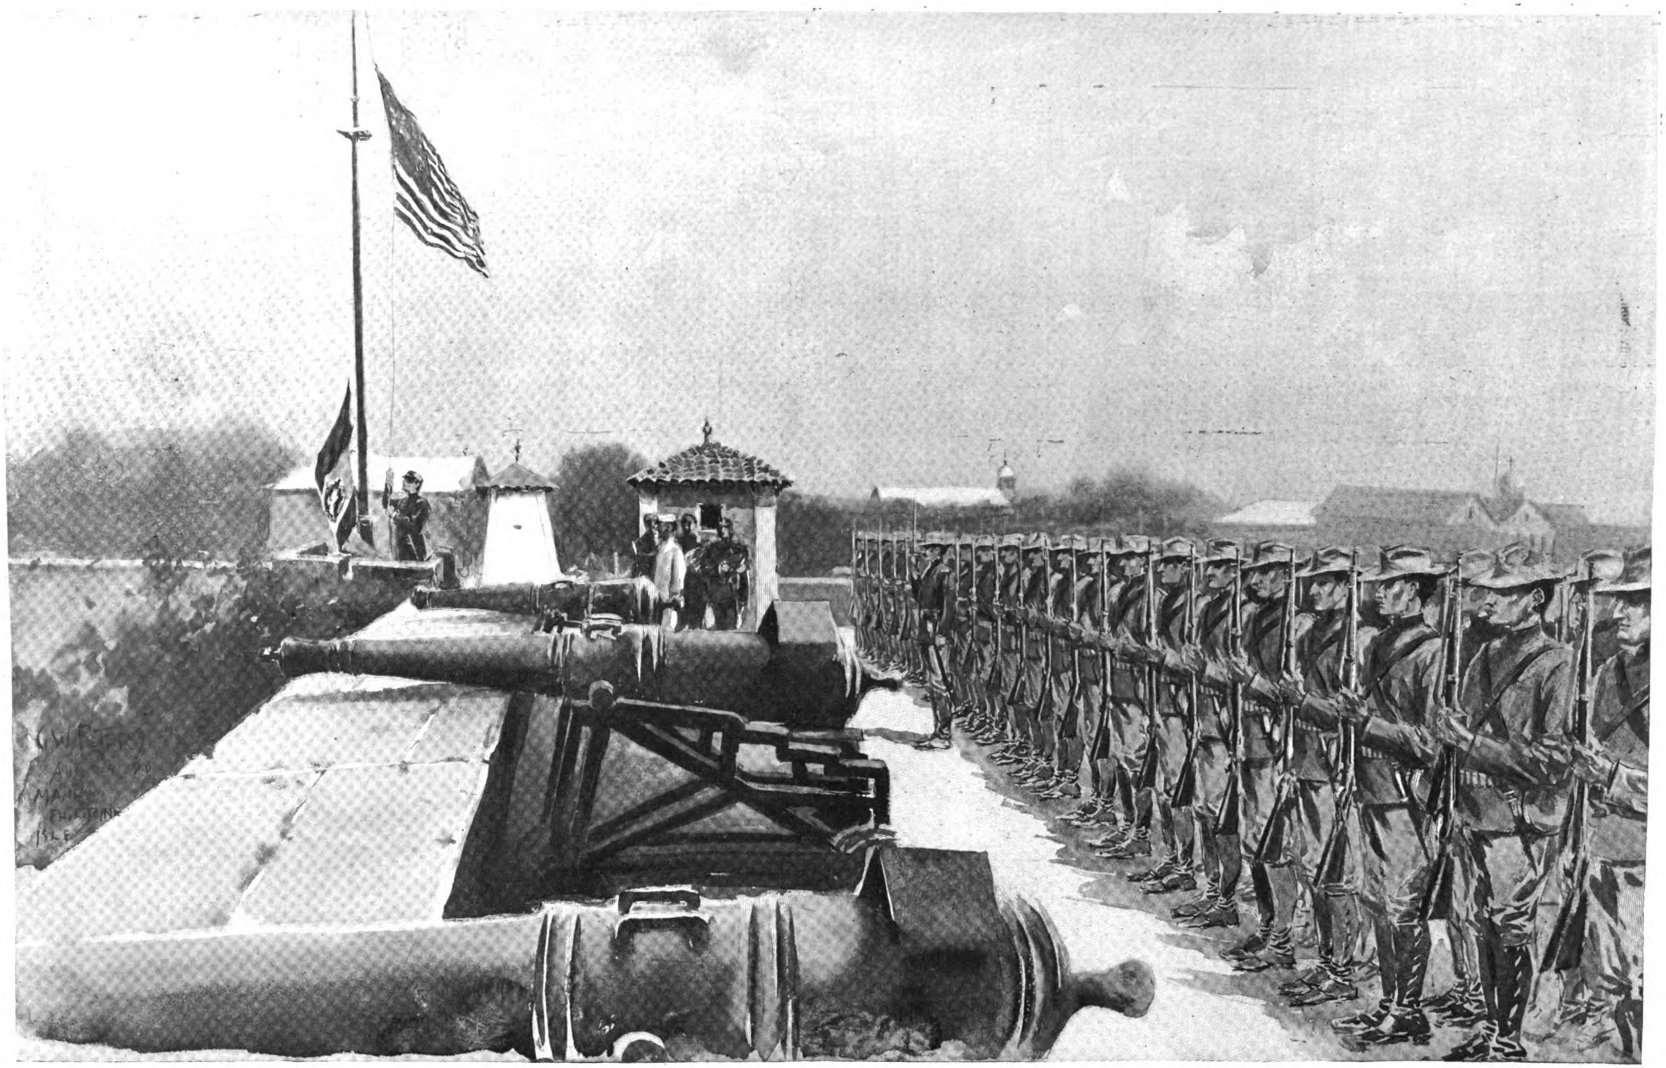
Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Digitized by Google

Street swept by Shell. Cuartel Balloja. Asylum.

SCENES IN PUERTO RICO.



SKETCHES BY T. DART WALKER, SPECIAL ARTIST FOR "HARPER'S WEEKLY."

San Juan. 3. Church of San José, struck by a Shell. 4. American Officers watching Spanish Troops drilling near Morro Castle.

Original from PENN STATE

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Digitized by Google

THE FALL OF MANILA—RAISING THE AMERICAN FLAG OVER FORT SANTIAGO ON THE EVENING OF AUGUST 13, 1898.

Drawn by G. W. Peters, Special Artist for "Harper's Weekly" with General Merritt's Forces.—[See Article "The Fall of Manila," by John F. Bass, in last Week's Number.]

Original from PENN STATE

LONDON.

October 1, 1898.

THE month of September in England is generally known as the silly season. Discussions on the marriage-tie, descriptions of the sea-serpent, and rumors of gigantic turnips are the topics that usually fill the newspapers. The month that closed yesterday has drained our nervous force. The Tsar's manifesto, the fresh dismissal of the traitor Li Hung-Chang and his restoration to power, the abdication or removal of the Chinese Emperor, the rebellion in South China, the battle of Omdurman, the violation of Egyptian soil by the French, the murder of the Austrian Empress, the Cretan massacres of British troops, the English ultimatum to Turkey, the Anglo-German agreement, the sensational development of the conspiracy against Captain Dreyfus, the revelation of a military camarilla in France, the accession and attempted assassination of the Queen of Holland, the defeat of Mr. Rhodes in South Africa, the Bismarckian revelations, the opening up of public discussion on the Clayton-Bulwer Treaty, and the death of the Queen of Denmark are seventeen events which will make September, 1898, memorable in the annals of our time. Of all these incidents, probably the concurrence of the Dreyfus exposure and the Fashoda affair is likely to have the most far-reaching historical consequences. Although neither the French nor the English newspapers openly refer to the sinister prospects of France in the near future, many intelligent Frenchmen—both revisionists and anti-Dreyfusards—expect barricades in the streets of Paris before many months have passed. The anti-Semites and those who from various causes are opposed to the revision of the Dreyfus trial declare that revision is only a cloak to hide the revolutionary spirit that has begun to show its head, and that the "Intellectuals," the Jews, and the Socialists are all concerned in a conspiracy for the overthrow of the French constitution. It is impossible to induce an average Frenchman to speak calmly on the supporters of Dreyfus. It is an axiom that they are animated by the basest of motives; that Zola, for instance, published his article, "J'accuse," in the Aurore merely in return for pecuniary gratification from the syndicate; that the "Intellectuals" only mix in the affair from ambition and pride, and the Socialists from love of change and communistic predilections for anarchy and petroleum. "Traitor" is the synonym of a supporter of justice to Dreyfus; "patriot," of the docile Frenchman who believes what his newspaper tells him, and who shouts, "Vive l'armée! Down with the traitors!" whenever it is suggested that an innocent man has been illegally condemned.

The Fashoda incident, under these circumstances, becomes specially interesting, because it is probably the final episode in the long struggle between England and France for the trade belonging to the great river valleys of the world. Fashoda belongs historically to the great struggle with France which began under William of Orange and was erroneously supposed to end with the battle of Waterloo. For one hundred and twenty-six years, from 1689 to 1815, we were engaged in seven great wars. These wars either began as wars with France or soon became so. There is, therefore, some reason, apart from the folly of kings, which forces the English continually to be in conflict with the French. These wars were caused by the instinct of self-preservation—the strongest instinct of humanity. They were mercantile wars, and the fundamental reason for each of them was that the English were afraid that the French would take from them the colonies they had, and so close their markets; and they also saw a good chance of enlarging their own markets, first at the expense of the French, and latterly by maintaining the "open door." The historic meeting of Kitchener and Marchand at Fashoda is possibly the last occasion on which the French and English will meet for the division of a continent. The result will be the same on the Nile as it was in India when Clive met Dupleix; in Canada when Wolfe met Montcalm; in Australia when Governor Philip was enabled to lay the foundations of a great English nation in consequence of the wreck of the French expedition under La Pérouse; at Trafalgar when Nelson met Villeneuve, and gave to the British eighty years start in the race for trade and empire; and lastly, in Cairo when Lord Cromer, in the teeth of fifteen years of almost intolerable provocation from successive French residents, founded an Egyptian empire, over which our flag will float as long as it floats over the Tower of London. The interior affairs of France are notoriously in a deplorable condition. The news of a military coup d'état would be surprising to nobody. Faith in their rulers has deserted the French people. The usual device of baffled and incompetent governments has always been to invoke trouble from abroad to distract attention from domestic difficulties. In France the plan is consecrated by frequent use. Not one Frenchman in a hundred thousand ever heard of Fashoda before Lord Kitchener saved Major Marchand's life by distracting the attention of the Khalifa by the battle of Omdurman. But for Kitchener, Marchand's party would have been butchered to a man. Even in the hour of impending attack the Khalifa found time and opportunity to despatch two steamers in order to ascertain the extent and position of the French force.

The meeting of the Sirdar and Marchand has done credit to both. Lord Kitchener acted wisely and with tact, while Major Marchand behaved like a gentleman of France. Nothing would have been easier than for Kitchener, by the tyrannous use of overwhelming force, to have hurried England into her twenty-fifth war with France by wounding the susceptibilities of the brave soldier explorer. I am told that Kitchener's language to Marchand was prescribed for him by Lord Salisbury. The attitude of the English press is one of reserve, although the fear is strongly expressed in society and political circles that Lord Salisbury, who suffered the Russians to require British men-of-war to leave Port Arthur, will enter into a discussion with the French government as to whether the French flag should fly at Fashoda. It is, however, somewhat extraordinary that the British public have been allowed to obtain their first authoritative news as to the presence of the French on the Nile from a statement of M. Delcasse, the French Minister for Foreign Affairs. There seems to be no sense in keeping the public in the dark. There is no elaborate policy to shape which must be concealed from the British tax-payer. British policy on the Nile is unalterable. The case is beyond discussion, for there is no modus vivendi possible between the most gallant and honorable of invaders and the lawful owner of the territory upon which he has trespassed. Withdrawal from Fashoda is the only avenue of escape for the French government. If they are humiliated they have themselves or their predecessors to thank. If the French refuse to withdraw—and at this time anything may happen—the respective governments of England and France will be supported by an enthusiastic public on both sides of the Channel, if the newspapers of both countries are to be believed. Sensible men in France, however, those with a stake in the country and a care for the future, are fully aware of the impossible position in which France has placed herself. Even if Fashoda were to be retained, which is as likely as that the Isle of Wight will be ceded to France, it would be useless to her. Annoyance to England was the sole motive of the Marchand expedition. To send an armed party of Frenchmen absolutely without a base to occupy Egyptian territory and defy the joint power of England, Egypt, and India—for Indian forces could land at Suakim within ten days from the date of an order from London—is so wild a scheme that it can end in nothing but futility. When the Fashoda incident is settled, the French power of annoyance in Egypt will probably be considerably curtailed before the coming winter is over. The French, aided by the Russians, who have no interests in Egypt, block the way by opposing grants being allowed for the Egyptian War Department by the Caisse de la Dette. In January next the existing international arrangements will be modified.

In English government circles it is maintained that everything has passed off at Fashoda exactly as was anticipated, and that the French flag at Fashoda means no more than the display of a British union-jack from the window of an English shop in Paris. There is nothing in British or Egyptian law to prevent Major Marchand from displaying the tricolor, so long as he refrains from any act of hostility against the country in which he is sojourning. I have reason to believe that while Lord Salisbury is resolute in maintaining the British contention as to the whole length of the Nile Valley, he is inspired with every wish to assist the French to extricate themselves from the false position in which they are placed. The British government will not allow armed re-enforcements to reach Major Marchand, and without stores or assistance he will not find it easy to remain where he is. Courteous and patient adherence to our declarations of policy on the subject of the Nile Valley is not considered incompatible with the neutralization of the Nile from the Great Lakes to the Mediterranean. The Suez Canal is already neutralized under international law, and the principle which has proved so successful there is likely to be extended to the Egyptian waterway. While, therefore, it is impossible that England should admit any other power to a share of the protectorate of Egypt, the policy of the "open door" will be illustrated by an object-lesson in the shape of an "open river." When Lord Salisbury proclaims that the Nile is one of the highways of the world in which all comers have equal rights of trade, our rivals will see that England seeks no exclusive advantages in territories which her arms have won back to civilization. Antecedent to any such declaration, however, must be the recognition of the inevitable by France. Close observers will note that England at the present juncture is specially polite to France, and the latter would be well advised to remember Mr. Kipling's hint—

"But oh! beware of my country when my country grows polite."

Now that the Egyptian Sudan has been conquered, English commercial men are beginning to ask whether the game is worth the candle. It will be a long time before any considerable demand is created for goods of British or American manufacture. Such demand as there is will probably be met by the peddling of cheap and nasty German wares by Greek agents. The population of the Sudan has no money to buy Anglo-Saxon goods. At the same time nearly $5,000,000 a year are being spent in the Nile Valley through the Egyptian army alone, and the result of this will be to awaken the dormant trading passion in the Sudanese. The trade in wild beasts, which has been closed for fourteen years, will be reopened. A certain amount of ivory will find its way down the Nile, but gum-arabic, which was formerly one of the staple products of the Sudan, has been superseded during the Mahdist rebellion by chemical substitutes. Minerals in the only form in which they can be worked adjacent to fuel, do not exist. Precious stones and gold have yet to be discovered. The probability is that the assistance of a large number of Greeks, who already monopolize such commerce as exists, will have to be called in to the help of the British or American merchant attempting to open up commercial relations with the territory now thrown open to the world.

Lord Kitchener is shortly to leave Egypt, and will be the guest of the Lord Mayor on November 4. His eyesight is grievously affected. For fifteen years he has worked at small things and done great ones. He is to-day a junior major-general, and has commanded an army of six brigades in the field. Few of his senior officers have ever done as much. For fifteen years he has worked his officers and men mercilessly. The regulations of the Egyptian army allow no married men on the staff or in places of responsibility. In this Kitchener adopts the same rule as Mr. Rhodes. Marriage interferes with tropical work. Sick-leave has been given to any officer who breaks down once. A second illness severs the connection between any officer in Kitchener's force and the Egyptian army. To serve Kitchener as he will be served, a man must be wax to receive, marble to retain, and iron to execute. He must be obedient as a member of the Order of Jesus, endowed with a will of steel, and possess nerves of wire. If the Sirdar is not much loved, and has made no friends in recent years, he is not unpopular. No general is unpopular who is always successful. The men who have fought under Kitchener, and who are now returning by twos and threes to London, say that when one goes forth to battle under our Iron General victory is assured, and when men trust their leader it is equivalent to the addition of many battalions to the army. Kitchener was cold as ice when there was work to do, but he broke down and wept bitterly at the burial service on Gordon, which was held on the ruins of the palace at Khartum on Sunday, September 4. He is a Liberal, and his stern character is strengthened by profound religious conviction. There is the greatest fear at the War Office that he will be appointed to high administrative office. The civilian clerks, about whom I have something to say later on, will get short shrift if Kitchener is let loose among them.

The disturbed state of the world is turning the thoughts of intelligent people to the state of the British army, and especially to the control exercised by the British War Office. The Indian and Egyptian armies, being exempt from the bureaucratic control of Pall Mall, are in a state of efficiency, but the deplorable nature of the system in force at headquarters in London is gradually being brought home to the people, and should be a solace to Americans who do not regard General Alger and perfection as convertible terms. A droll document has just been presented to Parliament under the title of a "Report of a Committee appointed by the Secretary of State for War to consider the Decentralization of War Office Business." In this blue-book broad farce is mingled with the seeds of tragedy. To Americans, angered with the defective organization of their own army, some passages from the farce disclosed by the latest blue-book on the British army may prove both interesting and amusing. The principal fact brought out by the evidence is that the home army is strangled by red-tape wielded by hundreds of civilian clerks, who have managed to snatch the real control of the army out of the hands of experienced generals. All power is concentrated in London. A general officer commanding a district in the United Kingdom is not trusted to expend a larger sum than five dollars on his own judgment. Mr. Ismay stated in evidence that a White Star captain with a salary of $4000 a year may be trusted with the unfettered expenditure of $100,000. The New York agent of the same firm is allowed to control $2,000,000 a year. A British lieutenant-general is trusted by the civilian staff of the War Office to the extent of twenty shillings. Some time ago the Admiralty was afflicted in the same way as the War Office, and there is a story of a post-captain whose claim for a cab fare from the dock-yard gates to Portsmouth Railway Station was refused on the ground that there was no evidence of his having made the journey. The reply of the gallant officer is historical. He is reputed to have said, "In the first place, I am a post-captain in her Majesty's navy, and I have in fact taken the cab, but if evidence is required I can produce the testimony of a beggar and a street-walker, who were on the spot at the time, and who would doubtless satisfy their lordships."

A story illustrating red-tape was told me the other day by an engineer officer. In the course of his duties, which involved travelling over the country, he sent in a bill which contained a charge, "porter, 6*d*." The word porter is one of those dubious terms in the English language which are capable of two interpretations. One signifies the man who carries one's baggage at a railway station; the other is the form of black beer which is known under the name of "porter." When my informant, therefore, claimed a return of the sixpence he had expended, he was told by the War Office authorities that alcoholic drinks were not to be included in the travelling allowance of officers. He rejoined that he was not claiming for alcoholic drink, but for the hire of a man to transport his baggage at a station. Upon which the sapient official rejoined that in future he should not claim for porter, but porterage. On the next occasion on which this officer, who was a wag, was travelling on behalf of his country, he sent in a bill which included the item, "cabbage, 2*s*." The bill was promptly returned by the War Office authorities, with the statement that green vegetables were not to be included in the travelling allowance of officers. The officer replied that he did not mean to imply that he had bought green vegetables, but that he had taken a cab, and that as when he had asked for the hire of a porter he was instructed to call it porterage, he could only presume that he was carrying out their lordships' wishes in claiming for the return of the sum he had laid down on the transport of his person and goods from the station under the head of "cabbage." The real trouble in the British War Office is that the regulations and warrants under which the British army now serves have grown up entirely for the benefit of War Office clerks, and serve to find work for them at the War Office rather than to find control for the army. If the ridiculous regulations were abolished to-morrow, as they will be if Lord Kitchener is installed in power, the War Office clerks will find in practice that they have nothing to do. Some months ago certain buildings at Dover Castle were burnt down. The general in command was Major-General Sir William Butler, K. C. B., the husband of Elizabeth Thompson, who painted the "Roll Call." Sir William Butler has a pretty wit, and when under examination by the recent War Office committee the incident referred to furnished the general with an opportunity for the following trenchant remark:

"The certificate and report system is in its nature misleading. On the occasion of the recent fire at the officers' quarters, Dover Castle, the reports and certificates dealing with the prevention of fire were of the most satisfactory nature. Everybody had done his duty. The place was burnt strictly according to regulation."

The theatrical season has reopened, the most important item being the introduction of "Macbeth" at the Lyceum by Mr. Forbes Robertson. The conception is founded on Irvingite lines, and although full of feeling and charm, the representation is not equal to the "Hamlet" produced by the same artist earlier in the year. The tendency to decry Sir Henry Irving and to belittle the immense service he has rendered to Anglo-Saxon dramatic art begins to attract attention. Sir Henry Irving is more than an interpreter of dramatic art. He is a personal force of the period, and has won the affectionate regard of his fellow-countrymen. The constant streams of attack from both sides of the Atlantic directed against him and against Miss Ellen Terry are, as I have reason to know, as unfounded as they are distasteful. The rumors of a dissolution of the theatrical partnership between Sir Henry and Miss Terry are devoid of foundation, and the imputation of strained relations between the two artists is equally unveracious.

ARNOLD WHITE.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THE AWKWARD AGE.*

BY HENRY JAMES, AUTHOR OF "DAISY MILLER," "AN INTERNATIONAL EPISODE," ETC.

VII.

LORD PETHERTON, a man of five-and-thirty, whose robust but symmetrical proportions gave to his dark blue double-breasted coat an air of tightness that just failed of compromising his tailor, had for his main facial sign a certain pleasant brutality, the effect partly of a bold, handsome parade of carnivorous teeth, partly of an expression of nose suggesting that this feature had paid a little, in the heat of youth, for some aggression at the time admired and even publicly commemorated. He would have been ugly, he substantively granted, had he not been happy, he would have been dangerous had he not been warranted. Many things, doubtless, performed for him this last service, but none so much as the delightful sound of his voice, the voice, as it were, of another man, a nature reclaimed, supercivilized, adjusted to the perpetual "chaff" that kept him smiling in a way that would have been a mistake, and indeed an impossibility, if he had really been witty. His bright familiarity was that of a young prince whose confidence had never had to falter, and the only thing that at all qualified the resemblance was the equal familiarity excited in his subjects.

Mr. Mitchett had so little intrinsic appearance that an observer would have felt indebted, as an aid to memory, to the rare prominence of his colorless eyes and the positive attention drawn to his chin by the precipitation of its retreat from detection. Dressed, on the other hand, not as gentlemen dress, in London, to pay their respects to the fair, he excited by the exhibition of garments that had nothing in common save the violence and the independence of their pattern a suspicion that, in the desperation of humility, he wished to make it public that he had thrown to the winds the effort to please. It was written all over him that he had judged, once for all, his personal case, and that as his character, superficially disposed to gayety, deprived him of the resource of shyness and shade, the effect of comedy might not escape him if secured by a real plunge. There was comedy therefore in the form of his pot-hat and the color of his spotted shirt, in the systematic disagreement, above all, of his coat, waistcoat and trousers. It was only on long acquaintance that his so many ingenious ways of showing that he recognized his commonness could present him as secretly rare.

"And where's the child, this time?" he asked of his hostess as soon as he was seated near her.

"Why do you say 'this time'?—as if it were different from any other time!" she replied, as she gave him his tea.

"Only because, as the months and the years elapse, it's more and more of a wonder, whenever I don't see her, to think what she does with herself—or what you do with her. What it does show, I suppose," Mr. Mitchett went on, "is that she takes no trouble to meet me."

"My dear Mitchy," said Mrs. Brookenham, "what do you know about 'trouble'—either poor Nanda's, or mine, or anybody's else? You've never had to take any in your life, you're the spoiled child of fortune, and you skim over the surface of things in a way that seems often to represent you as supposing that everybody else has wings. Most other people are sticking fast in their native mud."

"Mud, Mrs. Brook—mud, mud!" he protestingly cried as, while he watched his fellow-visitor move to a distance with their host, he glanced about the room, taking in afresh the Louis Quinze secretary, which looked better closed than open, and for which he always had a knowing eye. "Remarkably charming mud!"

"Well, that's what a great deal of the element really appears, to-day, to be thought; and precisely, as a specimen, Mitchy dear, those two French books you were so good as to send me and which—really, this time, you extraordinary man!" She fell back, intimately reproachful, from the effect produced on her, renouncing all expression save that of the rolled eye.

"Why, were they particularly dreadful?"—Mitchy was honestly surprised. "I rather liked the one in the blue cover—what's the confounded thing called?—I thought it had a sort of a something-or-other." He had cast his eye about as if for a glimpse of the forgotten title, and she caught the question as he vaguely and good-humoredly dropped it.

"A kind of a morbid modernity? There is that," she dimly conceded.

"Is that what they call it? Awfully good name. You must have got it from old Van!" he gayly declared.

"I dare say I did. I get the good things from him and the bad ones from you. But you're not to suppose," Mrs. Brookenham went on, "that I've discussed your horrible book with him."

"Come, I say!" Mr. Mitchett protested; "I've seen you with books from Vanderbank which, if you have discussed them with him—well," he laughed, "I should like to have been there!"

"You haven't seen me with anything like yours—no, no, never, never!" She was particularly positive. "He, on the contrary, gives tremendous warnings, makes apologies, in advance, for things that—well, after all, haven't killed one."

"That have even perhaps a little disappointed one?"

Mrs. Brookenham took no notice of this pleasantry; she simply adhered to her thesis. "One has taken one's dose, and one isn't such a fool as to be deaf to some fresh, true note, if it happens to turn up. But for abject, horrid, unredeemed vileness, from beginning to end—"

"So you read to the end?" Mr. Mitchett interposed.

"I read to see what you could possibly have sent such things to me for, and because so long as they were in my hands they were not in the hands of others. Please to remember in future that the children are all over the place and that Harold and Nanda have their nose in everything."

"I promise to remember," Mr. Mitchett returned, "as soon as you make old Van do the same."

"I do make old Van—I pull old Van up much oftener than I succeed in pulling you. I must say," Mrs. Brookenham went on, "you're all getting to require, among you, in general, an amount of what one may call editing—!" She gave one of her droll universal sighs. "I've got your books, at any rate, locked up, and I wish you'd send for them quickly again; one's too nervous about anything happening and their being perhaps found among one's relics. Charming literary remains!" she laughed.

The friendly Mitchy was also much amused. "By Jove, the most awful things are found! Have you heard about old Randage and what his executors have just come across? The most abominable—"

"I haven't heard," she broke in, "and I don't want to; but you give me a shudder, and I beg you'll have your offerings removed, for I can't think of confiding them, for the purpose, to any one in this house. I might burn them up in the dead of night, but even then I should be fearfully nervous."

"I'll send then my usual messenger," said Mitchy, "a person I keep for such jobs, thoroughly seasoned, as you may imagine, and of a discretion—what do you call it?—à toute épreuve. Only you must let me say that I like your terror about Harold! Do you suppose he spends his time over Dr. Watt's hymns?"

Mrs. Brookenham just hesitated, and nothing, in general, was so becoming to her as the act of hesitation. "Dear Mitchy, do you know I want awfully to talk to you about Harold?"

"About his reading, Mrs. Brook?" Mitchy responded with interest. "The worse things are, let me just mention to you about that, the better they seem positively to be for one's feeling up in the language. They're more difficult, the bad ones—and there's a lot in that. All the young men know it—those who are going up for exams."

She had her eyes for a little on Lord Petherton and her husband; then, as if she had not heard what her interlocutor had just said, she overcame her last scruple. "Dear Mitchy, has he had money from you?"

He stared with his good goggle eyes—he laughed out. "Why on earth—? But do you suppose I'd tell you if he had?"

"He hasn't really borrowed the most dreadful sums?"

Mitchy was highly diverted. "Why should he? For what, please?"

"That's just it—for what? What does he do with it all? What in the world becomes of it?"

"Well," Mitchy suggested, "he's saving up to start a business. Harold's irreproachable—hasn't a vice. Who knows, in these days, what may happen? He sees further than any young man I know. Do let him save."

She looked far away with her sweet world-weariness. "If you weren't an angel, it would be a horror to be talking to you. But I insist on knowing." She insisted now with her absurdly pathetic eyes on him. "What kind of sums?"

"You shall never, never find out," Mr. Mitchett replied with extravagant firmness. "Harold is one of my great amusements—I really have awfully few; and if you deprive me of him you'll be a fiend. There are only one or two things I want to live for, but one of them is to see how far Harold will go. Please give me some more tea."

"Do you positively swear—?" she asked with intensity as she helped him. Then without waiting for his answer: "You have the common charity to us, I suppose, to see the position you would put us in. Fancy Edward—!" she quite austerely threw off.

Mr. Mitchett, at this, had, on his side, a hesitation. "Does Edward imagine—?"

"My dear man, Edward never 'imagined' anything in life." She still had her eyes on her interlocutor. "Therefore if he sees a thing, don't you know? it must exist."

Mitchy, for a little, fixed the person mentioned as he sat with his other guest, but, whatever this person saw, he failed just then to see his wife's companion, whose eyes he never met. His face only offered itself, like a clean, domestic vessel, a receptacle with the peculiar property of constantly serving, yet never filling, to Lord Petherton's flow of talk. "Well, only don't let him take it up. Let it be only between you and me," Mr. Mitchett pleaded; "keep him quiet—don't let him speak to me." He appeared to convey, with his pleasant extravagance, that Edward looked dangerous, and he went on with a solemnity of levity: "It must be our little quarrel."

There were different ways of meeting such a tone, but Mrs. Brookenham's choice was remarkably prompt. "I don't think I quite understand what dreadful joke you may be making, but I dare say if you had let Harold borrow, you would have another manner, and I was at any rate determined to have the question out with you."

"Let us always have everything out—that's quite my own idea. It's you," said Mr. Mitchett, "who are by no means always so frank with me as I recognize—oh, I do that!—what it must have cost you to be over this little question of Harold. There's one thing, Mrs. Brook, you do dodge."

"What do I ever dodge, dear Mitchy?" Mrs. Brook quite tenderly asked.

"Why, when I ask you about your other child, you're off like a frightened fawn. When have you ever, on my doing so, said 'My darling Mitchy, I'll ring for her to be asked to come down, and you can see her for yourself'—when have you ever said anything like that?"

"I see," Mrs. Brookenham mused; "you think I sacrifice her. You're very interesting among you all, and I've certainly a delightful circle. The Duchess has just been letting me have it most remarkably hot, and as she's presently coming back you'll be able to join forces with her."

Mitchy looked a little at a loss. "On the subject of your sacrifice—?"

"Of my innocent and helpless, yet somehow at the same time, as a consequence of my cynicism, dreadfully damaged and depraved daughter." She took in, for an instant, the slight bewilderment against which, as a result of her speech, even so expert an intelligence as Mr. Mitchett's had not been proof; then, with a small jerk of her head at the other side of the room, she made the quickest of transitions. "What is there between her and him?"

Mitchy wondered at the other two. "Between Edward and the girl?"

"Don't talk nonsense. Between Petherton and Jane."

Mitchy could only stare, and the wide noonday light of his regard was at such moments really the redemption of his ugliness. "What 'is' there? Is there anything?"

"It's too beautiful," Mrs. Brookenham appreciatively sighed, "your relation with him! You won't compromise him."

"It would be nicer of me," Mitchy laughed, "not to want to compromise her."

"Oh, Jane!" Mrs. Brookenham dropped. "Does he like her?" she continued. "You must know."

"Ah, it's just my knowing that constitutes the beauty of my loyalty—of my delicacy." He had his quick jumps too. "Am I never, never to see the child?"

This inquiry appeared only to confirm his companion in the contemplation of what was touching in him. "You're the most delicate thing I know, and it crops up, in the oddest way, in the intervals of your depravity. Your talk's half the time impossible; you respect neither age nor sex nor condition; one doesn't know what you'll say or do next; and one has to return your books—c'est tout dire—under cover of darkness. Yet there's in the midst of all this, and in the depths of you, a little deep-down delicious niceness, a sweet sensibility, that one has actually, one's self, shocked as one perpetually is at you, quite to hold one's breath and stay one's hand for fear of ruffling or bruising. There's no one with whom, in talking," she balmily continued, "I find myself half so often suddenly moved to pull up short. You've more little toes to tread on—though you pretend you haven't: I mean morally speaking, don't you know?—than even I have myself, and I've so many that I could wish most of them cut off. You never spare me a shock—no, you don't do that: it isn't the form your delicacy takes. But you'll know what I mean, all the same, I think, when I tell you that there are lots I spare you!"

Mr. Mitchett fairly glowed with the candor of his attention. "Know what you mean, dearest lady? How can a man handicapped to death, a man of my origin, my appearance, my general weaknesses, drawbacks, immense indebtedness, all round, for the start, as it were, that I feel my friends have been so good as to allow me: how can such a man not be conscious, every moment, that every one about him goes on tiptoe and winks at every one else? What can you all mention in my presence, poor things, that isn't personal?"

Mrs. Brookenham's face covered him for an instant as no painted Madonna's had ever covered the little charge at the breast beneath it. "And the finest thing of all in you is your beautiful, beautiful pride! You're prouder than all of us put together." She checked a motion that he had apparently meant as a protest—she went on with her muffled wisdom. "There isn't a man but you whom Petherton wouldn't have made vulgar. He isn't vulgar himself—at least not exceptionally; but he's just one of those people, a class one knows well, who are so fearfully, in this country, the cause of it in others. For all I know he's the cause of it in me—the cause of it even in poor Edward. For I'm vulgar, Mitchy dear—very often; and the marvel of you is that you never are."

"Thank you for everything. Thank you above all for 'marvel'!" Mitchy grinned.

"Oh, I know what I say!"—she didn't in the least blush. "I'll tell you something," she pursued with the same gravity, "if you'll promise to tell no one on earth. If you're proud, I'm not. There! It's most extraordinary, and I try to conceal it, even to myself; but there's no doubt whatever about it—I'm not proud pour deux sous. And some day, on some awful occasion, I shall show it. So—I notify you. Shall you love me still?"

"To the bitter end," Mitchy loyally responded. "For how can, how need, a woman be 'proud' who's so preternaturally clever? Pride's only for use when wit breaks down—it's the train the cyclist takes when his tire's deflated. When that happens to your tire, Mrs. Brook, you'll let me know. And you do make me wonder just now," he confessed, "why you're taking such particular precautions and throwing out such a cloud of skirmishers. If you want to shoot me dead, a single bullet will do." He faltered but an instant before completing his sense. "Where you really want to come out is at the fact that Nanda loathes me, and that I might as well give up asking for her."

"Are you quite serious?" his companion, after a moment asked. "Do you really and truly like her, Mitchy?"

"I like her as much as I dare to—as much as a man can like a girl when, from the very first of his seeing her and judging her, he has also seen, and seen with all the reasons, that there's no chance for him whatever. Of course, with all that, he has done his best not to let himself go. But there are moments," Mr. Mitchett ruefully added, "when it would relieve him awfully to feel free for a good spin."

"I think you exaggerate," his hostess replied, "the difficulties in your way. What do you mean by 'all the reasons'?"

"Why, one of them I've already mentioned. I make her flesh creep."

"My own Mitchy!" Mrs. Brookenham protestingly moaned.

"The other is that—very naturally—she's in love."

"With whom, under the sun?"

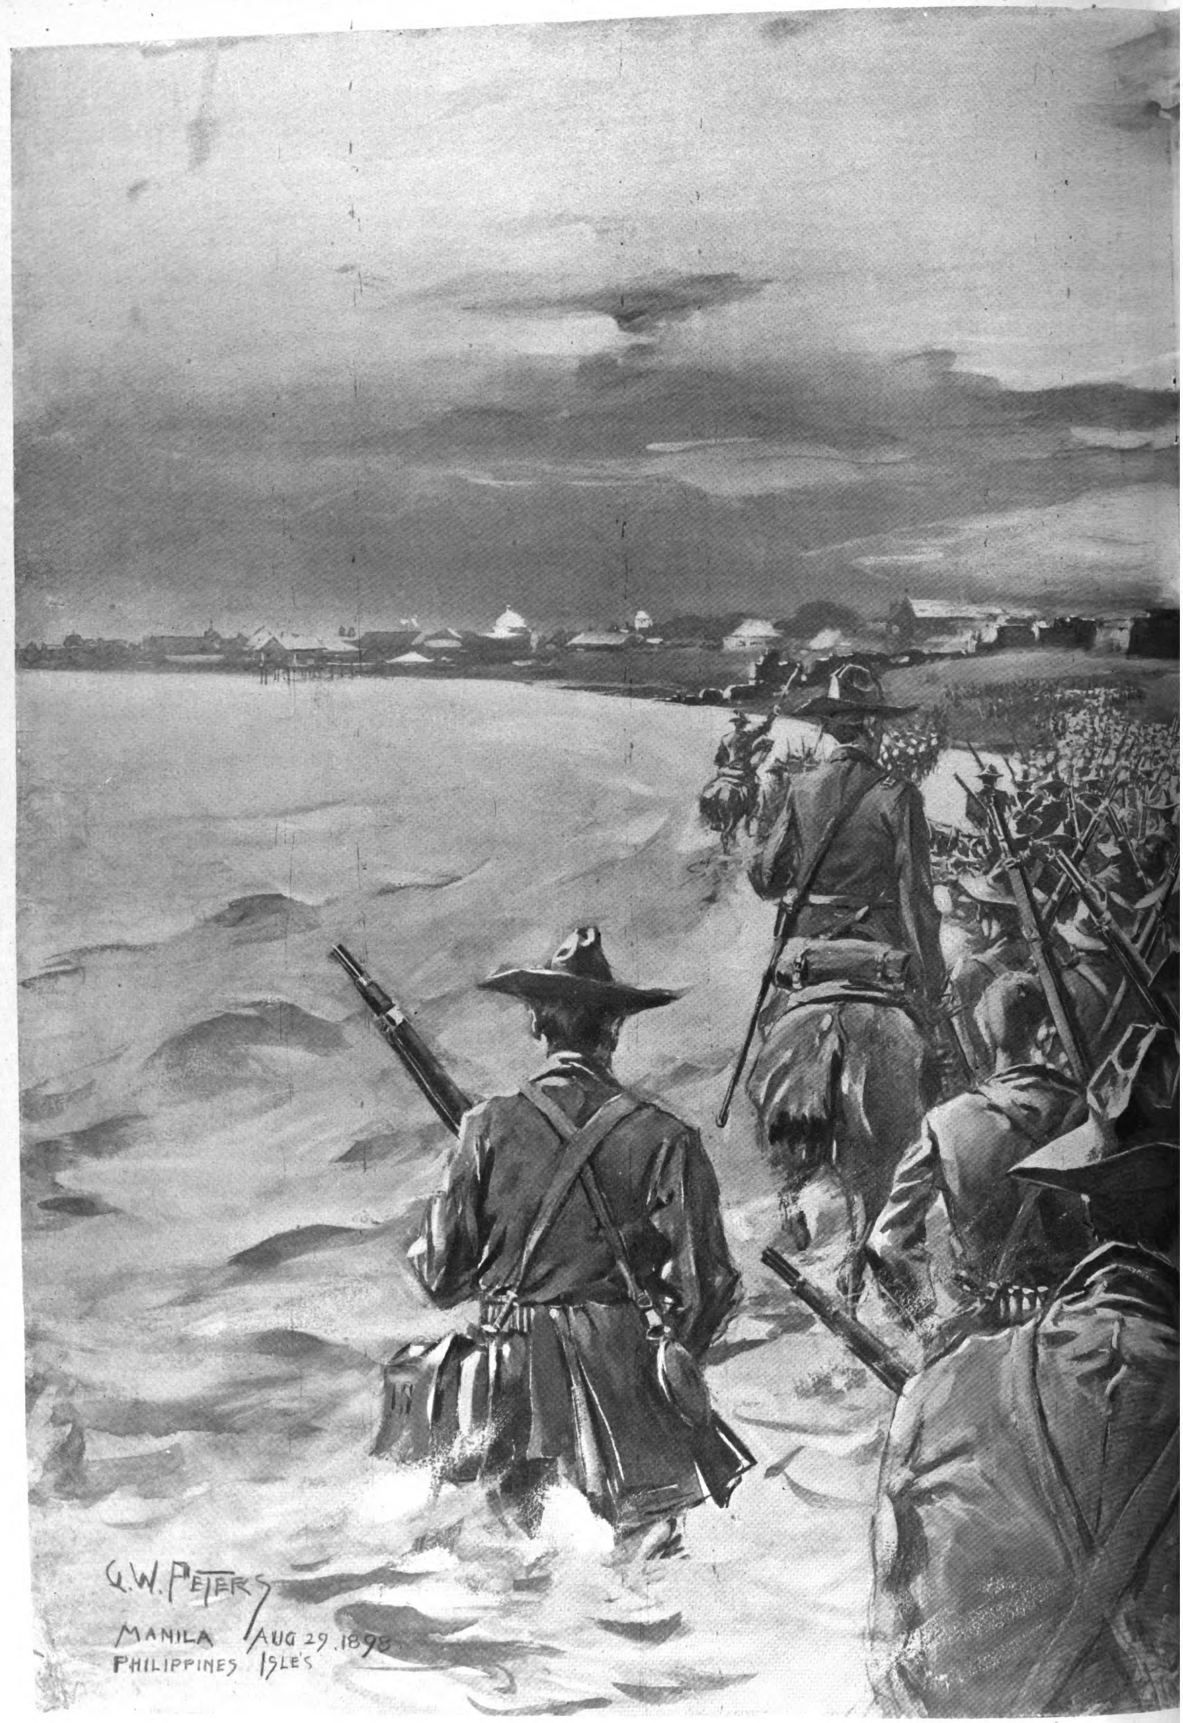
Mrs. Brookenham had, with her startled stare, met his eyes long enough to have taken something from him before he next spoke. "You really have never suspected? With whom conceivably but old Van?"

"Nanda's in love with old Van?"—the degree to which she had never suspected was scarce to be expressed. "Why, he's twice her age—he has seen her in a pinafore, with a dirty face, and well slapped for it: he has never thought of her in the world."

"How can a person of your acuteness, my dear woman," Mitchy asked, "mention such trifles as having the least to do with the case? How can you possibly have such a fellow about, so beastly good-looking, so infernally well turned out in the way of 'culture,' and so bringing them down on every side, and expect, in the bosom of your family, the absence of history of the reigns of the good kings? If you were a girl, wouldn't you turn purple? If I were a girl shouldn't I—unless, as is more likely, I turned green?"

Mrs. Brookenham was deeply affected. "Nanda does turn purple—?"

"The loveliest shade you ever saw. It's too absurd that you haven't noticed."



It was characteristic of Mrs. Brookenham's amiability that, with her sudden sense of the importance of this new light, she should be quite ready to abase herself. "There are so many things in one's life; one follows false scents; one doesn't make out everything at once. If you're right, you must help me. We must see more of her."

"But what good will that do me?" Mitchy inquired.

"Don't you care enough for her to want to help

* Begun in HARPER'S WEEKLY No. 2180.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THE FALL OF MANILA—OUR TROOPS MARCHING

Drawn by G. W. Peters, Special Artist for "Harper's Weekly" with General

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Malate.

NG THE BEACH INTO THE CITY, AUGUST 13, 1898.

RITT'S FORCES.—[SEE ARTICLE "THE FALL OF MANILA" IN LAST WEEK'S NUMBER.]

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

her?" Then before he could speak, "Poor little darling dear!" his hostess tenderly ejaculated. "What does she think or dream? Truly she's laying up treasure!"

"Oh, he likes her," said Mitchy. "He likes her in fact extremely."

"Do you mean he has told you so?"

"Oh no—we never mention it! But he likes her," Mr. Mitchett stubbornly repeated. "And he's thoroughly straight."

Mrs. Brookenham, for a moment, turned these things over; after which she came out in a manner that visibly surprised him. "It isn't as if you wished to be nasty about him, is it?—because I know you like him yourself. You're so wonderful to your friends"—oh, she could let him see that she knew!—"and in such different and exquisite ways. There are those, like him"—she signified her other visitor—"who get everything out of you and whom you really appear to like, or at least to put up with, just for that. Then there are those who ask nothing—and whom you like in spite of it."

Mitchy leaned back, at this, fist within fist, watching her with a certain disguised emotion. He grinned almost too much for mere amusement. "That's the class to which you belong."

"It's the best one," she returned, "and I'm careful to remain in it. You try to get us, by bribery, into the inferior place, because, proud as you are, it bores you a little that you like us so much. But we won't go—at least I won't. You may make Van," she wonderfully continued. "There's nothing you wouldn't do for him or give him." Mitchy admired her from his position, slowly shaking his head with it. "He's the man—with no fortune, and just as he is, to the smallest particular—whom you would have liked to be, whom you intensely envy, and yet to whom you're magnanimous enough to be ready for almost any sacrifice."

Mitchy's appreciation had fairly deepened to a flush. "Magnificent—magnificent Mrs. Brook! What are you, in thunder, up to?"

"Therefore, as I say," she imperturbably went on, "it's not to do him an ill turn that you maintain what you've just told me."

Mr. Mitchett, for a minute, gave no sign but his high color and his queer glare. "How could it do him an ill turn?"

"Oh, it would be a way, don't you see? to put before me the need of getting rid of him. For he may 'like' Nanda as much as you please: he'll never, never," Mrs. Brookenham resolutely quavered—"he'll never come to the scratch. And to feel that as I do," she explained, "can only be, don't you also see? to want to save her."

It would have appeared at last that poor Mitchy did see. "By taking it in time? By forbidding him the house?"

She seemed to stand with little nipping scissors in a garden of alternatives. "Or by shipping her off. Will you help me to save her?" she broke out again after a moment. "It isn't true," she continued, "that she has any version to you."

"Have you charged her with it?" Mitchy demanded with a courage that amounted to high gallantry.

It inspired, on the spot, his interlocutress; and her own, of as fine a quality now as her diplomacy, which was saying much, fell but little below. "Yes, my dear friend—frankly."

"Good. Then I know what she said."

"She absolutely denied it."

"Oh yes—they always do, because they pity me," Mitchy smiled. "She said what they always say—that the effect I produce is, though at first upsetting, one that, little by little, they find it possible to get used to. The world's full of people who are getting used to me," Mr. Mitchett concluded.

"It's what I shall never do, for you're quite too delicious!" Mrs. Brookenham declared. "If I haven't threshed you out really more with Nanda," she continued, "it has been from a scruple of a sort you people never do a woman the justice to impute. You're the object of views that have so much more to set them off."

Mr. Mitchett, on this, jumped up; he was clearly conscious of his nerves; he fidgeted away a few steps, then, with his hands in his pockets, fixed on his hostess a countenance more controlled. "What does the Duchess mean by your daughter's being—as I understood you to quote her just now—'damaged and depraved'?"

Mrs. Brookenham came up—she literally rose—smiling. "You fit the cap—you know how she would like you for little Aggie!"

"What does she mean, what does she mean?" Mitchy repeated.

The door, as he spoke, was thrown open; Mrs. Brookenham glanced round. "You've the chance to find out from herself!" The Duchess had come back and little Aggie was in her wake.

VIII.

Little Aggie, in this relation, was certainly a figure to warrant the highest hopes. As slight and white, as delicately lovely, as a gathered garden lily, her admirable training appeared to hold her out to them all as with precautionary finger-tips. She presumed, however, so little on any introduction that, shyly and submissively, waiting for the word of direction, she stopped short in the centre of the general friendliness till Mrs. Brookenham fairly became, to meet her, also a shy little girl—put out a timid hand with wonder-struck, innocent eyes that hesitated whether a kiss of greeting might be dared. "Why, you dear, good, strange 'ickle' thing, you haven't been here for ages, but it is a joy to see you, and I do hope you've brought your doll!"—such might have been the sense of our friend's fond murmur while, looking at her up and down with pure pleasure, she drew the rare creature to a sofa. Little Aggie presented, up and down, an arrangement of dress exactly in the key of her age, her complexion, her emphasized virginity. She might have been prepared for her visit by a cluster of doting nuns, cloistered daughters of ancient houses and educators of similar products, whose taste, hereditarily good, had grown, out of the world and most delightfully, so queer as to leave on everything they touched a particular shade of distinction. The Duchess had brought in with the child an air of added confidence for which, in a moment, an observer would have seen the grounds, the association of the pair being so markedly favorable to each. Its younger member carried out the style of her aunt's presence quite as one of the accessory figures effectively thrown into old portraits. The Duchess, on the other hand, seemed, with becoming blandness, to draw from her niece the dignity of a kind of office of state—hereditary governess of the children of the blood. Little Aggie had a smile as softly bright as a Southern dawn, and the friends of her relative looked at each other, according to a fashion frequent in Mrs. Brookenham's drawing-room, in free communication of their happy impression. Mr. Mitchett was, none the less, scantly diverted from his recognition of the occasion Mrs. Brookenham had just named to him.

"My dear Duchess," he promptly asked, "do you mind explaining to me an opinion that I have just heard of your—with marked originality—holding?"

The Duchess, with her head in the air, considered an instant her little ivory princess. "I'm always ready, Mr. Mitchett, to defend my opinions; but if it's a question of going much into things, perhaps we had better, if you don't mind, choose our time and our place."

"No 'time,' gracious lady, for, my impatience," Mr. Mitchett replied, "could be better than the present—but if you've reasons for wanting a better place, why shouldn't we go, on the spot, into another room?"

Lord Petherton, at this inquiry, broke into instant mirth. "Well, of all the coolness, Mitchy!—he does go at it, doesn't he, Mrs. Brook? What do you want to do in another room?" he demanded of his friend. "Upon my word, Duchess, under the nose of those—!"

The Duchess, on the first blush, lent herself to the humor of the case. "Well, Petherton, of 'those'—I defy him to finish his sentence!" she smiled to the others.

"Of those," said his lordship, "who flatter themselves that when you do happen to find them somewhere your first idea is not quite to jump at a pretext for getting off somewhere else. Especially," he continued to jest, "with a man of Mitchy's vile reputation."

"Oh!" Edward Brookenham exclaimed at this, but only as if with quiet relief.

"Mitchy's offer is perfectly safe, I may let him know," his wife remarked, "for I happen to be sure that nothing would really induce Jane to leave Aggie five minutes among us here without remaining herself to see that we don't become improper."

"Well then, if we're already pretty far on the way to it," Lord Petherton resumed, "what on earth might we arrive at in the absence of your control? I warn you, Duchess," he joyously pursued, "that if you go out of the room with Mitchy, I shall rapidly become quite awful."

The Duchess, during this brief passage, never took her eyes from her niece, who rewarded her attention with the sweetness of consenting dependence. The child's foreign origin was so delicately but unmistakably written in all her exquisite lines that her look might have expressed the modest detachment of a person to whom the language of her companions was unknown. The Duchess then glanced round the circle. "You're very odd people, all of you, and I don't think you quite know how ridiculous you are. Aggie and I are simple stranger-folk; there's a great deal we don't understand; yet we're none the less not easily frightened. In what is it, Mr. Mitchett," she asked, "that I've wounded your susceptibilities?"

Mr. Mitchett hesitated; he had apparently found time to reflect on his precipitation. "I see what Petherton's up to, and I won't, by drawing you aside just now, expose your niece to anything that might immediately oblige Mrs. Brook to catch her up and flee with her. But the first time I find you more isolated—well," he laughed, though not with the clearest ring, "all I can say is, mind your eyes, dear Duchess!"

"It's about your thinking, Jane," Mrs. Brookenham placidly explained, "that Nanda suffers—in her morals, don't you know?—by my neglect. I wouldn't say anything about you that I can't bravely say to you: therefore, since he has plumped out with it, I do confess that I've appealed to him on what, as so good an old friend, he thinks of your contention."

"What in the world is Jane's contention?" Edward Brookenham put the question as if they were "stuck" at cards.

"You really, all of you," the Duchess replied with excellent coolness, "choose extraordinary conditions for the discussion of delicate matters. There are decidedly too many things on which we don't feel alike. You're all inconceivable just now. Je ne peux pourtant pas la mettre à la porte, cette chérie"—whom she covered again with the gay sollicitude that seemed to have in it a vibration of private entreaty: "Don't understand, my own darling—don't understand!"

Little Aggie looked around with an impartial politeness that, as an expression of the general blind sense of her being, in every particular, in hands at full liberty either to spot or to spare her, was touching enough to bring tears to all eyes. It perhaps had to do with the sudden emotion with which—using now quite a different manner—Mrs. Brookenham again embraced her, and even with this lady's equally abrupt and altogether wonderful address to her: "Between you and me straight, my dear, and as from friend to friend, I know that you'll never doubt that everything must be all right!—what I spoke of to poor Mitchy," she went on to the Duchess, "is the dreadful view you take of my letting Nanda go to Tishy—and indeed of the general question of any acquaintance between young unmarried and young married females. Mr. Mitchett is sufficiently interested in us, Jane, to make it natural of me to take him into our confidence in one of our difficulties. On the other hand we feel your solicitude, and I needn't tell you, at this time of day, what weight, in every respect, we attach to your judgment. Therefore it will be a difficulty for us, cara mia, don't you see? if we decide suddenly, under the spell of your influence, that our daughter must break off a friendship—it will be a difficulty for us to put the thing to Nanda herself in such a way as that she shall have some sort of notion of what suddenly possesses us. Then there'll be the much stiffer job of putting it to poor Tishy. Yet if her house is an impossible place, what else is one to do? Carrie Donner's to be there, and Carrie Donner's a nature apart; but how can we ask even a little lamb like Tishy to give up her own sister?"

The question had been launched with an argumentative sharpness that made it for a moment keep possession of the air, and during this moment, before a single member of the circle could rally, Mrs. Brookenham's effect was superseded by that of the reappearance of the butler. "I say, my dear, don't shriek!"—Edward Brookenham had only time to sound this warning before a lady, presenting herself in the open doorway, followed close on the announcement of her name. "Mrs. Beach Donner!" —the impression was naturally marked. Every one betrayed it a little but Mrs. Brookenham, who, more than the others, appeared to have the help of seeing that, by a merciful stroke, her visitor has just failed to hear. This visitor, a young woman of striking, of startling appearance, who, in the manner of certain shiny house doors and railings, instantly created a presumption of the label somewhere "Fresh paint," found herself, with an embarrassment oddly opposed to the positive pitch of her complexion, in the presence of a group in which it was yet immediately evident that every one was a friend. Every one, to show no one had been caught, said something extremely easy; so that it was after a moment only poor Mrs. Donner who, seated close to her hostess, seemed to be in any degree in the wrong. This, moreover, was essentially her fault, so extreme was the anomaly of her having, without the means to back it up, committed herself to a "scheme of color" that was practically an advertisement of courage. Irregularly pretty and painfully shy, she was retouched, from brow to chin, like a suburban photograph—the moral of which was simply that she should either have left more to nature or taken more from art. The Duchess had quickly reached her kinsman with a smothered hiss, an "Edward dear, for God's sake take Aggie!" and at the end of a few minutes had formed for herself in one of Mrs. Brookenham's admirable "corners" a society consisting of Lord Petherton and Mr. Mitchett, the latter of whom regarded Mrs. Donner, across the room, with articulate wonder and compassion.

"It's all right, it's all right—she's frightened only at herself!"

The Duchess watched her as from a box at the play, comfortably shut in, as in the old operatic days at Naples, with a pair of entertainers. "You're the most interesting nation in the world. One never gets to the end of your hatred of the nuance. The sense of the suitable, the harmony of parts—what on earth were you doomed to do that, to be punished sufficiently in advance, you had to be deprived of it in your very cradles? Look at her little black dress—rather good, but not so good as it ought to be, and, mixed up with all the rest, see her type, her beauty, her timidity, her wickedness, her notoriety, and her impudeur. It's only in this country that a woman is both so shocking and so shaky." The Duchess's displeasure overflowed. "If she doesn't know how to be good—"

"Let her at least know how to be bad? Ah," Mitchy replied, "your irritation testifies more than anything else could do to our peculiar genius, or our peculiar want of it. Our vice is intolerably clumsy—if it can possibly be a question of vice in regard to that charming child, who looks like one of the new-fashioned bill-posters only, in the way of 'morbid modernity,' as Mrs. Brook would say, more extravagant and funny than any that have yet been risked. I remember," he continued, "Mrs. Brook's having spoken of her to me lately as 'wild.' Wild?—why, she's simply tameness run to seed. Such an expression shows the state of training that Mrs. Brook has reduced the rest of us to."

"It doesn't prevent, at any rate, Mrs. Brook's training, some of the rest of you being horrible," the Duchess declared. "What did you mean just now, really, by asking me to explain before Aggie this so serious matter of Nanda's exposure?" Then instantly, taking herself up before Mr. Mitchett could answer: "What on earth do you suppose Edward's saying to my darling?"

Brookenham had placed himself, side by side with the child, on a distant little settee, but it was impossible to make out from the countenance of either whether a sound had passed between them. Aggie's little manner was too developed to show, and her host's not developed enough. "Oh, he's awfully careful," Lord Petherton reassuringly observed. "If you or I or Mitchy say anything bad, it's sure to be before we know it and without particularly meaning it. But old Edward means it—!"

"So much that, as a general thing, he doesn't dare to say it?" the Duchess asked. "That's a pretty picture of him, inasmuch as, for the most part, he never speaks. What, therefore, must he mean?"

"He's an abyss—he's magnificent!" Mr. Mitchett laughed; "I don't know a man of an understanding more profound, and he's equally incapable of uttering and of wincing. If, by the same token, I'm 'horrible,' as you call me," he pursued, "it's only because, in every way, I'm so beastly superficial. All the same, I do sometimes go into things, and I insist upon knowing," he again broke out, "what it exactly was you had in mind in saying to Mrs. Brook, about Nanda, what she repeated to me."

"You 'insist,' you silly man?"—the Duchess had veered a little to indulgence. "Pray, on what ground of right, in such a connection, do you do anything of the sort?"

Poor Mitchy showed but for a moment that he felt pulled up. "Do you mean that when a girl liked by a fellow likes him so little in return—?"

"I don't mean anything," said the Duchess, "that may provoke you to suppose me vulgar and odious enough to try to put you out of conceit of a most interesting and unfortunate creature; and I don't quite, as yet, see—though I dare say I shall soon make it out!—what our friend has in her head in tattling to you on these matters as soon as my back is turned. Petherton will tell you—I wonder he hasn't told you before—why Mrs. Grendon, though not perhaps herself quite the rose, is decidedly, in these days, too near it."

"Oh, Petherton never tells me anything!" Mitchy's answer was brisk and impatient, but evidently quite as sincere as if the person alluded to had not been there.

The person alluded to, meanwhile, fidgeting frankly in his chair, alternately stretching his legs and resting his elbows on his knees, had reckoned as small the profit he might derive from this colloquy. His bored state indeed —if he was bored—prompted in him the honest impulse to clear, as he would have perhaps considered it, the atmosphere. He indicated Mrs. Donner with a remarkable absence of precautions. "Why, what the Duchess alludes to is my poor sister Fanny's stupid grievance—surely you know about that." He made oddly vivid for a moment the nature of his relative's allegation, his somewhat eyeical treatment of which became peculiarly derisive in the light of the attitude and expression, at that minute, of the figure incriminated. "My brother-in-law's too thick with her. But Cashmore's such a fine old ass. It's excessively

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google unpleasant," he added, "for affairs are just in that position in which, from one day to another, there may be something that people will get hold of. Fancy a man," he robustly reflected while the three took in more completely the subject of Mrs. Brookenham's attention—"fancy a man muddled up in such a quarter as that! The beauty of it is that the two women seem never to have broken off. Blest if they don't still keep seeing each other!"

The Duchess, as on everything else, passed succinctly on this. "Ah, how can hatreds comfortably flourish without the nourishment of such regular 'seeing' as what you call here bosom friendship alone supplies? What are parties given for in London but that enemies may meet? I grant you it's inconceivable that the husband of a superb creature like your sister should find his requirements better met by an object comme cette petite, who looks like a pen-wiper—an actress's idea of one—made up for a theatrical bazar. At the same time, if you'll allow me to say so, it scarcely strikes one that your sister's prudence is such as to have placed all the cards in her hands. She's the most beautiful woman in England, but her esprit de conduite isn't quite on a level. One can't have everything!" she philosophically sighed.

Lord Petherton met her comfortably enough on this assumption of his detachments. "If you mean by that her being the biggest fool alive, I'm quite ready to agree with you. It's exactly what makes me afraid. Yet how can I decently say in particular," he asked, "of what?"

The Duchess still perched on her critical height. "Of what but one of your amazing English periodical public washings of dirty linen? There's not the least necessity to 'say'!" she laughed. "If there's anything more remarkable than these purifications, it's the domestic comfort with which, when it has come and gone, you sport the articles purified."

"It comes back, in all that sphere," Mr. Mitchett instructively suggested, "to our national, our fatal want of style. We can never, dear Duchess, take too many lessons, and there's probably at the present time no more useful function performed among us than that dissemination of neater methods to which you are so good as to contribute."

He had had another idea, but before he reached it his companion had gayly broken in. "Awfully good one for you, Duchess—and I'm bound to say that, for a clever woman, you exposed yourself! I've at any rate a sense of comfort," Lord Petherton pursued, "in the good relations now more and more established between poor Fanny and Mrs. Brook. Mrs. Brook's awfully kind to her and awfully sharp, and Fanny will take things from her that she won't take from me. I keep saying to Mrs. Brook—don't you know?—'Do keep hold of her, and let her have it strong.' She hasn't, upon my honor, any one in the world but me."

"And we know the extent of that resource," the Duchess archly exclaimed.

"That's exactly what Fanny says—that she knows it," Petherton good-humoredly assented. "She says my beastly hypocrisy makes her sick. There are people," he pleasantly rambled on, "who are awfully free with their advice, but it's mostly fearful rot. Mrs. Brook's isn't, upon my word—I've tried some myself!"

"You talk as if it were something nasty and home-made—gooseberry wine!" the Duchess laughed; "but one can't know Fernanda, of course, without knowing that she has set up, for the convenience of her friends, a little office for consultations. She listens to the case, she strokes her chin and prescribes—"

"And the beauty of it is," cried Lord Petherton, "that she makes no charge whatever!"

"She doesn't take a guinea at the time, but you may still get your account," the Duchess returned. "Of course we know that the great business she does is in husbands and wives."

"This then seems the day of the wives!" Mr. Mitchett interposed as he became aware, the first, of the illustration that the Duchess's image was in the act of receiving. "Lady Fanny Cashmore!"—the butler was already in the field, and the company, with the exception of Mrs. Donner, who remained seated, was apparently conscious of a vibration that brought it afresh, but still more nimbly than on Aggie's advent, to its feet.

IX.

"Go to her straight—be nice to her: you must have plenty to say. You stay with me—we have our affair." The latter of these commands the Duchess addressed to Mr. Mitchett while their companion, in obedience to the former and affected, as it seemed, by an unrepressed familiar accent that stirred a fresh flicker of Mitchy's grin, met the new arrival in the middle of the room before Mrs. Brookenham had had time to reach her. The Duchess, quickly reseated, watched an instant the inexpressive concussion of the tall brother and sister; then while Mitchy again subsided in his place, "You're not, as a rule, clever, you're not delicate, you're not sane, but you're capable of extraordinary good looks," she resumed. "Vous avez parfois la grande beauté."

Mitchy was much amused. "Do you really think Petherton has?"

The Duchess withstood it. "They've got, both outside and in, the same great general things, only turned, in each, rather different ways, a way safer for him, as a man, and more triumphant for her as—whatever you choose to call her! What can a woman do," she richly mused, "with such beauty as that—"

"Except come desperately to advise with Mrs. Brook"—Mitchy undertook to complete her question—"as to the highest use to make of it? But see," he immediately added, "how perfectly competent to instruct her our friend now looks." Their hostess had advanced to Lady Fanny with an outstretched hand, but with an eagerness of greeting merged a little in the sweet predominance of wonder as well as in the habit, at such moments most perceptible, of the languid lily-bend. Nothing, in general, could have been less poorly conventional than the kind of reception given in Mrs. Brookenham's drawing-room to the particular element—the element of physical splendor void of those disparities that make the questions of others tiresome—comprised in Lady Fanny's presence. It was a place in which, at all times, before interesting objects, the unanimous occupants, almost more concerned for each other's impressions than for anything else, were apt rather more to exchange sharp and silent searchings than to fix their eyes on the object itself. In the case of Lady Fanny, however, the object itself—and quite by the same law that had worked, though less profoundly, on the entrance of little Aggie—superseded the usual rapt communion very much in the manner of some beautiful tame tigress who might really coerce attention. There was in Mrs. Brookenham's way of looking up at her a dim, despairing abandonment of the idea of any common personal ground. Lady Fanny, magnificent, simple, stupid, had almost the stature of her brother, a forehead unsurpassably low and an air of sombre concentration just sufficiently corrected by something in her movements that failed to give it a point. Her blue eyes were heavy in spite of being perhaps a couple of shades too clear, and the wealth of her black hair, the disposition of the massive coils of which was all her own, had possibly a satin sheen depreciated by the current fashion. But the great thing in her was that she was, with unconscious heroism, thoroughly herself; and what were Mrs. Brook and Mrs. Brook's intimates, after all, in their free surrender to the play of perception, but a happy association for keeping her so? The Duchess was moved to the liveliest admiration by the grand, simple sweetness of her encounter with Mrs. Donner, a combination indeed in which it was a question if she or Mrs. Brook appeared to the higher advantage. It was poor Mrs. Donner—not, like Mrs. Brook, subtle in sufficiency, nor, like Lady Fanny, almost too simple—who made the poorest show. The Duchess immediately marked it to Mitchy as infinitely characteristic that their hostess, instead of letting one of her visitors go, kept them together by some sweet ingenuity and, while Lord Petherton, dropping his sister, joined Edward and Aggie in the other angle, sat there between them as if, in pursuance of some awfully clever line of her own, she were holding a hand of each. Mr. Mitchett, of course, did justice all round, or at least, as would have seemed from an inquiry he presently made, wished not to fail of it. "Is it your real impression then that Lady Fanny has serious grounds—?"

"For jealousy of that preposterous little person? My dear Mitchett," the Duchess resumed after a moment's reflection, "if you're so rash as to ask me in any of these connections for my 'real' impression, you deserve whatever you may get." The penalty Mitchy had incurred was apparently grave enough to make his companion just falter in the infliction of it; which gave him the opportunity of replying that the little person was perhaps not more preposterous than any one else, that there was something in her he rather liked, and that there were so many different ways in which a woman could be interesting. This further levity it was, therefore, that laid him fully open. "Do you mean to say you've been living with Petherton for so long without becoming aware that he's shockingly worried?"

"My dear Duchess," Mitchy smiled. "Petherton carries his worries with a bravery! They're so many that I've long since ceased to count them; and, in general, I've been disposed to let those pass that I can't help him to meet. You're made, I judge," he went on, "a better use of opportunities perhaps not so good—such as, at any rate, enables you to see further than I into the meaning of the impatience he just now expressed."

The Duchess was admirable, in conversation, for neglecting everything not essential to her present plausibility. "A woman like Lady Fanny can have no 'grounds' for anything—for any indignation, I mean, or for any revenge worth twopence. In this particular case, at all events, they've been sacrificed with such extravagance that, as an injured wife, she hasn't had the gumption to keep back an inch or two to stand on. She can do absolutely nothing."

"Then you take the view—?" Mitchy, who had, after all, his delicacies, pulled up as at sight of a name.

"I take the view," said the Duchess, "and I know exactly why. Elle se les passe—her little fancies! She's a phenomenon, poor dear. And all with—what shall I call it?—the absence of haunting remorse of a good house-mother who makes the family accounts balance. She looks—and it's what they love her for here when they say 'Watch her now!'—like an angry saint; but she's neither a saint, nor, to be perfectly fair to her, really angry at all. She has only just enough reflection to make out that it may some day be a little better for her that her husband shall, on his side too, have committed himself; and she's only, in secret, too pleased to be sure whom it has been with. All the same I must tell you," the Duchess still more crisply added, "that our little friend Nanda is of the opinion—which I gather her to be quite ready to defend—that Lady Fanny is wrong."

Poor Mitchy found himself staring. "But what has our little friend Nanda to do with it?"

"What indeed, bless her heart? If you will ask questions, however, you must take, as I say, your risks. There are days when, between you all, you stupefy me. One of them was when I happened, about a month ago, to make some allusion to the charming example of Mr. Cashmore's fine taste that we have there before us: what was my surprise at the tone taken by Mrs. Brook to deny, on this little lady's behalf, the soft impeachment? It was quite a mistake that anything had happened—Mrs. Donner had pulled through unscathed. She had been but a day or two, at the most, in danger, for her family and friends—the best influences—had rallied to her support: the flurry was all over. She was now perfectly safe. Do you think she looks so?" the Duchess asked.

This was not a point that Mitchy was conscious of freedom of mind to examine. "Do I understand you that Nanda was her mother's authority—?"

"For the exact shade of the intimacy of the two friends and the state of Mrs. Brook's information? Precisely—it was 'the latest before going to press.' 'Our own correspondent!' Her mother quoted her."

Mr. Mitchett visibly wondered. "But how should Nanda know?"

"Anything about the matter? How should she not know everything? You've not, I suppose, lost sight of the fact that this lady and Mrs. Grendon are sisters. Carrie's situation and Carrie's perils are naturally very present to the extremely unoccupied Tishy, who is unhappily married into the bargain, who has no children, and whose house, as you may imagine, has a good thick air of partisanship. So, as with Nanda, on her side, there is no more absorbing interest than her dear friend Tishy, with whom she's at present staying and under whose roof she perpetually meets this victim of unjust aspersions—"

"I see the whole thing from here, you imply?" Mr. Mitchett, under the influence of this rapid evocation, had already taken his line. "Well," he said bravely, "Nanda's not a fool."

A momentary silence on the part of the Duchess might have been her tribute to his courage. "No. I don't agree with her, as it happens, here; but that there are matters as to which she's not in general at all befogged is exactly the worst I ever said of her. And I hold that in putting it so—on the basis of my little anecdote—you clearly give out that you're answered."

Mitchy turned it over. "Answered?"

"In the quarrel that, a while back, you sought to pick with me. What I touched on, to her mother, was the peculiar range of aspects and interests she's compelled to cultivate by the special intimacies that Mrs. Brook permits her. There they are—and that's all I said. Judge them for yourself."

The Duchess had risen as she spoke, which was also what Mrs. Donner and Mrs. Brookenham had done; and Mr. Mitchett was on his feet as well, to act on this last admonition. Mrs. Donner was taking leave, and there occurred among the three ladies, in connection with the circumstance, a somewhat striking exchange of endearments. Mr. Mitchett, observing this, expressed himself suddenly as diverted. "By Jove, they're kissing—she's in Lady Fanny's arms!" But his hilarity was still to deepen. "And Lady Fanny, by Jove, is in Mrs. Brook's!"

"Oh, it's all beyond me!" the Duchess cried; and the little wail of her baffled imagination had almost the austerity of a complaint.

"Not a bit—they're all right. Mrs. Brook has acted!" Mitchy went on.

"Oh, it isn't that she doesn't 'act'!" his interlocutress ejaculated.

Mrs. Donner's face presented, as she now crossed the room, something that resembled the ravage of a death-struggle between its artificial and its natural elegance. "Well," Mitchy said with decision as he caught it—"I back Nanda." And while a whiff of derision reached him from the Duchess, "Nothing has happened!" he murmured.

As if to reward him for an indulgence that she must much more have divined than overheard, the visitor approached him with her bravery of awkwardness. "I go on Friday to my sister's, where I shall find Nanda Brookenham. Can I take her any message from you?"

Mr. Mitchett showed a tint that might positively have been reflected. "Why should you dream of her expecting one?"

"Oh," said the Duchess, with a gayety that but half carried off her asperity, "Mrs. Brook must have told Mrs. Donner to ask you!"

The latter lady, at this, rested strange eyes on the speaker, and they had perhaps something to do with a quick flare of Mitchy's wit. "Tell her, please—if, as I suppose you came here to ask the same of her mother—that I adore her still more for keeping in such happy relations with you as enable me thus to meet you."

Mrs. Donner, overwhelmed, took flight with a nervous laugh, leaving Mr. Mitchett and the Duchess still confronted. Nothing had passed between the two ladies, yet it was as if there were a trace of something in the eyes of the elder, which, during a moment's silence, moved from the retreating visitor, now formally taken over at the door by Edward Brookenham, to Lady Fanny and her hostess, who, in spite of the embraces just performed, had again subsided together while Mrs. Brook gazed up in exalted intelligence. "It's a funny house," said the Duchess at last. "She makes me such a scene over my not bringing Aggie, and still more over my very faint hint of my reasons for it, that I fly off, in compunction, to do what I can, on the spot, to repair my excess of prudence. I reappear, panting, with my niece—and it's to this company I introduce her!"

Her companion looked at the charming child, to whom Lord Petherton was talking with evident kindness and gayety—a conjunction that evidently excited Mitchy's interest. "May we then know her?" he asked with an effect of drollery. "May I—if he may?"

The Duchess's eyes, turned to him, had taken another light. He even gaped a little at their expression, which was, in a manner, carried out by her tone. "Go and talk to her, you perverse creature, and send him over to me." Lord Petherton, a minute later, had joined her; Brookenham had left the room with Mrs. Donner; his wife and Lady Fanny were still more closely engaged; and the young Agnesina, though visibly a little scared at Mitchy's queer countenance, had begun, after the fashion he had touched on to Mrs. Brook, politely to invoke the aid of the idea of habit. "Look here—you must help me," the Duchess said to Petherton. "You can, perfectly—and it's the first thing I've yet asked of you."

"Oh, oh, oh!" her interlocutor laughed.

"I must have Mitchy," she went on without noticing his particular shade of humor.

"Mitchy too?"—he appeared to wish to leave her in no doubt of it.

"How low you are!" she simply said. "There are times when I despair of you. He's in every way your superior, and I like him so that—well, he must like her. Make him feel that he does."

Lord Petherton turned it over as something put to him practically. "I could wish for him that he would. I see in her possibilities!" he continued to laugh.

"I dare say you do. I see them in Mitchett, and I trust you'll understand me when I say that I appeal to you."

"Appeal to him straight. That's much better," Petherton lucidly observed.

The Duchess wore for a moment her proudest air, which made her, in the connection, exceptionally gentle. "He doesn't like me."

Her interlocutor looked at her with all his bright brutality. "Oh, my dear, I can speak for you—if that's what you want!"

The Duchess met his eyes, and so, for an instant, they sounded each other. "You're so abysmally coarse that I often wonder—" But, as the door reopened, she caught herself. It was the effect of a face apparently directed at her. "Be quiet. Here's Edward."

[To be continued.]

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Digitized by Google

THE FALL OF MANILA—BOMBARDMENT OF FORT SAN ANTONIO ABAD, AUGUST 13, 1898.

As seen from a Newspaper Despatch-Boat by G. W. Peters, Special Artist for "Harper's Weekly" with General Merritt's Forces.—[See Article "The Fall of Manila" in last Week's Number.]

Original from PENN STATE

MUSIC

LINDA MONTANARI,
Prima Donna of the Royal Italian Grand Opera Company.

OCTOBER NOTES.

THERE are as yet no musical first nights of any novel quality in this city—nor many even serious in a routine way. Few such will occur before the first week in November. Then the opening Philharmonic concerts, the re-established concerts of the Astoria's second series, at least, will take place. Mr. Carl Loewenstein, by-the-bye, after diligent searching for a better name than "permanent" for his newly organized band, has selected and announced another. His orchestra will be called "The New York Orchestra," and as such it is now incorporated. This title leaves something to be desired, but it is an improvement. Good local names for symphonic bands are hard to find, and I congratulate Mr. Loewenstein on his good sense and pains. Always misapplied, the name "permanent" is one that just now all music critics feel like repudiating. The return of Mr. Rosenthal and of Miss Adele aus der Ohe will furnish the nearest pianistic incidents of consequence. Mr. Emil Sauer is not to reach New York before January. At Chickering Hall another group of light afternoon musicals has been begun. A set of symphonic concerts detached from the Astoria group is to be undertaken under the Loewenstein auspices in Carnegie Hall, led by Mr. Paur, and to begin next Saturday night.

The First Autumn Musical Affairs.

We are not, however, operaless. The Castle Square Company last week showed that its management have the courage of their convictions, by taking up nothing less than "Aïda." Miss Yvonne de Treville, Miss MacNichol, and Messrs. Sheehan and Stewart fill the larger rôles, alternating with Miss Stewart, Miss Grace Romaine, Mr. William Lavin, and Mr. Chase. The performance stands for, by far, the most successful venture into a serious opera, imperative in its demands on a company that the Castle Square people have made. It ranks as one of the best representations in English of a work, safely to be called classic, yet on record with us. There were shortcomings; but the serious spirit and the effectiveness of all the chief artists mentioned deserve most generous praise. At the Casino, the Royal Grand Italian Opera Company, reorganized and strengthened since their local début last May, have been repeating Puccini's latest score, in four acts, "La Bohème," and a familiar selection of Italian works. To the principals in this independent little troupe—whose efforts last spring were kindly given all the credit that such direful unevenness in its performances could expect—a better orchestra and chorus and wardrobe, likewise a new conductor, Moreale of Turin, and several capable repertory singers, have been added. Mesdames Linda Montanari, Rosalia Chalia, Rita Elandi, Cleopatra Vicini, E. Danti, and Messrs. Agostini, Collenz, Scolari, Cantori, and Fumagalli are firm dependencies. A curious tangle over the organization's right to produce the Puccini score named suddenly arose a fortnight ago, but was finally adjusted by some arrangement of an amicable sort. Why there should be any bona-fide question of the rights here in works apparently long ago arranged for, and performed for months, I fail to see.

The Castle Square Company.
The Royal Italian Company.

YVONNE DE TREVILLE,
Soprano Castle Square Opera Company.

EFFIE STEWART,
Of the Castle Square Opera Company, as Aïda.

"La Bohème" grows with each hearing, so far. Its present exposition is so improved that one can study the opera with some closeness. It has been received again with unfeigned interest. It is, perhaps, the extremest flowering of the new Italian operatic tree. Spontini, Bellini, Donizetti, and Rossini would have conspued it, in their angry inability to endure it, perhaps even to understand it. The cuts and the patterns of Italian opera as they made it are thrown to the winds. Certain climaxes give an approach to detached episodes like arias, duets, concerted pieces in general. But for the most part everything is subordinate compared with treating a play like a play, whether it happens to be for music or not—to setting quickly spoken dialogue into a rapid, melodious stream, almost equally fluent and distributed. Recitative hardly obtains at all—that is to say, on the lines on which the old school established it—save when burlesque is meant. Rhythms are broken into all sorts of facets. The aim is to be natural—in an absurd vehicle. Verdi's exquisite "Falstaff" typifies the manner. Around all flows a ceaseless stream of instrumentation of the most dexterous, modern, delicate, subtle,

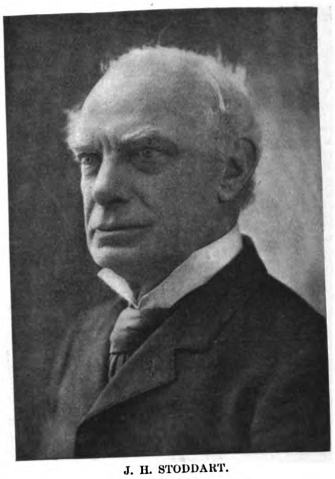
Puccini's "La Bohème."

THE FOUR DRUMMER-BOYS IN "THE LITTLE CORPORAL," AS PERFORMED BY FRANCIS WILSON'S COMPANY AT THE BROADWAY THEATRE, NEW YORK.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

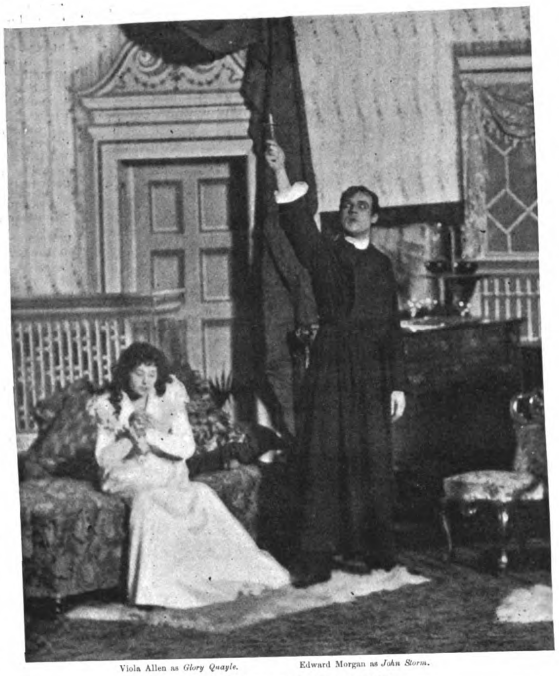
FRANZ SCHALK.

probably is past the experimental stage. The dates are the successive Fridays and Saturdays, November 4–5, November 25-26, December 16–17, January 13–14, February 3–4, February 24–25, March 17–18, April 7–8. The soloists thus far arranged are Miss Adele aus der Ohe, Madame Gadski, Madame Schumann-Heink, Mr. Willy Burmeester, Mr. Emil Sauer, and Madame Carreño—three pianists, two vocalists, and one violinist, each of the first rank. The repertory does not as yet announce any more specific novelty than Richard Strauss's new fantasia, "Don Quixote," a three-part score, which, in view of its subject, is all the more singularly sub-titled, "Introduction; Theme with Variations; Finale."



The Philharmonic Society.

E. IRENAEUS STEVENSON.



IF any cheerful grumbler at our modern stage wants to justify the lack of faith there is in him, he has only to go to see Mr. J. H. Stoddart at Keith's Union Square Theatre and Mr. Joseph Jefferson at the Fifth Avenue. Mr. Stoddart, it will be remembered, was well known, not so many years ago, as a member of the Union Square company, and in the quality of his acting belongs to an elder generation. For some years he has been living comfortably in retirement, but has fortunately been prevailed upon to give the famous telegraph scene from "The Long Strike" as the feature in Keith's continuous performance. He is to be seen at a quarter of three and at nine. The part he plays, Moneypenny, is

Two Youthful Actors.

J. H. STODDART.

one learns to love Acres, and to mourn his disappointments even while one is laughing at them. That, too, is a triumph belonging to an elder generation! It was a generation richer in sympathy than ours, and younger in everything. Or may we hope, as time goes by, to divine the secret of eternal youth?

Viola Allen as Glory Quayle. Edward Morgan as John Storm.

"SAY YOUR PRAYERS, GLORY!"

Scene from Act III. of "The Christian" as performed at the Knickerbocker Theatre, New York.

and masterly embroidery. A chorus is used only briefly, and as if for decoration. Puccini's work is not always eloquent; he has few robust themes to work up. But he makes much of them. The last act is the strongest, and it is deeply pathetic. The composer's gayety is never genuine. But, then, is there not fine art in this? Murger's famous novel is not truly gay. The libretto of "La Bohème," by-the-bye, is also of the newest Italian model; excessively literary—foolishly so; adapting Murger's text with indefatigable piety. As to the way in which the work is sung by this Royal —et cætera—troupe, kindly words again are due the singers. All are sincere, earnest, interesting in the Italian way; and they have good voices and good looks, even if they often sing badly. What their work lacks in refinement is compensated by vitality.

A long letter comes to me from a writer unknown, except so far as his signature stands, I fear, for a rather captious identity. He states that he has "been carefully seeing every comic opera, such and so called (sic), now to be heard on the stage in New York," and that he "cannot find a single thing in any one of them pleasant to hear or look at." Naturally, he rebukes me for having discovered not a little good music, mirth, and pleasing stage-pictures in one or another, as lately set forth in this journal. We must all lament the atrabilious temperament. Our enemies say that it is quite American. If "The Fortune-Teller," "The Charlatan," "The Little Corporal," or "Patience" has not cheered my correspondent, I fear that it is because he is a convinced dyspeptic, with the melancholy of Jaques himself. Or else he is one who, indeed, has been "seeing carefully," all too carefully, his comic operas. The trouble is not that the scores or libretti aforesaid are so much at fault. As for their stage-pictures, another page makes a passing reference to a small one that may be construed as a touch of argument.

A Matter of Taste.

In the general kaleidoscope of conductors now to be viewed, special interest naturally hangs about the coming here of Mr. Franz Schalk to lead the German-sung performances at the Metropolitan during Mr. Grau's complex season. Mr. Schalk's responsibilities will be heaviest when our Wagner in German is to be dealt out to us. But he is as yet very much an unknown quantity even to the many Americans who go far and abroad, hearing opera and concert and picking up handy impressions of leaders. He was born in Vienna in 1863. After his musical pupilage, under several good teachers, he came to stand toward Anton Bruckner, the great Viennese symphonist, in much the same relation as did Seidl to Wagner—as secretary, confidant, and scholar withal. He gradually became a stationed conductor—first in that pleasant and very musical Austrian city Graz, and then at Prague and in Berlin, in posts of active concert and operatic care. His last German relationship was with Berlin. Mr. Schalk is, by-the-bye, a "Bungert leader"; so if Mr. Grau wishes to take up the vast spectacularity of the "Odysseus" operas, here is precisely his gentleman for it. Mr. Schalk is of good repute as a concert-director, and is claimed as a Wagnerian bâton of ability. The only occasion on which I have heard him chanced not to be one of enough significance to give him a decisive individuality in present remembrance. He has, as his picture indicates, an alert, decisive manner, and a typical Austrian face.

Mr. Franz Schalk.

The delay in the formal issue of the prospectuses of our most active concert organization was general, and has been a cause of many little uncertainties. The Philharmonic Society, however, has issued the scheme of its fifty-seventh season with promptness and considerable completeness. Last year's experiment of eight rehearsals and eight concerts, in place of the traditional six apiece, still holds, and an old lawyer, whose crusty manner covers a warm heart, and who goes to all lengths to help a young woman in distress, scolding and abusing her at every step. The conception is old-fashioned, if you will, but to those who knew our stage in its earlier days the sketch must bring memories of many a "precious friend hid in death's dateless night"; and some even of a younger generation may be seen blowing their noses.

Mr. Jefferson in "The Rivals" is supported by a company so excellent that to name them gives a guarantee of excellence. Mr. Verner Clarges plays Sir Anthony Absolute; Mr. Otis Skinner, Captain Absolute; Mr. Wilton Lackaye, Sir Lucius O'Trigger; Mr. Joseph Warren, Faulkland; Walter B. Woodall, Fag; Miss Ffolliett Paget, Mrs. Malaprop; and Blanche Bendêr, Lucy. Miss Elsie Leslie, so long famous as Little Lord Fauntleroy, makes her first appearance, after several years of retirement and study, as Lydia Languish. If she is a trifle cramped in her gestures, and if her varying moods lack thoroughly natural transitions, the defect is to be laid to inexperience. She gives promise of an unusually intelligent mimique and rare personal charm. The version of the play is Mr. Jefferson's well-known adaptation, which, by eliminating several episodes and the character of Julia, brings Bob Acres into greater prominence. The sacrifice would be none too great merely for the pleasure of seeing the remaining passages from Sheridan upon the boards. As for the Bob Acres Mr. Jefferson has divined in Sheridan's lines, no price would be too great for the privilege of feeling again the spell of his sweet and penetrating humor. Without knowing how, he has made a melodrama that in the end simmers down to this: you must not be a music-hall singer, and you must be a philanthropist's wife.

"The Christian," Mr. Hall Caine's dramatization of his novel, is a play with a moral. It has been remarked a thousand times that by having a moral a play is precluded from being a pure work of art. "Both at the first and now" the end of a work of art "was and is to hold, as 'twere, the mirror up to nature." If a play holds ever so small and fragmentary a mirror up to nature, if it has any gleam of the myriad joys of life or of its myriad tragedies, it will adorn a thousand morals, though it will not point one of them. When the current of life runs true and strong, the last thing in men's minds is the doctrine of truth and strength. Yet in these palmy days of vaudeville and burlesque one had best be thankful perhaps for even a single moral, however unadorned. Mr. Hall Caine's one moral is that you must not be a music-hall singer, but a philanthropist's wife. If "The Christian" had been a work of art, the temptation in the life of Glory Quayle might have been made any one of a thousand beautiful and human things. It might have been the love of worldly sweetness and grace that won Praxiteles away from the sterner gods of Pheidias, or Titian from the austere faith of Giotto. Or, if this is too grand a theme, Mr. Hall Caine might have made us feel more of the love of independence and power that is alluring our young women from the ideals and the firesides of their mothers—and of their husbands! He might have shown the love of out-of-doors and of manly sports that is beguiling our young women from the parish church to the parish links. Any or all of such temptations Mr. Hall Caine might have made us feel if he had been working as an artist, and there would have been an appeal to the wayward love of the world in the heart of every one of us. In the end Glory's renunciation would thus have had the touch of true heroism, the vital appeal which it lacks in "The Christian" as it is playing at the Knickerbocker. Mr. Hall Caine has left his theme unglorified;

A Christian with only one Moral.

As a play with a purpose, however, "The Christian" is cleverly designed for popularity. It appeals to that very large class of people who are so uncertain of their perception of beauty and nobility that they would rather have one moral pointed at them than trust their own intelligence to apprehend two or three, or more, of a possible thousand. And then there are the people to be interested in the religious side of the play. How many these are is witnessed by the fact that, until a few years ago, the total yearly output of tracts and sermons and such books in England exceeded the total output of novels. And ever since the Notorious Mrs. Ebbsmith chucked a Bible into that Venetian porcelain stove, people have become more and more accustomed to seeing the church upon the stage. At one point in "The Christian" the doxology is casually played in the R. U. E. As a melodramatic tract, "The Christian" is a work of unusual power. There is probably no church in town that can compete on even terms with the Knickerbocker in the line of moral screaming.

The Knickerbocker Reform Church.

For what the actors have to do in the play they are more than adequate. The part of Glory Quayle is excellently suited to the somewhat lachrymose quality of Miss Viola Allen's powers, and her début as a leading lady is more than a success. Her reading is always intelligent and firm. If she fell short of embodying the cheerful worldly-mindedness one in-

The Preachers.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

nctively looks for in the part, the fault is probably more the author's than her n. There is not any really cheerful world-mindedness in the lines. As The Hon. hu Storm, Mr. Edward J. Morgan was sim-, dignified, and altogether sufficient. The ratio Drake of Mr. John Mason had mo-ents in which it seemed the best bit of ultimate acting in the play.

Mr. Mason was so good that one sighed to nk of the dramatic possibilities that might ve been developed in Glory's hesitation tween Drake's worldly manliness and John orn's commanding Puritanism. To de-velop that human situation to its fullest, however, would have been to take point from moral, for if you give an audience full oice between latter-day asceticism and the undant life of a normal man, there is little ubt as to how it will choose. It was an-unced that the ending of the book had en changed in dramatization so that the ay ends happily. Of course Glory is hap-r married, and perhaps she is happier rried to John. But when Mr. Mason was ing at his best there was a shadow of a ubt, and the shadow lingered long after curtain fell. Can it be that Mr. Hall ine has lacked the art to make even the stere and noble life of the spirit real and utiful to us? Or is a play with only one ral necessarily so thin-blooded that the st touch of human nature submerges the ral in a flood of vital feeling?

The Touch of Nature.

One of the leading signs of the times is success of young American actors in gland. Ever since those early days when American girl became famous abroad we ve felt that her father and her brother had only to be known to be liked thoroughly, if not as well; but for the most part the men have spent their lives at home the pursuits that furnish forth their wives' d daughters' establishments. If our actors the first to be discovered abroad (I ex-ot our ministers at the Court of St. James!), is because their business takes them there. e success of Mr. William Gillette's thor-gh-going Americanism has been duly her-ed, and it is gratifying to know that his rts were discovered before he went abroad. ith Mr. Robert Taber the case is some-at different. In company with his wife, s. Julia Marlowe Taber, he travelled oughout the leading American cities, but ugh always liked, he received scant rec-ition from the critics. In London he has n given a place in Sir Henry Irving's com-ny, and his acting has received distin-ished mention. His latest and greatest cess is in the part of Macduff, which he ys to Forbes Robertson's Macbeth, being ured for the nonce from Sir Henry Irving's npany. His performance is said to be as od as the part has ever known. That cduff is a "fat" part is an open secret of profession, and many an actor has done ll in it who has not later been heard of; judging from the scholarship and sin-rity of Mr. Taber's attitude toward his art, ould guess his success to be legitimate. e latest American to come into prominence London is Mr. Paul Arthur, long known e as a light comedian, who has the lead-part in a new play by Mr. Anthony pe. In "Hurly Burly," at Weber & lds', there is a song the purport of which hat all good things in the world grow on adway, and one stanza plainly says that theatres supply England with actors. h statements are at least still open to dis-sion, but they are interesting as suggest-that our influence is widening no less idly in the arts than in statecraft. Every r Broadway grows more kaleidoscopic, re like a cosmopolitan thoroughfare. ien we shall send forth as many and as d actors as our neighbors send to us, re will be no doubt that New York is a rld city.

The Brother of the American Girl.

The latest London success is a version Dumas's "Three Musketeers," by Mr. ary Hamilton. As Mr. Hamilton first ved the problem of focussing the novel o a play, the book was so long that it is said to have been seriously proposed to give it in succes-sive evenings, somewhat after the manner of "Wallenstein." its present curtailed form, however, it ns to show no lack of coherence. In the production at the Theatre Metropole, nberwell, Mr. Lewis Waller played d'Ar-nan with applause. It is announced that Tree will appear in Sydney Grundy's sion at Her Majesty's later in the season. America Mr. Sothern has already begun rehearse Mr. Hamilton's version of the y, which he prefers, and will take it on road, opening at Philadelphia. An al-st inevitable result of dramatization in glish is that the main love episode has n made over to suit the sympathies and sibilities of an Anglo-Saxon audience. that is nothing. Has not Mr. Hall Caine le over his own story to fit the require-nts of the stage! JOHN CORBIN.

Three Musketeers in one Evening.

HE SANTIAGO SEA-FIGHT.

HE navigators of the Indiana, Texas, n, Brooklyn, Oregon, and New York were ointed a board, with Lieutenant-Com-nder Wainwright of the Gloucester as irman, to determine the relative positions of the ships engaged in the fight with Cer-vera's fleet, to the end that the glory and other emoluments arising from that engage-ment might be justly distributed. They have prepared a report, and there is good reason to believe that "the substance of it," as freely set forth last week in the news-papers, is not to be found in it at all. As to the facts of the fight off Santiago, however, there is very little room for uncertainty left. The conclusions reached nearly three months ago by the WEEKLY, and confirmed by the letter published in WEEKLY of August 13, still hold. The plans were Admiral Samp-son's; the execution was the work of the several captains, unaffected by orders other than those of Sampson.

A FIELD ETCHING.

UPON soft-footed steeds the cyclers pass,
Seeking new joys along these quiet ways
Where timid Autumn comes and fondly lays
A gold and purple robe on Summer's bier:
And drowsing by the tomb I dimly hear
A spirit voice of silence in the grass.

ALBERT BIGELOW PAINE.

ADVICE TO MOTHERS.—MRS. WINSLOW'S SOOTHING SYRUP should always be used for children teething. It soothes the child, softens the gums, allays all pain, cures wind colic, and is the best remedy for diarrhœa. —[Adv.]

RECIPES SENT FREE.

THE N. Y. Condensed Milk Co., New York, send free upon request a pamphlet of recipes very valua-ble to housekeepers. They are the proprietors of the Gail Borden Eagle Brand Condensed Milk. Best infant food.—[Adv.]

SUPERIOR to Vaseline and Cucumbers, Crème Simon, marvellous for the complexion and light cutaneous af-fections: it whitens, perfumes, fortifies the skin. J. SI-MON, 13 Rue Grange Batelière, Paris; Druggists, Per-fumers, Fancy-goods stores.—[Adv.]

HEALTH improves, spirits rise proportionate to regu-larity of using ABBOTT'S—The ORIGINAL ANGOSTURA BITTERS. Get the genuine only—"ABBOTT'S."—[Adv.]

DR. SIEGERT'S ANGOSTURA BITTERS is known all over the world as the great regulator.—[Adv.]

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Pears'

It is a wonderful soap that takes hold quick and does no harm.

No harm! It leaves the skin soft like a baby's; no alkali in it, nothing but soap. The harm is done by alkali. Still more harm is done by not washing. So, bad soap is better than none.

What is bad soap? Im-perfectly made; the fat and alkali not well bal-anced or not combined.

What is good soap? Pears'.

All sorts of stores sell it, especially druggists; all sorts of people use it.

Arnold Constable & Co.
FURS.
Russian and Hudson Bay Sable, Silver and Blue Fox.
Chinchilla, Persian Lamb, Seal and Otter, Selected Pelts.
Russian Fur-lined Cloaks and Capes.
Novelties in Fur Collarettes, Scarfs and Muffs.
Fur Trimmings.
Broadway & 19th St.
NEW YORK.

THE HEAD SHAPE OF THE KREMENTZ One-Piece Collar Button
Makes it easy to button and unbutton.
ABSOLUTELY UNBREAKABLE IN WEAR
GUARANTEED—You get a new one in case of accident of any kind.
All jewelers sell them. Insist on getting the KREMENTZ
Postal us for booklet.
KREMENTZ & CO., 48 Chestnut Street, NEWARK, N. J.

WALLINGFORD, CONNECTICUT.
ROSEMARY HALL, a Country School for Girls.
MISS RUNTZ-REES, Principal.
Ninth year begins Oct. 1, 1898.

W. & J. Sloane
FINE CARPETS, RUGS AND UPHOLSTERY STUFFS.
Special Design Furniture.
Estimates and designs furnished upon application.
Broadway & 19th St.
NEW YORK.

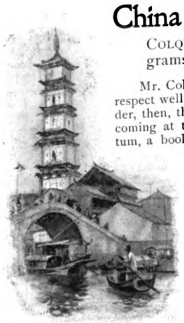
Financial
Letters of Credit.
Bills of Exchange bought and sold. Cable Transfers to Europe and South Africa. Commercial and Travellers' Letters of Credit. Collec-tions made.
Brown Brothers & Co.,
BANKERS, No. 59 WALL STREET.

THE CELEBRATED
SOHMER
Heads the List of the Highest-Grade Pianos.
Caution.—The buying public will please not con-found the genuine SOHMER Piano with one of a similar-sounding name of a cheap grade. Our name spells—
S—O—H—M—E—R
New York Warerooms
SOHMER BUILDING
Fifth Ave., cor 22d St.



Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

HARPER & BROTHERS'

Fall Publications

China in Transformation.

By ARCHIBALD R. COLQUHOUN. With Frontispiece, Maps, and Diagrams. 8vo, Cloth, $3 00.

Mr. Colquhoun possesses excellent qualifications, and is in every respect well equipped for the task he has undertaken. . . . Small wonder, then, that in the result we are provided with a volume which, coming at the present moment, supplies what is a decided desideratum, a book which makes clear to the most ordinary understanding the status quo existing in the Celestial Empire to-day.—Pall Mall Gazette, London.

A series of valuable and instructive essays on China and the Chinese. . . . Every page of the present volume should be carefully studied by those who desire to gain a right understanding of the present position in China. Mr. Colquhoun has made several journeys through portions of the empire, and he has studied the Chinese question from "the egg to the apples." It is a pleasure, therefore, to listen to him when he discourses on the geographical, economic, and social questions which constitute the greater part of his work.—The Athenæum, London.

Contributions to "Punch" and Henry Esmond

Volumes VI. and VII. of the Biographical Edition of W. M. Thackeray's Complete Works. Comprising Additional Material and Hitherto Unpublished Letters, Sketches, and Drawings Derived from the Author's Original Manuscripts and Note-books. Edited by Mrs. ANNE THACKERAY RITCHIE. Crown 8vo, Cloth, Uncut Edges and Gilt Tops, $1 75 per volume.

Study of a Child.

By LOUISE E. HOGAN. With a Colored Frontispiece and Many Illustrations. Crown 8vo, Cloth, Ornamental, $2 50.

This volume is a seven years' record of spontaneous development of a normal child's self-activity, with annotations by the late Dr. Preyer, of Wiesbaden.

The Golfer's Alphabet.

Pictures by A. B. FROST. Rhymes by W. G. VAN T. SUTPHEN. 4to, Illuminated Boards, $1 50.

"The Golfer's Alphabet" appeals not only to the scoffer at golf, and, on the other hand, to the expert and enthusiast, but, perhaps most of all, to the "duffer," who discovers in it, to his satisfaction, that there are worse players than he.

Crooked Trails.

Written and Illustrated by FREDERIC REMINGTON, Author of "Pony Tracks," etc. 8vo, Cloth, Ornamental, $2 00.

As those who read "Pony Tracks" are aware, Mr. Remington presents a perfect combination when he works with himself, supplementing his own letter-press with his own illustrations and vice versa.

Wild Eelin.

Her Escapades, Adventures, and Bitter Sorrows. A Novel. By WILLIAM BLACK, Author of "A Princess of Thule," "The Strange Adventures of a Phaeton," etc. Illustrated by T. DE THULSTRUP. Post 8vo, Cloth, Ornamental, $1 75.

"Wild Eelin" is a picturesque story of Scottish life, written in the author's best manner, the manner of "A Daughter of Heth" and "Madcap Violet."

Fables for the Frivolous.

(With Apologies to La Fontaine.) By GUY WETMORE CARRYL. With Illustrations by PETER NEWELL. 8vo, Cloth Ornamental, Deckel Edges and Gilt Top, $1 50.

Illustration from "Fables for the Frivolous."

Mr. Carryl has confessedly followed in the immortal footprints of Æsop and La Fontaine. He has even dared to put new wine into the old bottles, and his new liquor makes very agreeable tipple. It recalls the familiar flavor of ancient wisdom, but the draught has been fortified and charged with an effervescing wit that is peculiarly piquant and "age end."

Roden's Corner.

A Novel. By HENRY SETON MERRIMAN, Author of "The Sowers," "With Edged Tools," etc. With Illustrations by T. DE THULSTRUP. Post 8vo, Cloth, Ornamental, $1 75.

"Roden's Corner" is rich in incident and character, and is a keen criticism of the altruistic tendencies in modern social life and modern social charities. But under the surface runs a deep, strong vein of tragedy and pathos such as no living novelist is more deft in developing than is Mr. Merriman.

A Constitutional History of the American People. 1776-1850.

By FRANCIS NEWTON THORPE. Illustrated with Maps. Two Volumes. Crown 8vo, Cloth, Uncut Edges and Gilt Tops, $5 00.

A noble contribution for the library of those who would keep well informed in the history of the American people from 1776 to 1850.—Christian Work, N. Y.

By Order of the Magistrate.

A Novel. By W. PETT RIDGE, Author of "Secretary to Bayne, M.P.," "A Clever Wife," etc. Post 8vo, Cloth, Ornamental, $1 25.

Phases of an Inferior Planet.

A Novel. By ELLEN GLASGOW, Author of "The Descendant." Post 8vo, Cloth, Ornamental, $1 25.

The same virile touch which made Miss Glasgow's first book so remarkable is found in "Phases of an Inferior Planet." The book contains the same element of intense human interest which made its predecessor notable.

Harper's Round Table.

Bound Volume for 1898. Vol. I. (New Series). Profusely Illustrated. Large 8vo, Cloth, Ornamental, $2 50.

The first volume of HARPER'S ROUND TABLE, in its new monthly form, contains an unusually excellent collection of serial and short stories stirringly told and graphically illustrated. The volume is in every way an ideal holiday gift for young people.

The Instinct of Step-Fatherhood.

Stories. By LILIAN BELL, Author of "The Love Affairs of an Old Maid," etc. 16mo, Cloth, Ornamental, Uncut Edges and Gilt Top, $1 25.

Several of these stories are veritable master strokes of ingenious construction, and all are well up to the standard which Miss Bell has set for her work, and to which she so consistently adheres.

The Red Axe.

A Novel. By S. R. CROCKETT, Author of "Lochinvar," "The Gray Man," etc. Illustrated. Post 8vo, Cloth, Ornamental, $1 50.

D. L. DOWD, 1879

Mr. Crockett's remarkable gift of narration has never been displayed to greater advantage than in this strong story of adventure in Pomerania three centuries ago.

How to Get Strong

And How to Stay So. By WILLIAM BLAIKIE. With Numerous Portraits. New and Enlarged Edition from New Plates. Post 8vo, Cloth, Ornamental, $1 75.

D. L. DOWD, 188

Mr. Blaikie's object has not been so much to encourage the cultivation of great strength as to point out the vast advantages, physical, moral, and mental, which follow hard upon the institution of a systematic and rational practice of exercise.

New York HARPER & BROTHERS London

PUBLISHERS

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

"WIDE-OPEN" NEW YORK.

WHAT RENEWED CROKER GOVERNMENT MEANS, AND WHAT IS TO BE EXPECTED.

BY FRANKLIN MATTHEWS.

NEW YORK is wide open once more. Tammany Hall has at last secured its "terrible revenge," Richard Croker and his assistants have set in full operation a system of Tammany government under which vice flourishes openly for a price. The old days have come again, and Tammany leaders are fattening their pocket-books through the privilege of selling the right to violate law and through extortion and forced tribute. Devery, Richard Croker's friend, is Chief of Police. According to a message to the Legislature from Governor Black, he was selected for the place "to repeat the infamous practices which had tarnished his previous career." Devery knows the town is wide open. Croker cannot help knowing it, the Police Commissioners must know it, and if Mayor Van Wyck does not know it, a short investigation will prove it to him.

Despite the safeguarding provisions of the Raines liquor law, the saloons have been seized and made part of the Tammany machine; gambling in all its forms is going on, and the backers are paying for it; scores of pool-rooms are running in town, the most lucrative of all the sources of revenue for certain Tammany leaders; the profits from prize-fighting belong to other leaders, and through the Police Board a monopoly of this business goes to a Tammany man in Manhattan Borough, and to certain McLaughlin followers in Brooklyn Borough; the doors of dives swing open to throngs, especially on Saturday and Sunday nights, and for the delectation of their patrons a new "dance," a diabolism beside which the dance imported from the southern shores of the Mediterranean to this country five years ago is a model of virtue and propriety, has been set to music for nightly exhibition, making a performance so depraved that it would seem as if the lowest depths of infamy in that direction had been reached; theatrical performances are tolerated compared with which those which were condemned as indecent by the courts three years ago would be considered refined, and the theatre at which the worst of these is given, conducted by State-Senator Timothy D. Sullivan, displays a daily and nightly insult to the entire nation by the appropriation of the name of the hero of Manila as its own; the green goods men are already in the suburbs, and are preparing to come into town again; especially significant is the fact that the woman who was used in the attempt made by the friends of Devery to break down the Parkhurst case against him, and who, because of its failure, had to flee to Chicago, has come back again, and almost within the shadow of the Tenderloin station-house the doors of her abiding-place are open once more, as are those of a dozen or more of others of her grade in life; slot-machines are running in protected places; most important of all is the fact that the police are demoralized.

Last winter, in an article on "Wide-open Chicago," which was printed in the WEEKLY, I tried to reveal not so much the wickedness of that city—that would be a task beyond the power of print—as the fact that it was the direct result of an alliance for political power and personal profit between the Democratic politicians of that city and those who conduct the dens of vice. At the time I made my investigation in Chicago, under the conduct of a police official and a police reporter, Mayor Carter Harrison said to me that Chicago was not so wide open as New York. That was not true at that time; it is true now. And, as in the case of Chicago, it would not be worth while for a respectable journal to reveal the infamous condition of affairs in New York—indeed, no publication in existence would dare print it—for the mere sake of exposing frightful evils, nor even to indicate their nature to some extent, were it not that Richard Croker's face is set toward Albany at this time, and that it seems desirable to call attention to what may be expected if Tammany Hall gets control of the government of the State of New York. It is proper to say that the investigation upon which this article is based was made in company with those alert and trustworthy men the Tenderloin and police reporters, and that what information I did not gather personally was given to me by men who have knowledge of these matters, and the confidence of many of the most reputable men in New York.

RATES CHARGED FOR LAW-BREAKING.

To make sure not only that the old system of extortion by Tammany is in full swing again, but to obtain a list of prices charged, I went under proper auspices to one who, because of his actual connection with the police force, knows whereof he speaks, and who, if I were at liberty to give his name, would be recognized as an authority by every one who reads the newspapers. This man, so far as I know, does not share in any police plunder—indeed, I was sent to him because of that belief—but he knows all about it. This is the rate of prices that he furnished: pool-rooms, $300 to open, and from $100 to $300 a month; gambling, from $50 to $300 or more a month, according to the size of the receipts; keeping open a dive, $10 to $50 a week; running disorderly resorts, $50 to $150 a month; selling liquor from 1 to 5 A.M., the moderate charge of only $5 a month.

But it is not necessary to take the word of a man, whose name, for obvious reasons, cannot be made public, to make it certain that the old system of tribute is in force again. There is one absolutely unanswerable line of reasoning that proves it practically beyond shadow of doubt. It is this: Every man who has ever had any knowledge of the inner workings of politics in any large city in the United States knows that not for one hour would a wide-open condition be permitted unless the police, or the men behind the police, were paid for it. It has been the invariable rule in all American cities at all times. It is the rule to-day in Chicago, and it is the rule in New York and other places. The privilege of breaking the law must be paid for; the power to be able to laugh to scorn the effort of honest policemen—and there are many of them—must be paid for; the opportunity to grow rich on the exploitation of vice must be paid for. There are two ways of paying, as has been said. One is by cash, and the other is by votes. Generally both cash and votes are paid. The low rates which are charged to saloon-keepers for violating the Raines law by selling all night, instead of paying a nightly revenue of $10 to the authorities, as required by the law, would indicate that Tammany just now is as anxious to get payment with votes as with cash. This view is more than strengthened by the fact that the pool-rooms have been allowed to be opened again in the city, when it was only a few years ago, as is well known, that Mr. Croker and Tammany Hall closed them, "for good and moral reasons," and sent the patrons to the race-tracks to bet.

THE TENDERLOIN'S PROFESSIONAL BONDSMAN.

To see what wide-open New York means, and to obtain an illustration of what Tammany's "terrible revenge" really is, one should go to the Tenderloin station-house in West Thirtieth Street about eleven o'clock some evening. From ten to twenty creatures of the streets are brought in, and, within an hour or two, are released under bail furnished by a professional bondsman, a Tammany Hall leader, William R. Nelson, proprietor of the famous "black and tan" saloon on Seventh Avenue. The next day these creatures are fined in the police court. According to newspaper accounts, Nelson gets at least $5 for every bond that he signs. No other man is permitted to have the actual privileges he enjoys. The street sinner probably pays another $5 for her fine, and to make up for what has been taken from her under due process of law, and with the co-operation of the police for Nelson's profit, she must prowl the streets again, only to fall into the clutches of Nelson's pull again. Nelson's most intimate friend is the famous "ward-man" Schill, now back at his old station for "police duty," and with all indictments against him dismissed. In other words, a distinct part of the earnings of the creatures of the Tenderloin are diverted every night—a sum amounting from $50 to $100—to the coffers of "Bob" Nelson, Tammany leader.

But one should go deeper when considering the case of Nelson. The records show that when Devery was indicted, as the result of the Lexow investigation disclosures, Nelson was one of his bondsmen. Devery has come back into power, has taken the highest seat in police business in the country, and Nelson, his friend and bondsman, is sharing in the terrible revenge against Parkhurst in a way that is swelling Nelson's bank account. I had the honor of an introduction to Nelson and his friend ward-man Schill, in Nelson's saloon not long ago. His place reeks. Degraded blacks and whites may be found there. His hardened face shows signs of shrewdness and intelligence, and one can understand, after a study of him, why he has been able to accumulate a fortune.

I do not know what arrangement Mr. Nelson may have—if indeed he has any—with the Tenderloin police, but I know reporters who assert that the police have been sent to Nelson's place to get him to come to the station-house and sign bail-bonds. It may be that he has the run of the station-house business simply because he is close by, and, being a humane person, dislikes to see persons kept in confinement when he can secure their release. Certainly I cannot charge that the police get a share of Mr. Nelson's earnings. If such should be the case, no one could prove it (even the Lexow Committee could not prove many things), and so I do not assert it, and disclaim all intimation on my part to that effect. But I call attention to the close association between Nelson and the police.

THE EXCISE-LAW VIOLATION.

But it is in the general aspect of the Tenderloin that one sees a change since Devery came into full power. Reporters of twenty years' experience there say it is "worse than ever before." This famous centre is widest open, however, in regard to the enforcement of the excise law. With a reporter I went into Silver-Dollar Smith's club over his saloon on Sixth Avenue at 1.15 A.M. in the early part of this month. Admission was free to all. There was no book to be signed at the door. A lookout "sized" us up when we went in. The place upstairs was filled. A negro quartette furnished music. Beer was five cents a glass, and other liquors were sold at the usual rates. There was no pretence at serving a sandwich, probably because it was a "club." Of course Silver Dollar is a shining Tammany light. His place is typical of other saloons. It is a fact that cannot be disputed that any saloon in the centre of town may be kept open all night, in violation of law. Thousands of them are so kept open. One of the city magistrates was quoted recently as saying that the Liquor-Dealers' Association—the association to which saloon-keepers may belong for $5 a month—was hounding men who would not come into it, and was using the police to hector and annoy them. The magistrate afterward modified the reported speech, but if he had gone about the Tenderloin and other parts of the city he could have seen that some power was at work which gives saloon-keepers the fullest right to violate the law, and being a man of much experience in affairs of the world, he could understand that some one was paying for such privileges, and paying to those who could grant them. It is as true in politics as it is in business that you cannot get something for nothing, and especially true is that fact when that "something" is the violation of law.

Not every saloon-keeper violates the law, but it is said that most of them pay $5 a month so as to be let alone, and they let it go at that. Where the tribute from saloons, and they let it go at that. Where the tribute from saloons, estimated at from $50,000 to $60,000 a month, goes finally I am unable to say, but certain it is that none of it gets lost. The police get little or none of it. They obey orders to shut their eyes, and if saloon-keepers hand out a dollar or two occasionally, or send out a drink to those policemen who will take it, such must be their reward.

DIVES MORE DEPRAVED THAN BEFORE.

The dives are not yet in full blast in the Tenderloin. They are in full swing further down town. A magistrate of the city met me a month ago, and said, in surprise,

"Did you know that the dives have invaded Fourth Avenue?"

I did not know it, but it is true. Within the shadow of Cooper Union, and flaunting its scenes of shame almost in the face of the statue of the great philanthropist who founded that institution, is an open dive, under the guise of a club, than which no more depraved place ever existed in New York. I have a ticket of membership in that club —cost twenty-five cents, good for one year. The dance-hall of the club is like all those of the dives, and it is unnecessary to go into particulars.

A new dive on the Bowery, however, should be mentioned. It has a naval name. About its walls are naval pictures exclusively. Portraits of Dewey, Sampson, Schley, Hobson, Sigsbee, Evans, and a lot more look down from the walls. At the far end of the room are two mural paintings done in Bowery style. One represents the sinking of the Merrimac at the entrance of Santiago Harbor, and the other represents Hobson and his companions, resplendent in full uniforms, on a raft, waving defiantly the American flag amid shot and shell in the broad daylight. Flags decorate the places where there are no naval pictures. The first impression, as one enters this place and sees what is going on, is not one of astonishment so much as shock. The names and pictures of naval heroes are being used as decoys for vice. Tammany Hall permits such a desecration, and for revenue.

The place has the open approval of the police. While I was going in the doorway at three o'clock one morning recently, under the escort of a famous Bowery character, two policemen stood at the doorway, and each was receiving a drink of whiskey from the manager of the place. I could give the numbers of the policemen if necessary. They could see inside the dance-room, through the narrow hallway, and of course knew all that was going on.

The matter of the existence of dives should not be dismissed without reference to the East Side. That region just now is sprinkled with them, under the guise of cafés. They are there actually by the hundreds. Infamous and open as is their traffic, the greatest shame of it all is that they are permitted to exist where the children swarm and cannot escape them. There can be no greater crime against a rising generation than to permit such a condition of affairs. Any one can see it on a stroll through the leading streets. The minds of boys and girls must be debauched by this constant contact with vice. Tammany Hall permits it, and the man who could examine into the matter and say that Tammany does not profit by this slaughter of the innocents must lack reasoning powers. I saw more than a dozen of these hell-holes on a block.

FORTUNE IN THE POOL-ROOMS.

Turn now to another source of political revenue for Tammany—the existence of pool-rooms. There are probably one hundred and fifty of them in the present city limits. A leader close to Mr. Croker is said to be the man who must be "seen" before a pool-room is opened. I do not use his name, because I cannot prove any assertion against him. Any one who wishes to know it can find out from the patrons of the places for the asking. It is necessary to go back a little to understand the significance of the opening of the pool-rooms. It is only a few years ago, when Tammany controlled legislation at Albany and abolished the lobby, that Mr. Croker closed the pool-rooms, with the exception of one or two small affairs. It was proclaimed a move in the interests of virtue. It was said to have been due really to a difference between certain Tammany men and a certain pool-seller. Whatever the motive, whatever the cause, the pool-rooms were closed, and those who wished to bet had to go to the race-tracks to do it.

Curiously enough, just about that time Richard Croker, who had been a poor man, began to take an interest in horse-racing. There are those who say that the closing of the pool-rooms and the advent of Mr. Croker in racing were mere coincidents, and that is all. That may be so. After a time Mr. Croker transferred his racing interests to England, and the report is common that he has no interest—that is, personal interest—in American tracks. After he came back from Europe this year the pool-rooms were in full operation, in violation of law. Strangely enough, the day after Dr. Parkhurst came home from Europe the tip went from one end of town on the West Side to close, and for part of that afternoon these places were shut.

I went into one of these pool-rooms and spent an afternoon recently. It was within three minutes' walk of the Aquarium at the Battery. From two to three hundred men thronged the place. A little partition at one end of the room hid the telegraph-operator and the cashier and manager. Liquor was sold in the place. The odds were posted on a printed card. There were all sorts and conditions of men there. It was pitiful to see the wrecks—victims of betting—thumbing the pages of their books and systems, eager to borrow a dollar, and confident that some day they would get rich. There were scores of young fellows there, clerks from neighboring offices, and business was brisk all the time. Betting on races at four tracks was going on. The frequent posting and changing of odds, the voice of the manager calling off the description of the races as they were being run, and then urging those present to bet on other events, the confusion in investing or in collecting money, the frequent calls for the waiter to supply drinks—all indicated the wisdom in prohibiting such places, and also displayed the reason why they are now permitted to exist by Tammany Hall, in violation of law, and for the profit of a man high in the councils of that organization. Of course the police know that these places are open. Chief Devery knows it; the Police Commissioners must know it; if Mr. Croker does not know it, he is too busy with other matters; and if Mayor Van Wyck does not know it, it is because he is absorbed in the contemplation of the corruption and utter rottenness of his political opponents. Mayor Van Wyck is ready at all times to denounce and arraign Republican wickedness, and if in collecting his data for that purpose he is too busy to know that under his administration the most monstrous violations of law are sold by politicians in Tammany Hall, he must not be judged too harshly for not knowing what is going on about him. Public rascality must be put down, and if Mayor Van Wyck can only put it down among the Republicans, he should have full credit for that work. The man who took me into the pool-room I visited said there were twenty others where he had admittance. He also said that there were probably one hundred in Manhattan Borough alone. I have no personal knowledge about them except what I have written here.

PRIZE-FIGHTING MONOPOLY.

Then there is the prize-fighting revenue for Tammany followers! They have a monopoly of it in Manhattan.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google and the McLaughlin men have the monopoly in Brooklyn. State-Senator Timothy D. Sullivan is the favored Tammany man. Of course he has had an acquaintance with Mr. Croker for some time. It was during Mayor Strong's administration that the Horton boxing law was passed. At once numerous clubs sprang up, and for a time the law was observed strictly. After a while there was great rivalry between the clubs, and there arose a war to the death. Certain men wanted to control the boxing of the town; it was fast approaching prize-fighting. Finally it did become prize-fighting and the police shut down on it.

When Tammany came into power seventeen clubs applied to the Police Commissioners for permission to conduct boxing exhibitions. The night after Mayor Van Wyck took the oath a fight was stopped because it was not settled then who was to control prize-fighting. A dead-lock ensued for several months. It is common talk that Tim Sullivan wanted the rights for all of New York. State-Senator McCarren, chairman of the Democratic State Executive Committee, appeared before the Police Board in behalf of certain clients who wanted permission to run affairs in Brooklyn. The matter was compromised, Sullivan taking the rights in Manhattan, and the McLaughlin men those in Brooklyn. As a result, just four clubs are running. No others can get permission from the Police Board. The law requires the Commissioners to issue these permits under certain conditions. Each of the clubs which has fulfilled those conditions could mandamus the commissioners and probably compel them to issue the amusement permits, but what would be the use of that? The place would probably be raided on the ground of "brutality," and the business would be broken up. Even the New York Athletic Club, a club that is respected, and has respected the laws, could not get permission from the Police Commissioners to conduct boxing. There are plenty of technicalities whereby the Police Commissioners may delay issuing these permits, and one must be sure of his facts before he accuses them of dereliction of duty. But it is a most singular thing that only those clubs which Mr. Sullivan conducts, or those in which Mr. McCarren has an interest—at least so far as being counsel for the ostensible proprietors goes—are permitted to run. Some light may be thrown on this matter when it is known that in the last year that boxing was allowed there was a profit of $50,000 at the club that was patronized most. The reason why I say that Senator Sullivan owns the prize-fighting rights in Manhattan is because such ownership is common talk, and because I know men who have seen him counting the receipts, and who have it from Tom O'Rourke, the ostensible manager of the Manhattan outfit, that Sullivan is the real owner. Hundreds of men in Brooklyn and elsewhere will tell you that Mr. McCarren owns the Brooklyn rights, but inasmuch as he has appeared openly only as counsel for the Coney Island Club, those alone who know the full facts in the matter can make such an assertion about him. How much money there is in the club's treasury after his counsel fees are paid, of course, is not a public matter.

There has not been a profit thus far in prize-fighting this year, even with a monopoly. O'Rourke and his associates, however, expect to make one. They expect to get control of a Broadway club building for which another club is paying, according to report, $1200 a month rent, and paying it without being able to secure a license for fighting. To show how thoroughly O'Rourke controls affairs in this line, through the influence of Sullivan, I may repeat what he said to a well-known pugilist, one of the famous sluggers, in the presence of the man who has given me information for part of this article, and who, as a newspaper reporter of sporting events, is thrown constantly with such men. O'Rourke said,

"If you don't fight in my club, you don't fight anywhere else in THE STATE!"

There is a hint of what Tammany will do should it ever get control in Albany. There are other Tammany men whose names are associated with the prize-fighting revenue system, through the aid of the Tammany Police Board, but as it is mere talk, although probably correct in every respect, there is no warrant for mentioning them.

GAMBLING STILL RESTRAINED IN PART.

There remains the gambling privilege. The Tenderloin reporters say that all sorts of games are being played. The device of forming clubs is used as a shield. Half a dozen establishments are in full operation. No one who wants to gamble need go without satisfying that want in New York. I have not been in any of these places, because they are not open as yet to the general public, and therefore I must take hearsay as to them. The word of police officials and expert reporters, however, should be sufficient for most persons.

Of course policy-playing is carried on. It was carried on during the anti-Tammany régime, because it is next to impossible to stop it. It is the invariable rule of the "policy kings," however, to make terms of peace with municipal authorities whenever possible. There is no check on this form of gambling now. I went into one of the places with a policy fiend, the other day, to see how such places were conducted. We went up a long and narrow stairs, entered a room apparently devoted to the business of plumbing, crossed a narrow hallway, and entered what looked to be an upstairs bar-room. Behind a counter that filled one end of the room sat the policy-writer. There were dream-books, and scrap-books of former drawings, and the list of lucky numbers, and there was a throng passing in and out. Policy, like the other forms of gambling, is not yet wide open, but it is fast approaching that condition. The present state of affairs could not exist without police toleration, and the fact that a Tammany leader of more than ordinary importance is associated with this business, as a sort of special partner for the time being, may account for this toleration.

Such is government under the renewed rule of Mr. Croker, the man who is eulogized as a "great leader" and as a great and upright and pure statesman. He may be all that and many of us not know it, but the first noticeable effect on officials of the renewed rule is the complete demoralization of the police. Even if they would do their full duty they dare not, because the "pull" is abroad again. They are timid and shiftless, and one effect of this is an increase of crime in other directions than in the toleration of certain kinds of vice. Only a few days ago Magistrate Cornell said from the bench:

"In all my experience as a city magistrate I never knew highway robbery so prevalent as at present. It is a disgrace to the city that a respectable man cannot walk its streets without the danger of being held up and robbed."

In the early part of 1898 New York's police force was almost in a model condition. Here and there a scamp was found at work in it. It was run almost like a business in 1898 it is in a demoralized condition, as any man with eyes to see can observe, and duty is a matter subservient to the opportunity for political plunder. In a short time it will probably be thoroughly rotten again, thus adding to Tammany's income and happiness. Even now the tip has gone around that everything must be done to elect Van Wyck Governor, because if Roosevelt is elected the power to levy tribute may be cut short. Every office-holder has not only contributed money, but he is expected to work almost to the limit of exhaustion to secure votes. This is what Tammany has done in ten months. Around and through and over and under its administration runs a branching trail of vice, corruption, filth, and extortion. The trail leads straight up to Tammany Hall, as straight and as unerringly as the magnetic needle points towards the pole. There is no other place for it to go. Along its course the money-chariot, bearing tribute, rolls. It leaves in its wake a debauched police force, and hundreds, yes, thousands of young lives—men and women—the "come-ons" in vice, the fresh supply without which the system of plunder could not exist. What cares Tammany for police discipline, what cares Tammany for the lives that are being ruined and the thousands that are yet to be ruined, so long as blood-money and tribute roll in for distribution in political work or for personal enrichment? Tammany has set its eyes on the plunder of the State capital. There are saloons all over the State. State gambling privileges should be worth something. Votes are to be controlled by contracts, and money is to be gathered in by scores of ways. Mr. Croker is de facto Mayor of New York city; Robert A. Van Wyck is de jure Mayor. Who can doubt that it is Mr. Croker's intention to become de facto Governor of New York when he succeeds in making Augustus Van Wyck de jure Governor? And who can then doubt that Croker government in New York city will be repeated in New York State affairs?

THE POLICY OF EXPANSION—CUBA AND THE PHILIPPINES.

(Continued from page 1027.)

Our foe is conquered. The strength displayed by us amazes ourselves and the world. Our victory is so complete as to compel compliance with any demands we may make in regard to Puerto Rico and the Philippines. A commission has been appointed to negotiate the terms of peace with our adversary. It seems that the President has decided to hold Puerto Rico, and the only open question now of paramount importance is the holding of the Philippines, wholly or partially. If we deflect from the path pointed out by the noble motive of humanity, and follow the road of greed and aggrandizement, what justification is there for our course?

The Jingo casuists say that, as we did not bind ourselves as to any other of Spain's possessions but Cuba, our hands are free as to them. Farther, that we must emerge from our hermit position among the nations; that we tower head and shoulders above our fellows, and should show our prowess at the moment of our triumphal entrance upon the grand stage of the world's theatre, by taking away from a foe, powerless to resist, all her possessions worth anything.

It is argued that Spanish rule is corrupt and tyrannical, that her subjects are ruined by taxation, are denied justice in the courts, and, in fine, that her possessions ought to be taken from her because she does not govern them according to our ideas. It is gravely asserted that new and unexpected responsibilities have fallen upon us by reason of the war, and to allow Spain to continue her tyrannous hold on subject peoples is contrary to justice and the eternal fitness of things.

These hollow pleas are supplemented by directing our cupidity to the prospect of gain in developing the trade of the Philippines, rich in minerals and in agricultural productions. A market for our surplus product in manufactures is claimed to flow from adding them to our domain. The expansionists claim that our traditional policy of isolation and hermitage must be abandoned; that the entangling alliances and acts against which we were warned by Washington were lullabys to sing the infant nation to sleep, lest its strength were unequal to the work of contending with the elder nations. But now look at us! The nations behold us with fear and admiration! We have crushed, as an egg-shell is crushed, one of the effete powers. Who can withstand our might? In order to see what daring power will try bloody conclusions with us, we will retain with the strong hand what the strong hand has taken.

The question therefore resolves itself into the right to hold the Philippines and the expediency and policy of holding them.

On the first point we are estopped by our own declaration and the doctrines of international law.

It is contemptible sophistry to hold that what binds us as to Cuba does not as to the Philippines.

The casus belli was the crime against civilization, committed by the Spaniards in their methods of warfare against the Cuban insurgents. We took no note of atrocities, if any existed, in Puerto Rico and the Philippines. There were none, then, beyond the ordinary misgovernment that has ever characterized Spanish rule at home and abroad for the last four centuries.

The annihilation of the Spanish fleet and the capture of Manila was a mere incident of the war. So was the surrender of Puerto Rico.

The end of the war was the expulsion of the Spaniards from Cuba, the pacification of the island, and the establishment of a free stable government there.

All else done by our ships and troops was means to accomplish the end. We have burden enough to accomplish the end.

To garrison the island, pacify the insurgents (all the remaining population being already pacified), and establish a permanent free government for all the bona fide residents of Cuba is as much work for humanity as we are called upon to perform. The tax-payers of the United States will find it a costly and a slow work.

It is now a well-recognized doctrine of international law that wars of mere conquest among civilized nations are unjustifiable. A powerful nation strong enough to defy the intelligent criticism of mankind can override all law, human and divine. But every Napoleon will, sooner or later, meet his Waterloo.

Our Jingo casuists can point out no responsibility of a moral character that we have assumed by the capture of the Philippines. We are not the Quixote of nations. We are not called upon to redress grievances and right wrongs all over the globe. If this be true, the murder of the Armenians, the woes of the Russian Jews, the oppression of the Irish, and a thousand enormities practised by the nations of the earth on defenceless subjects call on us to put on our armor and assail the perpetrators of every wrong everywhere. The Malays of the Philippines are the least worthy among all the sufferers to receive our unselfish humane assistance.

The appeal to our cupidity is without any strength. It is, however, a confession that the home-market principle of the protectionist is a failure. To carry it to perfection we must take the whole earth, especially the civilized portion of it. If the Philippines are good as a market, Europe and the white dependencies of Europe are much better. We ship ninety per cent. of our exports to the latter. Only about ten per cent. goes to Asia, Africa, South America, and the islands of the sea. If we want more and better markets of our own, according to the protective idea, we must do as the Romans did—conquer all the civilized world.

Trade flows between persons and states who have the products that each, reciprocally, desires to have. Savage and half civilized races are never, in large degree, profitable customers of civilized people.

They generally, if not universally, make all their food products. Their exports are raw materials. Their primitive and simple wants are easily supplied by a small amount of the surplus product of civilized countries.

The surplus of civilization is consumed by civilization. Our trade with the Philippines is small now. To develop it will cost infinitely more than it is or ever will be worth.

The Philippines are in the equatorial belt. They are inhabited by Malays. They are not equal now, and perhaps never will be, to our negroes.

No Southern man but knows the terrific struggle the whites went through in the reconstructed States to save their civilization and their liberties from the "humanities" of reconstruction.

No Southern man but knows the debauching effects on the whites of the methods adopted to save themselves and their civilization. No Southern man ought to view, without the gravest apprehension, the incorporation into our Union of sub-tropical countries inhabited by dark and ignorant races necessarily to be governed by force.

Who is there that wants more of Judge Lynch, more of ballot-box stuffing, and more of their necessary result—ring rule of the most tyrannous description?

To hold the Philippines perpetually as a Territory is repugnant to the genius of our institutions. Our Constitution contemplates no other than a government "of the people, by the people, and for the people." The examples of New Mexico, Arizona, and the District of Columbia are not in point to prove the contrary. The latter is governed by Congress because of the danger of placing the exercise of the elective franchise in the hands of the colored population. Do we want to multiply dangerous factors? The former have not been admitted as States because of political considerations. No Spanish-American republic is self-governed, or can be. No archipelago in the Pacific inhabited by Malays is fit for self-government, or can be made so. The talk of Americanizing a population of 13,000,000 born in and adapted to the tropics is the merest vaporing. To maintain at such a distance standing armies and satraps is a constant menace to our liberties.

The policy that has developed us from weakness to strength, from a feeble republic into one of the most powerful and formidable nations of the earth, is that of isolation.

Nature has given us the most fertile and blessed region of all of man's dwelling-places. We have what no other nations have—the iron, the coal, and the fibres. We have the waterways to convey them to the ocean, so that the whole earth may share easily in our riches.

We have the inventive, active, energetic race, that utilizes all these gifts in greater degree than any other on the planet.

We are now forging our way into the markets of our civilized brethren, and exchanging with them our handiwork. The nations stand amazed not only at our prowess in war, but at our skill in all the arts and industries of peace.

Isolation and peace have wrought the wonders of our progress. We owe nothing to aggressive war. The war of the Revolution and the war of the States afford brilliant but bloody proof of the courage of our citizen soldiery. But in peace we have learned and practised the virtues and arts that will always safeguard us from attack, and fit us to cope with our brethren throughout the earth for whatever man desires of use or ornament or luxury, mental or physical.

In isolation was planted the infant republic. In isolation it has grown and expanded and flourished beyond the dreams of its founders. In isolation is our security for the future, as it has been our glory and security in the past.

Our chief glory has been, as it always ought to be, to have the only spot on earth where freemen govern free men. Let it always be so.

Washington announced and taught the profound policy of isolation. Shall folly and vainglory plunge us into the dangerous policies and entanglements of the Old World?

To sum up, I hold that we violate our solemn declaration if we retain the Philippines, either under full sovereignty or under a protectorate.

2. That even if we violated no faith, their incorporation into the body of our territory is a step pointing directly to a central government with absolute power.

3. That no just argument can show the material gain of such an acquisition.

With much respect.

DONELSON CAFFERY.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

WYCKOFF, SEAMANS & BENEDICT,
327 Broadway, New York, N. Y.

See that Hole?

WHAT IS IT FOR?

To insert a pointed instrument and eject the pen from the holder. Prevents the ink from flowing back into the holder and soiling the fingers.

Samples on receipt of return postage. Ask for Vertical No. 37.

The perfection of pens, slightly stiff, smooth points, durable, and uniform.

SPENCERIAN PEN CO.
450 Broome St., New York, N. Y.

HELP YOURSELF

to a better position, a better salary, by securing a technical education. Our method leads to sure success. Complete courses in

ELECTRICAL ENGINEERING

Steam, Mechanical or Civil Engineering; Mathematics; Chemistry; Mining; Mechanical or Architectural Drawing; Surveying; Plumbing; Architecture; Metal Pattern Drawing; Prospecting; Book-Keeping; Shorthand; English Branches

TAUGHT BY MAIL

Circular free. State subject you wish to study. Estab. 1891. 45,000 students and graduates. The International Correspondence Schools, Box 1159 Scranton, Pa.

$2.0 a Mon

HON. JOHN D. LONG, Secretary of the Navy, will tell the thrilling story of our torpedo-boat service in an early issue of the 1899 volume of

The Youth's Companion

Those who send $1.75 at once for the 1899 volume will receive FREE all the issues for the remaining weeks of 1898, containing stories by Rudyard Kipling, W. D. Howells, Mary E. Wilkins, and others. The 52 issues of the new year will be of rare variety and charm. These are a few of the

...Good Stories for 1899...

For Life and Liberty, Henry M. Stanley.
A Boy's Fox-Yard, John B. Dunn.
Police Spies in Russia, Poultney Bigelow.
How I Went to the Mines, Bret Harte.
An Esoteric Pig, Florence Converse.
A Pocketful of Money, W. D. Howells.
The Russian Crusoes, Gen. A. W. Greely.
Fifty Years with a Menagerie, Dan Rice.
In the South, T. Nelson Page.
A Night in a Box Car, Hayden Carruth.

The Companion Calendar Free..

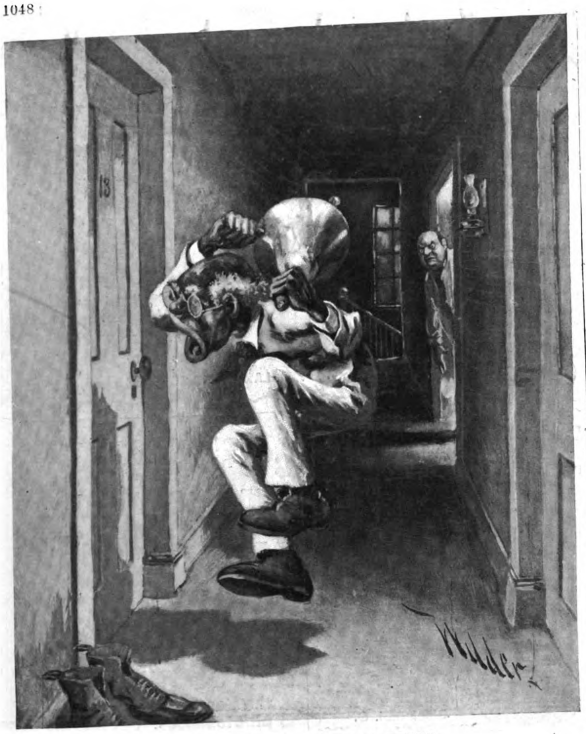
New subscribers who will send $1.75 at once, inclosing this slip or mentioning this paper, will receive THE COMPANION every week from the date of subscription until Jan., 1900, including:
FREE—All the remaining issues of 1898, inclusive of the beautiful Double Holiday Numbers.
FREE—The exquisite Companion Calendar, lithographed in 12 colors, suitable for the prettiest corner in the house.
And THE COMPANION for the 52 weeks of 1899—a library in itself.



E178

Illustrated Announcement and Sample Copies sent on request.

THE YOUTH'S COMPANION, 201 Columbus Ave., Boston, Mass.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, $4 00 a Year. BAZAR, $4 00 a Year.
WEEKLY, 4 00 a Year. LITERATURE, 4 00 a Year.
ROUND TABLE, $1 00 a Year.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

WORKING HARD AT HIS CALLING.

Armour's Extract of Beef

"has that rich, beefy flavor."

For preparing soups, sauces, gravies, etc. "Culinary Wrinkles" gives many ways of using Extract. It's mailed free for the asking.

ARMOUR'S CONCENTRATED TABLETS of BEEF EXTRACT and VEGETABLES—condensed food—for home use or travelers—Sample Box containing sufficient for three meals, free, for a two cent stamp and your dealer's name.

Actual size of Tablet.

Address ARMOUR & COMPANY, CHICAGO.

GUESS with Whom is Mrs. Dewey Playing —a Lady or a Gentleman?

Miss J. Curtis, Chicago, wrote: "How Dewey know?" We answered, "Dewey not know by 'ad' in McClure's Magazine October or by writing Archarena Co., Peoria, Ill., who send free Souvenir Picture Answer and description of the Greatest Parlor Game Board."

Cherry Finish—Ten Games on the No. 2 Archarena Combination Board with Net Pockets and Carrom Rings.

The lady is playing the Pocket Carrom Game. Ten Pins is played by using our cushion back, and on the reverse side of this board you can play Croklnole and Archarena.

T. M. JEFFORDS, Prin. Public Schools, Winchester, Ill., writes: "Sirs:—The Archarena Combination Board, which I purchased of you has given us more satisfaction than any other game we ever had."

YES, You Can Entertain an Evening Party on this Game Board by having 3 or 6 persons on each side and taking turns of shooting the Red Man from wherever it stops (on Carrom Pocket side)—or all the family can have a social game.

No. 1 Board, 4 Games, $2.50 Satisfaction Guaranteed.
No. 2 Board, 10 Games, $3.50 Express paid east of Omaha.

Have your dealer show it or write for Rules and Answer to Guess, also special price to neighborhood clubs.

ARCHARENA CO., Manufacturers, Peoria, Ill.

The odor left by a highly scented toilet soap is not agreeable to most people of refined tastes.

A delicate perfume may be used after an Ivory Soap bath with much more pleasing effect.

Ivory Soap leaves only a comfortable feeling of perfect cleanliness.

Copyright, 1896, by The Procter & Gamble Co., Cincinnati.

THE HAIR 27th Ed., 25c. (or stamps). Why it Falls Off, Turns Grey, and the Remedy. By Prof. HARLEY PARKER. A. N. LONG & CO., 1013 Arch St., Phila., Pa. "Every one should read this little book."—Athenæum.

EARL & WILSON'S LINEN COLLARS & CUFFS BEST IN THE WORLD

GETTYSBURG, LURAY, WASHINGTON.

Personally-Conducted Tour via Pennsylvania Railroad.

Over the battlefield of Gettysburg, through the picturesque Blue Mountains, via Hagerstown and Antietam, and down the beautiful and historic Shenandoah Valley to the unique Caverns of Luray; thence across the rolling hills of Northern Virginia to Washington, is the route of this tour—a section of the country intensely interesting from both an historic and a scenic standpoint.

The tour will leave New York 8.20 A. M., and Philadelphia 12.20 P. M., Tuesday, November 1, in charge of one of the company's tourists' agents, and will cover a period of five days. An experienced chaperon, whose especial charge will be unescorted ladies, will accompany the trip throughout. Round-trip tickets, covering all necessary expenses during the entire time absent, will be sold at the extremely low rate of $25 from New York, $24 from Trenton, $22 from Philadelphia, and proportionate rates from other points.

For itineraries and full information apply to ticket agents, Tourist Agent, 1196 Broadway, New York; 789 Broad Street, Newark, N. J.; or address Geo. W. Boyd, Assistant General Passenger Agent, Broad Street Station, Philadelphia.

Nathan B. Goodnow & Co.,

BANKERS.

ESTABLISHED 1873.

2 Post Office Sq., Boston, Mass.

Transact a General Banking Business, including the Purchase and Sale of Stocks, Bonds, and Grain, for Investment or on Margin.

Dealers in Government and Railroad Bonds.

Books containing Four-Year Range of Prices, Dividends, and Earnings sent free on request.

A Permanently Invested Fund of over TWO HUNDRED AND TWENTY-FOUR THOUSAND DOLLARS is held as a Guaranteed Security for all persons having business with us.

Correspondence solicited.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS

MAGAZINE, $4 00 a year
WEEKLY, $4 00 a year
BAZAR, $4 00 a year
LITERATURE, $4 00 a year
ROUND TABLE, $1 00 a year

1831 Sixty-Ninth Year. 1899

THE

Country Gentleman

The ONLY Agricultural NEWSpaper.

INDISPENSABLE TO

ALL COUNTRY RESIDENTS

WHO WISH TO

KEEP UP WITH THE TIMES.

Single Subscription, $2;
Two Subscriptions, $3.50;
Four Subscriptions, $6.

SPECIAL INDUCEMENTS TO RAISERS OF LARGER CLUBS.
Write for Particulars on this Point.

Free till Jan. 1 to New Subscribers for 1899.

It will be seen that the difference between the cost of the COUNTRY GENTLEMAN and that of other agricultural weeklies (none of which even attempts to cover the agricultural news of the day) may readily be reduced, by making up a small Club, to

Less than a Cent a Week!

Does such a difference as that justify you in contenting yourself with some other paper instead of having the best?

SEND FOR SPECIMEN COPIES,

Which will be mailed Free, and compare them with any other rural weekly; it will not take long to see the difference. Address

LUTHER TUCKER & SON,
ALBANY, N. Y.

REDUCED RATES TO PHILADELPHIA VIA PENNSYLVANIA RAILROAD, ACCOUNT PEACE JUBILEE.

For the grand Peace Jubilee at Philadelphia, October 26 and 27, the Pennsylvania Railroad Company will sell excursion tickets from all ticket stations on its line, to Philadelphia, at rate of single fare for the round trip (minimum rate, 25 cents). Tickets will be sold and good, going, October 24 to 27, and returning, leaving Philadelphia to October 31, inclusive.

This jubilee will be one of the greatest events in the history of Philadelphia. The rededication of Independence Hall, recently restored; the unveiling of the Grant Equestrian Monument, Fairmount Park; a monster civic and industrial parade, and a grand military and naval pageant, led by General Miles and other distinguished heroes of the late war, will be prominent features. The President and his Cabinet are also expected to be present.

Esterbrook's Pens Triumphant.

IN SIGNING THE PEACE PROTOCOL

Secretary Day used our

No. 048 Falcon

And Ambassador Cambon our

No. 313 Probate

We manufacture 150 other styles. Ask your Stationer for them.

The Esterbrook Steel Pen Co., Works, Camden, N. J. 26 John St., New York.

MOST PERFECT BLOCK SIGNALS ON THE NEW YORK CENTRAL.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

HARPER'S WEEKLY

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. XLII.—NO. 2184.

Copyright, 1898, by HARPER & BROTHERS.
All Rights Reserved.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 29, 1898.

TEN CENTS A COPY.
FOUR DOLLARS A YEAR.

IN A PUERTO RICAN PRISON.

SHOWING SPANISH PRISONERS AND A FEW AMERICAN "MISCONDUCTS."

ONE OF THE DIFFICULT PROBLEMS CONFRONTING THE UNITED STATES IN ITS ADMINISTRATION OF ITS NEW POSSESSIONS.

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

HARPER'S WEEKLY

(TWENTY-FOUR PAGES)

NEW YORK CITY, OCTOBER 29, 1898

Terms: 10 Cents a Copy—$4 00 a Year, in Advance

Postage free to all Subscribers in the United States, Canada, and Mexico

Subscriptions may begin with any Number

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS

New York City: Franklin Square

London: 45 Albemarle Street, W.

Also for sale at Brentano's, 37 Avenue de l'Opéra, Paris

IT will be regrettable if the silver Democrats of this State do not finally succeed in getting their ticket printed on the official ballot. It is charged that the necessary petitions to that end were not filed because one of them was destroyed in the office of DAVID B. HILL. It is decidedly for the interests of the cause of sound money that the full silver vote of this State should be polled. Nothing could more seriously disconcert the politicians who now believe in the cause of free silver.

MR. CROKER denounces the article by MR. FRANKLIN MATTHEWS on "'Wide-Open' New York," which appeared in the last issue of HARPER'S WEEKLY, as "absolutely false in every particular." Now there are several particulars in which every one knows it is not false. The first is that Tammany rules the city; the second is that CROKER rules Tammany; the third is that New York is wide open. These facts being known, as they are, Mr. CROKER will find it difficult to make people believe that the purveyors of vice are not paying for the privilege of violating the law, and that this state of affairs is not made possible by his rule.

WE have spoken elsewhere of the difficulty of determining Mr. MCKINLEY'S position on the expansion policy from his speeches in the West; but he made a speech at a dinner in Chicago on Wednesday night of last week in which he used this sentence:

> The war with Spain was undertaken not that the United States should increase its territory, but that the oppression at our very door should cease. This noble sentiment must continue to animate us, and we must give to the world full demonstration of the sincerity of our purpose.

The expansionists have not received a more direct repulse than this. The President in these words has pronounced against them, and has declared that the nation will be dishonored by the adoption of their views.

Mr. ROOSEVELT declares that a vote against him will be a vote against expansion. People who wish to vote for Mr. ROOSEVELT on rational grounds need not be disturbed by this. Their votes will not count for expansion, but in favor of an honest State administration and an independent judiciary.

THE Republican party and the sound-money Democrats both should rejoice in the fact that the National Democratic organization is to be maintained. The national committee of the party has issued an address announcing that they propose that the party which nominated PALMER and BUCKNER in 1896 shall remain a political organization for the purpose of combating the free silver heresy, and for maintaining the effort to secure freer trade. Such an organization is absolutely essential as a refuge for those who cannot accept either Bryanism or Dingleyism.

WE do not know exactly, from his speeches made during his tour through the West, whether or not Mr. MCKINLEY has come to the conclusion that we must take all the Philippines. In his general terms he often used phrases that are employed by the expansionists. He talked about the "fruits of our conquest" as if they imposed some obligations upon us that did not exist before the war, and as if we were bound to extend the blessings of humanity wherever we thought they were lacking. There is room to hope, however, that he has not yet become an expansionist; and in this, if the hope is justified, we are quite sure that he will be sustained by public opinion, if time is given public opinion to form itself definitely on this subject. We are sure, in other words, that the drift of public opinion is against the taking of the Philippines, and we are glad to see that the Peace Commissioners at Paris are denying that we intend to exercise sovereignty in Cuba. This looks as if it were the intention of the administration to keep the promise of the declaration of war, and therefore it is much more significant than the general expressions of the President, who naturally desires to avoid committing himself on a grave issue during a friendly call at the Trans-Mississippi Exposition at Omaha, and at other places on his route.

MAJOR MARCHAND and his five companions are, it is said, at Fashoda still. What they are doing there is not very clear, but the fact that they have not taken their passage by a Nile boat for Cairo appears to give much satisfaction to the Parisian press, which clings to the hope that they will not only be brought down, free of expense, by Great Britain, but that she will be prepared to pay something to get rid of them. French sentiment on most questions where the honor of the nation is concerned is an article so fearfully and wonderfully made that few of its developments need surprise anybody, but this open chaffering for a trifle in hand, as a salve to the honor of France, has something about it almost too suggestive of the shop. The precedent, however, is a thoroughly bad one, and we cannot but hope that Lord SALISBURY, under the threat of the national displeasure of Great Britain, will stand to his original and common-sense position in the matter. Put into plain English, the MARCHAND expedition was one of two things; either it was an exploration for purposes of science, like STANLEY'S—and in that case it can have no political significance whatever—or it was a deliberately planned filibustering expedition, aimed at secretly getting possession of territory claimed by Egypt, and at the very time in process of being forcibly reand at the very time claimed on her behalf by England. Where the honor of France comes in seems more of a conundrum than a question of state.

IT would almost seem as if something was about to come of the concert of Europe at last. The Turkish soldiers, after one more little playful exhibition of their propensity for killing people in Crete, are about to go. It was time; but then it has been universally admitted by everybody, except the Turks themselves and the Emperor WILLIAM, to be sure, that it was time years ago. It was perhaps fortunate that on this last occasion they made the mistake of murdering a British consular officer and shooting several British marines. England might go a long way in condoning little things like killing Cretans who chanced to be Christians, but to put a bullet into a British subject is a very different matter, and if he chanced to be a consular official in addition, something was bound to be done, whether the concert of Europe was agreeable or not. It is possible that, after all, this Cretan business may lead to some good results apart from anything it does to improve the condition of the Cretans themselves. If it only convinces European diplomatists that they have not yet reached the height of civilization necessary to bring about any effective concert whatever, it will have assisted in getting rid of one of the most remarkable shams which has disgraced modern civilization. Had England had the good sense to take the bull by the horns two years ago, and to insist on the withdrawal of the Turks from the island in favor of such a government as the Cretans might select, it is pretty safe to say that she would have come out of the matter with more credit and probably with no more expense than she has to-day.

THE election of THEODORE ROOSEVELT to the Governorship of the State of New York ought to be desired, it seems to us, by all good citizens. We have nothing to urge against Mr. VAN WYCK personally, except that he is willing to take a nomination from RICHARD CROKER, and is presumably willing to act as CROKER commands should the people elect him to the Governorship. It may be answered that PLATT is as much a boss as CROKER, and as bad a one. Perhaps he is; but just at present he is not so dangerous, because he has not yet had the temerity to try to bring the judiciary of the State under the rule of the machine. The judiciary is now the sole resort of honest people, and good men ought to fight for the maintenance of its integrity. Besides, Mr. ROOSEVELT is not only an honest man, but he promises in his speeches to administer the affairs of the State without regard to party or bosses, and to give us good government so far as it is in the power of the chief magistrate of the State to control its executive and administrative business. Mr. ROOSEVELT will pursue canal thieves quite as vigorously as VAN WYCK, and will endeavor to secure their punishment, if he finds them guilty, with quite as little consideration for the fact that they may be Republicans. What we want at the head of the affairs of this State is an honest and intelligent executive, and that we know Mr. ROOSEVELT to be. We are not supporting him because he was a Rough Rider, or because he went to the war at all, or because he has notions about expansion, which we regard as infantile, but because, notwithstanding this last serious blemish upon his character as a public man, we believe that the affairs of the State will be not only honestly but intelligently administered by him, because he knows what the State needs, and not only knows a thief when he sees him, but hates him because he is a thief.

GOVERNOR TANNER of Illinois is the product of political conditions that are becoming too prevalent in this country. A few years ago no existing machine in the Middle West, except possibly Ohio, would have dared to nominate such a man as TANNER for a great political office. Now he is actually Governor of one of the largest States in the Union. Whether he be corrupt or not, he is the product of corrupt conditions; and that he is ignorant and lawless are facts known to the world. Under the law the mine-owners at Virden had a perfect right to find their labor where they could. They may have been oppressive and unjust to their employees, but that is not a question which the Governor of the State had a right to determine or to act upon. The men who were employed and came to operate the mines have the right to be treated as citizens wherever they go in this country, because the Constitution of the United States declares that they, being citizens of Alabama, shall have the right of citizenship everywhere. The owners of the mines had the right to call upon the Governor to protect their property against violence, and the negroes who went to Illinois for employment had the right to demand from him protection for their lives and persons. He announced that he would not protect the property of the mine-owners, and that he would not permit the negroes to enter the State for the purpose of finding employment. In doing so he defied the Constitution and laws of the country, he violated the laws of his own State, and he broke his oath of office. He is not only a disgrace to American politics and to the high position which he holds, but to American citizenship. Similar, if not so grave, political conditions as those which produced TANNER in Illinois exist in other States. The efforts of good men throughout the country for some years have been directed to putting an end to this state of things by educating the people to a comprehension of its evils and by arousing the public conscience. Our expansionists call these things "parochial politics," but whether they are parochial or not they are essential to our comfort, to our credit in the world, and now at last they have been shown to be essential to the preservation of our institutions.

SPAIN holds out for the assumption of her Cuban debt by the United States, and is rather more inclined to insist on money relief than on the retention of territory, if the reports in the daily newspapers from Paris are to be credited. The debt was largely incurred by Spain for the purpose of putting down the insurrection against her rule in the island. If the United States is intervening simply to relieve the island from her rule, there is no reason in the world why we should repay the debt which has been incurred in aid of the oppressions which Spain has practised, and which have resulted in her final overthrow. If it were clear to the minds of Europe that our intervention was purely in the interest of the Cubans, Spain would not have a friend on the continent in support of her contention that we should assume her own obligations, and we are glad to see that the commissioners are so far fulfilling the promise made in our declaration of war that it was not to be a war of conquest as to insist that the United States does not propose to exercise sovereignty over Cuba. But the suspicion heretofore entertained that we intend to keep the island gave some support to the claim which the Spanish commissioners have made. The claim cannot possibly be complied with. If we finally keep the island it must be on the ground that the Cubans cannot establish a proper government, and therefore that we are forced to assume the task for which they are not prepared. We certainly have not incurred the horrors and hardships of war for the purpose of buying Cuba, and it is preposterous for Spain and her friends to assume that her defeat will relieve her from meeting obligations which are due from her to those who were foolish enough to lend her money to carry on a hopeless war. She incurred the obligations in aid of her effort to conquer Cuba, and she cannot ask us to assume them as a part of the responsibilities of sovereignty, since, when they were incurred, the sovereignty clearly rested in her. If her commissioners could succeed in extracting a promise from the United States

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google government of the payment of the public debt, her defeat would turn out to be a very profitable one for her; for our retention of the island would not only relieve her of a debt, but would save her a large annual sum, the revenues that she has received from the island of late being considerably less than the government has cost her.

THE PROBLEMS OF THE INTER-OCEANIC CANAL.

ONE of the national projects of the immediate future which may be regarded as reasonably certain is the construction of a ship-canal through Central America. A large number of the State conventions of both parties have inserted in their platforms declarations in favor of this work, and have announced that the general government ought to undertake it. The importance of the project cannot be overestimated. The commerce of the Gulf States and of the Pacific coast would be especially benefited, while, in view of our new national responsibilities in the Pacific, it is eminently wise that we should see to it that a shorter passage be established for our vessels of war between the Atlantic and Pacific seaboards. The long and anxious voyage of the Oregon is properly pointed to as a warning against the continuation of existing physical conditions if these conditions can be bettered.

We have heretofore been of the opinion that national money aid to the canal enterprise would be of doubtful propriety—perhaps of doubtful constitutionality. So long as the canal was proposed merely in the interests of commerce, and so long as the government was approached on the plea that its investment in the stock of a canal company, or its guarantee of the bonds of the corporation, would be safe and might be profitable, the inevitable answer was that if the plea were true, private capital would undoubtedly build the canal, and would build it cheaper and manage it more economically and efficiently than the government would. Moreover, we are opposed in this as in other efforts to the practice of wringing money from the taxpayers for the profit of private citizens. But the question becomes different, as many questions will become, now that we are a colonial power, already possessing Hawaii, which vastly weakens us by the extension of our frontier, and by the pushing of it into a region remote from our mainland, where hostilities are always imminent. We are now much more vulnerable than we were a year ago, as Admiral COLOMB has already pointed out in the North American Review; and since we have thus exposed ourselves and rendered necessary the maintenance of a more formidable fleet than we have hitherto needed, we must assume other charges; and, among other things, we must probably pay, in whole or in part, for the construction of an interoceanic canal.

Hitherto it has been assumed that the only practicable route for a canal was across Nicaragua. The French had undertaken to build a canal at Panama, but had retired, baffled by the tumultuous Chagres River, the unhappy experiment producing a crop of scandals affecting French public men which made even the corruptions of the Second Empire hang their diminished heads. Nicaragua was not only thought to be the most practicable route, but concessions had been granted by the government of Nicaragua, and eminent statesmen and ex-statesmen of our own country had embarked in the project, and had expended large sums of money in preliminary work. Quite as important as any other consideration was the fact that under the CLAYTON-BULWER treaty this country and England had guaranteed the neutrality of the canal. It is true that our own Jingoes are now reviving an old contention, and are insisting that the treaty has become void by reason of Great Britain's breach of one of its provisions, but it is sincerely to be hoped, if a waterway is built, that it will be treated as part of the high seas.

While it is true that it has been assumed that the Nicaragua route is the one to be adopted, no satisfactory report has yet been made on the engineering problems involved, or as to the cost of the work, or, generally, as to the promise of the undertaking, or the possibility of maintaining the canal after completion at a reasonable cost. The enterprise is more or less involved in mystery, some of which may be cleared up by the forth-coming report of the WALKER commission; although, from the views expressed by members of it before the Senate select committee last June, some of the serious problems which presented themselves to the LUDLOW commission, whose report was distinctly unfavorable to the Nicaragua project, are still considered grave, and no solution of them has occurred to the new commission. After many years of investigation, including surveys by many different engineers and commissions, it is still uncertain if the canal can be constructed and properly maintained at a cost which would make it economically possible. All estimates as to the cost of the work are untrustworthy, expert opinion—or rather guessing—ranging from $100,000,000 to an indefinite but very much larger sum. Certainly if Congress is to authorize the expenditure of millions of the public moneys on this project it can only be after still further investigation, and a much more definite report and set of estimates than have yet been made.

To add to the confusion of mind, or to increase the already existing doubt as to the advisability of the Nicaragua route, now comes General HENRY L. ABBOT, one of the recognized authorities of the engineer corps of the army. In association with a number of engineers—French, German, English, and American, including the chief engineers of the Manchester and Kiel ship-canals—General ABBOT last spring visited the Panama Canal route, and he has come to the conclusion that this route is not only practicable, but that it is much the better of the two. He says that his judgment is "in some degree assisted by having formerly traversed Nicaragua." Not only does he think that the route is practicable and best, but he and his associates of the technical commission have made a plan for the completion of the canal. The revival of this old route as a practicable one will astonish a good many persons who have supposed that Panama was abandoned when the French government dropped it. But it seems that a company was formed in 1894, which has since been pushing the work of investigation, and is ready to complete the work, the result of the investigation being that its engineers believe that they have solved the problem which baffled DE LESSEPS and his predecessors.

In brief, the great problems of the Chagres River and of the climate have been theoretically, at least, overcome. The old plan of building the canal along the bed of the torrential stream which has already swept away so much human labor has been abandoned, and General ABBOT says that the stream is to be mastered by a perfectly practicable series of locks. This route possesses a decided advantage in two deep-water harbors at the termini of the canal, and in the railroad which runs alongside it for its whole length. On the Nicaragua route it will be necessary to build about one hundred and twenty miles of railway, mostly through a wilderness. Besides, two ports at the termini must be constructed; and the experiment in making an artificial harbor at Greytown has not been successful.

This is what General ABBOT says of the Nicaragua route:

> About 120 miles of railroad must be built, mostly traversing a wilderness. Almost nothing has been done in the way of construction or of preparation for the work. Of the whole length of 176 miles, 68 miles follow the bed of a crooked river, where the prevailing trade-winds and the currents resulting from the whole outflow of Lake Nicaragua will unite to aggravate the difficulties of shipping in transit. The length of the route is about four times that of the Panama Canal, adding proportionately to the time of passage. Finally, at least one dam is demanded, quite without precedent in our canal construction, besides several miles of huge embankments in the San Francisco basin, where the foundations are extremely bad, and where a rupture at any future time would entail veritable disasters.

He adds that the annual rainfall in Panama is much less than in Nicaragua, being 93 inches as against 256 inches, and concludes that—

> To the general relative merits of the two canals already considered must be added that the Panama route lies in the interior of Colombia, while that by Nicaragua lies near the Costa-Rican boundary, where hostilities are liable at any time to cause difficulties, as they already have done during the canal examination by the WALKER commission last spring. Also, that in respect to danger from possible earthquakes, which might easily cause trouble at the great locks, Panama is by far the more safe, because no active volcano is found within a distance of at least 200 miles from it, while three lie in the close vicinity of the route of the Nicaragua Canal, and one within only 40 miles of its western locks. Last April an earthquake destroyed substantial masonry buildings at Leon, only 100 miles distant from these lock sites.

The cost of the Panama Canal is stated by General ABBOT to be, in round numbers, $100,000,000, and he appropriately suggests that—> before the government embarks on so important a work that the relative merits of the two routes will be examined and judged by a commission of expert engineers, for it is certain that only one canal is now needed, and that that one should be the best possible.

Certainly whatever is done in this direction ought to be done on the report of experts, and if Congress is really going to "rise to its new responsibilities," it cannot better prove it than by modestly retiring while engineers solve the problem of the relative merits of the two routes.

THE BOSS AND THE BENCH.

THERE is a salutary restriction placed upon the power of the bosses by the nature of things, which is expressed in the ancient saying that whom the gods wish to destroy they first make mad. Because a man who has secured possession of the political machine can commit with impunity many outrages and many infamies, he comes to think that there is no outrage and no infamy that he cannot commit with impunity. The day comes when he goes a step too far, when the public indignation which he has so often braved takes at last effective form, and he is overthrown.

Mr. RICHARD CROKER, the Tammany boss, is now trying an interesting and, for himself, a dangerous experiment upon the public patience. Tammany has not yet been in full power for a year, but it has already become as defiant of decency as when it was hurled out of power in consequence of the disclosures of the LEXOW committee. Mr. MATTHEWS'S detailed exposition of "'Wide-Open' New York," in the last number of the WEEKLY, shows that already Tammany is behaving with as cynical an impudence as if it had been intrenched in unchallenged power for a decade. The good work done by Mr. ROOSEVELT and his associates in the purification of the police has been all but undone already. The very appointment of the smirched DEVERY to be Chief of Police was accepted, as without doubt it was intended, as a notification to the force that the reign of merit was over and the reign of favor had been renewed. Vice and crime were no longer to be regarded as objects of an uncompromising prosecution, but as sources of revenue that had been for a time overlooked. Law-breakers, of all varieties, were not to be suppressed, as who should kill the goose that laid the golden eggs, but to be privately taxed for "all the traffic would bear." The tributary streams that had for a time been obstructed were to begin again to flow to the boss, irrigating the intermediaries on their way. The government of the city was to be again a compact between the payer and the receivers of blackmail, between men ready to pay bribes to break the law and perjured wretches sworn to enforce the law and banded to take bribes to allow it to be broken.

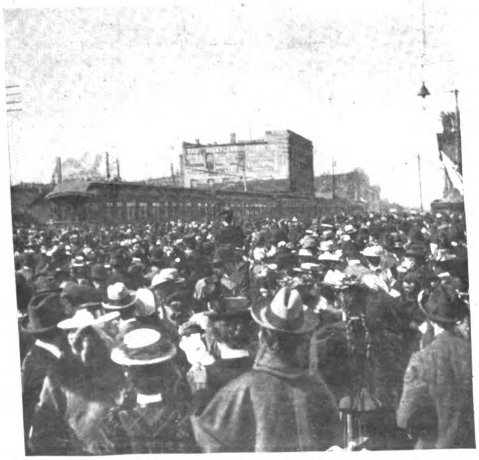
This is once more the municipal government of New York. Mr. MATTHEWS has shown us how it works. Already, after only ten months, things are ripe for another PARKHURST and another LEXOW. But it is at this juncture that the Tammany boss thinks it safe to make a still more daring attempt upon the public patience than the licensing of vice and crime. He thinks he can punish, by refusing him a renomination, a judge of his own party, whose party loyalty and whose judicial fitness are alike unquestioned, but who has refused to take the orders of the boss in the discharge of his official duties. With incredible insolence, CROKER has actually given this explanation of his refusal to renominate Judge DALY to a committee of the Bar Association which called upon him to urge the renomination! The action by which Judge DALY incurred his displeasure was a refusal to discharge an officer of the court to make room for a tool of CROKER'S. But of course it might equally have been a refusal to make a decision to CROKER'S order.

We repeat that this is a dangerous experiment. It ought to be a fatal experiment. For the people —even "the plain people"—are alive to the necessity of an honest and independent judiciary. They now have notice that before nominating candidates for the bench CROKER has satisfied himself that they will not be too honest or too independent to do his bidding. In attacking the independence of the judiciary he has laid his dirty hands upon what all Americans regard as the ark of the covenant. The experiment he is trying has been tried by another boss—another Democratic boss, another boss in this State. DAVID B. HILL is a man of much better education than CROKER, and is himself a lawyer. These facts made his attempt to prostitute the judiciary at once less excusable and more surprising than the present attempt made by a man who attaches no more sanctity to the administration of justice than to the business of squeezing the pool-sellers. HILL insisted upon nominating a man who had shown himself unfit to be a judge, while CROKER insists upon "turning down" a man who has shown his fitness to be a judge, among other ways, by refusing to submit to CROKER'S dictation. In 1893 HILL was quite as clearly the Democratic boss in the State as CROKER now is in the city. He felt so sure of victory that he made sure his ticket could carry MAYNARD. He was mistaken about MAYNARD to the extent of 100,000 votes, and MAYNARD dragged the rest of the ticket with him. It remains to be seen whether CROKER has not also reckoned without his host in assuming that he is strong enough to defy all decency.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

The President and Ex-Governor Stone.

ST. LOUIS, OCTOBER 14—PROCESSION ARRIVING AT SOUTHERN HOTEL.



ST. LOUIS—CROWD WAITING FOR THE PRESIDENT AT FOREST PARK.

OMAHA, OCTOBER 12—GENERAL MILES ON THE SPEAKERS' PLATFORM.

KOREAN MINISTER WAITING FOR HIS CARRIAGE AT THE OMAHA CLUB.

PRESIDENT'S TRAIN LEAVING CEDAR RAPIDS, IOWA.

THE PRESIDENT SHAKING HANDS AFTER A SPEECH.

THE PRESIDENT'S WESTERN TRIP—SCENES ALONG THE ROUTE.

Photographs by George G. Bain, Special Correspondent of "Harper's Weekly" with the President's Party.—[See Page 1054.]

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THE PRESIDENT DELIVERING HIS ADDRESS AT THE EXPOSITION-GROUNDS.

THE GREAT CROWD THAT GATHERED TO LISTEN TO THE PRESIDENT'S ADDRESS.

PRESIDENT McKINLEY'S VISIT TO THE TRANS-MISSISSIPPI EXPOSITION AT OMAHA, OCTOBER 12, 1898.

PHOTOGRAPHS BY RINEHART.—[SEE PAGE 1054.]

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THE PRESIDENT AT OMAHA.

PRESIDENT MCKINLEY, members of his cabinet, the general of the army, and other distinguished guests spent the day of October 12 at the Trans-Mississippi Exposition. The event was colored with the enthusiasm which always greets a President in large assemblages, regardless of his personality. Probably there was an increased fervor due to Mr. McKinley's personal popularity; and the spectacular in the presence of General Miles with his staff, all in uniform, added much to the pleasure of the thousands who were drawn to Omaha by the event.

Two things were conspicuous in the reception of the President—the orderliness of the arrangements for his entertainment and the good-humor of the crowds that greeted him. Every feature of the programme went smoothly and without delay. The President was not overwhelmed by the rush of curious people at any point in the course of the entertainment. The eagerness of the throng to get near to him never passed reasonable bounds. If it had any disposition to do so it would have been held in check by the line of Nebraska volunteers stationed on each side of the route which his carriage followed.

Ninety-eight thousand people greeted the President at Omaha, composed chiefly of the agricultural population of the vicinage. The city people of Omaha had as much difficulty to see their distinguished visitor as the strangers within their gates, for the number of these made travel to the exposition-grounds by any sort of conveyance extremely difficult.

It was said by one of those who witnessed the entire programme that there were five acres of people at Omaha, and that only one acre of them saw the President. This was probably true of the occasion when he delivered a formal address from the platform on the East Midway; but it is not likely that many of the visitors failed of an opportunity to see him as he passed through the city or while he was seated on one or other of the stands from which he spoke or viewed the exercises in his honor. The occasions thus offered were made exceptionally good by the location of the stands. For the night parade of Tuesday, which followed the President's arrival, a platform had been built in front of the City Hall.

The sloping ascent about the great Court House building opposite was covered with spectators as closely as they could be packed together, and the windows and cornices were filled. Below, the street was crowded with a great throng.

The first feature of the President's entertainment at Omaha was the parade of Ak-Sar-Ben, a Western development of the Mardi-gras parades in the South. St. Louis was the first city to transplant the Mardi-gras festivities to Northern soil, and now every city of the West and Northwest has its fall festival and parade. That of Omaha is not deficient in merit and interest. Coupled with it on the night of the President's arrival was an electric parade, in which the floats were brilliant with incandescent lights. The President did not wait to see the electric floats, and the gods and goddesses of mythology looked for him in vain from their eminences. He had withdrawn to his carriage and gone to his quarters in the Omaha Club House. Here, with the members of his party, he was established in rooms especially fitted for his accommodation, and here he spent presumably a restful night.

From the club on the following morning he was taken in an open carriage, under the escort of President Wattles of the exposition, to the exposition-grounds. The scene in the club-house that morning was bright with color and brilliant with gold lace. The Chinese and Korean ministers and their families, clad in the many-hued silks of their native costumes, gave the needed touch of color to the assemblage, and the brass buttons and gold lace of General Miles and his staff made the scene brighter. There were women in gay costumes, too, with flowers in their hands. Officially the party was one of the most distinguished that ever gathered in a Western city. Of the President's official family there were present Secretary Gage of the Treasury, Secretary Bliss of the Interior Department, Postmaster-General Charles Emory Smith, and the Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. Wilson. Mr. Gage and Mr. Smith were accompanied by their wives; Mr. Wilson by his daughter. Mrs. McKinley was not able to accompany the President, because of a domestic affliction. Of the less important officials of the administration there were present the Assistant Secretary of War, the Commissioner of Education, the chief of the Weather Bureau, and the chief of the Signal Corps of the army, General Greely. In the diplomatic party were the minister of the Argentine Republic and the secretary of the Cuban legation. Senators Thurston and Allen, Governor Holcomb, ex-Governor Saunders, and ex-Senator Manderson were of the receiving party.

At the exposition-grounds the President went directly to the stand from which he was to deliver an address. The crowd extended on each side almost to the limit of the wide space. In front it stretched in unbroken mass to the two buildings on each side of the viaduct, and to the summit of that bridge which connects the Midway with the large court of the exposition.

When the address of the President was finished, the Postmaster-General spoke for a few minutes. Then, one after another, the distinguished members of the party were introduced, and each was greeted with a good-natured cheer.

The incidents of the reception that followed the speech-making in quick succession were a luncheon, a circuit of the exhibition buildings, a view of the Indian Congress and sham battle, a dinner, a drive around the illuminated court, and an exhibition of fireworks.

To the visitors from the East the exposition inevitably suggested the World's Fair. But it was a subject of wonder with them that in this remote city of the West an exhibition could have been created which would bear comparison so favorably with that stupendous show. In one feature they found it unique, and that feature was probably the most interesting in the experience of the President. No one of the line of "Great Fathers" who have seen the gradual hemming in of the American Indian on Western soil has ever witnessed such an assemblage as Mr. Rosewater had brought together, with the aid of Congress and a $40,000 appropriation, to form the crowning glory of the Omaha show.

The Indians were deeply interested in the meeting. They had put in a request that the President would shake hands with them. But 600 hands were more than the President had time to grasp, so he compromised by taking off his hat and bowing to each of the delegations from the thirty tribes as they marched forward and saluted him. A more pronounced greeting met Geronimo, as the old warrior dashed forward on his pony, and removing the horned cap from his head, bowed with a grim smile to the chief of the white men. When the sham battle was concluded the President walked down the line of Indians, hat in hand, bowing and smiling.

The President's visit was the climax of the Omaha Exhibition. It saw the richest fruition of many months of labor, whose results have been successful beyond all expectation. In the face of unfavorable conditions created by the war, Major Clarkson, the secretary of the exposition, told me the treasury at the time of the President's visit contained $185,000, and there were no debts. On only three days had the gate receipts failed to meet the expenses of the show. Every bill had been paid when due, and the prospects were fair for a refund of the entire sum advanced by the stockholders.

As to the effect of the show on Omaha, Mr. Hitchcock, the editor of the World-Herald, who is the fusion candidate for Congress, said that it had recreated the city. It was a desperate resort of a community threatened with bankruptcy, and its result has been the stimulation of trade, the lifting of mortgages, an increase in the active population of the city, and the encouragement of enterprise which since the "boom" days has met with an inadequate reward. All this has been due, in large measure, to the untiring efforts of President Wattles and Secretary Clarkson, who have put in more than a laborer's day on the exposition's business for many months; to the publicity given to the enterprise through the work of Editor Rosewater of the Bee; and to the active assistance which every citizen has given to the managers of the exposition.

GEORGE GRANTHAM BAIN.

THE WEST INDIES.

[SPECIAL CORRESPONDENCE OF "HARPER'S WEEKLY."]

I.—THE MAROONS OF JAMAICA.

WHEN England, in 1655, took Jamaica from the Spaniards, there were some two thousand slaves on the island, most of them pure Africans, but a few the hybrid offspring of negroes and the aboriginal Arawak Indians, whom the Spaniards had found in possession of the island, and, in the course of a century, had managed to exterminate. These slaves—known in history as Koromantyns, or, more commonly, "Maroons"—sided with their masters, and on the flight of the Spanish forces from Jamaica they took to the mountains, and for a century and a half maintained a harassing war against the English. But in 1795 the Jamaican government imported from Cuba a great number of mastiffs, trained like the blood-hound to track human beings by scent, but, unlike the blood-hound, to attack the victim of their ruthless quest with horrible ferocity. The knowledge that these animals were arrayed against them paralyzed the Maroons, and, rather than meet them in fight, they surrendered to the troops whom until then they had held in very scant respect. Not a shot was fired after the "blood-hounds" reached the English camp. The rebels capitulated on the single condition that their lives should be spared. Thus ended the troubles with the Maroons. Their leaders were eventually shipped off to Sierra Leone, and the rank and file, being confirmed in certain privileges which, after a previous "peace," had been granted to them, retired to their villages, and thenceforth not only lived in peace with the English, but during the negro insurrection, quelled with such merciful severity in 1865 by Governor Eyre, they fought on the side of the whites. The privileges referred to above were the grant of certain lands in perpetual freehold and exemption from all taxation, and modified "home-rule"—quamdiu se bene gesserint. On these terms the descendants of the Spaniards' slaves, still known as Maroons, live in the island, and one of their locations is Moore Town, about ten miles from Port Antonio, on the northern shore of the island. Their lines have certainly been cast, from a negro point of view, in very pleasant places. Well above sea-level, in the midst of superb scenery, this interesting human fragment of old world history lives a life very much its own and in some respects quite isolated, but year by year assimilating more and more with its surroundings. Ever since the suppression of Gordon's insurrection in 1865 the Maroons have been gradually ridding themselves of their "caste" prejudice, which held them aloof from the freed negroes and the half-castes, so that to-day the inhabitants of Moore Town possess scarcely any special characteristics of feature and suggest no special type. Here and there, frequently enough to arrest attention, one sees fine features, thin lips, oval faces, with a lithe and dignified bearing—a combination absolutely unknown among the negroes, and pointing back to a strong strain of blood other than African—probably that of the aboriginal Arawak Indians, who are recorded to have been a comely and graceful race. But the majority of the Maroons are as mongrel-looking a collection as could be picked up at the corner of any Port Antonio street, and though suggesting in appearance, strange to say, less of the negro than the coolie, are in gesture, temperament, and mental traits unmistakable Africans. They are very light-hearted and excitable, exceedingly simple, and surprisingly shrewd; a community which would follow and desert a leader with equal alacrity; impulsive but not purposeful, and morbidly superstitious. I confess I was greatly disappointed to find them becoming so "civilized"—to see roofs of corrugated zinc instead of palm-leaf thatch, Bass and Tennant their beers instead of pombe and cassava, and canned meats their delicacies instead of ubonni.

"What is your religion?" I asked a hoary old heathenish-looking person.

"Church of England," was the shocking reply; and later, when I expressed a wish to see his fetich, he flattened me out by asking, "Fetich—what is fetich?"

I had hoped, I confess, to interview a witch-finder, to see a medicine-man perhaps go through some dance, or at least hear an obeah-man curse a little. But no, they are all "Church of England," in proof of which in the valley below stood a dilapidated, half-roofed, no-windowed church, in and out of which some fat little children were chasing some fat little pigs, which had invaded the sacred premises for the sake of shade.

"So you are all thinking of joining the Americans," I said.

"No, sir, not me," was the reply.

"Why not?" I asked.

"Because, sir, I think the Americans most unsuitable."

"Unsuitable!" said I, in surprise. "Unsuitable for what?"

"Unsuitable, sir, for the dominions of Queen Victoria!"

This led me to speak of loyalty, in the course of which my acquaintance informed me that "bullets do not kill you if you are fighting in the right cause," and in support of this startling generalization he adduced the case of his own brother, "now a dead man, sir, and buried by the missionary who lives on top of yonder hill," who, when fighting on the side of the English against the rebel slaves in 1865, "was twice struck by bullets, sir, on the head and on the chest, and they glanced off him, sir, because he was fighting for the right cause—for Queen Victoria, sir."

What the "loyalty" of the colored population of the island may spring from I would not undertake to guess, but it is an unquestionable fact that not one negro in a thousand, and probably not more than one "Jamaican" in a thousand, would, on plebiscite, vote for annexation. Somehow or another the very same apprehension of Americans exists everywhere among the black and half-black people of the island as of Russia among the natives of India. Some affect to explain this by rumors that have reached the island as to harsh treatment of the blacks in the southernmost States, others by the fact that from time to time colored youths, who have been educated as Baptist missionaries or doctors in the United States, return here and spread among the resident blacks exaggerated accounts of the disabilities and drawbacks incidental to negro life in America as compared with British dominions. Whatever the reason, the fact remains that the colored population of Jamaica is to-day not in one district, but in all, unanimously "loyal" to the British government. In fact, more than one Englishman of long residence has told me that to take a vote on the question of annexation to the United States would be to provoke riots, and perhaps even run the risk of insurrection.

Is this "loyalty" only speech-deep? For myself, I frankly confess I believe it is. I cannot forget that history teaches us that the government of colored peoples by minorities of whites is periodically disturbed by outbreaks of popular ill feeling towards the authorities. These are due in special cases to fanaticism, or the spirit of unrest natural to fighting-races chafing under the tiresome monotony of law-abiding peace, but as often as not they arise from the curious frame of mind common to all humanity, expressed in the Bible in the phrase, "and Jeshurun waxed fat, and kicked." Outbreaks apparently quite senseless have often occurred in British possessions when the people had "waxed fat," when prosperity under benevolent government had made them forget the benevolence and swelled their heads. The black is particularly subject to this weakness of "swelled head," whether as the individual servant of an intelligent master or the subject of a kindly government. He waxes fat and "kicks."

Now the Maroons, except for an incident that occurred some three years ago, when they tumultuously demanded certain lands, and, on being shown that they had no claim to them, peaceably accepted the fact and retired from the estate they had claimed, have lived in peace and plenty. Their hills and valleys are superbly fertile. The open lands afford excellent grazing, there is abundance of beautiful water, and the vegetation is largely composed of bananas and cocoanut-palms, bread-fruit trees, sugar-cane, mango, guava, and other fruit trees—a medley of valuable food-producing plants which, with occasional kola, pineapples, and oranges, is partly the result of their own planting, partly the surviving evidences of a departed prosperity, when these lands formed parts of rich plantations worked by slave laborers, but thrown out of culture by the emancipation of the negroes. In this black man's paradise they have thriven and multiplied, and though they have voluntarily abandoned their original isolation, they are still an individual community, and, taking all the world round, should be the most contented, as they are certainly the best-to-do, of all negro or negroid colonies living under white rule. Until quite recently the colony of Jamaica had looked upon the Maroons as thoroughly law-abiding, and indeed it was supposed that in case of any popular disturbance they might be counted upon as auxiliaries of British authority.

Some weeks ago the Maroons applied to government for and received a plan of the grounds which had been granted to their predecessors a hundred years ago in perpetuity and tax free. Their interpretation of this survey led them to assert that the tribe was not now in possession of all the lands that had been granted to it in 1795, and to claim certain portions of several estates. Among these was a certain "Fyfe Pen"—"pen" being the Jamaican equivalent for the American "ranch" or Australian "run"—which had since the death of Colonel Fyfe been split up and portions of it absorbed into the now existing Gibraltar, Iter Boreale, and Fort George plantations. This old pen the Maroons have reconstructed from the survey map, and are now asserting proprietorship over such portions of those three estates as had originally belonged to Colonel Fyfe. This gentleman, an Englishman, was selected by government to take charge of the Maroons in 1865, when, after assisting the authorities against the rebels, they made a kind of triumphal progress through portions of the island, fêted and applauded by the loyal population, and for some reason or another the Maroons now claim Colonel Fyfe's estate as their property. What other connection Fyfe may have had with the tribe, beyond organizing and marching with it in the parade, I have not been able to discover, either from the Maroons themselves or from officials, but it is evident that the community have satisfied themselves as to the existence of some sort of "rights," for they have committed the offence known technically, I believe, as "forcible entry and detainer"—that is to say, they marched on to the Gibraltar and Iter Boreale estates in body over a hundred strong, cut a wire fence as assertion of right of way, pulled some cocoanuts to prove proprietorship, and ordered the laborers to take no more log wood off the grounds, and to empty out the contents of wagons already loaded on to the ground. This was on Tuesday and Wednesday. The inspector-general of police

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google was sent to Annotto Bay, and some forty constables collected at that place, and on Saturday, the necessary information having been laid, summonses were taken out against some twelve or fifteen of the leaders of the movement, and are made returnable for Tuesday next here at Annotto Bay, and on that day we shall see what we shall see. Meanwhile the Maroons remain in possession, and not one of them, if we are to believe what they say, intends to move. And nothing can be more precise and emphatic than their language. Suffice it to say that in my own hearing a Maroon said that if the negro constabulary tried to turn them off the grounds they had seized, they would kill every one of them, or die themselves to the last man. This may, of course, have been mere braggadocio, but it did not sound like it when it was said, and the speaker and his companions did not look like "blatherskites" when they said it. But, after all, there is no saying how far "tall talking" may be carried without any resultant violence. On the other hand, the Maroons are, as I have said, vain, excitable, easily swayed, and sentimental, not to say superstitious. Of the constabulary, who are all black, except their officers, the Maroons have a deplorably poor opinion, and every "Jamaican" of color you speak to on the subject tells you that the Maroons despise the negroes. For one thing, of course, they really obtained their present peculiar semi-independence by force of arms, and although they eventually succumbed in a kind of panic at the presence of "blood-hounds" in the English camps, they were never, as a matter of fact, thrashed, and they have not forgotten the fact.

PHIL. ROBINSON.

Annotto Bay, October 2.

A PUERTO RICO PROBLEM.

THE CROWDED PRISONS.

THE scene might be a prison-yard in any one of the larger towns of that island over which our flag was raised on Tuesday, October 18—in Ponce, San Juan, Guayama, and the other places which have come so suddenly into our consciousness during the last few months that it almost seems as though the war with Spain had created them.

There is a large square court-yard, or patio, open to the sky in fair and foul weather; it is paved with flag-stones, and surrounded by a colonnade. If the reader were making his observations from a point near the centre of the patio (or, as it were, in the foreground of the drawing on the first page of this number of the WEEKLY) he would see, between the arches and in the deep shadow, doors of the cells in which ordinary prisoners are locked at night. These are on a level with the ground, and above them is a row of little grated windows, where dark faces are seen pressed against the bars, and bare feet are thrust out. The solitary occupants are intently watching figures that move across the little square of sunlit pavement visible to them.

"Pablo is carrying his chain in his hand to-day; yesterday he dragged it"—that is about all they see.

The cells in this upper tier are reserved for prisoners held in close confinement. And often there is a barrier between the arches, to restrain an intermediate class, including political offenders and suspected persons, who are neither condemned to absolute solitude nor allowed to mingle with the common herd. In the sunny court are natives of high and low degree, white and black—but only natives, for the Spaniards have always been more leniently treated. The man who has been charged with murder and the man whose peasant neighbor has accused him of a theft of fruit are together here, and have equal privileges in most respects. But the more dangerous fellows must drag about heavy log-chains attached to their ankles. There is a game of handball for those who do not wear the chain, and for all, without exception, and at all hours of the day, there is the favorite pastime—gambling. Mere lack of money is no impediment; when the last piece of silver has vanished, there is still a button or a tin dish to be won or lost. From time to time friends of the prisoners come, bringing presents of uncooked food—of corn, or meat, or codfish, perhaps—and hand these things in through the bars, or throw them down from the flat roof—the azotea—to which any one has free access. And so the common supply of food in the large iron kettle receives frequent additions. It is rather like the old custom of the North American savages—all is soup meat that comes to this kettle; the fire is kept up; there is at least a spoonful of hot food for those that are hungry. A stone tank in the centre of the court is supplied with running water; and here at last is an object that the eye can rest upon with pleasure, for the artistic Spaniard has made of even this prison fountain a bit of architecture. Half-naked figures of the men who wash their clothing in the tank are in harmony with this classical suggestion.

Many of these prisoners are simple country people whom the Guardia Civil captured in highway and hedge. Some of them assert that they have been confined for a year or more without trial, and an American visitor is likely to hear that a fair proportion do not accurately know why they were committed. They all expected to be released on the arrival of the American army, and it is not too much to say that this expectation was shared by the inhabitants of the island generally. For, otherwise, what should the Americans do with the imprisoned? Could they investigate each case separately and take evidence once more? Would they have confidence in the old records and retain the old judges, virtually approving every scandalous sentence and reaffirming every old judgment by continuing the penalty it had involved? To the islanders this problem seemed very difficult.

One of those who thought the problem would prove too difficult was a Spanish volunteer at San Juan. He had lost an arm on May 12, when Admiral Sampson bombarded the capital's defences. On his visiting-card was inscribed, after his name and as a title or characterization, the word "Hero." And he was authorized to adopt that title.

As the native prisoners, when anticipating the advent of Miles and Brooke and their twenty thousand, pictured the event to themselves, the gates would be thrown open, they would flock out, guns would be placed in their hands, and they would be told to kill as many Spaniards as possible. Now, of course, there is bitter disappointment among them and their friends. The impression produced on their minds when they discovered that not only were they still prisoners pending investigation of the charges recorded against them, but even unruly members of the army of liberation shared their captivity, forms a curious subject for speculation. It is matched, however, by the reflections of offenders who wear Uncle Sam's uniform, but who find themselves shut in "such a place to put a man who came down here to fight!"

In view of the conjectures that have been mentioned above, the first steps in the development of the American policy are of special interest. After October 18 the Spanish civil authorities continued to hold office. It became evident that they were not to be replaced so long as they performed their duties satisfactorily. There was no such protest at San Juan as that which made itself heard at Manila, where it led General Merritt to modify his proclamation. It is thought that the perfect definition of the terms of the problem will make its solution comparatively easy, and, judging from present indications, we may expect hearty co-operation of Spaniards, Spanish-Americans, and Americans in the effort to understand the situation and to effect an easy transition.

MARRION WILCOX.

THIS BUSY WORLD

Bismarck's Autobiography (Harper & Brothers), which is announced to appear next month, will come opportunely to qualify the impressions of Prince Bismarck's character and career which have been formed from works about him that have appeared since his death. It is the only work of the sort that he left. In 1889 the Cotta Publishing House in Germany asked the Chancellor to write down his recollections of his life and work. He declined at the time, but the following year, when he had unexpectedly gone out of office, he arranged with the Cottas for the book they had asked for, and began work on it. Its title, Gedanken und Erinnerungen, was his own choice. He dictated his recollections first to Lothar Bucher, and after Bucher's death went on with the help of Dr. Chrysander.

There are no sensational disclosures in this autobiography, but it includes the thoughts, memories, and reflections of the artificer of an empire, as he looked back in his age on the labors of his life, and on the history which he helped to make. Bismarck's most violent critics do not deny that his personality was exceedingly interesting. It enters into this work more largely than into any other that can be written.

One finds it harder and harder, as the campaign in New York State progresses, to locate the line which separates Colonel Roosevelt's share in beating Spain from what was done to that end by the other land forces of the United States. The Colonel's admiring friends keep shoving the boundary of his renown farther and farther along, incidentally leaving less and less credit to the regular army, the gallant correspondents, and his other helpers. The address calling for a Roosevelt League of German-Americans points out that—

> An officer at the head of his regiment, it was he who in the critical moment insured success. If we had had no Roosevelt at Santiago, and if we had been defeated in action there, who knows whether to-day we would be in a position to consider terms of peace?

So, in introducing the candidate at a meeting of colored voters, Mr. T. T. Fortune said, on October 14:

> When Colonel Roosevelt made his charge up San Juan Hill he was supported on the right and left by the colored troopers of the Ninth and Tenth Cavalry, and the gallant Colonel won his victory with their aid.

The ignorant reader wonders whether there were no surviving officers of the Ninth and Tenth Cavalry, and why they are not entitled to appear as part owners of the victory of San Juan. Moreover, there are close students of our recent military history who find in General Kent's report that a man named Hawkins, an obscure general in the regular army, who commanded a brigade, captured San Juan Hill with the Sixth and Sixteenth regular infantry, with extremely valuable assistance from the Ninth, Thirteenth, and Twenty-fourth regular infantry. No doubt Colonel Roosevelt rode up one segment of the hill and General Hawkins another. At any rate, readers of General Kent's report maintain that Hawkins and his men had something to do with the San Juan victory; indeed, the portion of credit that they assign to General Hawkins is of appalling size, and not to be reconciled with the dimensions of the piece which the Colonel's friends claim for him, except on the theory that the aggregated parts of that victory are very much larger than the whole. No one doubts that the Colonel did his full duty according to his lights and abilities as a volunteer officer, but he must be mortified at the dissemination of the idea that he was the mainspring of the American forces at Santiago, and that if he had broken, the wheels of our military machine would have ceased to go round. No doubt many of these misleading impressions will be set right in the war articles for the magazines, the composition of which now engages the Colonel's scant leisure, as well as in the history of the late war which is soon to come from his near friend Senator Lodge.

A poem called "America, Beloved Land," published in the WEEKLY for October 8, was accompanied by a note saying that it was composed by Mr. Abbot Frederic as a substitute for "The Star-Spangled Banner," the words of which familiar song seemed to him "weak and inadequate."

Mr. Frederic desires that it should be stated that the note did not express his sentiments, and that he does not wish to appear as disparaging the words of "The Star-Spangled Banner," or as assuming that his own composition is necessarily more worthy of the nation.

Reports of the American Peace Commission sitting in Paris represent the American commissioners to be in good health and spirits, and to be haggling actively with their Spanish brethren over the terms of peace. At last accounts discussion was still confined to Cuban concerns, and especially to the question of the Cuban debt, and whether responsibility for any part of it could be imposed upon the United States. The Spanish commissioners have asked that our government shall assume sovereignty in Cuba, and our commissioners have refused to do so, though willing to undertake to preserve order until a stable government is perfected. So far as public information goes, the Commission has not yet made a beginning of the settlement of the problem of the Philippines. News of the Commission and its doings creates no excitement in this country, the average citizen and newspaper reader feeling full confidence in our commissioners, and being very ready to believe that the conclusions they will reach will be the best obtainable.

The canon of the Episcopal Church relating to divorce is to remain unchanged. The amendment proposed by the party in the convention led by Bishop Doane proposed to forbid Episcopal clergymen to officiate at the marriage of either party to a divorce during the lifetime of the other party. An amendment offered by Bishop Potter prohibited remarriage after a divorce granted for a cause succeeding the marriage except in the case of the innocent party to such a divorce. In the preliminary vote Bishop Potter's amendment beat Bishop Doane's amendment by a vote of 32 to 31, but by a subsequent vote (31 to 24) it was determined to leave the present canon unamended. So the Episcopal Church will continue for at least three years more to countenance the remarriage of the innocent party to a divorce.

There is little to say about the loss of the Mohegan except that the Mohegan was lost. On Friday evening, October 14, at seven o'clock, on her course from London to New York, she ran aground on rocks near the Lizard, the southern extremity of Cornwall. A heavy easterly gale was blowing, which drove back tugs which put out to her rescue, and made it very difficult to launch her own boats. Of 158 persons aboard, 50 were saved. Of 54 passengers 11 were saved, among them five women. Out of the crew of 104, 39 were saved. Her commander, Captain Griffiths, and her first, second, and third officers were lost. How the vessel came to be six or seven miles north of her course is not yet explained. A coroner's inquest began on Monday, October 17, was adjourned for a week in order to insure the presence of a nautical expert from the Board of Trade. The surviving passengers, some of whom were present at the inquest, were not allowed to give evidence before the adjournment, and their testimony may not be taken at all. This action of the coroner in not taking the testimony of the passengers before they were scattered is criticised.

The Mohegan was a single-screw steamer of 4510 tons, and was one of five vessels lately bought by the Atlantic Transport Company to replace five vessels sold by that company to the United States to be used as army transports. She was a new ship, launched this year at Hull, England, and at first named Cleopatra.

The Philadelphia Ledger feels sure that it is mistaken policy for a high-class newspaper to cut its price to one cent. It does not believe "that intelligent, healthy-minded people are deterred from reading decent papers because of the difference of one or two cents in price." That is true enough, and it is also true that while intelligent people don't want what the Ledger calls "madhouse sheets" at any price, when an interesting and reputable newspaper can be bought for one cent a great many buyers add it daily to the paper or the group of papers they

ATLANTIC TRANSPORT LINER "MOHEGAN," WRECKED OFF THE LIZARD, OCTOBER 14, WHEN 108 LIVES WERE LOST OUT OF 158.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google are taking already. Most persons in New York who really aspire to keep abreast of the times seem nowadays to feel the need of looking through from four to ten papers daily. Time was when a family that took in a newspaper felt that it got the news. Now every prudent family takes in a paper or two for the news, and a few more as a precaution against being taken in. When you buy one or two newspapers a day the price doesn't matter much, but when you buy five or six, the extra pennies are of more moment. A good many thrifty persons dislike as much to pay three cents for a newspaper as for a postage-stamp.

Mr. William G. Brown, the deputy keeper of the records of Harvard University, is trying to make a complete list of the Harvard men—officers, graduates, undergraduates, and temporary members of the university in any department—who have served in the war with Spain. The list is to be printed in the Harvard Graduates' Magazine, and the documents on which it is based are to be kept in the university archives. It is thought that the list will include as many as three hundred and fifty names. "I am inclined to think," writes the deputy keeper, "that more Harvard men enlisted during the period of the war than during the corresponding early period of the civil war."

A Philadelphia correspondent, who thinks that the WEEKLY, while observant of Red Cross work, has not paid due attention to the labors of the National Relief Association, points out, in the name of justice, that the National Relief has had agents at Camps Alger and Wikoff, and at Tampa and other points in Florida; that it still has agents at Ponce, Santiago, and Camp Meade; that it is working through Consul Wildman at Hong-kong for the troops at Manila, and sends weekly tons of supplies; that its secretary, in company with Major Appel, meets every transport that comes to New York; that as late as October 15 it had charge, and doubtless still has charge, of a large number of sick soldiers in Philadelphia; that it has fed thousands of soldiers; and that it makes a business of locating missing men and sending them home. "Ask the soldiers from Cuba, Ponce, or the camps about the National Relief Commission," says this reproachful Philadelphian, "and see what answer you get."

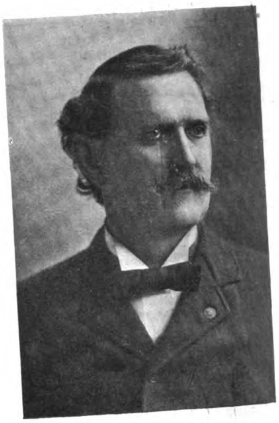
Joseph Simon, the new Republican Senator from Oregon, was born in Germany in 1851, and is a Jew, as his name suggests. He came with his parents to Oregon in 1857, and got his schooling first at a private school in Portland kept by Sylvester Pennoyer (who was afterwards Governor), and later at the Portland public schools. In 1870 he entered the law office of John H. Mitchell and Joseph N. Dolph, both of whom have since been United States Senators. Two years later he was admitted to the bar, and has practised law ever since with ability and success. His political activities include five terms of service in the Oregon State Senate, over five sessions of which he presided. In 1879 he ran for Mayor of Portland, and missed election by one vote. In 1891 he was a strong candidate for the United States Circuit Judgeship, to which President Harrison eventually appointed William B. Gilbert.

Senator Simon has long been an active and influential

JOSEPH SIMON,
United States Senator-Elect from Oregon.

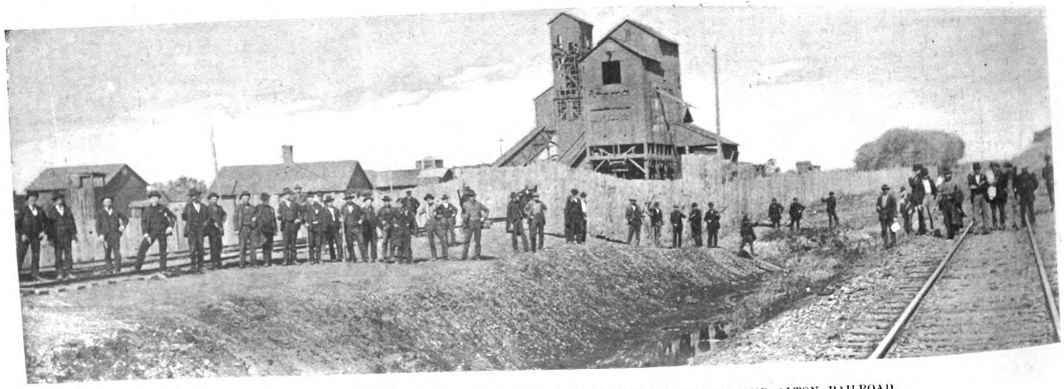
Republican, and is a strong and outspoken advocate of the gold standard. He has fought free silver from the beginning, and is credited with having done more than any one else to win Oregon's sound-money victories in 1896 and 1898.

No more bloodshed is expected to result from the miners' strikes in Illinois, but the situation continues to be very uneasy, with no settlement in sight. Governor Tanner has been using the State troops to prevent the importation of negro laborers into Virden and Pana, and his right to use troops for such a purpose and to search railroad trains and interfere with travel will probably be inquired into in suits to be brought against the State of Illinois. There has been talk of asking the President to send regular troops to the scene of disturbance, on the ground that the Governor has failed in his duty, and that the mine-owners and negro laborers have been deprived of their constitutional rights as citizens of the United States. Meanwhile the rejected negroes who were driven away from Virden have been left on the hands of the railroad which brought them, and after finding a temporary refuge at Springfield, were sheltered at last accounts in the jail at St. Louis.



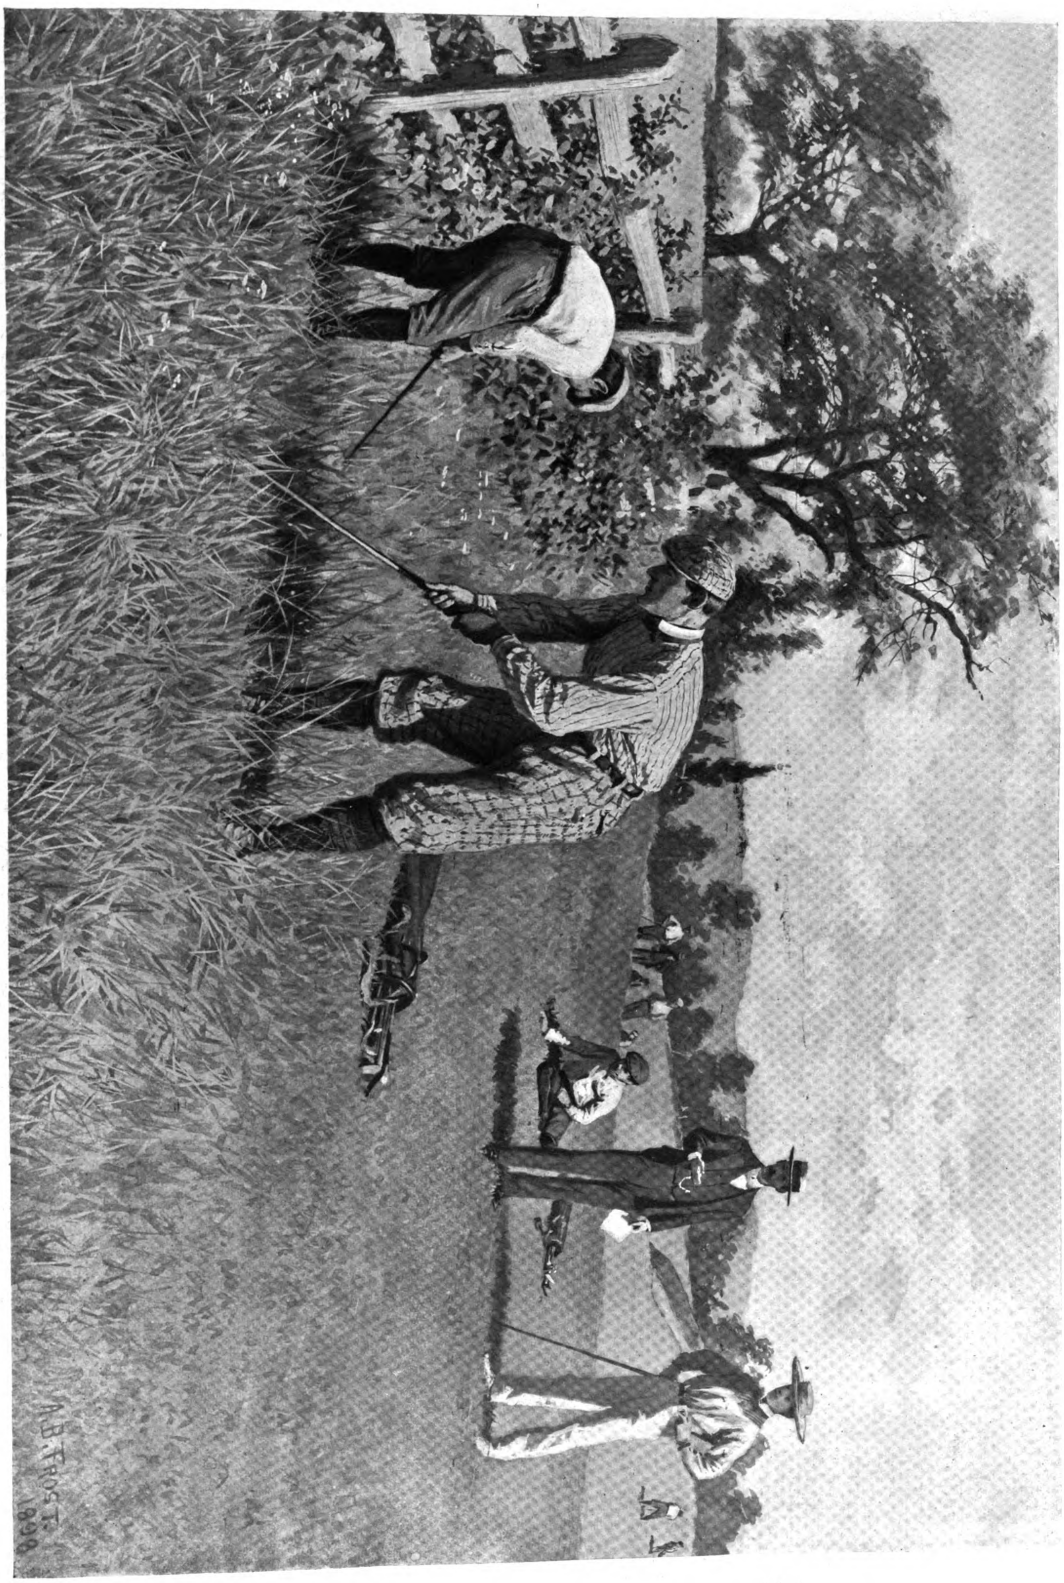
The news of the sudden death of Harold Frederic in London, on October 19, was extremely surprising to persons who only knew him as the London correspondent of the New York Times and as a writer of books. He was only forty-two years old, and started in life with an enviable physical and mental endowment, which should have lasted him far longer than it did. He was born on a farm in the Mohawk Valley, near Utica. When he was two years old he lost his father, and his boyhood and youth became a struggle with poverty. But he managed to get the rudiments of education, going to the public schools in Utica in the intervals of work. When he was fourteen he left school and became an office-boy in the employ of Editor Bailey of the Utica Observer. A little later, discovering a talent for drawing, he found lucrative employment in Boston in retouching photographic negatives. His eyes gave out under the strain of that work, and he returned to the Utica Observer as reporter. In 1882 he became editor of the Albany Evening Journal, and in 1884 left that paper to become the London correspondent of the New York Times. His work for the Times is well known. His first novel, Seth's Brother's Wife, was published in 1887. Of ten other novels that he wrote, eight have been published, one is now running as a serial, and the last is to be published next year. The scenes of several of his books are laid in central New York, and are of especial interest to persons to whom that region is familiar. His most notable novel was The Damnation of Theron Ware, published in 1896, which was widely read, and excited much attention.

In his life there were tragedies and grave blemishes, which marred a career in many respects so notable, and which doubtless contributed to his premature collapse under the pressure of hard work. Last August he suffered a stroke of paralysis, which left him ailing and partially crippled, though he kept up his work until a day or two before his death.



E. S. MARTIN.

MINER'S CABIN NEAR STOCKADE AT VIRDEN, WHERE WOMEN MADE COFFEE FOR THE STRIKERS.

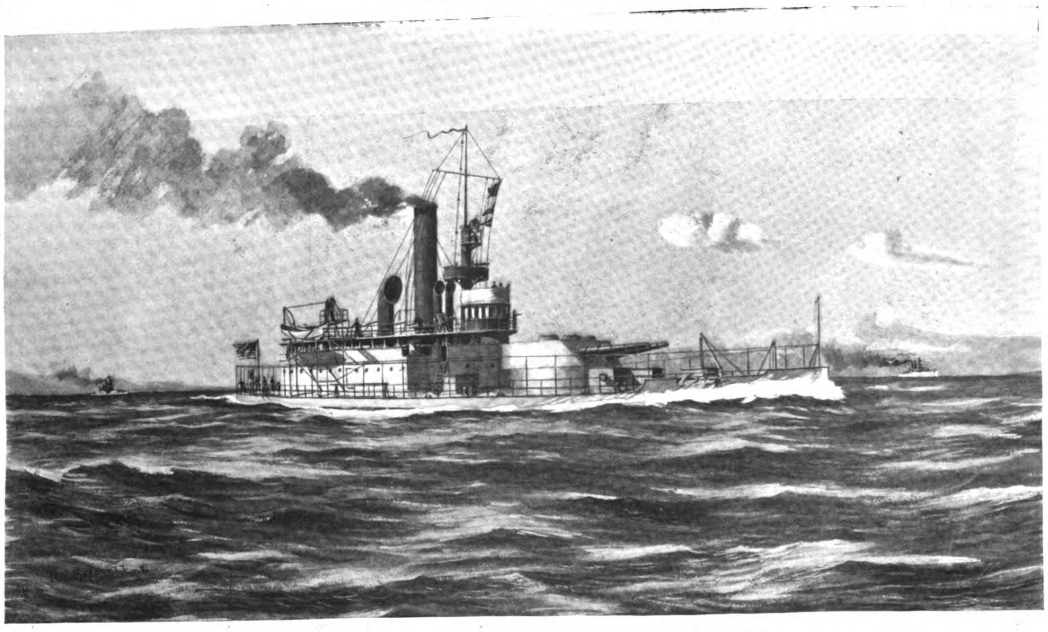


GOVERNOR JOHN R. TANNER.

EXTERIOR VIEW OF STOCKADE AT VIRDEN, SHOWING MAIN TRACK OF CHICAGO AND ALTON RAILROAD.

THE SCENE OF THE ILLINOIS LABOR TROUBLES.—PHOTOGRAPHS TAKEN FOR "HARPER'S WEEKLY."

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002024114 8
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google



TOURNAMENT DAY.

THE LOST BALL.—TIME'S ALMOST UP.—DRAWN BY A. B. FROST.

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THE NEW SINGLE-TURRET MONITORS LATELY AUTHORIZED BY CONGRESS.
Drawn from the Plans by R. G. Skerrett.

NEW HARBOR-DEFENCE VESSELS.

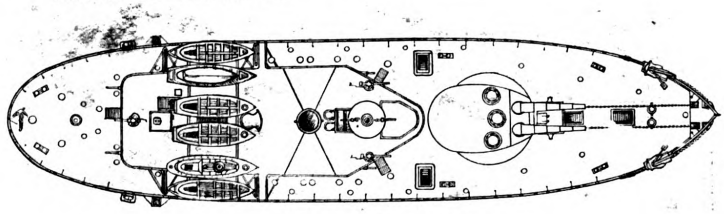
THE SINGLE-TURRET MONITORS "ARKANSAS," "CONNECTICUT," "FLORIDA," AND "WYOMING."

While the Monitor is not the all-around superior fighting-machine claimed by some of its advocates, the order is one singularly adapted for special service, and within those limitations is more than a match, weight for weight, for any craft an enemy may bring to bear upon our coast.

Long before the lessons of the late conflict had been brought home to us—yes, even before the struggle had fairly begun—Congress made provision for four harbor-defence vessels of the Monitor type; and while experience has shown the ships unfitted for that cruiser service into which they were pressed through stress of circumstances, still the Monitor remains the ideal vessel for the inner line of coast defence, and the wisdom of Congress in ordering them is justified.

Every one familiar with the type knows that it is characterized, first, by low freeboard—i.e., height of hull above-water; second, by an all-around fire of powerful guns; and third, by massive armor protection for all exposed vital parts. In theory, the vessel seems to be the perfected type of heavy fighting-ship, and so she is in smooth water; but as a good gun platform in a fair seaway she is a failure, notwithstanding the fact that she is as seaworthy and buoyant as a duck. A good gun platform is a craft such as rolls easily and slowly—one, in fact, that trenches so far upon instability that her recovery is gradual. The natural buoyancy of the Monitor, because of her low freeboard and limited top hamper, causes her to recover with wonderful quickness and to make accurate gun-fire in only a fair-sized sea a matter of chance pure and simple. The results of their recent service has emphasized all this, and, too, has shown them to be very wearing upon both officers and crew when kept continually steaming with hatches battened down in Southern waters.



The provision for these new vessels has required them to be for harbor defence only, and as such the ships have been especially designed from a fighting point of view, while retaining all of the peculiar sea-going qualities of the type.

The vessels will be 225 feet long on the water line, with a powerful ram belowwater, will have a maximum beam of 50 feet, and, upon a normal displacement of 2700 tons, will draw only 12½ feet of water.

As usual, the hull will be of steel, with a double, or inner, bottom extending practically from stem to stern, and the common general system of water-tight subdivisioning of the whole interior. An extensive pumping and draining plant will connect with all of the main water-tight compartments, and be ample guard against either fire or the damage of normal accidents of action.

This hull will be protected from gun-fire by a continuous belt of armor reaching from two and a half feet below the water-line up to the height of the main-deck—the one principal deck aboveboard. This armor will have a maximum thickness of eleven inches abreast the boilers, engines, and magazines, tapering thence to five inches at the bow and stern. The armor will be treated by the new Krupp process, which has already been found to be considerably superior, defensively, to that heretofore treated by the Harvey method. The main-deck, which, in fact, becomes the protective deck, will consist of two thicknesses of three-quarter-inch plating of nickel steel, and will be proof against practically all plunging shot to which it may be exposed. This deck will have the usual covering of wood planking.

The vessels will have twin screws, worked by two three-cylinder triple-expansion engines quartered in one water-tight compartment. These engines, together with those of the circulating pumps, will have a collective indicated horse-power of quite 2400 when making 200 revolutions a minute, and inducing a speed of twelve knots an hour. Steam, at a working pressure of 250 pounds, will be supplied by four water-tube boilers placed in a common water-tight compartment. Every possible provision has been made to make life in the fire-rooms tolerable when under pressure, and the single big armored ventilator will be the principal air-duct for both the boiler and the engine rooms. The two smaller ventilators just forward of the smoke-stack will answer the double purpose of ash-hoists and supplemental ventilation for the fire-room. The space between the double casings of the smoke-stack will also form a convenient escape for hot air from the boiler region, and armor protection about the stack to a height of four feet above the main-deck line will guard against injury threatening suffocation to those below.

DECK PLAN, NEW HARBOR-DEFENCE VESSELS.

A coal-supply, loosely stowed, of quite 200 tons will be carried; and that will be sufficient for a considerable radius of action along our coast-line.

Wood-work will be reduced to a minimum, and, with the exception of decks, will be fire-proofed. Linoleum will take the place of planking on all but the main, superstructure, and bridge decks, which are exposed to the weather.

The ships will be lighted by electricity, and extensively ventilated by a system of blowers, promising tolerable conditions betweendecks when the hatches are battened down through stress of weather. The hatchways on the main-deck without the superstructure are all raised to a considerable height, that they may be left open even when the deck forward is covered by light seas coming aboard. This will also make the living-spaces more comfortable under normal conditions, while the more general use of electricity will do away with the heating incident to long lines of steam-pipes.

The armament of each vessel will consist of two 12-inch guns, four 4-inch rapid-fire rifles, three 6-pounders, and four automatic 1-pounder pieces.

The two 12-inch guns will be placed in a single-balanced turret having an arc of train of 300 degrees. The turret and barbette armor will be eleven inches thick, and will be treated by the Krupp process. The deflective face of the turret will have an incline of 42 degrees, giving it the defensive virtues of plating considerably thicker. The turret-turning gear, the ammunition-hoists, the rammers, and the elevating mechanisms will be run by electricity. The ventilating apparatus will be actuated by the same energy.

The four 4-inch rifles will be mounted in the superstructure at the four corners, where they will have commanding positions. The 12-inch and the 4-inch guns will be built to use smokeless powder, which will at once make them vastly superior to any pieces of native manufacture and of like calibre now in our service.

The 6-pounders and the 1-pounder automatic guns will be placed on the hammock berthing, on the bridge-deck, and up in the top of the single military mast. Besides carrying the guns and the search-light, the mast will serve the purpose of an air-duct, and will feed the forward part of the ship accordingly.

The vessels will have docking keels, which, incidentally, will serve in part the purpose of bilge keels, and add considerably to the steadiness of the ships in a seaway, making them just that much superior to the other vessels of the Monitor type now in service.

Comfortable and commodious quarters are provided for a captain, six other officers, and a crew of about 130 persons, and every convenience has been added to overcome the hardships heretofore common to the Monitor type of ship.

The vessels were really inspired by the needs of the naval militia, and as annual training-schools for this growing branch of our defences will serve a valuable purpose while obviating the detail, as heretofore, of ships required for other duty. The batteries of these Monitors will cover all the instruction needed, from a battle-ship down to a torpedo-boat, save in that of torpedo duty only; while in other directions they will meet the whole scope of a practical education in naval warfare.

Bids for these vessels, ranging from $825,000 up to $875,000 apiece, have been accepted, and the four vessels will be built, one by the Union Iron Works of San Francisco; one by the Newport News Ship-building and Dry-dock Company of Newport News, Virginia; one by the Bath Iron Works of Bath, Maine; and one by Lewis Nixon, of Elizabethport, New Jersey.

WHEN THE REGIMENT CAME BACK.

All the uniforms were blue, all the swords and rifles new,
When the regiment went marching down the street.
All the men were hale and strong as they proudly moved along
Through the cheers that drowned the music of their feet.
Oh the music of their feet keeping time to drums that beat,
Oh the glitter and the splendor of the sight:
As with swords and rifles new, and in uniforms of blue,
The Regiment went marching to the fight.

When the Regiment came back all the guns and swords were black,
And the uniforms had faded into gray.
And the faces of the men who marched through that street again
Seemed like faces of the dead who lose their way.
For the dead who lose their way cannot look more gaunt or gray—
Oh the sorrow and the anguish of the sight.
Oh the weary lagging feet out of step with drums that beat,
When the Regiment came marching from the fight.

Ella Wheeler Wilcox.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THE AWKWARD AGE.*

A Novel.

BY HENRY JAMES,

AUTHOR OF "DAISY MILLER," "AN INTERNATIONAL EPISODE," ETC.

X.

IF Mitchy arrived exactly at the hour, it was quite by design and on a calculation—over and above the little pleasure it might give him—of ten minutes clear with his host, whom it rarely befell him to see alone. He had a theory of something special to go into, of a plummet to drop or a feeler to put forth; his state of mind, in short, was diplomatic and anxious. But his hopes had a drop as he crossed the threshold; his precaution had only assured him the company of a stranger—the person in the room, and to whom the servant announced him, was not old Van. On the other hand this gentleman would be clearly old—what was it? the fellow Vanderbank had made it a matter of such importance he should "really know." But were they simply to have tea there together? No; the candidate for Mr. Mitchett's acquaintance, as if quickly guessing his apprehension, mentioned on the spot that their entertainer would be with them: he had just come home in a hurry, fearing he was late, and then had rushed off to make a change. "Fortunately," said the speaker, who offered his explanation as if he had had it on his mind—"fortunately the ladies haven't yet come."

"Oh, there are to be ladies?" Mr. Mitchett genially replied.

His fellow-guest, who was shy and apparently nervous, sidled about a little, swinging an eye-glass, yet glancing, in a manner a trifle birdlike, from object to object. "Mrs. Edward Brookenham, I think."

"Oh!" Mitchy himself felt, as soon as this comment had quitted his lips, that it might sound even to a stranger like a sign, such as the votaries of Mrs. Edward Brookenham had fallen into the way of constantly throwing off, that he recognized her hand in the matter. There was, however, something in Mr. What-was-his-name's face that somehow encouraged frankness; it had the sociability of surprise—it hadn't the chill. Mitchy saw, at the same time, that this friend of old Van's would never really understand him; though that was a thing he at times liked people as much for as he liked them little for it at others. It was in fact when he most liked that he was on the whole most tempted to mystify. "Only Mrs. Brook?—no others?"

"'Mrs. Brook'?" his friend echoed. He had stared an instant, as if literally missing the connection; but quickly after, to show he was not stupid—and indeed it seemed to show he was delightful—had smiled with extravagant intelligence. "Is that the right thing to say?"

Mitchy gave the kindest of laughs. "Well, I dare say I oughtn't to."

"Oh, I didn't mean to correct you," his interlocutor hastened to profess; "I meant, on the contrary, will it be right for me too?"

Mitchy's great goggle attentively fixed him. "Try it."

"To her?"

"To every one."

"To her husband?"

"Oh, to Edward," Mitchy laughed again, "perfectly!"

"And must I call him 'Edward'?"

"Whatever you do will be right," Mitchy returned—"even though it happen to be sometimes what I do."

His companion, as if to look at him with a due appreciation of this, stopped swinging the nippers and put them on. "You people here have a pleasant way—"

"Oh, we have!"—Mitchy, taking him up, was gayly emphatic. He began, however, already to perceive the mystification which in this case was to be his happy effect.

"Mr. Vanderbank," his victim remarked, with perhaps a shade more of reserve, "has told me a good deal about you." Then as if, in a finer manner, to keep the talk off themselves: "He knows a great many ladies."

"Oh yes, poor chap, he can't help it. He finds a lady wherever he turns."

The stranger took this in, but seemed a little to challenge it. "Well, that's reassuring, if one sometimes fancies there are fewer."

"Fewer than there used to be?—I see what you mean," said Mitchy. "But if it has struck you so, that's awfully interesting." He glared and grinned and mused. "I wonder."

"Well, we shall see." His friend seemed to wish not to dogmatize.

"Shall we?" Mitchy considered it again in its high suggestive light. "You will—but how shall I?" Then he caught himself up with a blush. "What a beastly thing to say—as if it were mere years that have shown it!"

His companion, this time, gave way to the joke. "What else can it be—if I've thought so?"

"Why, it's the facts themselves, and the fine taste, and above all something qui ne court pas les rues, an approach to some experience of what a lady is." The young man's acute reflection appeared suddenly to flower into a vision of opportunity that swept everything else away. "Excuse my insisting on your time of life—but you have seen some?" The question was of such interest that he had already begun to follow it. "Oh, the charm of talk with some one who can meet one's conception of the really distinguished women of the past! If I could get you," he continued, "to be so awfully valuable as to meet mine!"

His fellow-visitor, on this, made, in a pause, a nearer approach to visibly taking his measure. "Are you sure you've got one?"

Mr. Mitch[illegible] brightly thought. "No. That must be just wh[illegible] you. And it can't therefore be for confirmation, can it?" he went on. "It must therefore be for the beautiful primary hint [illegible]together."

His interlocutor began, with a shade of the eye-glass, to shift and sidle again, as if distinctly exc[illegible]d by the subject. But it was as if his very excitement made him a trifle coy. "Are there no nice ones now?"

"Oh yes, there must be lots. In fact I know quantities."

This had the effect of pulling the stranger up. "Ah, 'quantities'! There it is."

"Yes," said Mitchy, "fancy the 'lady' in her millions! Have you come up to London, wondering, as you must, about what's happening—for Vanderbank mentioned, I think, that you have come up—in pursuit of her?"

"Ah," laughed the subject of Vanderbank's information, "I'm afraid 'pursuit,' with me, is over."

"Why, you're at the age," Mitchy returned, "of the most exquisite form of it. Observation!"

"Yet it's a form, I seem to see, that you've not waited for my age to cultivate!" This was followed by a decisive head-shake. "I'm not an observer. I'm a hater."

"That only means," Mitchy explained, "that you keep your observation for your likes—which is more admirable than prudent. But between my fear in the one direction and my desire in the other," he lightly added, "I scarcely know how to present myself. I must study the ground. Meanwhile has old Van told you much about me?"

Old Van's possible confidant, instead of immediately answering, again assumed the pince-nez. "Is that what you call him?"

"In general, I think—for shortness."

"And also"—the speaker hesitated—"for esteem?"

Mitchy laughed out. "For veneration! Our disrepects, I think, are all tender, and we wouldn't for the world do to a person we don't like anything so nice as to call him, or even to call her, don't you know—?"

His questioner had quickly looked as if he knew. "Something pleasant and vulgar?"

Mitchy's gayety deepened. "That discrimination is our only austerity. You must fall in."

"Then what will you call me?"

"What can we?" After which, sustainingly, "I'm 'Mitchy,'" our friend revealed.

His interlocutor looked slightly queer. "I don't think I can quite begin. I'm Mr. Longdon," he almost blushed to articulate.

"Absolutely and essentially—that's exactly what I recognize. I defy any one to see you," Mitchy declared, "as anything else, and on that footing you'll be, among us, unique."

Mr. Longdon appeared to accept his prospect of isolation with a certain gravity. "I gather from you—I've gathered indeed from Mr. Vanderbank—that you're a little sort of a set that hang very much together."

"Oh yes; not a formal association, nor a secret society—still less a 'dangerous gang,' or an organization for any definite end. We're simply a collection of natural affinities," Mitchy explained; "meeting perhaps principally in Mrs. Brook's drawing-room—though sometimes also in old Van's, as you see, sometimes even in mine—and governed at any rate everywhere by Mrs. Brook, in our mysterious ebbs and flows, very much as the tides are governed by the moon. As I say," Mitchy pursued, "you must join. But if Van has got hold of you," he added, "or you've got hold of him, you have joined. We're not quite so numerous as I could wish, and we want variety; we want just what I'm sure you'll bring us—a fresh eye, an outside mind."

Mr. Longdon wore for a minute the air of a man knowing but too well what it was to be asked to put down his name. "My friend Vanderbank swaggers so little that it's rather from you than from himself that I seem to catch the idea—"

"Of his being a great figure among us? I don't know what he may have said to you, or have suppressed; but you may take it from me—as between ourselves, you know—that he's very much the best of us. Old Van, in fact—if you really want a candid opinion," and Mitchy shone still brighter as he talked, "is formed for a distinctly higher sphere. I should go so far as to say that on our level he's positively wasted."

"And are you very sure you're not?" Mr. Longdon asked with a smile.

"Dear no—I'm in my element. My element is to grovel before Van. You've only to look at me, as you must already have made out, to see I'm everything dreadful that he isn't. But you've seen him for yourself—I needn't tell you!" Mitchy ejaculated.

Mr. Longdon, as if under the coercion of so much confidence, had stood in place longer than for any previous moment, and the spell continued for a minute after Mitchy had paused. Then nervously, abruptly, he turned away, and his friend watched him rather mindlessly wander. "Our host has spoken of you to me in high terms," he said as he came back. "You would have no fault to find with them."

Mitchy took it with his highest light. "I know, from your taking the trouble to remember that, how much what I've said of him pleases and touches you. We're a little sort of a set then, you and I; we're an organization of two, at any rate, and we can't help ourselves. There—that's settled." He glanced at the clock on the chimney. "But what's the matter with him?"

"You gentlemen dress so much," said Mr. Longdon.

Mitchy met the explanation quite half-way. "I try to look funny—but why should Apollo in person?"

Mr. Longdon weighed it. "Do you think him like Apollo?"

"The very image. Ask any of the women!"

"But do they know—?"

"How Apollo must look?" Mitchy considered. "Why, the way it works is that it's just from Van's appearance they get the tip, and that then, don't you see? they've their term of comparison. Isn't it what you call a vicious circle? I borrow a little their vice."

Mr. Longdon, who had once more been arrested, once more sidled away. Then he spoke from the other side of the expanse of a table covered with books for which the shelves had no space—covered with portfolios, with well-worn leather-cased boxes, with documents in neat piles. The place was a miscellany, yet not a litter, the picture of an admirable order. "If we're an association of two, you and I, let me, accepting your idea, do what, this way, under a gentleman's roof and while enjoying his hospitality, I should in ordinary circumstances think perhaps something of a breach."

"Oh, strike out!" Mitchy laughed. It possibly chilled his interlocutor, who again hung fire so long that he himself at last adopted his image. "Why doesn't he marry, you mean?"

Mr. Longdon fairly flushed with recognition. "You're very deep, but with what we perceive—why doesn't he?"

Mitchy continued, visibly, to have his amusement, which might have been, this time, and in spite of the amalgamation he had pictured, for what "they" perceived. But he threw off after an instant an answer clearly intended to meet the case. "He thinks he hasn't the means. He has great ideas of what a fellow must offer a woman."

Mr. Longdon's eyes travelled awhile over the amenities about him. "He hasn't such a view of himself alone—"

"As to make him think he's enough as he stands? No," said Mitchy, "I don't fancy he has a very awful view of himself alone. And since we are burning this incense under his nose," he added, "it's also my impression that he has no private means. Women in London want so much."

Mr. Longdon was silent a little. "A very great deal, I dare say."

"Oh, a tremendous lot. They want everything. I mean the sort of women he lives with. A modest man—who's also poor—isn't in it. I give you that, at any rate, as his view. There are lots of them that would—and only too glad—'love him for himself'; but things are much mixed, and these not necessarily the right ones, and at all events he doesn't see it. The result of which is that he's waiting."

"Waiting to feel himself in love?"

Mitchy just hesitated. "Well, we're talking of marriage. Of course you'll say there are women with money. There are"—he seemed for a moment to meditate—"dreadful ones!"

The two men, on this, exchanged a long regard. "He mustn't do that."

Mitchy again hesitated. "He won't."

Mr. Longdon had also a silence, which he presently terminated by one of his jerks into motion. "He sha'n't!"

Once more Mitchy watched him revolve a little, but now, familiarly, yet with a sharp emphasis, he himself resumed their colloquy. "See here, Mr. Longdon. Are you seriously taking him up?"

Once more, at the tone of this appeal, the old man perceptibly colored. It was as if his friend had brought to the surface an inward excitement, and he laughed for embarrassment. "You see things with a freedom—!"

"Yes, and it's so I express them. I see them, I know, with a raccourci; but time, after all, rather presses, and at any rate we understand each other. What I want now is just to say"—and Mitchy spoke with a simplicity and a gravity he had not yet used—"that if your interest in him should at any time reach the point of your wishing to do something or other (no matter what, don't you see?) for him—"

Mr. Longdon, as he faltered, appeared to wonder, but emitted a sound of gentleness. "Yes?"

"Why," said the stimulated Mitchy, "do, for God's sake, just let me have a finger in it."

Mr. Longdon's momentary mystification was perhaps partly but the natural effect of constitutional prudence. "A finger?"

"I mean—let me help."

"Oh!" breathed the old man thoughtfully and without meeting his eyes.

Mitchy, as if with more to say, watched him an instant; then, before speaking, caught himself up. "Look out—here he comes."

Hearing the stir at the door by which he had entered, he looked round; but it opened at first only to admit Vanderbank's servant. "Miss Brookenham!" the man announced; on which the two gentlemen in the room were—audibly, almost violently—precipitated into a union of surprise.

XI.

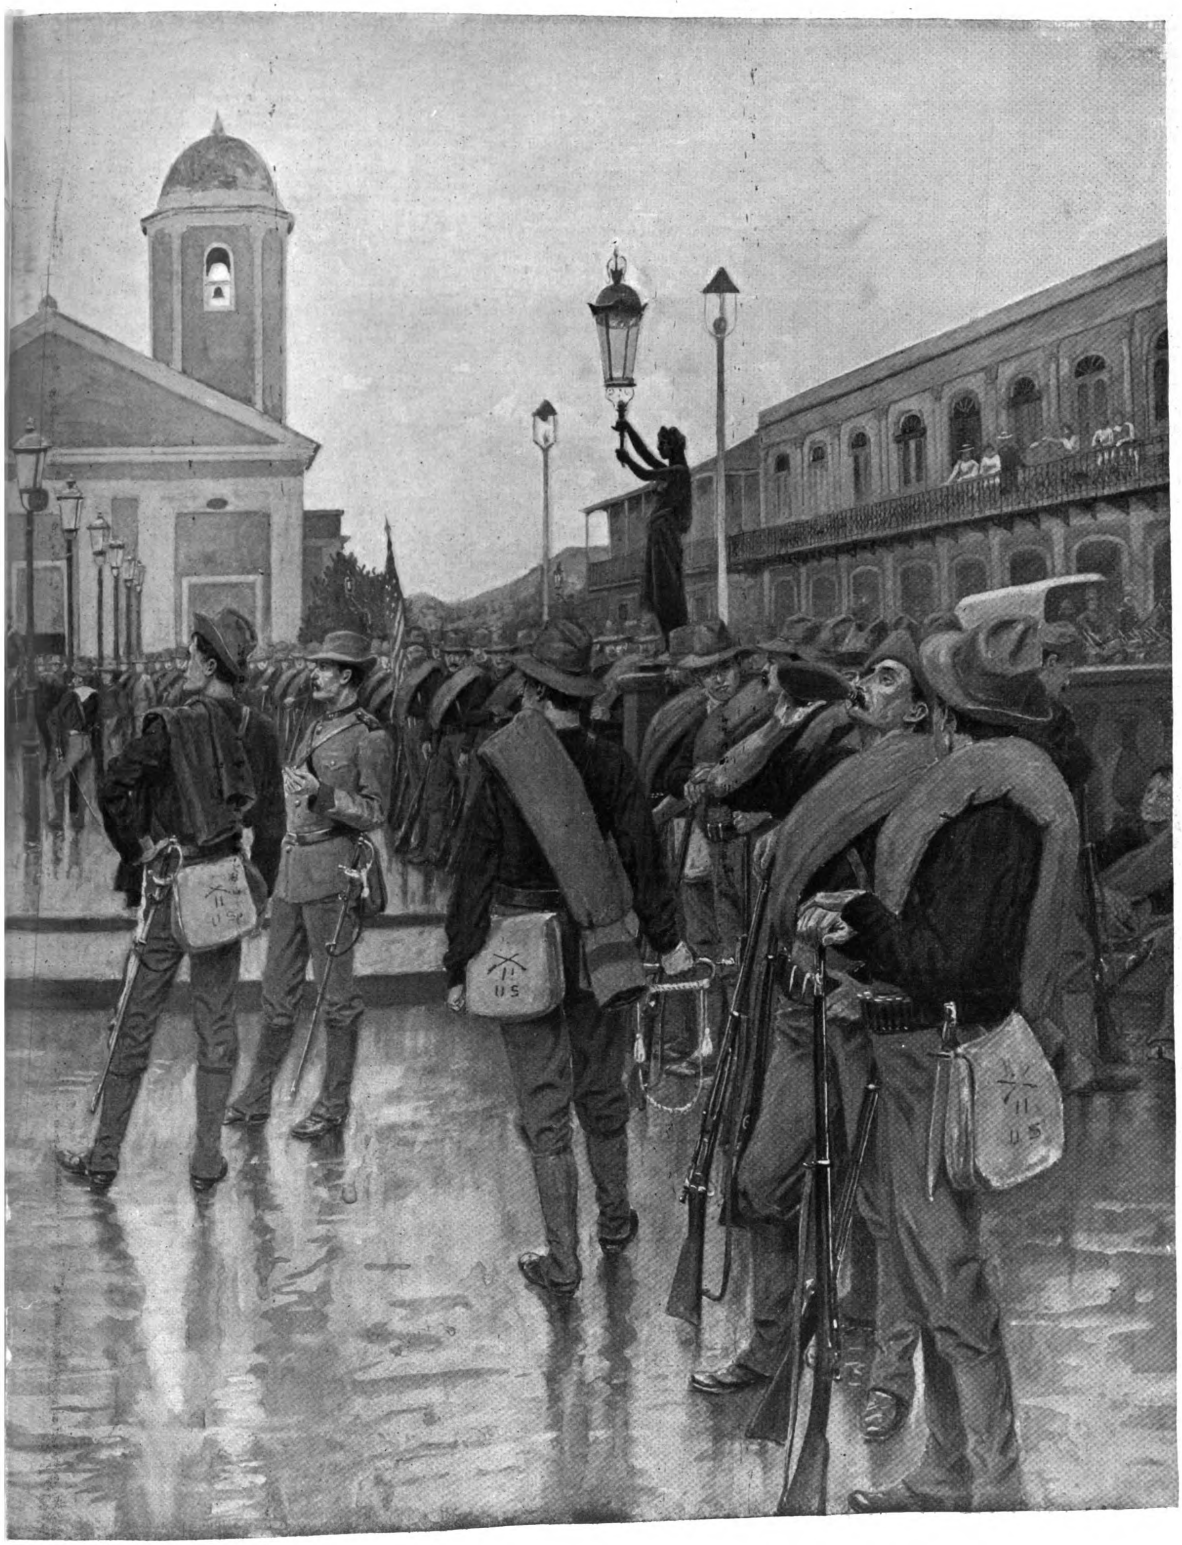
Whatever she was, it would have seemed, Nanda was not easily abashed, for, though she drew up an instant on failing to find in the room the person whose invitation she had obeyed, she advanced the next moment as if either of the gentlemen before her would answer as well. "How do you do Mr. Mitchy? How do you do Mr. Longdon?" She made no difference for them, speaking to the elder, whom she had not yet seen, as if they were already acquainted. There was, moreover, in the air of that personage at this juncture little to invite such a confidence: he appeared to have been startled, in the oddest manner, into stillness, and holding out no hand to meet her, only stared rather stiffly and without a smile. An observer disposed to interpret the scene might have fancied him a trifle put off by the girl's familiarity, or even, as by a singular effect of her self-possession, stricken into deeper diffidence. This self possession, however, took, on her own part, no account of any awkwardness; it seemed the greater from the fact that she was almost unnaturally grave; and it overflowed in the immediate challenge, "Do you mean to say Van isn't here?—I've come without mother—she said I could, to see him," she went on, addressing herself more particularly to Mitchy. "But she didn't say I might do anything of that sort to see you."

If there was something serious in Nanda and something blank in their companion, there was, superficially at least, nothing in Mr. Mitchett but his usual flush of gayety. "Did she really send you off, this way, alone?" Then while the girl's face met his own with the clear confession of it, "Isn't she too splendid for anything?" he asked with immense enjoyment. "What do you suppose is her

* Begun in HARPER'S WEEKLY No. 2189.

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE



Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

SCHWAN'S REGULARS ON THE PL

DRAWN BY R. F. ZOGBAUM, SPECIAL

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

ZA AT MAYAGUEZ, PUERTO RICO.

ARTIST FOR "HARPER'S WEEKLY."

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google idea?" Nanda's eyes had now turned to Mr. Longdon, whom she fixed with her mild straightness; which led to Mitchy's carrying on and repeating the appeal. "Isn't Mrs. Brook charming? What do you suppose is her idea?"

It was a bound into the mystery, a bound of which his fellow-visitor stood quite unconscious, only looking at Nanda still with the same coldness of wonder. All expression had, for the minute, been arrested in Mr. Longdon, but he at last began to show that it had merely been retarded. Yet it was almost with solemnity that he put forth his hand. "How do you do?—how do you do? I'm so glad—!"

Nanda shook hands with him as if she had done so already, though it might have been just her look of curiosity that detracted from her air of amusing herself. "Mother has wanted me awfully to see you. She told me to give you her love," she said. Then she added with odd irrelevance: "I didn't come in the carriage, nor in a cab or an omnibus."

"You came on a bicycle?" Mitchy inquired.

"No, I walked." She still spoke without a gleam.

"Mother wants me to do everything."

"Even to walk!" Mitchy laughed. "Oh yes, we must, in these times, keep up our walking!" The ingenious observer just now suggested might even have detected in the still higher rise of this visitor's spirits a want of mere inward ease.

She had taken no notice of the effect upon him of her mention of her mother, and she took none, visibly, of Mr. Longdon's manner or of his words; what she did, while the two men, without offering her, either, a seat, practically lost themselves in their deepening vision, was to give her attention to all the place, looking at the books, pictures and other significant objects, and especially at the small table set out for tea, to which the servant who had admitted her now returned with a steaming kettle. "Isn't it charming here? Will there be any one else? Where is Mr. Van? Shall I make tea?" There was just a faint quaver, showing a command of the situation more desired perhaps than achieved, in the very rapid sequence of these ejaculations. The servant meanwhile had placed the hot water above the little silver lamp and left the room.

"Do you suppose there's anything the matter? Oughtn't the man—or do you know our host's room?" Mr. Longdon, addressing Mitchy with solicitude, yet began to show, in a countenance less blank, a return of his sense of relations. It was as if something had happened to him and he were in haste to convert the signs of it into an appearance of care for the proprieties.

"Oh," said Mitchy, "Van's only making himself beautiful"—which account of their absent entertainer drew some point from his appearance at the moment in the doorway furthest removed from the place where the three were gathered.

Vanderbank came in with friendly haste and with something of the look indeed—refreshed, almost rosy, brightly brushed and quickly buttoned—of emerging, out of breath, from pleasant ablutions and renewals. "What a brute to have kept you waiting! I come back from work quite begrimed. How d'ye do, how d'ye do, how d'ye do? What's the matter with you, huddled there as if you were on a street-crossing? I want you to think this a refuge—but not of that kind!" he laughed. "Sit down, for Heaven's sake; lie down—be happy! Of course you've made acquaintance all—except that Mitchy's so modest! Tea, tea!"—and he bustled to the table, where, the next minute, he appeared rather helpless. "Nanda, you blessed child, do you mind making it! How jolly of you!—are you all right?" He seemed, with this, for the first time, to be aware of somebody's absence. "Your mother isn't coming? She let you come alone? How jolly of her!" Pulling off her gloves, she had come immediately to his assistance; on which, quitting the table and laying hands on Mr. Longdon's shoulders to push him toward a sofa, he continued to talk, to sound a note of which the humor was the exaggeration of his flurry. "How jolly of you to be willing to come—most awfully kind! I hope she isn't ill? Do, Mitchy, lie down. Down, Mitchy, down!—that's the only way to keep you." He had waited for no account of Mrs. Brookenham's health, and it might have been apparent—still to our sharp spectator—that he found nothing wonderful in Nanda's unsupported arrival.

"I can make tea beautifully," she said from behind her table. "Mother showed me how this morning."

"This morning?"—and Mitchy, who, before the fire and still erect, had declined to be laid low, greeted the simple remark with uproarious mirth. "Dear young lady, you're the most delicious family!"

"She showed me at breakfast about the little things to do. She thought I might have to make it here and told me to offer," the girl went on. "I haven't yet done it this way at home—I usually have my tea upstairs. They bring it up in a cup, all made and very weak, with a piece of bread and-butter in the saucer. That's because I'm so young. Tishy never lets me touch hers, either; so we had to make up for lost time. That's what mother said"—she followed up her story, and her young distinctness had clearly something to do with a certain pale concentration in Mr. Longdon's face. "Mother isn't ill, but she told me already yesterday she wouldn't come. She said it's really all for me. I'm sure I hope it is!"—with which there flickered in her eyes, dimly but perhaps all the more prettily, the first intimation they had given of the light of laughter. "She told me you would understand, Mr. Van—from something you've said to her. It's to see Mr. Longdon without—she thinks—her spoiling it."

"Oh, my dear child, 'spoiling it'!" Vanderbank protested as he took a cup of tea from her to carry to their friend. "When did your mother ever spoil anything? I told her Mr. Longdon wanted to see you, but I didn't say anything of his not yearning also for the rest of the family."

A sound of protest rather formless escaped from the gentleman named, but Nanda continued to carry out her duty. "She told me to ask why he hadn't been again to see her. Mr. Mitchy, sugar?—isn't that the way to say it? Three lumps? You're like me, only that I more often take five." Mitchy had dashed forward for his tea; she gave it to him; then she added, with her eyes on Mr. Longdon's, which she had had no difficulty in catching: "She told me to ask you all sorts of things."

The old man had got up to take his cup from Vanderbank, whose hand, however, urged him to sit down again. Mr. Longdon, resisting, kept erect with a low gasp that his host only was near enough to catch. This suddenly appeared to confirm an impression gathered by Vanderbank in their contact, a strange sense that his visitor was so agitated as to be trembling in every limb. It brought to his lips a kind ejaculation—"I say!" But even as he spoke, Mr. Longdon's face, still pale, but with a smile that was not all pain, seemed to supplicate him not to notice; and he was not a man to require more than this to achieve a divination as deep as it was rapid. "Why, we've all been scattered for Easter, haven't we?" he asked of Nanda. "Mr. Longdon has been at home, your mother and father have been paying visits, I myself have been out of London, Mitchy has been to Paris, and you—oh yes, I know where you've been."

"Ah, we all know that—there has been such a row made about it!" Mitchy said.

"Yes, I've heard of the feeling there is," Nanda replied. "It's supposed to be awful, my knowing Tishy—quite too awful."

Mr. Longdon, with Vanderbank's covert aid, had begun to appear to have pulled himself together, dropping back upon his sofa and giving some attention to his tea. It might have been with the notion of showing himself at ease that he turned, on this, a benevolent smile to the girl. "But what, my dear, is the objection—?"

She looked gravely from him to Vanderbank and to Mitchy and then back again from one of these to the other. "Do you think I ought to say?"

They both laughed, and they both just appeared uncertain, but Vanderbank spoke first. "I don't imagine, Nanda, that you really know."

"No—as a family, you're perfection!" Mitchy broke out. Before the fire again, with his cup, he addressed his hilarity to Mr. Longdon. "I told you a tremendous lot, didn't I? But I didn't tell you about that."

The old man maintained, yet with a certain vagueness, the attitude of amiable inquiry. "About the—a—family?"

"Well," Mitchy smiled, "about its ramifications. This young lady has a tremendous friendship—and, in short, it's all very complicated."

"My dear Nanda," said Vanderbank, "it's all very simple: don't believe a word of anything of the sort."

He had spoken as with the intention of a large, light optimism; but there was clearly something in the girl that would always make for lucidity. "Do you mean about Carrie Donner? I don't believe it, and at any rate I don't think it's any one's business. I shouldn't have a very high opinion of a person who would give up a friend." She stopped short, with the sense apparently that she was saying more than she meant, though, strangely, as if it had been an effect of her type and of her voice, there was neither pertness nor passion in the profession she had just made. Curiously wanting as she seemed both in timidity and in levity, she was to a certainty not self-conscious—she was extraordinarily simple. Mr. Longdon looked at her now with an evident surrender to his extreme interest, and it might well have perplexed him to see her at once so positive and yet of so fresh and sweet a tenderness of youth.

"That's right, that's right, my dear young lady: never, never give up a friend for anything any one says!" It was Mitchy who rang out with this lively wisdom, the action of which on Mr. Longdon—unless indeed it was the action of something else—was to make that personage, in a manner that held the others watching him in a slight suspense, suddenly spring to his feet again, put down his teacup carefully on a table near him and then, without a word, as if no one had been present, quietly wander away and disappear through the door left open on Vanderbank's entrance. It opened into a second, a smaller sitting-room, into which the eyes of his companions followed him.

"What's the matter?" Nanda asked. "Has he been taken ill?"

"He is rum, my dear Van," Mitchy said; "but you're right—of a charm, a distinction! In short just the sort of thing we want."

"The sort of thing we 'want'—I dare say!" Vanderbank laughed. "But it's not the sort of thing that's to be had for the asking, and we shall be mighty lucky if we can get it."

Mitchy turned with amusement to Nanda. "Van has invented him, and, with the natural greed of the inventor, won't let us have him cheap. Well," he went on, "I'll pay my share of the expense."

"The difficulty is that he's so much too good for us," Vanderbank explained.

"Ungrateful wretch," his friend cried, "that's just what I've been telling him that you are! Let the return you make not be to deprive me—!"

"Mr. Van's not at all too good for me, if you mean that," Nanda broke in. She had finished her tea-making and leaned back in her chair with her hands folded on the edge of the tray.

Vanderbank only smiled at her in silence, but Mitchy took it up. "There's nobody too good for you, of course; only you're not quite, don't you know? in our set. You're in Mrs. Grendon's. I know what you're going to say—that she hasn't got any set, that she's just a loose little white flower dropped on the indifferent bosom of the world. But you're the small sprig of tender green that, added to her, makes her immediately 'compose'."

Nanda looked at him with her cold kindness. "What nonsense you do talk!"

"Your tone is sweet to me," he returned, "as showing that you don't think me, either, too good for you. No one, remember, will take that for your excuse when the world some day sees me annihilated by your having put an end to our so harmless relations."

The girl appeared to lose herself a moment in the abysmal humanity over which his fairly fascinating ugliness played like the whirl of an eddy. "Martyr!" she exclaimed, gently. But there was no smile with it. She turned to Vanderbank, who, during the previous minute, had moved toward the neighboring room, then, hesitating, taking counsel of discretion, had come back a little nervously. "What is the matter?"

"What do you want to get out of him, you wretch?" Mitchy went on as their host, for an instant, produced no answer.

Vanderbank, whose handsome face had a thought in it, looked a trifle absently from one of them to the other; but it was to Nanda he spoke. "Do you like him, Nanda?"

She showed surprise at the question. "How can I know so soon?"

"He knows already."

Mitchy, with his eyes on her, became radiant to interpret. "He knows that he's pierced to the heart!"

"The matter with him, as you call it," Vanderbank brought out, "is one of the most beautiful things I've ever seen." He looked at her as with a hope that she would understand it. "Beautiful, beautiful, beautiful!"

"Precisely," Mitchy continued, "the victim done for by one glance of the goddess!"

Nanda, motionless in her chair, fixed her other friend with clear curiosity. "'Beautiful'? Why beautiful?"

Vanderbank, about to speak, checked himself. "I won't spoil it. Have it from him!"—and, returning to the old man, he this time went out.

Mitchy and Nanda looked at each other. "But isn't it rather awful?" Mitchy demanded.

She got up without answering; she slowly came away from the table. "I think I do know if I like him."

"Well you may," Mitchy exclaimed, "after his putting before you probably, on the whole, the greatest of your triumphs."

"And I also know, I think, Mr. Mitchy, that I like you." She spoke without attention to this hyperbole.

"In spite of my ineffectual attempts to be brilliant? That's a joy," he went on, "if it's not drawn out by the mere clumsiness of my flattery." She had turned away from him, kindly enough, as if time for his talk in the air were always to be allowed him; she took in vaguely Vanderbank's books and prints. "Why didn't your mother come?" Mitchy then inquired.

At this she again looked at him. "Do you mention her as a way of alluding to something you guess she must have told me?"

"That I've always supposed I make your flesh creep? Yes," Mitchy admitted; "I see that she must have said to you: 'Be nice to him, to show him it isn't quite so bad as that!' So you are nice—so you always will be nice. But I adore you, all the same, without illusions."

She had opened, at one of the tables, unperceivingly, a big volume, of which she turned the leaves. "Don't 'adore' a girl, Mr. Mitchy—just help her. That's more to the purpose."

"Help you?" he cried. "You bring tears to my eyes!"

"Can't a girl have friends?" she went on. "I never heard of anything so idiotic." Giving him, however, no chance to take her up on this, she made a quick transition. "Mother didn't come because she wants me now, as she says, more to share her own life."

Mitchy looked at it. "But is this the way for her to share yours?"

"Ah, that's another matter—about which you must talk to her. She wants me not, any more, to see only with her eyes. She's throwing me into the world."

Mitchy had listened with the liveliest interest, but he presently broke into a laugh. "What a good thing, then, that I'm there to catch you!"

Without—it might have been seen—having gathered the smallest impression of what they enclosed, she carefully drew together again the covers of her folio. There was deliberation in her movements. "I shall always be glad when you're there. But where do you suppose they've gone?" Her eyes were on what was visible of the other room, from which there arrived no sound of voices.

"They are there," said Mitchy, "but simply looking unutterable things about you. The impression's too deep. Let them look, and tell me meanwhile if Mrs. Donner gave you my message."

"Oh yes, she told me some humbug."

"The humbug then was in the tone my perfectly sincere speech took from herself. She gives things, I recognize, rather that sound. It's her weakness," he continued, "and perhaps even, one may say, her danger. All the more reason you should help her, as I believe you're supposed to be doing, aren't you? I hope you feel that you are," he earnestly added.

He had spoken this time gravely enough, and with magnificent gravity Nanda replied: "I have helped her. Tishy is sure I have. That's what Tishy wants me for. She says that to be with some nice girl is really the best thing for her."

Poor Mitchy's face, hereupon, would have been interesting, would have been distinctly touching, to other eyes; but Nanda's were not heedful of it. "Oh," he returned after an instant and without profane mirth, "that seems to me the best thing for any one."

Vanderbank, however, might have caught his expression, for Vanderbank now reappeared, smiling on the pair as if struck by their intimacy. "How you are keeping it up!" Then to Nanda, persuasively: "Do you mind going to him in there? I want him so really to see you. It's quite, you know, what he came for."

Nanda seemed to wonder. "What will he do to me? Anything dreadful?"

"He'll tell you what I meant just now."

"Oh," said Nanda, "if he's a person who can tell me sometimes what you mean—!" With which she went quickly off.

"And can't I hear?" Mitchy asked of his host while they looked after her.

"Yes, but only from me." Vanderbank had pushed him to a seat again, and was casting about for cigarettes. "Be quiet and smoke, and I'll tell you."

Mitchy, on the sofa, received, with meditation, a light. "Will she understand? She has everything in the world but one," he added. "But that's half."

Vanderbank, before him, lighted for himself. "What is it?"

"A touch of humor."

"Oh yes, she's serious."

Mitchy smoked a little. "She's tragic."

His friend, at the fire, watched a moment the empty portion of the other room, then walked across to give the door a light push that all but closed it. "It's rather odd," he remarked as he came back—"that's quite what I just said to him. But he won't invoke the comic sense."

XII.

"Is it the shock of the resemblance to her grandmother?" Vanderbank had asked of Mr. Longdon on rejoining him in his retreat. The old man, with his back turned, was gazing out of the window, and when, in

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google answer, he showed his face, there were tears in his eyes. His answer, in fact, was just these tears, the significance of which Vanderbank immediately recognized. "It's still greater then than you gathered from her photograph."

"It's the most extraordinary thing in the world. I'm too absurd to be so upset"—Mr. Longdon smiled through his tears—"but if you had known Lady Julia you would understand. It's she again, as I first knew her, to the life; and not only in feature, in stature, in color, in movement, but in every bodily mark and sign, in every look of the eyes, above all—oh, to a degree!—in the sound, in the charm, of the voice." He spoke low and confidentially, but with an intensity that now relieved him—he was restless in his emotion. He moved about, in his excitement, gently, as if with a sacred awe—as if, but a few steps away, he had been in the very presence. "She's all Lady Julia. There isn't a touch of her mother. It's unique—an absolute revival. I see nothing of her father, either—I see nothing of any one else. Isn't it thought wonderful by every one?" he went on. "Why didn't you tell me?"

"To have prepared you a little?"—Vanderbank felt almost guilty. "I see—I should have liked to do so; though," he added, smiling, "I might so, by putting you on your guard, have caused myself to lose what, if you'll allow me to say so, strikes me as one of the most touching tributes I've ever seen rendered to a woman. In fact, however, how could I know? I never saw Lady Julia, and you had, in advance, all the evidence that I could have: the portrait—pretty bad, in the taste of the time, I admit—and the three or four photographs that, with it, you must have noticed at Mrs. Brook's. These things must have compared themselves, for you, with my photograph, in there, of the granddaughter. The similarity, of course, we had all observed, but it has taken your wonderful memory and your admirable vision to put into it all the detail."

Mr. Longdon thought a moment, giving a dab with his pocket-handkerchief. "Very true—you're quite right. It's far beyond any identity in the pictures. But why did you tell me," he added more sharply, "that she isn't beautiful?"

"You've deprived me," Vanderbank laughed, "of the power of expressing civilly any surprise at your finding her so. But I said to you, please remember, nothing that qualified a jot my sense of the curious character of her face. I have always positively found in it a recall of the type of the period you must be thinking of. It isn't a bit modern. It's a face of Sir Thomas Lawrence—"

"It's a face of Gainsborough!" Mr. Longdon returned with spirit. "Lady Julia herself harked back."

Vanderbank, clearly, was equally touched and amused. "Let us say at once that it's a face of Raphael."

His old friend's hand was instantly on his arm. "That's exactly what I often said to myself of Lady Julia's."

"The forehead's a little too high," said Vanderbank.

"But it's just that excess, that, with the exquisite eyes and the particular disposition, round it, of the fair hair, makes the individual grace, makes the beauty of the reminder."

On his letting go of Vanderbank's arm the young man held him, as an encouragement to confidence, by his own. "It's a face that should have the long side-ringlets of 1830. It should have the rest of the personal arrangement, the pelisse, the shape of bonnet, the sprigged muslin dress and the cross-laced sandals. It should have arrived in a pea-green 'tilbury,' and it should be a reader of Mrs. Radcliffe. And all this to complete the Raphael!"

Mr. Longdon, who, relieved by expression, had begun to recover himself, looked hard a moment at his companion. "How you've observed her!"

Vanderbank met it without confusion. "Whom haven't I observed? Do you like her?" he then rather oddly and abruptly asked.

The old man broke away again. "How can I tell—with such disparities?"

"The manner must be different," Vanderbank suggested. "And the things she says."

His visitor was before him again. "I don't know what to make of them. They don't go with the rest of her. Lady Julia," said Mr. Longdon, "was rather shy."

On this too his host could meet him. "She must have been. And Nanda—yes, certainly—doesn't give that impression."

"On the contrary. But Lady Julia was gay!" he added, with an eagerness that made Vanderbank smile.

"I can also see that. Nanda doesn't joke. And yet," the young man continued with his exemplary candor, "we mustn't speak of her, must we? as if she were bold and grim."

Mr. Longdon fixed him. "Do you think she's sad?"

They had preserved their dropped tone and might, with their heads together, have been conferring as the party "out" in some game with the couple in the other room. "Yes. Sad." But Vanderbank broke off. "I'll send her to you." Thus it was he had come back to her.

Nanda, on joining Mr. Longdon, went straight to the point. "He says it's so beautiful—what you feel on seeing me; if that is what he meant." The old man said nothing again, at first; he only smiled at her, but less strangely now, and then appeared to look about him for some place where she could sit near him. There was a sofa in this room too, on which, observing it, she quickly sank down, so that they were presently together, placed a little sideways and face to face. She had shown perhaps that she supposed him to have wished to take her hand, but he forbore to touch her, only letting her feel all the kindness of his eyes and their long, backward vision. These things she evidently felt soon enough; she went on before he had spoken. "I know how well you knew my grandmother. Mother has told me—and I'm so glad. She told me to say to you that she wants you to tell me." Just a shade, at this, might, over the old man's face, have appeared to drop; but who was there to detect whether the girl observed it? It didn't prevent, at any rate, her completing her statement. "That's why, to-day, she wished me to come alone. She wished you to have me, she said, all to yourself."

No, decidedly, she was not shy: that mute reflection was in the air an instant. "That, no doubt, is the best way. I thank her very much. I called, after having had the honor of dining—I called, I think, three times," he went on, with a sudden displacement of the question; "but I had the misfortune, each time, to miss her."

She kept looking at him with her intense young clearness. "I didn't know about that. Mother thinks she's more at home than almost any one. She does it on purpose: she knows what it is," Nanda pursued, with her perfect gravity, "for people to be disappointed of finding her."

"Oh, I shall find her yet," said Mr. Longdon. "And then I hope I shall also find you."

She appeared simply to consider the possibility and, after an instant, to think well of it. "I dare say you will now, for now I shall be down."

Her companion just blinked. "In the drawing-room, you mean—always?"

It was quite what she meant. "Always. I shall see all the people who come. It will be a great thing for me. I want to hear all the talk. Mr. Mitchett says I ought to—that it helps to form the young mind. I hoped, for that reason," she went on, with the directness that made her honesty almost violent—"I hoped there would be more people here to-day."

"I'm very glad there are not"—the old man rang equally clear. "Mr. Vanderbank kindly arranged the matter for me just this way. I met him at dinner, at your mother's, three weeks ago, and he brought me home here that night, when, as knowing you so differently, we took the liberty of talking you all over. It had the effect, naturally, of making me want to begin with you afresh—only that seemed difficult too without further help. This he good-naturedly offered me; he said"—and Mr. Longdon recovered his spirits to repeat it—"'Hang it, I'll have them here for you!'"

"I see—he knew we would come." Then she caught herself up. "But we haven't come, have we?".

"Oh, it's all right—it's all right. To me the occasion is brilliant and the affluence great. I've had such talk with those young men—"

"I see"—she was again prompt, but beyond any young person he had ever met she might have struck him as literal. "You're not used to such talk. Neither am I. It's rather wonderful, isn't it? They're thought awfully clever, Mr. Van and Mr. Mitchy. Do you like them?" she pushed on.

Mr. Longdon, who, as compared with her, might have struck a spectator as infernally subtle, took an instant to think. "I've never met Mr. Mitchett before."

"Well, he always thinks one doesn't like him," Nanda explained. "But one does. One ought to," she added.

Her companion had another pause. "He likes you."

Oh, Mr. Longdon needn't have hesitated! "I know he does. He has told mother. He has told lots of people."

"He has told even you," Mr. Longdon smiled.

"Yes—but that isn't the same. I don't think he's a bit dreadful;" she pursued. Still, there was a greater interest. "Do you like Mr. Van?"

This time her interlocutor indeed hung fire. "How can I tell? He dazzles me."

"But don't you like that?" Then before he could really say: "You're afraid he may be false?"

At this he fairly laughed. "You go to the point!" She just colored, to have amused him so, but he quickly went on: "I think one has a little natural nervousness at being carried off one's feet. I'm afraid I've always liked too much to see where I'm going."

"And you don't, with him?" She spoke with her curious, hard interest. "I understand. But I think I like to be dazzled."

"Oh, you've got time—you can come round again; you've a margin for accidents, for disappointments and recoveries; you can take one thing with another. But I've only my last little scrap."

"And you want to make no mistakes—I see."

"Well—I'm too easily upset."

"Ah, so am I," said Nanda. "I assure you that, in spite of what you say, I want to make no mistakes either. I've seen a great many—though you mightn't think it," she persisted; "I really know what they may be. Do you like me?" she brought forth. But even on this she spared him too; a look appeared to have been enough for her. "How can you say, of course, already?—if you can't say for Mr. Van. I mean as you've seen him so much. When he asked me just now if I liked you, I told him it was too soon. But it isn't, now; you see it goes fast. I do like you." She gave him no time to acknowledge this tribute, but, as if it were a matter of course, tried him quickly with something else. "Can you say if you like mother?"

He could meet it pretty well now. "There are immense reasons why I should."

"Yes—I know about them, as I mentioned: mother has told me." But what she had to put to him kept up his surprise. "Have reasons anything to do with it? I don't believe you like her!" she exclaimed. "She doesn't think so," she added.

The old man's face, at last, partly bewildered, partly reassured, showed even more something finer still in the effect she produced. "Into what mysteries you plunge!"

"Oh, we do; that's what every one says of us. We discuss everything and every one—we're always discussing each other. I think we must be rather celebrated for it, and it's a kind of trick—isn't it?—that's catching. But it, and it's a kind of trick—isn't it?—that's catching. But don't you think it's the most interesting sort of talk? Mother says we haven't any prejudices. You have, probably, quantities—and beautiful ones: so perhaps I oughtn't to tell you. But you'll find out for yourself."

"Yes—I'm rather slow; but I generally end by finding out. And I've got, thank Heaven," said Mr. Longdon, "plenty of prejudices."

"Then I hope you'll tell me some of them," Nanda replied, in a tone evidently marking how much he pleased her.

"Ah, you must do as I do—you must find out for yourself. Your resemblance to your grandmother is quite prodigious," he immediately added.

"That's what I wish you'd tell me about—your recollection of her and your wonderful feeling about her. Mother has told me things, but that I should have something straight from you is exactly what she also wants. My grandmother must have been awfully nice," the girl rambled on, "and I somehow don't see myself at all as the same sort of person."

"Oh, I don't say you're in the least the same sort: all I allude to," Mr. Longdon returned, "is the miracle of the physical heredity. Nothing could be less like her than your manner and your talk."

Nanda looked at him with all her honesty. "They're not so good, you must think."

He hung fire an instant, but was as honest as she. "You're separated from her by a gulf—and not only of time. Personally, you see, you breathe a different air."

She thought—she quite took it in. "Of course. And you breathe the same—the same old one, I mean, as my grandmother."

"The same old one," Mr. Longdon smiled, "as much as possible. Some day I'll tell you more of what you desire. I can't go into it now."

"Because I've upset you so?" Nanda frankly asked.

"That's one of the reasons."

"I think I can see another too," she observed after a moment. "You're not sure how much I shall understand. But I shall understand," she went on, "more, perhaps, than you think. In fact," she said earnestly, "I promise to understand. I've some imagination. Had my grandmother?" she asked. Her actual sequences were not rapid, but she had already anticipated him. "I've thought of that before, because I put the same question to mother."

"And what did your mother say?"

"'Imagination—dear mamma? Not a grain!'"

The old man showed a faint flush. "Your mother then has a supply that makes up for it."

The girl fixed him, on this, with a deeper attention. "You don't like her having said that."

His color came stronger, though a slightly strained smile did what it could to diffuse coolness. "I don't care a single scrap, my dear, in respect to the friend I'm speaking of, for any judgment but my own."

"Not even for her daughter's?"

"Not even for her daughter's." Mr. Longdon had not spoken loud, but he rang as clear as a bell.

Nanda, for admiration of it, broke almost for the first time into the semblance of a smile. "You feel as if my grandmother were quite your property!"

"Oh, quite."

"I say—that's splendid!"

"I'm glad you like it," he answered kindly.

The very kindness pulled her up. "Excuse my speaking so, but I'm sure you know what I mean. You mustn't think," she eagerly continued, "that mother won't also want to hear you."

"On the subject of Lady Julia?" He gently, but very effectively, shook his head. "Your mother shall never hear me."

Nanda appeared to wonder at it an instant, and it made her completely grave again. "It will be all for me?"

"Whatever there may be of it, my dear."

"Oh, I shall get it all out of you," she returned without hesitation. Her mixture of free familiarity and of the vividness of evocation of something, whatever it was, sharply opposed—the little worry of this contradiction, not altogether unpleasant, continued to fill his consciousness more discernibly than anything else. It was really reflected in his quick brown eyes that she alternately drew him on and warned him off, but also that what they were beginning more and more to make out was an emotion of her own trembling there beneath her tension. His glimpse of it widened—his glimpse of it fairly triumphed when, suddenly, after this last declaration, she threw off with quite the same accent, but quite another effect: "I'm glad to be like any one the thought of whom makes you so good! You are good," she continued; "I see already how I shall feel it." She stared at him with tears, the sight of which brought his own straight back, so that thus, for a moment, they sat there together.

"My dear child!" he at last simply murmured. But he laid his hand on her now, and her own immediately met it.

"You'll get used to me," she said with the same gentleness that the response of her touch had tried to express; "and I shall be so careful with you that—well, you'll see!" She broke short off with a quaver, and the next instant she turned—there was some one at the door. Vanderbank, still not quite at his ease, had come back to smile upon them. Detaching herself from Mr. Longdon, she got straight up to meet him. "You were right, Mr. Van. It's beautiful, beautiful, beautiful!"

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

ONE WAY OF DOING IT.

THE mysteries of the censorship of various European literary and dramatic centres would make a volume of disclosures entertaining to all who write plays and books for a living. Every now and then a betrayal in a reminiscence will indicate the underworkings of such state machinery, amusingly. In 1872–3 the late Jules Simon was Minister of the Fine Arts, under the Presidency of M. Thiers. George Sand, aged, but still industriously an author at that time, had had a vast success with her novel—now less read than many of her better books—Mademoiselle de la Quintinie. Not deterred by its bold psychologic topic—the weakness of a priest's temperament under temptation—she had made a play out of the story, and it was accepted at the Odéon. From the first the piece was seen in the light of a delicate and undesirable drama. But, as ill luck had it, never had Madame Dudevant been so set on having a piece of hers played, and never had she been so dull in recognizing its unpleasantness. The play would occasion scandal, and give offence, beyond doubt, to the Church and to all devout people; and yet George Sand was not an author to be refused and reprimanded. Besides all this, Jules Simon was a close personal friend of George Sand, and confessed that he did not dare to tell her the situation so troubling him. At last an expedient occurred. Simon sent for Duquesnel, of the Odéon's direction. "Was everything ready?" asked Simon, anxiously. Everything, yes; the actors had reached the last rehearsals, and the scenes and costumes were all in completeness—so said Duquesnel, and asked if the play was really to be interdicted. "I interdict a play by my dear friend Madame Dudevant? Never!" cries Simon. "But—all the same—" and he looked expressively at Duquesnel. Not a word more was said. The manager understood, and retired. The play was never interdicted; but "Mlle. de la Quintinie" never was played. From the hour of that interview with Simon and that look, something always happened, especially an illness, among the members of the cast. One by one they were laid up with colds, colics, rheumatics, bilious attacks. Paint-pots fell on the scenery, and it had to be repainted, and was not. Costumes were lost. Spring came, and the Odéon closed for the vacation. In the autumn the drama "Mauprat" was taken up, and the run of it was so long that "Mlle. de la Quintinie" again lapsed. In 1876 George Sand died. Nobody knows where the manuscript of her unplayed drama to-day reposes.

E. I. S.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Digitized by Google

AN EXCHANGE OF PRISONERS.—From the Painting by Gilbert Gaul.

Original from PENN STATE

THE difference between a poor thing well done and an excellent thing poorly done has seldom been more effectively illustrated than in the two metropolitan novelties of the week. "On and Off," with which Mr. Charles Frohman's new comedy company is opening at the Madison Square Theatre, is an anonymous version, un-Americanized, of "Le Contrôleur des Wagon-Lits," Alexandre Bisson's latest hit. "Uncle Dick," which Mr. Sol. Smith Russell is playing at the Montauk Theatre, Brooklyn, is a naturalized adaptation by Miss Martha Morton from an unnamed German original.

"On and Off," though impossible enough in its main situations, is a delight to the sense of technical excellence.

KATHERINE FLORENCE,
Now appearing in "On and Off" at the Madison Square Theatre, New York.

The married life of one Godfray is made miserable by his parents-in-law. By pretending to be occupied as inspector of sleeping-cars he gets three days a week off, and improves the opportunity to plan a divorce and sue for the hand of a young woman with acceptable parents-in-law. The real inspector, whose name is also Godfray, discovers this plot, and by intimidating the pretender, manages to amuse himself with the pretender's wife, and also to marry the young woman with acceptable parents-in-law. Few plots could be more hackneyed or more impossible; yet the treatment of the plot is so fresh and powerful that the play affords an excellent evening's fun. Of the company, Miss Katherine Florence and Miss Amelia Bingham have the good looks, and Mr. Fritz Williams and Mr. E. M. Holland—the two Godfrays—have the comic genius. Mr. Holland's acting is truly admirable in its simplicity, certainty, and variety of effect, and has the creative touch of the artist. In a word, the technical resources displayed in the production of "On and Off" are so great that one scarcely stops to realize the essential purport of what he has been listening to. When he does stop, he finds that though the farce is too artistic to be either moral or immoral, it presupposes an amount of obliquity that can scarcely fail to deaden one's sensibilities. And the effect is only the worse because what happens is presented so attractively and so convincingly.

A Poor Thing Well Done.

With "Uncle Dick" the case is reversed. The story has to do with a wanderer, who, having made a fortune in South Africa, comes back to live and die in the bucolic serenity and goodness of his native village. He finds the village, but not the bucolic serenity and goodness. His relatives have been bitten by the same ambitious unrest that carried him away in the first place. Each one is trying to be something he is not fitted to be. The fun comes out of the fact that Uncle Dick puts it in the power of each one to be the thing he is not fitted to be, and that each is made to repent his bargain heartily. They learn to sigh for the serenity and goodness of a normal life, as Uncle Dick himself has done. That is a sympathetic theme, and far more deeply founded in human nature than any situation in the clever French farce. But the adaptation! The characters are mere algebraic symbols, and the jokes exponents that do not rise to any power. The whole thing is so crude and elementary that one rejoices that the German author was spared having his name on the programme.

A Good Thing Ill Done.

As for the impersonations, only one was worthy of the theme, the Uncle Dick of Mr. Sol. Smith Russell. That was more than worthy. To the Gemüthlichkeit of the original lines he added the sweetness and depth of humor of the American temperament. The quality of Mr. Russell's impersonation might almost be localized as Western; in a thousand ways it suggested Abraham Lincoln. Compared to the brilliant froth of "On and Off," the breadth and depth of "Uncle Dick" were the breadth and depth of the ocean. The theme of the play strikes at the heart of our modern futility of unrest; an author able to treat it with artistic skill would stand a good chance of ranging himself with the immortals.

A pretty discussion as to plays and players has lately been brought about our ears. An enterprising New York newspaper has been able to make out that, in his lecture on "The Drama as a Fine Art," Mr. I. Zangwill has rapped our playwrights and managers on the knuckles. It has used this golden opportunity to fill its columns with remonstrances, some intelligent and good-natured, others quite the reverse, and all from the prominent members of the most sensitive of professions. As for the playwright, Mr. Zangwill is reported as saying that the schoolboy who defined a plagiarist as "a writer of plays" builded better than he knew. Our playwrights steal their literature from the French drama—and leave out the literature. Mr. Bronson Howard, our leading writer of plays, answers this naughty speech by inveighing against young men of letters who issue diplomas to themselves as critics of the stage, and argues that in all ages the English stage has had little or nothing to do with literature—whether expounded by young men or old:

The Mob and the Manager.

> I have on my shelves nineteen collections of plays, most of them selected plays, practically covering the dramatic productions of the English stage. Let any one read even these selected plays and he will find that trash predominated at all times. In the collection which does not contain selected plays, but all the plays produced within a certain period, the proportion of trash is simply enormous.

It is true enough that of all the vast number of "attractions" on our stage, only a few are to be classed as drama, and of these few, fewer still make any pretence of literary quality. That is just what Mr. Zangwill was saying! And what if he did say it somewhat pointedly?

As for the managers, the enterprising newspaper evidently represented Mr. Zangwill as saying that they usually come from the riffraff, and are at best shopkeepers, and that the drama is in a rapid decline. To this Mr. Joseph Jefferson answered:

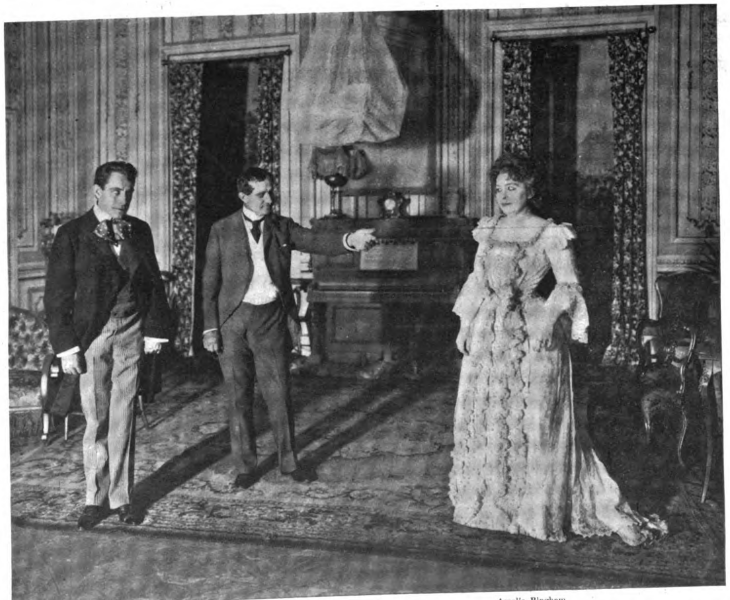
> He calls managers shopkeepers. Theoretically that sounds very severe. But practically he is wrong to condemn them for being shopkeepers. They are shopkeepers, and they shouldn't be anything else. They deal in goods. I'm part of those goods.
>
> The "decline of the drama," eh? That's an old wail. It reappears with the regularity of the sea-serpent. It rears its head in virtuous indignation, and then stealthily witnesses the plays it reviles. That wail goes far back. We find Colley Cibber complaining that French dancers and Italian mountebanks had pushed Shakespeare to the wall. And I have no doubt that if we could search the archives of Athens we should find Thespis, the first and only actor of his day, complaining of the decline of the drama.

At first glance it would seem that Mr. Zangwill had been pretty thoroughly snowed under. But a careful perusal of his lecture will reveal the fact that he not only takes a hopeful view of the modern drama, but speaks from a thorough knowledge of the stage. "The manager," he says, "is necessarily a shopkeeper. We have no right to demand that he should be anything but a business man." Far from saying hard words about Mr. Zangwill, our player people ought to pray Heaven that all writers about the stage might be as cheerful and state plain facts as plainly. Like publishing books or editing a newspaper, the production of plays is a matter of business, with the difference that the initial expense is great and the risk enormous. One is brought up against that same old tragic truth: He who lives to please, must please to live. Had the enterprising newspaper been as eager to discover the truth as to lacerate people's feelings, it would have seen at once that Mr. Zangwill and the profession are of one mind, and that that is mainly Mr. Zangwill's.

The only remark of Mr. Zangwill's that might justly have given offence was lost in the shuffle. It is to the effect that managers are very stupid business men, and

ANNIE RUSSELL,
Now appearing in "Catherine" at the Garrick Theatre, New York.

are not able to read the demand there is for legitimate drama. Mr. Zangwill exhorts managers to be shopkeepers of a higher class. Curiously enough, this very charge of stupidity has lately been independently made by the Dramatic Mirror—a trade journal that has at its command all the facts with regard to our stage. It says:



The Hope of a Literary Drama.

> Shakespeare would live even if banished utterly from the stage of this generation. Perhaps another generation will know managers who can read success in him. If the managers really could understand what the public wants the theatres would be fuller than they now are, although many faces now seen in them would be lost to sight.....
>
> The popular approval ["Cyrano de Bergerac"] proves that our public is keenly appreciative of fine things, and confounds completely those managers who glibly estimate American taste in matters dramatic at the lowest possible valuation.

The managers have only to follow Mr. I. Zangwill and they will all wear diamonds.

As for the triumph of "Cyrano," which is now fortunately quite beyond question, I should enter a slight demurrer, much as I applaud Mr. Zangwill's judgment in the main. Mr. Mansfield's success, magnificently as it is deserved, seems in some respects due to the defects of his production. The rhymed passages in the translation, so painful to sensitive ears, seem rather to please the audiences, and even a few of the critics were taken by

The Literary Element in "Cyrano."

Fritz Williams. E. M. Holland. Amelia Bingham.

A SCENE FROM "ON AND OFF," AS GIVEN BY THE MADISON SQUARE THEATRE COMEDY COMPANY, NEW YORK.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google their empty jingle. It is known that Mr. Mansfield discarded the translation which he had ordered from Miss Gertrude Hall, and which has lately been published, because Miss Hall, herself a poet of no mean distinction, refused to render the original into anything more catching than a well-modulated prose. Mr. Howard Thayer Kingsbury, whose name is attached to the accepted translation, was not only willing to drop into verse at intervals, but to permit Mr. Mansfield to fall into rhyme. In some cases to my knowledge the members of the company followed Mr. Mansfield's lead, and added rhymes of their own. This actor's instinct for mouthing is not new. Hamlet had something to say to the players about it, and Cyrano himself chastised the bad actor, Montfleury, for it. It doubtless explains the fact that many a scene in Shakespeare's best blank verse has the tag of a senseless rhyme. No doubt Shakespeare was as guiltless of those rhyme tags as Mr. Kingsbury of these; and no doubt also Shakespeare's public, like Mr. Mansfield's, enjoyed the scene more for the jig time. As for the flavor of Gascony, which we miss in Mr. Mansfield's Cyrano, it would perhaps be as little availing as the remarkable performance of the flea, in Hans Andersen's fairy-tale, who, in the contest for the hand of the Princess, jumped quite out of sight, and thereby lost the prize to the cricket, who jumped neatly into the Princess's lap! By all means give us an Anglo-Saxon Cyrano. In spite of these defects much of the quality of the original remains. The vigor of Mr. Rostand's lines is not easily done to death, and his dramatic construction is not affected. Moreover, critics who have seen the French production say that the staging of the American play is in many ways superior. Mr. Zangwill himself has told us that Mr. Mansfield's Cyrano is far more virile, far more truly heroic, than M. Coquelin's. In his dedication of the play M. Rostand avers that the soul of Cyrano has passed into M. Coquelin; but, like the soul of Hamlet, the soul of Cyrano is too great to inhabit a single frame. If M. Rostand were to see the American performance, he would perhaps inscribe the soul of the Cyrano of the third and the fifth acts to Mr. Mansfield.

JOHN CORBIN.

ALBERT SALÉZA AS MÂTHO.

MUSIC

AUTUMN MUSIC ABROAD: THE OPERA SEASON.

It is yet the time, late autumn, when the curious contrast between the theatrical movement and the musical one is emphatic. The reviewer of the musical sort of entertainments sighs for that early vivacity of a preliminary season, garnished with good stock opera and with brilliant ballets d'action. Such things make September and October briskly inviting in many European musical centres, especially those where the German stage policy rules.

ERNESTINE SCHUMANN-HEINK AS ORTRUD.

Take Frankfurt and Vienna to witness the activity of operatic doings long before winter. And it is to be remembered that New York has not the monopoly of hot fall evenings. In the single month of September, at the Frankfurt City Theatre, were presented all the following operas, lighter or heavier: "Tannhäuser," "Aïda," "Orphée aux Enfers," "Der Freischütz," "Boccaccio," "Lohengrin," "A Basso Porto," "The Flying Dutchman," "Fidelio," "The Mastersingers," "The Armorer" (Lortzing), "The Gypsy Baron," "Carmen," "Faust," "The Huguenots," "The Prophet," "Hänsel and Gretel," "Rheingold," "The Valkyr," "The Troubadour," "Hans Heiling," "Siegfried," "The Dusk of the Gods," and the "Daughter of the Regiment," besides other stable works of various calibres in the repertory of this admirably alert stage. In Vienna the list was much the same, but adding "Don Giovanni," "The Evangelist," "The Cricket on the Hearth," "Werther," "La Dame Blanche," "L'Africaine," "The Trumpeter of Säkkingen," "Romeo and Juliet," and a half-dozen of those gorgeous pantomimic ballets for which Vienna, Warsaw, and Milan are distinguished.

Autumn Opera in Frankfurt and Vienna.

In Cologne a broad repertory has been promptly taken up. Even Berlioz's colossal "The Trojans at Carthage" was not postponed till frost, nor a fresh work by Becker—"Ratbold." At Mannheim, always a busy musical city, a part of the list up to last week offered "The Huguenots," "Rienzi," "Figaro's Wedding," "Faust," "Fidelio," "The Evangelist," "The Jewess," "The White Lady," "Masaniello," "Orpheus," and "Martha." At Karlsruhe, always active with rarer and heavier matters, the Nibelungen Tetralogy has been done, several Mozart scores sung, and Berlioz's formidable "Beatrice and Benedict" drew large houses. And so it has gone on—in Bremen, Hamburg, Hanover, Munich, and Leipzig, and all over Teutonia the musical. And it all means a wide musical public, not merely a fashionable musical public.

Current Opera Elsewhere in Germany.

The fact is people try to forget warm weather in Germany by going to hear good music. In the element of ballet, a lively variety in an opera season, New York has practically everything to learn. The Metropolitan's is a stage adapted to the spectacular ballet, exactly as it is a stage suitable only for opera that includes a spectacular quality. But the ballet in several acts and given as a whole evening's entertainment has never had a fair chance to win its way here, to amuse and charm us with all that riot of color and whirl of terpsichorean elegance that makes it so tenaciously attractive in great Continental theatres. Where such ballet has been tried here, its failure to score was not that Americans cannot be children before its charm, like other people, but that, like wise children, New-Yorkers refuse to be diverted with a poor and clumsy counterfeit article.

Apropos of opera and the incoming prospectuses, Mr. Grau's announcement of the Metropolitan's official season is at hand—a portentous little book. About a million dollars is spoken of as the risk to the impresario. Attractiveness and expense in a star season seem to be at the limit in such a scheme. In fact, star singers will be as plenty as shoe-buttons. There are additions and withdrawals since Mr. Grau's less decisive sketches of his plans slipped about the papers during the summer. But no subtraction is of real account. How can one manager, in one season, need all these people? How can he really use them? How can he pay them? It is a wonderment. Take—alphabetically, as they are so many—the surnames. Of sopranos and contraltos Mr. Grau presents Adams (Suzanne), Brema, Bréguière, Bauermeister, Calvé, Eames, Engle, Lehmann, Mantelli, Meisslinger, Melba, Nordica, Pevny, Roudez, Sembrich, Schumann-Heink, Thompson (Fanchon). The tenors, barytones, and basses offer us a like mixture of races and genres, with Albers, Bars, Bispham, Carbone, Campanari, Ceppi, Devriès (Herman), Dippel, Dufriche, Van Dyk, Maurel, Meux, Mühlmann, Plançon, Pringle, de Reszké (Jean), de Reszké (Edouard), von Rooy, Saléza, Saligmac, Vanni. The four conductors are Bevignani, Mancinelli, Saar, and Schalk. A small army of practical assistants of less public duty complete the directory. It is a pleasure to see a régisseur-général (formally so called) among the functionaries. That august personage will earn his salary, whoever else does not.

The Metropolitan's Opera Season.

As to a few artists among the foregoing, curiosity will fix strongly on that admirable Polish contralto (Polish by birth, but identified with German stages all her life) Madame Ernestine Schumann-Heink. Madame Schumann-Heink ranks as the first contralto, in voice and dramatic authority, at present in European notice. She is in the prime of her powers, as her portrait here given indicates. Madame Schumann-Heink, nevertheless, has been at least nineteen years before a Continental public, in wide repertory, before her Wagner work at the Baireuth performances of 1896 drew new notice to her, and so secured her an engagement last year at Covent Garden. Miss Suzanne Adams is the latest American light soprano to be acclaimed in Paris as an exceptional débutante. Miss Adams is a Cambridge (Massachusetts) young lady, and from the first nights of her Opéra trial she has been successful in pleasing French and English auditors and critics, much as did Madame Eames, and in largely the same rôles—Juliette, Gilda, Marguerite, and so on. Miss Fanchon Thompson, another American débutante in Paris, won favor there, and almost immediately harvested new honors in London. As to Mr. Grau's truly noble army of men, Mr. Ernest van Dyk is possibly a shade the most eminent. Though he may be charged with coming to us late in his long and broad career, when I heard him sing two or three of his best parts, some months ago, it seemed to me that he sang them as well as when he was a dozen years younger. Mr. Van Dyk's rôles are considerably identical with those elected by Mr. Jean de Reszké. Mr. Andreas Dippel was with us some years back, a valuable young actor and an excellent singer in German opera, and, more than that, a tenor lyric rather than heroic. Mr. Anton von Rooy reaches us as a new Wagner barytone, of full voice and effective style in acting such solid responsibilities as those of Wotan, and of Baireuth's deep-voiced gentry in general. He is a Belgian, and possesses a large extra-Wagnerian repertory. Mr. Albert Saléza, of whom a good deal has been said in advance of his first American engagement, has been a thoroughly useful, robust tenor at the Opéra in Paris, and has a potent dramatic style.

We shall not see M. Saléza, however, in one of his most effective impersonations—that of the love-drunken and sacrilegious warrior Mâtho, in Reyer's opera "Salammbô." But he will probably have ample chance to show his energies as a typical French artist, now in the plenitude of youth and voice. I use advisedly the word "see" in alluding to his Mâtho. For in ending that tragic work occurs his amazingly acrobatic and startling pitch, head over heels, down a towering Carthaginian staircase, and his falling at the feet of the statuelike Salammbô—a mass of blood, filth, rags, and general physical ruin—to bare his breast for Salammbô's dagger. Folks who, as did Dickens's Fat Boy, "like to feel their flesh creep" have an excellent prescription in Mr. Saléza's Mâtho. "Salammbô," by-the-bye, in spite of its melodic and, indeed, instrumental tameness, would suit the Metropolitan to a centimetre with its pompous tableaux.

Mr. Saléza as Mâtho.

That reminder turns attention again to Mr. Grau's prospectus—what may be its promises as to his season's operas. Fifty-one evening performances and seventeen matinée ones, and non-subscription nights besides, give large leeway. But out of the "selection" left, as so often, somewhat vague, I doubt if more than two or three works be undertaken, apart from those already in such perennial use in the Metropolitan—German, French, and Italian. Probably Mr. Mancinelli's "Hero and Leander," possibly Ponchielli's "La Gioconda," semi-possibly Massenet's "Sapho," will be brought to pass. Mr. Grau's present troupe, one many observe, could make, out of hand, a repertory almost as wide as the whole Continental one, in such a state of "study" are many of the artists. But that will not affect the situation. Madame Calvé, I understand, has desired this year a complete representation of Bizet's "The Pearl-Fishers"—not just two acts, as before—as a special illustration of her colorature art. Neither "Le Cid" nor "La Juive" nor "Mefistofele" nor "Henry the Eighth" (this last not mentioned) is of likely choice. Of the two complete cycles of Wagner's Nibelungen dramas, producing them without the prudent cuts usually made in their presentation, notice has already been taken. We shall have this incident in January and February. The Wagner and non-Wagner repertory, in short, abides about as hitherto. But with such singers, how reconciled we are to a "selection" about as much in variety, from year to year, as the pattern of a floor-cloth! The eye does fasten, however, most pleasurably on one work, of which a revival seems fairly certain. This is Goldmark's "Queen of Sheba." It was a special success here during two of the "German-opera" winters long ago. Its colossal score is as gorgeously rich and impassioned as its mere spectacle can be made Oriental in color. "The Queen of Sheba" is a great piece of true dramatic music. The younger patronage of the Metropolitan should be acquainted with it. It has a concerted piece in the first act and a finale to its third act that have scarcely their parallels in modern opera for sheer splendor of musical effect.

The Metropolitan's Repertory.

E. IRENÆUS STEVENSON.

ANTON VON ROOY AS WOTAN.

Concerning the Newer Opera-Singers.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THE OCCUPATION OF MAYAGUEZ.

THE brief campaign of Puerto Rico was conducted with skill and ability. Success followed the American arms in every movement, and was accompanied by comparatively little suffering and trivial loss, the enemy being compelled to abandon one position after another by the superior strategy of the Americans until the signature to the protocol for a treaty of peace put an abrupt end to hostilities. The stories of the splendid fighting and magnificent courage of our regulars in the battles before Santiago in Cuba, the hardships they suffered, have overshadowed in the public mind the comparatively small encounters with the enemy in Puerto Rico. Nevertheless the fighting there has been sharp, the advance of our troops bravely resisted at more than one point; but it was never checked, and one town after another was opened to our troops. It fell to the good fortune of General Schwan's column—McComb's Troop of the Fifth Cavalry, some field-guns, and the Eleventh Infantry, afterwards re-enforced by part of the First Kentucky—to occupy the pretty and populous town of Mayaguez, on the west coast, after the defeat of the enemy in a brilliant engagement near the Rosario, driving the Spaniards in the direction of Lares, and uncovering Mayaguez, where the welcome by the inhabitants was of a nature seldom met with by an invading army. On every side the troops were received as liberators from hated oppressors. Old and young, black and all the intermediate shades up to and including white, men, women, and children, vied with one another in cordial expressions of delight at their presence. The wounded, Spaniards and Americans, were cared for at the hands of the Red Cross Society, and soon were housed in the theatre—for the nonce a hospital. Many were badly hurt, some in the shadow of death; but no murmurs escaped them as, friend and foe, the wounded lay together in clean white cots, cheered and comforted by their surroundings and the tender and sympathetic ministration of their nurses. Our brave fellows could not tell in words of their gratitude to the dark-robed women hovering by their beds like angels of all that is good and merciful; but Catholic or Protestant, Dago or Yankee, none will forget the sweet-faced Spanish nuns, whose gentle hands and soft voices brought relief to suffering body and hope to sinking hearts.

Schwan made but a brief stay in the town, his troops going into camp in the outskirts. Meanwhile the U.S.S. Montgomery arriving in the harbor, convoying re-enforcements and supplies, the column moved out again, the advance-guard overtaking and putting to rout the former garrison, which had hurriedly evacuated Mayaguez on the approach of the United States force, capturing many of them, and bringing them back prisoners to the place where they had so long been masters.

The crew of the U.S.S. Montgomery, Commander George A. Converse, U.S.N., commanding, was at general quarters as the ship slowly steamed in towards the harbor of Mayaguez. Like a picture from fairyland the beautiful shores of the bay stretched on either hand, the hills tumbling back inland, covered to their very tops with dense masses of tropical vegetation, while here and there in the valleys the bright green leaves of the sugar-cane spread like carpets in great square patches; close to the water's edge the high towerlike chimneys and low roofs of an occasional sugar-mill broke through the rich and varied green of the foliage around about. Followed by her convoy, two army transports, Morgan and Hudson, the latter swarming with soldiers of the First Kentucky Infantry, the war-ship moved cautiously forward over the smooth waters; there was silence fore and aft, broken only by the singsong chant of the quartermasters heaving the lead, and the occasional sharp, imperative order from the bridge. Grouped about the guns the bluejackets stood, hoping and longing for the enemy to open. Hundreds of eyes searched every point and headland for evidence of presence of the foe; but no sign or token of hostile life answered their eager gaze, all was quiet and still shoreward, not a movement anywhere—not even a breath of wind to stir into languid motion the featherlike tops of the tall palms. Silently one of the men pointed over the side, where with scarcely a move of their tails two great sharks, their black dorsal fins cutting the surface, kept pace with the ship, slowly moving nearer and nearer in. Ahead the roofs of houses show through trees, one tall building gleaming white and dazzling in the sun's rays. On the port bow a hill rises; there is a building on the top, something near by that looks like a mound of freshly turned earth, and surmounting all a flag-staff with a flag clinging limp and motionless. Every glass on the ship was brought to bear on the height. At the guns the men closed up; every one waited the flash and smoke of hostile ordnance. But instead of fire and crash and shriek of shell some friendly zephyr touches with caressing hands the limp folds of bunting on the hill, and for a moment—there waving, as if in graceful welcome, the blue, white, and scarlet of our own flag stands out clear and distinct against the tropical purple of the sky. The men look at one another, disappointment written all over their honest faces. "Damned if I ever thought the sight of the American colors would make me cuss," says the bo's'n's mate. "Boat coming out, sir. White flag," reports some one on the bridge. Not one boat but two are coming towards the ships, and soon the Puerto-Rican pilot climbs over the side, smiling all over his swarthy countenance, bowing, hat in hand, on all sides, as he tells that Schwan with his regulars had thrashed the Spaniards, now in full retreat towards Lares, and had already occupied Mayaguez. Half an hour afterwards the ships dropped anchor within half rifle distance of the shore. The harbor was swarming with boats, their occupants comprising all shades and colors of Puerto Rico's population, from coal-black bumboat men eager for trade to dark-browed señoritas in fresh summer dresses, and their pretty faces coated with thick powdering of rice flour, all smiles and flowers for the conquistadores americanos. The first visitor from shore was the British vice-consul. The flag waving greeting to the ship that morning had been hoisted over the residence of the former American consul by his direction, and as he left the ship, the thunder of Montgomery's guns, saluting the red-crossed banner of the nation nearest by tongue and kin to ours, echoed back from the adjacent hills.

RUFUS FAIRCHILD ZOGBAUM.

CHICAGO'S PEACE JUBILEE.

CHICAGO has had a peace jubilee, beginning on Sunday night, October 16, lasting five days, and including several great meetings and receptions, a ball, a banquet, and a big parade. President McKinley was the central figure of the celebration. He made one or two speeches every day, shook hands with thousands of his fellow-countrymen, was present at all the great gatherings, reviewed the great procession, and was made a Doctor of Laws by Chicago University. Generals Miles, Shafter, and Wheeler represented the army. No naval officers of high rank who were in the late war could be present, but all of them were remembered by arches put up in honor of their victories. There was some bad weather, but not enough to be a serious drawback to the success of so great a show. It would be gratifying to learn that the President took advantage of his presence in Chicago to consult with Governor Tanner about the promotion of peace at Virden and Pana, but there is no assurance that such an interview took place.

ADVICE TO MOTHERS.—MRS. WINSLOW'S SOOTHING SYRUP should always be used for children teething. It soothes the child, softens the gums, allays all pain, cures wind colic, and is the best remedy for diarrhœa. —[Adv.]

GAIL BORDEN
EAGLE BRAND CONDENSED MILK
IN 1856 Gail Borden introduced condensed milk, and from small beginning an enormous industry has resulted. The product of tens of thousands of cows is required to supply the demand for this superior infant food. No other equals it.—[Adv.]

SUPERIOR to Vaseline and Cucumbers, Crème Simon, marvellous for the complexion and light cutaneous affections; it whitens, perfumes, fortifies the skin. J. SIMON, 13 Rue Grange Batelière, Paris; Druggists, Perfumers, Fancy-goods stores.—[Adv.]

THE best regulator of digestive organs, DR. SIEGERT'S ANGOSTURA BITTERS.—[Adv.]

ABBOTT'S—THE ORIGINAL ANGOSTURA BITTERS—synonyme for health and happiness.—[Adv.]

USE BROWN'S Camphorated Saponaceous DENTIFRICE for the TEETH. 25 cents a jar.—[Adv.]

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Van Bibber Little Cigars

after breakfast — on the open cars — at the office — after lunch — to give to "friends" — on the ferry — on the train, and everywhere and always — where a short smoke is desired.
They are economical — as there is no waste.
They are wholesome — as there is no moisture.
They are satisfactory — as they are made of the very best imported whole leaf tobacco and never vary in quality.

They are little cigars for little smokes!

At all dealers 10 for 25c., or send 25c. (stamps) and a special pocket pouch containing 10 will be sent by return mail anywhere.

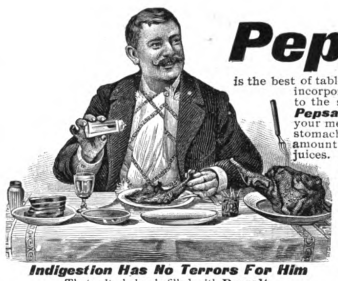
H. ELLIS & Co., Baltimore, Md.

The American Tobacco Co., Successor

The Shaver

who reaches the "top round of the ladder" of comfort, ease, and safety uses Williams' Shaving Soap.

The great, thick lather is like richest cream in its softening, soothing, refreshing effect.



It makes a healing, lathery luxury of what other soaps render a dreaded, painful drudgery.

Does your barber use Williams' Soap? Do you?

SOLD EVERYWHERE,
but sent by mail if your dealer does not supply you.

Williams' Shaving Stick.....25 cents.
Genuine Yankee Shaving Soap.....10 cents.
Luxury Shaving Tablet.....25 cents.
Swiss Violet Shaving Cream.....50 cents.
Williams' Shaving Soap (Barber's), 6 Round Cakes. 1 lb., 40c. Exquisite also for toilet. Trial cake for 2c. stamp.

THE J. B. WILLIAMS CO.,
GLASTONBURY, CONN.
London, 64 Great Russell St., W. C. Sydney, Australia, 161 Clarence St.

Pepsalt...

is the best of table salt, into every grain of which is incorporated digestive substances natural to the stomach. Fill your salt-cellar with Pepsalt and use it in place of salt at your meals. If you have indigestion your stomach does not supply the necessary amount of the dissolving or digestive juices. Pepsalt taken in place of salt at your meals makes good this deficiency, as you take with every mouthful of your food a similar substance to that which is required and at the right time, and your indigestion is a thing of the past.

Send for sample in salt-shaker bottle and try it.

Price 25 cents, postpaid.

THE VAUPEL SAMARITAN CO., 45 Sheriff St., Cleveland, Ohio.

Indigestion Has No Terrors For Him
That salt-shaker is filled with Pepsalt

PEPSALT CURES AND PREVENTS INDIGESTION

Eau de Cologne No. 4711.

The most pungent, exhilarating and refreshing Perfume. Used by persons of refinement. Imported into America for three-quarters of a Century. Be sure to get "No. 4711," which is the standard in all civilized countries.

MÜLHENS & KROPFF, N. Y., U. S. AGENTS.

BOKER'S BITTERS

The oldest and best Specific against dyspepsia; an appetizer and a promoter of digestion.
Ask your Grocer, Liquor Dealer, or Druggist.

HARPER'S CATALOGUE

thoroughly revised and classified, will be sent by mail to any address on receipt of ten cents.

THE CELEBRATED
SOHMER
Heads the List of the Highest-Grade Pianos.

Caution.—The buying public will please not confound the genuine SOHMER Piano with one of a similar-sounding name of a cheap grade.
Our name spells—
S—O—H—M—E—R
New York Warerooms
SOHMER BUILDING
Fifth Ave., cor 22d St.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THE DOWAGER EMPRESS OF CHINA.

THE very intelligent minister of the Chinese government to the United States, Mr. Wu Ting-Fang, says that the time-honored story of the Empress Dowager of China having been a slave girl has no foundation in fact. Doing this, Mr. Wu destroys some of the romance which surrounds this remarkable woman; but there is still left enough to make her career a wonder to her sex. The Empress Dowager was not a slave girl, but she was the daughter of an obscure official, and to-day she is the actual, as for many years she has been the virtual, ruler of the great Chinese Empire. The first straw pointing the way of the wind was a royal decree degrading a cabinet officer whose position corresponds to that of the Secretary of the Treasury at Washington. This man had been high in favor with the Emperor, and it was not to be supposed that he would have been removed unless some power greater than the Emperor's had wrought the change. The only power which is above the Emperor's in China is that of the Empress Dowager. Since the removal of this official the Empress Dowager has come out openly and reassumed the regency.

There are really no slaves in China, as we commonly understand the term. There are servants under contract for a number of years, as our apprentices are bound to masters until they reach their majority. In some families these servants are treated as daughters. Sometimes the master of the house takes a fancy to a girl and takes her for his concubine, or second wife. If she bears him children she is raised to the position of wife.

The Emperor of China has a consort, or wife, and one or more imperial concubines, or second wives—the term concubines not having the derogatory meaning in China that it has in Christian countries, where polygamy is unlawful. When the Emperor of China wants a wife or an imperial concubine, announcement is made in the court circle, and all officials above a certain grade are required to send in statements of the eligible women of their families. A list of these is chosen, and the candidates are required to present themselves at court, where the choice is made. If he likes, the Emperor may examine the candidates for himself, but sometimes they are examined and chosen for him. The consort and two concubines who make up the imperial ménage at Peking now were chosen by the Empress Dowager.

More than forty years ago the then Emperor of China signified his wish to choose a concubine, and notice was given in the court circle. The Manchus and the Chinese do not intermarry, so the Chinese were exempt from presenting candidates. The Manchu officials offered their daughters for the Emperor's choice, and one of the least important of them was honored.

The Empress of China was childless. The Emperor wanted a son and heir. This son came to him as the child of his newly chosen concubine. Immediately the concubine was raised to the dignity of a wife, and shared with the first wife the honors of the household.

This woman was bright, of great shrewdness and remarkable force of character. She dominated the household and the government. When the Emperor died, though she and the first wife were made regents jointly, it was she who controlled the government in the interests of her son. After a few years she who had been the first wife died, and the one-time concubine became, in name as well as in fact, the sole ruler of the empire. At the end of thirteen years of her regency (twenty-four years ago) her son died. There was no direct heir to the throne. Several collateral branches of the family claimed the succession, but the Dowager Empress chose a nephew, one of several sons of the brother of the late Emperor her husband, and, against all opposition, she installed him in her son's place. She continued as regent until a few years ago, when, tiring of the responsibilities of her position, she withdrew from active public affairs.

This made no serious change in the conduct of the government. In spite of her withdrawal, she still was the first person in the empire. On feast days, though all the court circle attended the Emperor's reception, they first paid their respects to the Empress Dowager; and the Emperor himself called on her before he held his court reception, going through the streets of Peking to her palace in a chair, accompanied by all his suite, and prostrating himself before her.

To those who remember the obscurity into which the Dowager Empress of Germany retired as soon as her son was elevated to the throne, this homage seems strange; but the Chinese explain it on this ground: In China respect is paid to a person because of age, social position (as father or mother or aunt), and official position. The Empress Dowager commands the Emperor's respect because of her age, because of her position as his aunt, and because of her standing as Empress Dowager. Diplomatic officials have

ADVERTISEMENTS.

CAPTAIN SIGSBEE

THE NOVEMBER CENTURY, ready Tuesday, November 1st, will contain the first part of Captain Sigsbee's personal narrative of the destruction of the "Maine." Here, for the first time, the commander of the ship gives in a full and authoritative manner his account of the memorable events connected with the "Maine," including important facts and details not before made public. The story will have a tremendous popular interest. Authentic photographs and drawings will illustrate it. Captain Sigsbee's story will be complete in three numbers. Lieut. Hobson's graphic narrative of the sinking of the "Merrimac" will begin in the December CENTURY.

THE SPANISH WAR SERIES, which begins in the November CENTURY, will be one of the most notable achievements in the history of magazine literature. The Tribune says: "The latest enterprise of THE CENTURY throws into the shade nearly everything that has been done in the past. The naval battles in the Spanish-American War are to be described by some of those who took part in them. Sampson, Schley, Evans, Taylor, Wainwright, Sigsbee, and Hobson are the principal contributors to the series."

Captain Mahan, Captain Crowninshield, Captain Bartlett, Lieutenant Bernadou and many other well-known naval officers will furnish additional papers.

THE DESTRUCTION OF THE "MAINE"

THE November CENTURY not only begins the Spanish War Series, but contains first chapters in a new life of Alexander the Great, superbly illustrated; a new novel by Marion Crawford, an historical romance of the Second Crusade; and the first part of Paul Leicester Ford's papers on Franklin; also the first part of a story by Frank R. Stockton, and a complete story by Mark Twain.

Do not miss the November CENTURY. Price 35 cents. It is necessary that subscriptions should be sent in early if subscribers wish to receive a copy of the first edition of the November CENTURY containing the richly decorated cover, by Grasset, the famous French poster-maker. The second edition of the magazine will have only a plain cover. All dealers take subscriptions ($4.00—begin with November), or remittance may be made to the publishers,

THE CENTURY CO.,
Union Square,
New York.

Capt. Sigsbee and Lieut. Hobson Will Write only for

THE CENTURY MAGAZINE

A Well-Kept Shoe

is a comfort and credit to the wearer. A soft, pliable, comfort-giving shoe looks better and wears better than one that's stiff and unyielding.

VICI Leather Dressing

will not only polish your shoes but make them soft. It's a medicine for leather. The ingredients of VICI LEATHER DRESSING are used in finishing the most famous shoe leather in the world—Vici Kid. That's a little secret you didn't know before. There's a book full of just such secrets about shoes and their care, that you can have if you will send us your name and address.

ROBERT H. FOERDERER, Philadelphia, Pa.

Harper & Brothers'

Descriptive list of their publications, with portraits of authors, will be sent by mail to any address on receipt of ten cents.

WONDERFUL TRIËDER BINOCULARS

½ Actual Size.

Have 8 to 10 times the power of the best of the old-style field and opera glasses.

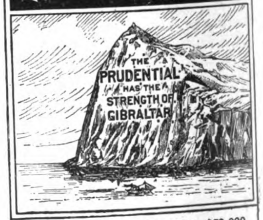
Pocket size—invaluable for Army and Navy, War Correspondents, Race Meets, Regattas, Travel, and the Theatre.



Send for Descriptive Catalogue. For sale by leading jewelers and opticians throughout the United States. Among them:

New York—Theodore B. Starr, F. G. Schmidt, Gall & Lembke, Queen & Co., Ga Nun & Parsons.
Brooklyn—J. B. Hoecker, 212 Fulton St.
Chicago—C. D. Peacock, Spaulding & Co., Hyman, Berg & Co., N. Watry, H. Borsch.
Philadelphia—Queen & Co., Bonschur & Holmes, Williams, Brown & Earle.
Washington—Franklin & Co., Moore & Leding, D. N. Walford.
Boston—Pinkham & Smith.
St. Louis—A. S. Aloe Co., Erker Bros.
San Francisco—Hirsch & Kayser, Henry Kahn & Co., Geo. H. Kahn.

Prices Range from $44.50 to $72.50.

C. P. GOERZ, 52 Union Sq. (East), N. Y. City

INSURE IN The Prudential

LIFE INSURANCE, $15 to $50,000
ALL AGES....BOTH SEXES
Write for information
THE PRUDENTIAL INSURANCE CO.
...OF AMERICA...
John F. Dryden, Pres. Home Office: Newark, N. J.

HERE'S A NOVELTY!

OLD MAMMOTH CAVE BOURBON.

Bottled in Bond.

BY SPECIAL PERMISSION OF THE U. S. TREASURY.

Guaranteed by U.S.Govt. Certificate ON EACH BOTTLE.

HISTORY.—This Whisky was made in 1881 and 1883, exported in bond to Europe, and after twelve years returned to Louisville Customs Warehouse, where it was found necessary to repack it in glass owing to the ancient and unsafe condition of the barrels, and which was done by special permit of the United States Treasury and under Government supervision. Price, (delivered expressage paid,) $15 per case of 12 bottles, or $5 per sample case of 4 bottles. Blank package, without any marks indicating contents, when desired.

AUG. COLDEWEY & CO., Louisville, Ky.
Established 1848. Reference: Any Local Bank.

PATENT secured or money all returned. Search free. Collamer & Co., F St., Wash., D. C.

WORKS EASILY

THE Remington Standard Typewriter

WYCKOFF, SEAMANS & BENEDICT
327 Broadway, New York

WALLINGFORD, CONNECTICUT.
ROSEMARY HALL, a Country School for Girls.
MISS RUNTZ-REES, Principal.
Ninth year begins Oct. 1, 1898.

SO SIMPLE A CHILD CAN USE THEM

SUNART CAMERAS

28 Styles from $5.00 to $100.00
All Cameras Sold under a Positive Guarantee
Send 2c. stamp for Catalogue. SUNART PHOTO CO. 92 Aqueduct St., Rochester, N. Y.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google always recognized this by sending their cards to the Empress Dowager as well as to the Emperor when there was a feast day, such as the Emperor's birthday or New Year's day.

The Empress Dowager's authority has ever been recognized officially in decrees during her retirement from the regency. The Emperor has frequently said in decrees that he has been "instructed by the Empress Dowager" to do this or that. As the Court Gazette has recorded also the fact that he visited her about once in five days, it has been generally understood that she was consulted by him on all questions of importance.

Gradually there has grown up in the court circle a party opposed to her influence. To this party belonged the cabinet minister recently deposed. This party succeeded in having Li Hung-Chang stripped of many of his honors. The Dowager Empress is Li's friend. Now that she has taken up the reins of government again, he may return to his old position of power.

For a long time, until the publication of the Emperor's abdication, no one knew, except inferentially, that the Dowager Empress had actually reassumed the regency. There was no precedent for such an act; but those who knew the Empress Dowager said she was quite capable of establishing a precedent. Now that she has openly returned to power, all petitions to the Emperor will be addressed to the Dowager Empress as well, and her name will precede his in the address. She will resume her official position, sign all decrees with the Emperor, and hold court receptions.

The Empress Dowager is a woman of about sixty-three years. She is not only intelligent, but it is said she is well educated. The strength of her character has kept the Manchus in power in China.

PARIS—PAUL DEROULEDE HARANGUING THE CROWD IN THE AVENUE WAGRAM, OCTOBER 2.

PARIS.

[SPECIAL CORRESPONDENCE OF "HARPER'S WEEKLY."]

October 10, 1898.

THE events of the last two weeks seem at last to have opened the eyes of the most optimistic of Frenchmen, and the general apathy hitherto prevailing among those not personally interested in the varying phases of the Dreyfus affair has given place to a feeling of genuine alarm—alarm for the stability of the present form of government; alarm for the success of the coming exposition, on which so many hopes have been built. Où allons nous? Whither are we drifting? is the question that occupies the mind of every serious and patriotic citizen; and it has just found an open expression in the petition, praying for relief, addressed to the ministry by a number of prominent business men.

PARIS—A MEETING OF STRIKERS AT THEIR HEADQUARTERS AT THE BOURSE DU TRAVAIL.

To-day's cartoon by Caran d'Ache in the Figaro presents the situation in a sombre enough light. The artist has labelled it, "Le tournant de l'histoire," which, freely translated, may mean "the turning-point in her history." The centre figure is the Republic, in female form, and she has just reached the twenty-eighth mile-stone at a bend in the highway. Beyond, various ominous figures confront her—first of all, a hydra-headed old hag whose flanks are weighted down with Dreyfus "dossiers"; behind, a striker in defiant attitude; then the two pretenders to the throne; Britannia in martial array, the word "Fashoda" on her shield; lastly, a horde of Egyptians and Dervishes. A gloomy prospect indeed for the wanderer!

Add to this the discouragement, and sullen resignation to what is deemed the inevitable, noticeable among certain leaders of thought. Every fresh misfortune, every new complication calculated to injure the country's welfare, is met with the cry of "decadence." The Latin race is slowly but surely deteriorating, say they. Edmond Desmoulins showed this over a year ago in his now famous book, À quoi tient la supériorité de la race anglo-saxonne?

Since then, according to them, enough has occurred to corroborate his theories. The defeat of Spain clearly presages the fall of her Latin sister. The Dreyfus affair, with the symptoms it has provoked, is but another step in the same direction.

These prophets of evil have their hearers and their believers, and therein lies the danger, for the French seem gradually to be losing confidence in themselves. The Fashoda incident, and the accompanying comments of the British Jingo press, have so far failed to awaken the interest of the masses. Had the circumstances occurred ten years ago, all France would have been up in arms to maintain what she honestly considered to be her rights. To-day she will doubtless surrender them, unless, indeed, as a few still believe — though very few — the government may, from sheer desperation, decide to follow Napoleon III.'s example and seek a way out of the present internal difficulties by accepting a foreign war.

That these difficulties are increasing day by day it is easy enough to perceive. At the time of writing, Paris looks like a city in a state of siege. Bodies of infantry and cavalry patrol the streets or lurk in the enclosures surrounding the buildings in course of construction. Every fresh "extra" brings the news of further accessions to the ranks of the strikers. There is talk now of a general strike of all the trades throughout France, and it does not appear to be empty talk either.

Although there seems to be no direct connection between the Dreyfus agitation and the origin of the strike, it is certain that the feeling of unrest created by the former has borne fruit in the minds of the proletariat. Whole bodies of men who declare themselves satisfied with their wages have struck work—one might almost say, for the sake of making trouble. They have a vague undefined notion that the time is ripe for action, and that the cause of labor will benefit at this moment by aggressive measures on their part. Agents provocateurs, and irresponsible agitators, are having it all their own way among the unreasoning masses.

It is possible that the above conclusions may have been somewhat influenced by the writer's personal experiences and surroundings, for, thrown into the vortex by professional necessity, I naturally see the darker side of the situation. No one hopes more sincerely than myself that the picture is overdrawn, and that France may soon emerge from her present troubles and enter upon a new era of prosperity. But I repeat, the temper of the people is not of the best at the present moment. Bad blood is brewing all the time. I have been present at all the recent manifestations of "patriots," "Dreyfusards," strikers, and the rest of them, and it would not take much, in my opinion, to set the powder-train ablaze. The proceedings under way for revising the Dreyfus case have not altered the situation a whit, as witness the events of Sunday, October 2. For reasons far from clear, M. de Pressensé, one of the editors of the staid and sober Temps, provoked on that day a riot on the Avenue Wagram, in favor of the prisoner of l'Ile du Diable, which earned for him the strictures even of his own paper. The "Dreyfus" press has been going it "hot and heavy" ever since, and needless to add that the patriots have replied in the same strain. And thus it goes on all the time—bitter polemics in the newspaper press, daily incidents in the streets. And the end is not yet.

Two pictures I send you present views pertinent to the situation—the Bourse du Travail, hot-bed of the striking day-laborers on the East Side, and the Champs Élysées near the Arc de l'Étoile, favorite stamping-ground of the "Ligueurs" and anti-Semites on the West. They form an interesting contrast.

V. GRIBAYÉDOFF.

PARIS—MEMBERS OF THE "PATRIOTIC LEAGUE" CHEERING THE CUIRASSIERS ORDERED TO PARIS TO PROTECT PROPERTY FROM THE STRIKERS.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

FRENCH ABSOLUTISM AND THE DREYFUS CASE.

THERE is much more in the Dreyfus affair than the question of the right and the wrong involved in the unfortunate captain's conviction. As the case stands between him and the government, it is clear not only that he has been convicted in secret, but that the evidence, which has finally been made public in answer to the clamorous demands of outraged Radicals and Jews, is worse than worthless. Some ardent supporters of the French system and of French practice say that the government has in its possession most convincing proof of the guilt of Captain Dreyfus, which it cannot make public without endangering the peace of Europe. In view of all that has happened in Europe during the last three or four years, it seems as though it is the chief end of its civilization to avoid war. This is not in accordance with the teachings that we receive on this side of the water from the politicians who fear that we shall become Chinese intellectually and morally if we do not fight often enough. Here we are told that there is something worse than war, and even the peacefully inclined among us are prone to believe that dishonor, turpitude, lying, swindling, and other vices, including those of oppression and injustice, are to be avoided even at the cost of the last resort of the barbarians from whom we sprang, and from whose political devices we have not yet been able wholly to escape. Be it remembered, too, that we are never in a condition of readiness for campaigning, although we may never be unready for a fight. We have no army organization, for example, even when we are engaged in war, although we are never without soldiers. Nevertheless, we are taught that it is our duty to go to war on the report that some of our neighbors are starving on account of an insurrection which they or their friends have brought on themselves; and we do go to war, and suffer keenly all of its horrors, in order to drive out of their own land the soldiers whose brutal resistance to the insurrection has brought distress and illness and death. I am stating the case a little rudely, and crudely too perhaps, but I am doing so merely to mark the contrast between American and European belligerence; probably one might truly say between American and European sentimentality. At any rate, it is clear that the bellipotent powers of civilization are not so nervously sensitive to honor as is the power which until recently has not thought it necessary to arm to the teeth for the sake of preserving the peace, and there is room for speculation here as to the influence of the military life upon the national morale. Take Esterhazy, for example, the "gentleman" who throws in his conscience when he sells his sword. But this kind of speculation is outside of the purpose of this paper, and I shall simply add that France is willing to appear, at least, to be controlled by some army chiefs among whom are officers who are ready to commit perjury and forgery in order that a scapegoat may suffer cruel punishment, and all this for the sake of avoiding war with—which is it, Germany or Russia? Perhaps there may be evidence of the guilt of Dreyfus of which the world at large knows nothing, and perhaps its revelation would plunge Europe into war, or at least dissolve the Franco-Russian alliance, but we fancy that on this side of the water the government that avoided war on such terms would have to go, and we naturally wonder what effect it is all to have on the interesting republican experiment which is being tried in France—a wonder that is changed to dreadful anticipation in view of the state of mind of the army and the people.

After all, the misdeeds of any particular government, especially if the misdeeds can be charged to the form of government, are likely to become crucial. If Dreyfus is innocent, his conviction and his punishment constitute one of the historical national crimes, and the question is as to the capacity of democracy for such crimes. Is it possible that under a self-governing people an innocent man can be condemned in secret, on false testimony, or on no testimony at all, and his punishment persisted in after it is known that his conviction rests on manufactured testimony? Such an injustice could not be committed in England or in the United States. It is practically impossible under the Anglo-Saxon system. But, although France is a self-governing community, in theory at least, it is demonstrated in the Dreyfus case, whether he be innocent or not, that a military tribunal is as absolute as was the Great Mogul, or as any savage chief who enjoys the power of life and death over his subjects. For, even if Dreyfus be guilty, it is now clear that an innocent man might be condemned in France on a bordereau such as that written by Esterhazy and on a letter such as that forged by Henry, these being the documents which the general staff and the Minister of War thought to be sufficient to defend the conviction and sentence. The only safeguard of the accused who is brought before a French military tribunal, and the main protection of one haled before a French administrative tribunal, is the integrity, the honor, of his judges. The wrath of the anti-Dreyfusites against Zola and the others who demand a retrial, or who go farther and insist on the innocence of the unhappy Alsacian, is aroused by the assault on the honor of the general staff which is involved. It is bad, of course, for a people like the French to lose faith in the integrity of their military chiefs, but it is a good deal worse for the chiefs to deserve the general condemnation; and if there is not to come a reform of the army, if the army and the Jesuits are to insist on the virtue of the former and on the control of the latter, there may be more than is now anticipated in the surrender of the right of primogeniture by Prince Victor Bonaparte in favor of Colonel Prince Louis Bonaparte, of the Russian army.

Whether or not the honor of the general staff is rightly suspected on account of the Dreyfus case, it is clear, as I have said, that a general staff that is not honorable may, under French law and practice, condemn any innocent man whom the officers wish to put out of the way. This is a characteristic of the French government, and such a government can never be regarded as a democratic government by an American or an Englishman. The Dreyfus case exists because such a case is entirely possible under the system of jurisprudence which governs France. There the private citizen does not stand on an equal footing with the official. The same laws do not govern the two, nor do the same courts of justice hear and determine controversies between private persons and between a citizen and an official. In our country and in England we boast that every man stands equal before the judges. The law that punishes the thief who steals punishes also the official who embezzles. The judge who sentences the brute who assaults his fellow must also mete out punishment to the officer who invades the rights of the citizen. In France there is one law for private citizens and one court for the trial of questions arising between them. This is the court of law. For the officials there is the administrative court; for, as Professor Lowell has shown in his Government and Parties in Continental Europe, the result of French development has been to strengthen the administrative branch of the government, while English development has made the judicial branch of the government the safeguard of personal liberty. Under our system law reigns, while under the French system, when there is a question between the individual and the government, discretion rules. In other words, the law is not permitted to interfere with the exigencies of the government, or with what the administrative courts think those exigencies may be. Therefore, in contemplating the attitude of the French people towards the Dreyfus case, it is not fair to judge them by our own standards. It is as difficult for Americans or Englishmen to assume a French mental attitude on such a question as this as it is for us to understand why the nations with the largest armies are willing to save themselves from the horrors of war at the cost of their honor or of their reputation for being just. It is fair, however, that we should bear in mind that Frenchmen have been taught to believe that the first duty of the military and administrative courts is to preserve the efficiency of the army and the administration. And it is familiar knowledge that in a general way, and notwithstanding the sad experience of 1870, this system has brought about the desired results, and that French military organization is admirable and French administration excellent. The rights of the individual, however, suffer, and the doing of justice is not an ideal in a government whose powers are bent towards absolute efficiency. Efficiency is primarily the attribute of a wise and benevolent despotism, and France is therefore a democracy with some of the attributes of absolutism. This puts the government of the moment higher than human liberty. And if an act of justice to an individual, whether the individual be Captain Dreyfus or an unfortunate citizen who has been run over by a Paris coachman, is likely to create distrust in the army or in the administrative branch of the government, the individual must go under. When one puts the case thus neatly, one must not forget that if it could be thus brought home to the French, especially to the Parisian mind, there would be danger of an outburst, and usually an outburst in Paris goes properly enough by the name of revolution; but it is probably very far removed from the French mind that anything is wrong with the French system. It is not the habit of the French to deal with political principles. They are likely to recognize the fact sooner or later that an individual act of injustice, or even of crime, has been committed, but it will be long before they see that they themselves made the crime possible by insisting that the discretion of military and administrative tribunals should be exercised for the protection of the army and the government even against just accusation. It was because these sacred institutions are to be maintained at all hazards that Zola's accusations against the courts martial were treated by the populace as a kind of treason. It will not be until the last moment that the French system of jurisprudence will be attacked. The French people attack individuals and groups, they turn kings and emperors off their thrones, they upset governments, but they never think of reforming the system on which rest the relative rights of the government and the governed.

There is as much absolutism in France in the administration of the criminal and administrative law as there has been shown to be in the military tribunals which have convicted Dreyfus, exonerated Esterhazy, and punished Picquart. The weakness of the French political mind is that it is under the control of domineering logic. It has come to a sentimental recognition of the right of the people to govern themselves; but when Louis XIV. said, "L'état, c'est moi!" he laid down the hypothesis on which his republican successors are still reasoning. The state would be really now the people if France were a true republic; that is, the people would have the ultimate power, and the government which they have set up would exist for their benefit. Louis XIV. really was both the state and the government, and the French people have never been able to separate the two. Therefore now, as two hundred years ago, the government is the state, and is sacred. It must be maintained at all hazards, even at the cost of injustice, even at the serious cost of personal liberty. How many Englishmen or Americans know of the true relations between the French citizen and the gendarme or the sergent de ville? How many of our travelling pleasure-seekers, sojourning for a gala-day in Paris, realize that an enemy or a policeman, especially sensitive to what our own guardians call "buck talk," might easily divert their visit from one of gayety to one of penalty? An arrest is an easy matter. It is easy here and in London, but practically it is not so common an indulgence of the Anglo-Saxon as of the French police. But once the accused is behind the cell door the matter takes on a different aspect in France from that to which we are accustomed, thanks to the blessings of the Great Charter. There is no reason known to the French law for informing the accused of the nature of the charge which has led to his incarceration. All that is necessary to keep him in prison for an indefinite time is an understanding between the policeman and the magistrate—the juge d'instruction. It is for this embodiment of French law and French justice to discover some reason for depriving the victim of his liberty, and in the mean time the victim must remain in ignorance. He is not to know the charge that is made against him; but from time to time he is haled before the juge d'instruction and examined as to his life, his secret thoughts, his relations to society—in short, he is probed for hidden crime, or for evidence of the truth of the charge which some policeman may have lodged against him. There is a wonderful picture of this terrible per-on—the juge d'instruction—written by Balzac in Splendeurs et Misères de Courtisanes, and one can learn of the dreadful character and power of this official from the scene in which Camusot the magistrate interpolates Carlos Herrera and Lucien de Rubempré for the purpose of discovering Jacques Collin under the frock of the Spanish priest. It is only recently, within a comparatively few months, that the legislative branch of the French Republic, after a discussion that endured for about twenty years, enacted a law providing that an accused may have counsel when he appears before the juge d'instruction. But in Balzac's time, and under every French government which has pretended to administer law at all, the accused has been obliged to appear alone before this awful mystic power—the man whose usefulness to the state consists in his power to worry and torture, to worm out secrets, to frighten timid people into hysterical and often untrue confession; in a word, to convict, and to convict whether justice or injustice be served thereby. The accused is kept in close confinement. His house is searched. His desk is broken open. His private papers are carried to the magistrate, to whom the post-office authorities also deliver his mail. If he were an American or an Englishman in his own land, he would be before the open courts, as soon as he applied, on a writ of habeas corpus, and the government would be compelled to state the charge against him. In France he is in the power of a practically irresponsible despot. This is the criminal law of France, which is not administered by the administrative courts, but which not only bears a strong—a family—resemblance to the law as practised before the political tribunals, but is intimately connected with it; for if the officials who pursue the private citizen are governed by malice or by personal enmity, or by a desire to put away temporarily a dangerous or troublesome political opponent, there is no punishment awaiting them for false imprisonment. Often, it is true, justice is done—more often than otherwise; but the great danger of any human institution lies in its possibilities; and to illustrate the possibilities of French criminal law, one of our recent ministers to France told me of a case which came under his official observation. The victim was a young American student at Paris, who, with some equally guilty comrades, indulged one night in unfriendly conversation with a sergent de ville of the Latin Quarter. The youth, who lived on an allowance made him by his father, was thrown into jail. The American minister was appealed to. He made strong representations to the Minister for the Interior—the head of the police of France. He received no reply. Weeks passed, and the unhappy youth was kept in concealment. Finally a member of the American legation happened to pass the Palais de Justice one day as this enemy of France was about to start for the frontier. He had been found guilty, and he was to be banished from France. There was, of course, an appeal to the Secretary for Foreign Affairs and a rescue, but an examination of the dossier showed that he had been charged with being a German and a vagabond.

This sort of thing is possible in France just as well as the Dreyfus case, and yet it is found to be impossible to induce Frenchmen to discuss their system as a proper object of reform. They are eager to overthrow governments and individuals, but not their ancient system, which serves them just as well under President Faure as it served their ancestors under Louis XIV. or Louis Philippe or Napoleon III. I remember to have heard a clever American tell of his effort to interest Henri Rochefort in the writ of habeas corpus, of which this furious socialist had never heard, despite his six years' residence in London. The effort was wasted. Rochefort was too busy at conspueying some one to listen to a discussion or an explanation of fundamental principles.

The theory of administrative law is carried out logically, so that the judges are kept under the power of the politicians. The administrative judges are appointed by the civil authorities and are removable by the President. They are consequently the creatures of the politicians; and our own Mr. Croker would, unconsciously perhaps, extend this feature of the French system to our regular courts of justice by making all judges amenable to Tammany Hall. The illustration serves to indicate the character of French administrative courts. It is held, for example, that if the political power illegally suppresses a newspaper in a moment of excitement, the court will not give the outraged proprietors any redress. In general the principle is that the administrative court will not interfere with political acts. Twenty years ago the French government decreed the suspension of monasteries. The injured orders appealed to the ordinary courts of law. The government raised the question of jurisdiction—a question that must go to the Tribunal of Conflicts. This tribunal is composed of the Minister of Justice, three members of the Court of Cassation, and three members of the Council of State, which is the highest administrative court, and two other persons chosen by these seven. In other words, the political power controls. This tribunal decided that the ordinary courts did not have jurisdiction of these questions, and the monasteries were so well assured of the impossibility of securing from the administrative courts a judgment against the government that they did not appeal to them. A very pretty case is often cited by those who think well of the French system, to show that the administrative courts can do justice against the government. Two or three years ago the Council of State rendered a judgment against the government in a case involving the interpretation of a statute which related to a state guarantee of interest on the securities of certain railroads. This decision, adverse to the interests of the government, so outraged the Chamber of Deputies, however, that they drove the government out of power for submitting the question to the Council of State, so firmly has it become the fixed idea of the French mind that the government of the moment is the state, and that the state is to be maintained at all hazards, active opposition to the government being, of course, treason.

In this Dreyfus case the army is the government, and it has done what was within its power and within its discretion. Supposing, however, that the committee of the Court of Cassation, to which the question is referred, grants a revision, what will happen? According to French political and legal logic, M. Brisson the Premier and his cabinet, together with these judges of the highest court in France, in desiring revision, will have rebelled against that part of the French government which has full jurisdiction of military affairs, and therefore of this case. It will be a revolt against the principal and most admired feature of the present French government. The question may come whether, to sustain the army, France will overthrow the civil power of the republic and restore a rule more essentially or naturally military. The solution of this problem is what we shall wait to see. At any rate, and whatever happens, there is likely to be no immediate change in French absolutism, whether an emperor or a president presides over its administration.

H. L. N.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

BRIGHT'S DISEASE

"BUFFALO LITHIA WATER

A Veritable Antidote."

Dr. Alfred L. Loomis, Professor of Pathology and Practical Medicine in the Medical Department of the University of New York, wrote: "For the past four years I have used BUFFALO LITHIA WATER in the treatment of Chronic Bright's Disease of the Kidneys, occurring in Gouty and Rheumatic subjects, with marked benefit."

Dr. Wm. H. Drummond, Professor of Medical Jurisprudence, Bishop's University, Montreal, Canada: "In the Acute and Chronic Nephritis (Bright's Disease of the Kidneys) of Gouty and Rheumatic Origin, as well as in the graver Albuminuria of Pregnancy, I have found BUFFALO LITHIA WATER to act as a veritable antidote, and I know of no other natural agent possessing this important quality."

Dr. Graeme M. Hammond, of New York, Professor of Diseases of the Mind and Nervous System in the New York Post-Graduate Medical School and Hospital: "In all cases of Bright's Disease of the Kidneys, I have found BUFFALO LITHIA WATER of the greatest service in increasing the quantity of urine and in eliminating the albumin."

Geo. Halsted Boyland, A.M., M.D., of Paris, Doctor of Medicine of the Faculty of Paris, says: "There is no remedy so absolutely specific in all forms of Albuminuria and Bright's Disease, whether acute or chronic, as BUFFALO LITHIA WATER, Spring No. 2, accompanied by a milk diet. In all cases of Pregnancy where albumin is found in the urine as late as the last week before confinement, if this Water and a milk diet are prescribed the albumin disappears rapidly from the urine and the patient has a positive guarantee against Puerperal Convulsions. Used as a substitute for ordinary water during the period of Gestation, it will be found invaluable as a preventive of Puerperal Convulsions and other disturbances incident to this condition."

Dr. Cyrus Edson, Health Officer of New York City: "I have prescribed BUFFALO LITHIA WATER with great benefit in Bright's Disease of the Kidneys."

Dr. Harvey L. Byrd, of Baltimore, President and Professor of Obstetrics and Diseases of Women and Children in the Baltimore Medical College: "It has an ascertained value in Bright's Disease. A knowledge of its action in that disease thus far would seem to warrant the belief that it would in many instances, at least in early stages, arrest it entirely, and in its more advanced stage prove a decided comfort and palliative."

BUFFALO LITHIA WATER is sold by Druggists and Grocers generally. It is an undoubted, positive remedy for many of the most serious and most common ills that afflict mankind. An illustrated book can be procured on request, containing the testimony of the most famous physicians of this country and Europe as to the wonderful power of BUFFALO LITHIA WATER in Gout, Rheumatism, Bright's Disease, Gravel, Indigestion, Nervous Dyspepsia, Nervous Exhaustion, Malaria, Alcoholism, Eczema and Blood Disorders, Diseases of Women, etc. Send for the book and judge for yourself. Address

PROPRIETOR, BUFFALO LITHIA SPRINGS, VIRGINIA.

---

Tonical and Restorative.

HUNTER

Baltimore Rye.

RICH, PURE FLAVOR.

---

GETTYSBURG, LURAY, WASHINGTON.

Personally-Conducted Tour via Pennsylvania Railroad.

Over the battlefield of Gettysburg, through the picturesque Blue Mountains, via Hagerstown and Antietam, and down the beautiful and historic Shenandoah Valley to the unique Caverns of Luray; thence across the rolling hills of Northern Virginia to Washington, is the route of this tour—a section of the country intensely interesting from both an historic and a scenic standpoint.

The tour will leave New York 8.20 A. M., and Philadelphia 12.20 P. M., Tuesday, November 1, in charge of one of the company's tourists' agents, and will cover a period of five days. An experienced chaperon, whose especial charge will be unescorted ladies, will accompany the trip throughout. Round-trip tickets, covering all necessary expenses during the entire time absent, will be sold at the extremely low rate of $25 from New York, $24 from Trenton, $22 from Philadelphia, and proportionate rates from other points.

For itineraries and full information apply to ticket agents, Tourist Agent, 1196 Broadway, New York; 789 Broad Street, Newark, N. J.; or address Geo. W. Boyd, Assistant General Passenger Agent, Broad Street Station, Philadelphia.

---

Blakemore Whiskey 7 years Old.

NOTHING BETTER MADE OR SOLD.

Matured in wood and bottled in bond under Governmental Supervision.

If your dealer hasn't it, send us TWELVE DOLLARS, and we will have sent to your address by express prepaid a sample case containing TWELVE BOTTLES.

Freiberg & Workum,
Cincinnati, O.

---

The Club Cocktails

MANHATTAN, MARTINI, WHISKEY, HOLLAND GIN, TOM GIN, VERMOUTH, AND YORK.

A COCKTAIL MUST BE COLD TO BE GOOD; TO SERVE IN PERFECT CONDITION, POUR OVER CRACKED ICE, (NOT SHAVEN) STIR AND STRAIN OFF.

G. F. HEUBLEIN & BRO., SOLE PROPRIETORS.
39 BROADWAY, NEW YORK. HARTFORD, CONN.
AND 20 PICCADILLY, W., LONDON, ENGLAND.

---

THERE are four issues of The Companion every month, and each issue is a volume in extent and variety, the welcome friend of young and old in thousands of homes. The exceptional character of the contents of from week to week and from year to year, is indicated by the names of some of the eminent men and women who will contribute to early numbers.

THE YOUTH'S COMPANION

For November 3d,
Frank R. Stockton has a clever humorous sketch entitled, "SOME OF MY DOGS."

For November 10th,
Rudyard Kipling's story of humble heroism, "THE BURNING OF THE 'SARAH SANDS.'"

For November 17th,
Lord Dufferin describes a pleasure excursion in the Baltic during the Crimean War.

For November 24th,
Mary E. Wilkins has a story entitled "A NEW ENGLAND GIRL SEVENTY YEARS AGO."

For December 1st,
Wm. D. Howells has written a story for fruit-loving boys, "THE WATERMELON PATCH."

MME. LILLIAN NORDICA, HON. THOMAS B. REED, I. ZANGWILL and THE MARQUIS OF LORNE will contribute delightful articles and stories for December issues.

All FREE to New Subscribers.

50-Cent Calendar FREE

NEW SUBSCRIBERS who will cut out this slip and send it with name and address and $1.75 will receive:

FREE—Every weekly issue of The Companion from the time subscription is received till January 1, 1899.

FREE—Thanksgiving, Christmas and New Year's Double Numbers.

FREE—The exquisite Companion Calendar for 1899, lithographed in 12 colors. The finest Calendar of the century.

AND THE COMPANION 52 weeks, a full year, to January 1, 1900. 1178

Sample Copies and Prospectus FREE.

THE YOUTH'S COMPANION, Boston.

---

Harper's Catalogue

Descriptive list of their publications, with portraits of authors, will be sent by mail to any address on receipt of ten cents.

---

Strong Evidence.

Its pleasing to note the large and constantly increasing patronage of the Lake Shore & Michigan Southern Ry. It is strong evidence that efforts to please the public by providing the best of everything in travel are appreciated. Come and ride with us. We have the finest service and the easiest riding road in the whole world.

Our "Book of Trains" (sent free) will tell you all about the great through trains between Chicago, Cleveland, Buffalo, New York and Boston. No change of cars.

A. J. SMITH,
G. P. & T. A., Cleveland, O.

---

---

Financial

Letters of Credit.

Bills of Exchange bought and sold. Cable Transfers to Europe and South Africa. Commercial and Travellers' Letters of Credit. Collections made.

Brown Brothers & Co.,
BANKERS, No. 59 WALL STREET.

---

---

There is no Kodak but the Eastman Kodak.

Holidays are Kodak Days

Catalogues free at the dealers or by mail.

EASTMAN KODAK CO.
Rochester, N. Y.

---

THE HAIR 27th Ed., 25c. (or stamps). Why it Falls Off, Turns Grey, and the Remedy. By Prof. HARLEY PARKER. A. N. LONG & CO., 1013 Arch St., Phila., Pa. "Every one should read this little book."—Athenæum.

---

MAGIC LANTERNS WANTED AND FOR SALE OR EXCHANGE. HARBACH & CO. 809 Filbert St. Phila. Pa.

---

HARPER'S PERIODICALS

| | |
|---|---|
| MAGAZINE, $4 00 a year. | BAZAR, - - - $4 00 a year |
| WEEKLY, $4 00 a year. | LITERATURE, $4 00 a year |

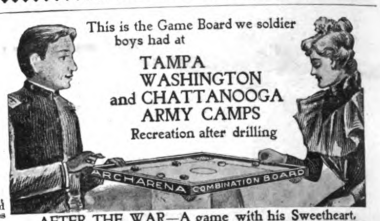
ROUND TABLE, $1 00 a year.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

AN EXPERT OPINION.

THE NEW CADDIE. "Say, dis is de slowest game o' shinny I ever see! Wot's de use of dem dudes paddin' deir legs like dat wen dey never even tries to soak each other a lick?"

A delicious drink and a piquant relish.



Vigoral

"Concentrated Beef"

Represents all the nutriment and flavor of prime roast beef in a condensed form. It builds up the invalid. Strengthens the convalescent.
Our Chafing Dish Recipe Book sent upon request. It gives fifty ways of using Vigoral.
ARMOUR & COMPANY, CHICAGO.

All dealers can show you

Archarena Combination Boards.

This is the Game Board we soldier boys had at TAMPA
WASHINGTON and CHATTANOOGA
ARMY CAMPS
Recreation after drilling

AFTER THE WAR—A game with his Sweetheart.

L. C. YOCUM, Marceline, Mo., writes: "Boat Board out; had delightful evening, seven tables going at once."

He made her a present of a Board and they are playing the Pocket Carrom Game. Ten Pins is played by using our cushion back, and on the reverse side of this board you can play Crokinole and Archarena; Ten Games, all on our 28 inch No. 2 board, for $5.50; or Archarena and Carrom Games on No. 1 board for $2.50. Express paid east of Omaha. Special price to clubs. Send order or write for rules to ARCHARENA CO., Manufacturers, PEORIA, ILLINOIS.

"A PERFECT FOOD—as Wholesome as it is Delicious."

Walter Baker & Co.'s

Breakfast

Cocoa

Trade-Mark.

The Standard for Purity and Excellence....

Costs less than one cent a cup.

Our Trade-Mark on Every Package.

Walter Baker & Co. Ltd.
DORCHESTER, MASS.
ESTABLISHED 1780.

Next to floating on a cloud.

For absolute comfort and convenience in CAMPING or YACHTING

"PERFECTION"
AIR MATTRESSES AND CUSHIONS

are important requisites—they are water-proof, light, and convenient—can be deflated and rolled into small compass. Desirable for hospital or home use.
Free illustrated catalogue tells all about them.
MECHANICAL FABRIC CO.,
Air-Goods Department, Providence, R. I.

CHEW

Beeman's

The Original

Pepsin Gum

Cures Indigestion and Sea-sickness.

All Others Are Imitations.

1831 Sixty-Ninth Year. 1899

THE

Country Gentleman

The ONLY Agricultural NEWSpaper.

INDISPENSABLE TO
ALL COUNTRY RESIDENTS
WHO WISH TO
KEEP UP WITH THE TIMES.

Single Subscription, $2;
Two Subscriptions, $3.50;
Four Subscriptions, $6.

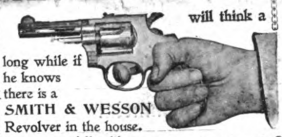
SPECIAL INDUCEMENTS TO RAISERS OF LARGER CLUBS.
Write for Particulars on this Point.

Free till Jan. 1 to New Subscribers for 1899.

It will be seen that the difference between the cost of the COUNTRY GENTLEMAN and that of other agricultural weeklies (none of which even attempts to cover the agricultural news of the day) may readily be reduced, by making up a small Club, to

Less than a Cent a Week!

Does such a difference as that justify you in contenting yourself with some other paper instead of having the best?



SEND FOR SPECIMEN COPIES,

Which will be mailed Free, and compare them with any other rural weekly; it will not take long to see the difference. Address

LUTHER TUCKER & SON,
ALBANY, N. Y.

"AN INTRUDER"

will think a long while if he knows there is a SMITH & WESSON Revolver in the house.

All calibers; long or short barrel.
Write for descriptive catalogue.
SMITH & WESSON,
15 Stockbridge St., Springfield, Mass.

Arnold Constable & Co.

Gloves.

Men's Riding and Driving Gloves.
Ladies' and Children's Gloves.
Courvoisier, Fownes', and Dent's Best Gloves.

Men's Furnishings.

Smoking Jackets, Pajamas, Shirts, Neckwear and Hosiery.

Broadway & 19th st.
NEW YORK.

Nathan B. Goodnow & Co.,
BANKERS.
ESTABLISHED 1873.
2 Post Office Sq., Boston, Mass.

Transact a General Banking Business, including the Purchase and Sale of Stocks, Bonds, and Grain, for Investment or on Margin.
Dealers in Government and Railroad Bonds.
Books containing Four-Year Range of Prices, Dividends, and Earnings sent free on request.
A Permanently Invested Fund of over TWO HUNDRED AND TWENTY-FOUR THOUSAND DOLLARS is held as a Guaranteed Security for all persons having business with us.
Correspondence solicited.

THE POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

Under the excellent administration of Postmaster-General Smith, the Post Office Department is running with the regularity, system, and perfection of a Waltham watch. This great Department, which transmits the correspondence of the most intelligent people on earth, is in the best of hands and its management is almost perfection. All of which is a source of pride, which is sincerely esteemed by the city of Washington, its headquarters. —Washington Times.

Joseph Gillott's
STEEL PENS.
GOLD MEDAL, PARIS EXPOSITION, 1889,
AND THE CHICAGO EXPOSITION AWARD.
THE MOST PERFECT OF PENS.

LITERATURE

is a weekly journal of literary criticism, and contains from week to week thoughtful, thorough, and comprehensive reviews of all important publications in the civilized world. These reviews bear the stamp of master hands in every instance.

Colonel John Hay

A portrait of the distinguished Secretary of State and Literateur will appear in the current issue as a supplement. These portrait supplements are beautifully printed on heavy paper, and are both attractive and valuable.

Rudyard Kipling
George Meredith

Contributions of poetry from these two eminent men of letters have within a month added to the wealth of LITERATURE'S pages. American letters by W. D. Howells, and supplements of special subjects such as rare book plates, noteworthy editions, current books, etc., further increase the reader's interest in this periodical.

10 Cents a Copy $4 00 a Year

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers, New York, N. Y.

EARL & WILSON'S
LINEN
COLLARS & CUFFS
BEST IN THE WORLD.

Between New York and Chicago in 24 Hours. . .
Via New York Central and Lake Shore Route, . THE LAKE SHORE LIMITE

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

AMATEUR SPORT DEPARTMENT RESUMED THIS WEEK.

HARPER'S WEEKLY

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. XLII.—No. 2185. NEW YORK, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 5, 1898. TEN CENTS A COPY. FOUR DOLLARS A YEAR.

Copyright, 1898, by HARPER & BROTHERS. All Rights Reserved.

CROKER TO THE PUBLIC:

"IF THIS IS WHAT THE PEOPLE WANT, THEY KNOW HOW TO GET IT."

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

HARPER'S WEEKLY

(TWENTY-FOUR PAGES)

NEW YORK CITY, NOVEMBER 5, 1898

Terms: 10 Cents a Copy—$4 00 a Year, in Advance

Postage free to all Subscribers in the United States, Canada, and Mexico

Subscriptions may begin with any Number

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS

New York City: Franklin Square

London: 45 Albemarle Street, W.

Also for sale at Brentano's, 37 Avenue de l'Opéra, Paris

FRANCE is rapidly demonstrating that she is unfit for self-government. M. BRISSON, in his speech from the tribune, just before the vote of censure which forced his government to resign, put himself in the position of defending the civil power against the military power—a position that would be unanimously sustained by any English or American legislative body to which a similar appeal might be made. In fact, it is only a people who will insist upon the authority of the civil over the military power that can remain a democracy. No one can tell whither France is drifting. It may be to an empire, or it may be something worse. In either event, there is likely to come an interval of anarchy.

IN the midst of our concern about distant islands of the sea, the defective government which Spain has given the Philippines, and the incompetency of the Cubans and the natives of the Philippines to govern themselves, parochial politics in this country are lively, and, in our view, important. Race wars are going on in North Carolina, Alabama, and Mississippi. In Mississippi eleven negroes have been killed, and the whites in the neighborhood of Forest seem to be out gunning for blacks as if they were game. The reign of law was suspended for several days, until Sheriff STEPHENSON came to aid her outraged majesty, and, with the help of fifty good citizens carried five of the negroes in safety to the jail at Meridian. In North Carolina the fighting between the whites and the blacks seems to spring from politics. Owing to Mr. MCKINLEY'S appointment of black politicians to office, the whites there appear to dread the return of negro rule. Now, although Sheriff STEPHENSON is engaged in the vindication of the right of the blacks to live, and in also vindicating the majesty of the law, he is, according to the expansionists, simply performing narrow duties in the sphere of parochial politics. We nevertheless, for our part, regard his conduct in the performance of his duty as heroic and useful as was the conduct of any of our heroes at Santiago or at Manila. In fact, we are inclined to think his conduct essentially more heroic than the bravery of the soldiers in battle, because he stood up against public opinion in his own community, and invited persecution, and perhaps ostracism, while the soldiers who fought in the war were sure of praise and honors. These events in the South are symptomatic, and until the country meets and settles properly the conditions thus presented to it, democratic government here cannot be said to be wholly successful. This is the plain truth, and we cannot escape it by deriding those who are for civilization at home, or by shouting for more savages to govern—white or black—in the islands of the Pacific.

THE report of Admiral SAMPSON on the naval operations preliminary to the destruction of CERVERA'S squadron has been made public by the government. The substance of the report first appeared in HARPER'S WEEKLY in the issue of August 13. Nothing new is added by the official document to the facts which then appeared. The country now knows, however, from official sources, that Commodore SCHLEY was slow in blockading CERVERA'S squadron; that he was strangely dilatory in taking advantage of information sent him by the Navy Department and by Admiral SAMPSON, to the effect that CERVERA'S squadron was at Santiago; that as late as the 23d of May, when CERVERA'S squadron had been at Santiago four days, SCHLEY announced that he was sure that he was at Cienfuegos, and that he had him there "almost to a certainty." Having finally been pushed away from Cienfuegos, he wandered about the Caribbean Sea, out of sight of Santiago, until evening of the 28th of May; that then, in flat disobedience of his orders, he announced that he was going to Key West to coal; in the mean time SAMPSON, who seems to have forecast everything, had made up his mind that CERVERA would go to San Juan in Puerto Rico or to Santiago, and he had prearranged the plan for sinking the Merrimac in the mouth of the harbor of Santiago. He was greatly disturbed by SCHLEY'S reluctance and inactivity—to call the latter's manifest disposition by no harsher term. When at last SCHLEY reached Santiago, he lay off the harbor at such a distance that his blockade was ineffective; and it was not until SAMPSON established what the English naval attaché called, on account of the nearness of SAMPSON'S stations to the shore batteries, "an impertinent" blockade that CERVERA was finally bottled up. In the mean time SCHLEY had lost a splendid opportunity to capture or destroy the Colon and the Maria Teresa, simply because he had not enterprise enough to go in and take them, they being anchored within plain sight and without steam up. The story of SCHLEY'S conduct is humiliating to him, and especially so because he is a singular example of unreadiness and timidity, the one naval officer who failed to do his duty admirably, and to seize with energy and ingenuity and courage every opportunity that came in his way. One more fact remains to be mentioned in the history of SCHLEY'S adventures before Santiago. On the Sunday morning on which CERVERA'S squadron undertook to escape from Santiago, it appears from the chart of that action that SCHLEY, in the Brooklyn, started in towards the enemy, but, after a moment, turned towards the east, ran for a time away from the enemy, then turned to the westward and ran parallel with the flying Spanish ships. SCHLEY thus lost another opportunity of the campaign. If he had kept on his course he might have gone to the bottom, but he would have gone gloriously, and he would probably have headed off the Spanish cruisers and secured them as prey to the American battle-ships. His excuse for his flight is that he was afraid of being rammed. That is like the excuse that a cautious soldier might offer for not going into a charge, on the ground that he had information that the enemy intended to kill him if they got an opportunity. Why should the Vizcaya ram the Brooklyn, and not the Brooklyn the Vizcaya, if In the second place, why should not SCHLEY have submitted to ramming, if in that way he might have made the victory over the enemy more complete? One more question and we have done. In view of all these facts, which were known to the President when he promoted Commodore SCHLEY, why is SCHLEY rewarded at all?

THE ISSUE IN NEW YORK.

THE choice this year in New York, for independent and honest men who long for honest government and for the preservation of American institutions, is difficult. It is not, however, with them, a choice between ROOSEVELT and VAN WYCK, but between ROOSEVELT and BACON. No thoroughly independent man intends to vote for VAN WYCK, but a good many good citizens will vote for BACON, for the reason, excellent to their minds, that ROOSEVELT'S success might misrepresent the attitude of New York on the expansion madness, and for the further excellent reason that if the BACON ticket receives a certain number of votes, a recognized third party will be brought into existence, which will be able hereafter to put into the field a third ticket, without undertaking the labors and encountering the hazards of securing 6000 signatures to a petition, each county in the State furnishing at least fifty of these.

It seems to us that the great struggle this year in New York is against CROKER, and that the only effective method of defeating him is by the election of ROOSEVELT. It is true that the Republican candidate is proclaiming that a vote for him is a vote for expansion, but he is mistaken. None but the unduly excited consider him an important factor in national issues. Neither his election nor his defeat will make a particle of difference in the settlement of our affairs with Spain—that is, in the disposition of the Philippines and Cuba. The only method in which the State can express its opinion on this subject is in the election of Congressmen, and in these contests we fear that the issue is not plainly drawn. We fancy that the President will be governed in this matter, however, by what he considers to be the public sentiment of the West, and he is reported to have returned to the White House, from his visit to Omaha, with a strong impression that the West wants the Philippines. On what divine inspiration such an impression could rest we do not pretend to know, and we trust that the report is untrue. At any rate, Mr. MCKINLEY is too shrewd a man, and understands Mr. ROOSEVELT too thoroughly, to believe that his choice as Governor of the State of New York would mean that the people of this State prefer broils abroad to a continuation of the work of civilization at home. Moreover, the President knows that Mr. ROOSEVELT'S campaign promised to be a failure as long as it was conducted on national issues and until CROKER'S assault upon the judiciary brought that vulgar boss to the front.

Does the election come to a choice between CROKER and PLATT? No. PLATT is probably the meanest of bosses. That he is quite as low as CROKER we confidently believe, and we know that his machine is as corrupt as Tammany Hall. But we have confidence in Mr. ROOSEVELT'S character and faith in his intelligence. We do not count against him the hot and excited utterances of the campaign. We cannot judge him on these. We prefer to believe in him for his past deeds, and in full confidence to accept his promises that he will be Governor for the whole State, for all its people, and not for the advancement of the interests of any party, or any machine, or any boss, and that he will give the State an honest administration, pursuing thieves where he finds them, whether they be Republicans or Democrats. It is true that he will not be the whole government, and that his election may bring in a PLATT Legislature. But a PLATT Legislature, bad as it will be, is not worse, certainly, than a Legislature pledged to the re-election of EDWARD MURPHY, the follower of BRYAN and the representative of Tammany Hall. Moreover, we cannot refuse to support a good man for Governor because some voters, who might otherwise oppose bad Republican candidates for the Legislature, will, in voting for ROOSEVELT, vote the whole Republican ticket. If ROOSEVELT is elected, we shall have a good man in the chief executive office. If VAN WYCK is elected, CROKER will be in supreme command of the State government.

PLATT'S power at least is doomed to be crippled; CROKER'S power may be broken or it may triumph throughout the State. It is the fashion in some quarters to say that PLATT is worse than CROKER. It is true that he is as bad; he could not well be worse; but he is not nearly so dangerous when he comes to be considered as an element in State politics. In the city he is an important eccentric in the Tammany municipal machine, but he has no such organization as Tammany, and he has not at his back such a solid body of voters as CROKER has—a body of voters numbering in the neighborhood of 200,000, who can be moved and voted almost as one man. This body of voters has seized upon the liberties of the metropolis of the country, and has made him its king; the question is, shall it make him king of the whole State?

Let us consider him a moment. He is an ignorant, brutal man, who has come from among the moral dregs of the people, and by base arts and strong will reached the head of the government. He was described with pitiless accuracy by Mr. BOURKE COCKRAN, in his speech at Carnegie Hall. Ex-leader of the "tunnel gang," ex-prize-fighter, race-track gambler, this man who is now mysteriously rich, and who probably would be ruined even in the eyes of his base associates if he revealed the sources of his wealth, was once the head of an oligarchy known as the "Big Four" of Tammany Hall. Now he is an absolute ruler; more absolute within his jurisdiction than is the Tsar in his. He reigns over more than 2,000,000 of subjects, not one of whom, especially if he is the owner of property, is safe from his enmity. He is reported to have asserted that he intends to remain at the head of Tammany for the remainder of his life. No such power, no such confidence of power, is known elsewhere in any republican form of government in the world. This ruffian from the slums, whose notions of civil government are of that sort that fired the mob which ruled France during the "Terror," has declared himself ruler for life. How soon will it be before he announces that his power is to be transmitted to his eldest son? CROKER the king is so sure of his power that he does not hesitate to abuse it openly. The WEEKLY has exposed the manner of his government of New York city. The vice to which he is native reigns with him, and pays tribute to his reign. The laws of the State are defied. The guardians of the peace are the servants of crime. The good citizen lives by sufferance, taking what his majesty bestows upon him. The criminal and the vicious may buy indemnity, make the city a hideous abode of orgy and brutishness, and prey upon the victims which their knavery selects. This is CROKER'S rule in the city. He wishes to extend it. He seeks to put his creatures at the head of the State government. He wants to repeal the laws which incommode him, and to make fresh laws which shall aid his absolute rule, or disobedience to which he and his creatures may sell for money. He is king and legislator for the city; he would be king and legislator for the State. His rule is sustained in the city by its beneficiaries—public plunderers, criminals of all classes, from the bank-robber to the sneak-thief, gamblers, pool-sellers, green-goods men, while

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google prostitution buys from it the right to flaunt its shame in the eyes of innocent youth. Does the State want this vulgar cormorant to flap his wings over the Capitol at Albany? Does it wish to promote his ambition to befoul Washington? Does it want CROKER managing its canals, its asylums, its hospitals, its prisons, and its militia, and to prey upon every corporation created by its laws?

Finally, is CROKER to be helped to own the judiciary? The courts now afford the one refuge of honest citizens. The people of the boss-ruled State have lost their political power, but, thanks to the vigilance of the bar, and especially to the intelligent activity of the Bar Association of the city of New York, the courts have been kept reasonably pure. In no other way has CROKER more offensively shown his contempt for public opinion and for the rights of citizens than by his refusal to nominate Judge DALY. It is too late now for him to declare that Judge DALY has outlived his usefulness. He admitted the true reason before he discovered that he had aroused the people by his assault on the independence of the judiciary. He refused renomination because Judge DALY declined to obey his orders, and in doing this he has announced that he will have no judges who are not his obedient henchmen. The issue is clearly drawn. Shall the last refuge of decent men be filled with CROKER'S creatures? Shall crime and vice sit also on the bench? Shall CROKER'S enemies, who are all good citizens, seek their rights in CROKER'S courts? Shall it be CROKER'S justice or the people's that shall be administered by the judges?

In this attack upon the bench the vulgar boss has at last played the fool, and has made himself the chief instrumentality for the election of ROOSEVELT, whose success alone can prevent the consummation of CROKER'S ambition.

THE POLICY OF EXPANSION.

LETTERS FROM BISHOPS HENRY C. POTTER AND ARTHUR C. A. HALL, OF THE PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL CHURCH, AND BISHOP JOHN F. HURST, OF THE METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH.

Editor Harper's Weekly:

THE question of the future policy of the United States with reference to foreign peoples and territory brought by the late war within their reach is one on which a variety of unexpected lights has happily been cast since first it was raised.

When we had reduced Spain to the point where it was inevitable that she must surrender her hold upon Cuba, Puerto Rico, and possibly the Philippines, there was for a moment a curious consensus of opinion that, whatever disavowals of territorial aggrandizement had been made in Congress or by the Executive, we could not disown a responsibility of sovereignty which conquest had practically created. Few people seemed to remember that; if our own most solemn declarations were to be considered in any other than a Pickwickian sense, we had not undertaken any war of conquest, or any other than a business of righteous intervention on behalf of an oppressed people. We had brought their oppressors to their knees, and were in a position to say to them: "See here! These oppressive methods of yours, these deliberate cruelties, these monstrous extortions, must cease, and you must reform them altogether. See to it that you set about ending this reign of brutality and greed! And that you may do it, we will stop awhile and see that you do!"

This was the obvious line, in view of the grounds on which originally we had justified our interference. But that we did not honestly believe in our own professions speedily became apparent. The commercial class shouted, "Trade demands new channels, and the party in power must give them to us, or step down and out!" The Jingo screamed: "Here is a chance for an imperial destiny! Disregard it at your peril; for if you do you make yourselves the laughing-stock of the civilized world! What is a great nation without colonies? And what are colonies but the credentials of empire!" And besides these, the philanthropists and missionary enthusiasts protested: "Consider what you have to give to these pagan or only half-Christian and wholly superstitious peoples! Ours is the pure light of the Gospel! Look at the Sandwich Islands, and read the history of the 'Sons of Missionaries,' and see what a blessing the 'American religion' has been to those benighted peoples!"

Well, we have been looking, but we do not need to look so far. The proposition before us to-day, whether in the farther or the hither islands that are this moment within our grasp, is substantially this: "Here are certain subject races. Come and rule them, enfranchise them, ennoble them." What now are the indications that we have any single qualification for such a task? The question ought not to be difficult to answer, for in a comparatively short space of time—less than a century—three subject races, so to speak, have been dropped into our lap, and the record of our dealings with them may be known and read of all men. One of them is the Indian race, another the negro race, and another the Chinese. If any honest man, by any ingenuity—and in spite of our tardy efforts in connection with one of them, the Indian, to redeem the dishonor of our dealings with him—can extract any ground for anything else than shame and confusion of face in view of our dealings with these races, I congratulate him upon his ingenuity. The story in every case, in greater or less degree, has been one long record of cruelty, rapine, lust, and outrage. "The best Indian," an army officer has been quoted as saying, "is a dead Indian"; and the best negro or Chinaman apparently is one who has been strung up at a lamp-post or grilled alive on a village bonfire. And this is the nation, with such a record to demonstrate its capacity to deal with subject races, which is to give a new and more benign civilization to the Spanish West Indies and the Philippine Islands!

If, indeed, it is to be done, it is greatly to be hoped that our members of Congress, Jingo newspaper editors, and political contractors may be drafted for service in the ranks—not anywhere above them—of our armies of occupation. These people are responsible for the tens of thousands of physical wrecks that have come back from Santiago, Chickamauga, Camp Alger, and Montauk. Their principles of civic and military administration have given us the infamous results which have turned the glory of our victories into the shame of our most criminal incompetency in every department of the practical administration of a great army. And the fruits of such a policy—a policy that trades in positions of grave responsibility, and barters civic and military appointments for a political "pull"—are, it is to be hoped, teaching our people that the "imperial" idea has for this republic no better promise than identical results, only in far larger proportions; to the further degradation of subject races, and to the greater dishonor of those who are to rule them.

As I conclude these few words I hear some one say: "What intemperate speech! What good can come of denunciations so bitter and contemptuous?" Who can say? But, in the elder time, when one was bidden to speak plain and searching words to an age that loved darkness rather than light, what was the message, constraining such a one, from the Spirit of the Eternal Truth? I read it in an old book much forgotten of men and nations, but having a word to them now as pertinent and as personal as any that it ever uttered to any of their predecessors:

"Son of man, speak to the children of thy people, and say unto them, When I bring the sword upon a land, if the people of the land take a man of their coasts, and set him for a Watchman: if when he seeth the sword come upon the land he blow the trumpet, and warn the people; then whosoever heareth the sound of the trumpet, and taketh not warning; if the sword come, and take him away, his blood shall be upon his own head. He heard the sound of the trumpet, and took not warning; his blood shall be upon him. But he that taketh warning shall deliver his soul. But if the Watchman see the sword come, and blow not the trumpet, and the people be not warned; if the sword come, and take any person from among them, he is taken away in his iniquity; but his blood will I require at the Watchman's hand." That must be one's justification for the performance of a painful and unwelcome task.

HENRY C. POTTER.

---

Editor Harper's Weekly:

There are no reliable plans for national procedure when a war commences. The first shot may break the whole slate of long and labored calculations. Men may decree and put their methods on record, and order armies and navies at the touch of a bell. But there are other bells of which they know nothing. No sooner are the dogs of war let loose than some subtle force takes possession of congresses and nations, and in due time all the participants are swept away by the unexpected omnipotence. A conqueror rises to a height which gives him a survey of a wider horizon. If a severe sense of duty sent him out to fight, his victories may now teach him lessons which even adversity never gave him. The amazing thing is that these mighty secondary impulses are not wild wanderings, but are often the wisest decisions, which will become all the clearer in the light of the far future.

Where do we stand at this hour? With convictions and conclusions entirely different from those with which we began the war with Spain. The instruction has been drastic in the extreme. The war has taught us lessons which we never knew before, and has led us to learn slowly but intensely that there are duties which we owe to the human family which we had never anticipated. We have heretofore been thinking solely of ourselves. But this latest history makes us touch elbows with the world.

True, we have been a long time learning the great lesson of expansion. But reason enough—we never had occasion to learn it before. We gave much vehement advice to dear old England when the Armenian history was being enacted. We complained that English interference was an absolute necessity, and that the powers should permit such inhumanity was our sharp and chronic criticism. But that was across mountain and sea and strange tongues. Meanwhile the Cuban cry became so loud as to stifle all sounds of far-away woes. Here was a fair island bleeding and starving at our feet and before our eyes. Our people not only thought, but felt. The ultimatum to Spain ended in the declaration of war, and the basis of the war was humanity to Cuba. The insurrection had been going on for three years. It was the old intermittent fever of Cuban revolution, and might go on and reappear indefinitely. The sending of the Asiatic Squadron to Manila was a happy thought. Spain could be struck with great effect in her furthest possessions. The sinking of the Spanish fleet on May 1 tells the rest of the story. The fall of Manila, with the practical possession of the fourteen hundred islands and of the ten millions of people, was henceforth only a question of time.

What now shall become of the Philippines? Can the United States withdraw from its own record? The duty which seemed strong and clear at the outset would be only half discharged were the liberated peoples handed back to their former rulers. Suppose it should happen that the United States should claim only Manila and its island of Luzon—what would become of the other islands and their inhabitants? One of two things would result—Spain would either make contracts for the sale of her islands to the highest bidder—Russia, Germany, or France—or she would send an army not less than one hundred and fifty thousand strong to open her new dominion in the Philippines. Either course would do violence to the American sense of justice. Our clear-eyed President put the ground of the war on the sole basis of humanity. Some had been claiming the continuance of the insurrection was a damage to our commercial interests; others, on all grounds, that Cuba must be annexed; and still others, that Cuba must be an independent government. But the President placed the claim of justice to humanity as the only one on which we could go to war, and resisted strongly the pretext of intervention. He resisted obedience to even that imperial call to the last moment. But on that basis we began, and there we stand to-day.

To permit the possible transfer of Cuban wrongs to Philippine territory would be a violation of the very claim we made at the outset. Should the United States allow the Philippines to go back again to Spanish sovereignty, either our country or some other might in due time find it necessary to repeat for the Philippines what our arms have done for Cuba—namely, to stop injustice. Has the day not passed when great stretches of territory and men by the million can be bartered as so many cattle? Political control is a sacred right. Who has given us the authority to sanction the sale of the smallest islands of the Philippine archipelago? Those far-off islands were in revolt at the same time with the Cubans, and by our attack on them the United States, for the time being, practically took the side of the insurgent and fought against the same enemy. The nation's duties are not exhausted when it protects, both at home and abroad, the rights of its citizens. It has a high duty among the family of nations to protect the sufferer under every sky.

This is, indeed, a new departure. But may it not be a high moral necessity which arises from a wider intelligence and a warmer sympathy with the welfare of the world? Our training thus far has been largely juvenile. We have been hedged in at every period of our history by the fear that other nations might be offended, and we have been taking affronts from them and have withheld response because of the fear of threat or defeat. We have been children playing in the back yard. At one time we had a quadrennium of domestic conflict. It was a long and hard fisticuff, away from the world's interference. Thanks to a good fortune, we fought it without a foreign power coming in to fire a single shot. We were in knickerbockers then, and our attachments were to the old homestead. But all at once a demand was made upon us by a cry in the great world for help. We were the first and nearest to hear. We came out upon the street ourselves; we saw that there was suffering going on, and that the plea for help was honest and strong; we were averse to leaving the weak ones to suffer, and entered on the task of rescue. Success came—much larger than we had even hoped. Are we not large enough now, and has the time not come for us to put off the knickerbockers and pass beyond the juvenile period and take a share in the world's demands?

We will admit that this is unexpected. But does not the unexpected abound on every page of our national history? In every serious crisis of our history, when our policy was clearly defined, and to which we had slowly vowed fidelity, we have been suddenly compelled to turn about and take another course. We thought only of Texas when we sent Taylor to Mexico. But in the end, with Fremont as prophet, we stood on the Pacific coast and took our first look across the western sea. We thought only of the preservation of the Union when we began the war of 1861–5. But a larger end was reached—the last shackle of the slave was broken. We may call it an incident, but history calls it a moral revolution. We achieved freedom by the very momentum of destiny. We went into war with Spain with the thought only of righteous rule in a neighboring island. But may it not be a providential purpose that peoples of whom we never dreamed should feel the touch of liberty from the American hand? To withhold such help would be to convert Dewey into a myth. To prevent possible injustice in the Philippines—which are ours by the fortunes of war—is as much a duty as it was to suppress actual injustice in Cuba, which we had to reach by invasion.

Let us keep all the Philippines until we have taught them how to govern themselves. Let us learn how to build up far-away peoples by learning how England has made this great achievement, over and over again, and understands it as her finest art, by her three glowing centuries of justice and education.

JOHN F. HURST.

---

*Editor Harper's Weekly:

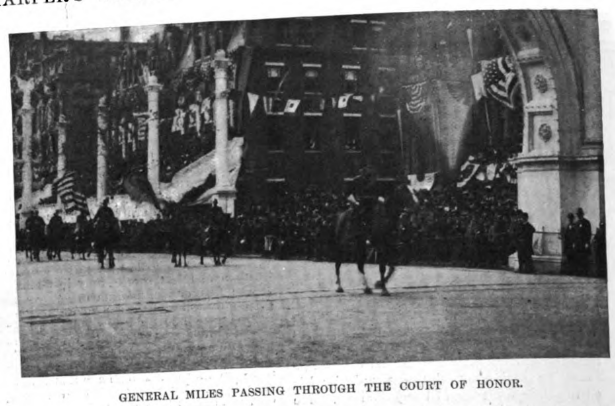
In my judgment neither right nor policy would be served by our adoption of what is called an "imperial" policy. We entered upon the war with Spain with certain clearly defined aims, and with a voluntary repudiation of any policy of self-aggrandizement. We have not been behindhand in denouncing "land-grabbing," under color of advancing the sphere of civilization, on the part of other nations. Let us not at the very first temptation show the insincerity of our protests. We are bound to do our utmost to establish a just and stable government in place of the oppressive system of misrule which we have overturned. So far, as by the destruction of the Spanish fleet and the capture of Manila, we have, incidentally, as it were, upset the only government that existed in the Philippines. We are morally bound to protect the various interests that are thus endangered, of the natives, the Spaniards, and foreigners. Neither duty nor interest demands that we should attempt to subjugate the whole archipelago. This, be it remembered, is the real question in the Philippines. It is not a question of surrendering that which we have not acquired. We only hold Manila. Whatever Spain under pressure may yield, we should still have to deal with the natives. Is a policy of forcible annexation of conquered races to be adopted by the nation which has hitherto claimed to be the exponent, in the modern world, of republican principles?

Has our treatment of the Indians and the negroes in our country been so eminently successful as to mark us out as peculiarly fitted for the government of subject races? We have no trained colonial administrators. As things are, the addition of foreign possessions would almost certainly mean the large increase of offices at the disposal of party leaders, to be given not to those who are specially qualified, but to those who have a political pull.

At the same time, our experience of the short campaign in Cuba has abundantly shown that we have as yet no army fitted for the work which would for many years be needed—of military rule in foreign lands and tropical climates.

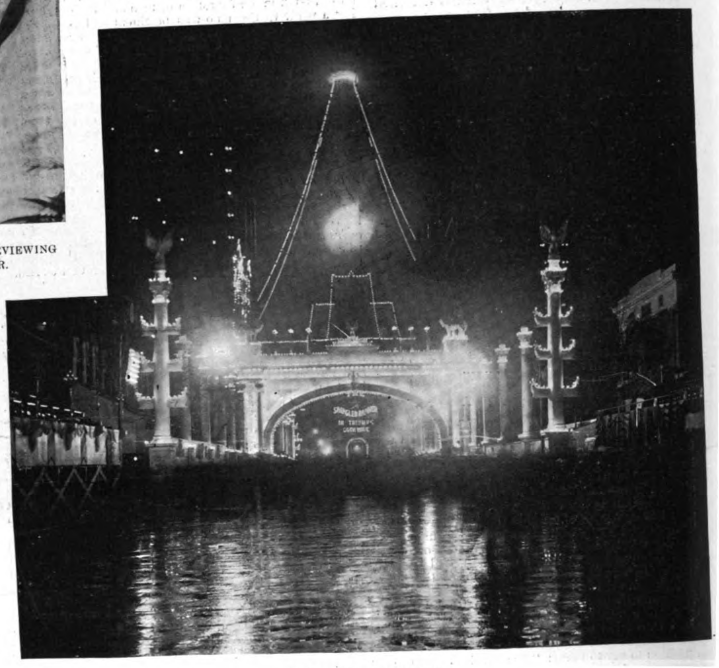
While we dare not in a cowardly fashion shirk duties and burdens which are providentially laid upon us, we are equally bound to resist the temptations of ambition and greed which would destroy our moral influence, and turn, as must every evil policy, to our own injury.



ARTHUR C. A. HALL.

* This letter was originally written by Bishop Hall to the Darlington Free Press, and is here reprinted with permission.—EDITOR HARPER'S WEEKLY.

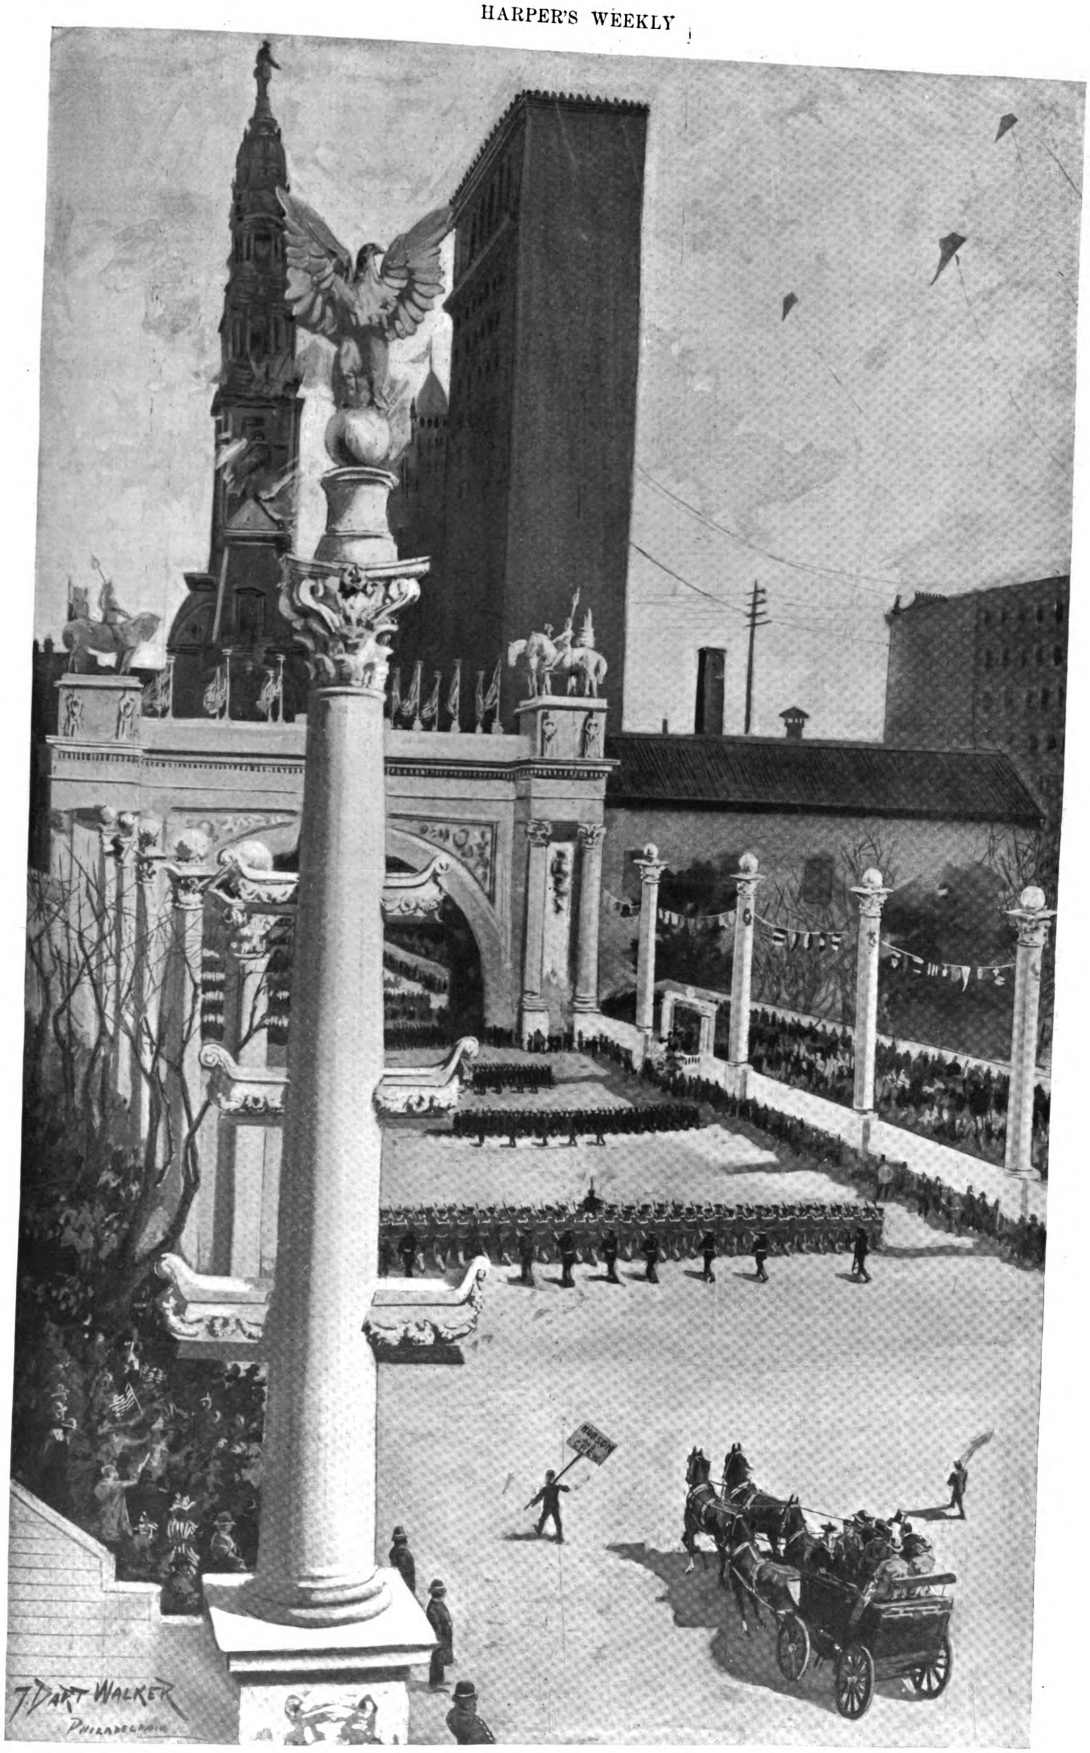
Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google



PRESIDENT McKINLEY AND GENERAL SHAFTER REVIEWING THE TROOPS FROM THE COURT OF HONOR.

GENERAL MILES PASSING THROUGH THE COURT OF HONOR.

THE UNION LEAGUE CLUB.



THE COURT OF HONOR.
Photograph Copyrighted, 1898, by W. H. Rau.

THE 16TH PENNSYLVANIA VOLUNTEERS PASSING THE PRESIDENTIAL REVIEWING-STAND.

THE PEACE JUBILEE AT PHILADELPHIA.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THE PEACE JUBILEE AT PHILADELPHIA—LIEUTENANT HOBSON AND THE "MERRIMAC'S" CREW PASSING THROUGH THE COURT OF HONOR.—DRAWN BY T. DART WALKER.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THIS BUSY WORLD

The first of the two volumes of Bismarck's autobiography, which are to be published in November by the Harpers, has been in type in Germany since 1893. In August of that year Prince Bismarck had a severe illness, as to the issue of which he felt uncertain. Mr. Kroener of the Cotta Publishing House came to Friedrichsruh to see him, and was allowed to talk with him for five minutes. At that time the manuscript of two volumes was in existence. Bismarck turned over to Mr. Kroener the manuscript of the first volume, saying: "I have looked over this portion of the manuscript several times, and have made many additions and corrections. There are still some changes to be made, if I have health and strength to make them, but possibly this illness may be my last. The other volume, which remains in my writing-desk, is not yet complete, and under any circumstances could not be printed at present."

He recovered from that illness, and was able to prepare both volumes for the printer. They include thirty-three chapters, beginning with one devoted to "Early Years," and closing with chapters devoted respectively to the Emperor William I. and the Emperor Frederick.

It was voted the other day by the Boston Board of Health "that the use of 'wall draperies' at funerals is a source of filth and cause of sickness, and the board hereby orders that the use of such draperies in any room or place used for a funeral, or for the preparation or retention of any human body before or in connection with such funeral, be, and hereby is, forbidden."

This ruling applies, apparently, not to the ordinary draperies of houses in which folks die, but to the running in of special draperies for use at funerals. Is not that an interesting revelation of the survival in Boston of archaic and barbaric practices whereof the rest of American mankind wot not?

Another illustration of how different Boston is appears in the fault found by the New England Sabbath Protective League with Mayor Quincy of Boston, because he has caused notices to be sent to the teachers in the Boston public schools, pointing out the merits of the city's Sunday evening concerts in Music Hall, and urging teachers to attend them and to recommend them to their pupils. The league objects to having new forms of Sabbath-dodging discovered to the rising generation. The sentiment which suggests itself promptly to the parental mind, that schoolchildren ought to go early to bed, seems not to have affected the discussion.

To make herself a new home and move into it cost Columbia University $6,879,000. Of this amount she still owes $3,750,000. The debt will be reduced by about one million dollars when she sells her old site on Madison Avenue, and other sales that she contemplates will help her further. Her treasurer believes that in the course of five years her income will increase enough to take care of all the interest of her diminished debts without embarrassing her. Meanwhile, however, her income of between $800,000 and $900,000 is not much more than sufficient for her running expenses, without providing the $150,000 needed this year for her interest account. This interest-money is payable next June, and it is stated that a number of the substantial upholders of the university have agreed to guarantee the payment of it. But in order that there may be less to pay, President Low invites the university's friends to buy the institution's three-per-cent. bonds, secured by real estate. Columbia now pays four per cent. on her debts, and like all debtors, would much prefer to pay one per cent. less.

If we do not continue to be so engrossed in the elucidation of such perplexities as boss rule, the canal frauds, expansion, the apportionment of the glory of San Juan, and the distribution of our fruits of victory, that we have no attention to spare for other problems, it is possible that we may find the vaccination question urged upon our attention with energy enough to make some public stir. Mr. William Tebb, an eminent British anti-vaccinationist, is going about among us, implanting in receptive minds distrust of the value and appreciation of the drawbacks of Jenner's discovery. He has been one of the leaders of the great and recently successful fight against compulsory vaccination in England, and as he has been studying and fighting against vaccination for twenty-five years, he has accumulated a lot of ammunition for his crusade. Orthodox persons who accept vaccination as confidently as though its efficacy were specified in the Shorter Catechism will be surprised to find what a respectable appearance of a case can be made against it, while, of course, to make a case against compulsory vaccination is no trick at all.

Mr. Tebb was last heard of in Boston, and intends to stay long and travel widely in this country, gathering fresh information and sowing seeds of rebellion and distrust of medical authorities in the minds of the people.

Apropos of the recent death of a noted Harvard football-player from the effects of typhoid taken in Puerto Rico, Mr. Frederic Remington writes: "It seems worth noting that while a great many college football men went into the army, if any prize-fighters went I did not hear of them. There may have been prize-fighters among the volunteers, but it would take investigation to disclose any. Yet a favorite defence of the ring is that it develops the manly qualities so necessary to the safety of a nation."

It certainly does seem as though fist fighting was less effectual in the development of the war spirit than bunting with the head, tackling, and the other football specialties, still we must remember that while pugilists were apparently scarce, and football-players were numerous, in our armies, the football men had no monopoly of grit. Roy Walter Stover, Harvard, '98, of the First Dakota Volunteer Infantry, whose death from typhoid fever at Manila is announced, is remembered as a Harvard debater. So too the individual whose egregious and irrepressible valor at Santiago made the deepest and most resonant impression on the public mind was a college graduate, but is not known to have been a football-player while in college. The truth is he is believed to have been a good deal of a student, and to have graduated with considerable distinction, a thing possible, of course, to football-players, but not common.

Mr. Stuart Wadsworth Wheeler, Harvard, '98, a member of the Philadelphia City Troop, of whose death Mr. Remington speaks, lived at Bryn Mawr, Pennsylvania, and came home from Puerto Rico with typhoid fever. Nine weeks later, when he had apparently recovered, he went on a hunting trip to Maine. The change of climate, and perhaps the exertion incident to his trip, brought on a relapse. He was brought back to Boston, and died a fortnight ago at the Massachusetts General Hospital. He was a member of the Harvard football team in '96, '97, and '98, and was popular among his fellows. His death is all the more sad in having been, apparently, avoidable.

There is some doubt whether funny men who are not funny have a just claim on the forbearance of the public because their intentions are honorable, but there is no doubt that the funny man who is funny makes grateful debtors of us all. A really and truly funny man whose efforts deserve acknowledgment is Mr. Peter Dunne, of the Chicago Journal, the creator of Mr. Dooley. Dooley is a delicious person, who keeps well abreast of the times, forms opinions, and frees his mind of them to excellent purpose. His observations on the recent visit of the President to Chicago, and the speeches and occurrences incident to it, wind up with this:

"What do you think ought to be done with th' fruits iv victhry?" Mr. Hennessy asked.

"Well," said Mr. Dooley, "if 'twas up to me, I'd eat what was r-ripe an' give what wasn't r-ripe to me inimy. An' I guess that's what Mack means."

Let us hope that Dooley has guessed right. He is a valuable man, one to be prized for his personal characteristics, for his intellectual attributes, for his gift of satire, and his remarkable turn for the use of language. It is said that his prototype is a sure-enough Irish saloon-keeper in Chicago.

M. Pierre Puvis de Chavannes, the French painter, who died in France on October 25, is best known in this country from the paintings he did for the Boston Public Library. He was born in Lyons in 1824. His reputation was of slow development, and not until 1859, when he was thirty-five years old, was a picture of his accepted at the Salon. Even after that his work was slow to find favor. He sold a picture, "Peace," to the government in 1861 for $1200, but it is related that he had to give the companion-piece, "War," which the state would not purchase. These pictures took a second-class medal. In 1882 his "Pro Patria Ludus" took the Salon's medal of honor. His reputation, though it grew slowly, grew steadily, and of late years his position as a great artist has been freely recognized in Paris. His fame rests chiefly on his decorative pictures, of which the best known among many examples are in the Sorbonne and the Pantheon.

Philadelphia spent nearly all of last week in the throes of a peace jubilee. On Sunday she returned thanks in her churches for peace. On Monday she received guests and got ready to jubilate. On Tuesday she had a naval parade on the Delaware River, in which the Secretary of the Navy, about two hundred steamers, and a war fleet of fourteen vessels took part. On Wednesday the President came to town, and the programme called for a civic parade; but it rained dismally, and the parade was put off until Friday. The Union League Club gave a reception in the evening, at which were present the President, General Miles, General Wheeler, Lieutenant Hobson, Captain Paget of the British navy, and many other valiant, handsome, and distinguished persons. On Thursday there was a military and naval parade, in which the new veterans of the war got an enthusiastic welcome. A reception followed in the evening at the Academy of Music, and an illumination of the town. On Friday came the postponed civic parade.

Many a reader and lover of Thackeray has speculated about the details of that great writer's religious beliefs. That he was a pious man and a Christian no one familiar with his writings can have doubted. There is enough religion in the poem called "The End of the Play" to serve as a rule of life to any one who is at loss to find a better one. But Thackeray rarely or never discussed religious or doctrinal questions in his books, and it is highly interesting to find in Mrs. Ritchie's introduction to Esmond, in the Biographical Edition (Harper's), a letter written to his daughters just before he started for America, in which he discusses the question of the literal inspiration of the Bible. The gist of his opinion is conveyed in this short paragraph:

To my mind, Scripture only means a writing, and Bible means a book. It contains divine truths, and the history of a divine character; but imperfect, but not containing a thousandth part of Him; and it would be an untruth before God were I to hide my feelings from my dearest children, as it would be a sin if, having other opinions, and believing literally in the Mosaic writings, in the six days' cosmogony, in the serpent and apple and consequent damnation of the human race, I should hide them, and not try to make those I loved best adopt opinions of such immense importance to them. And so God bless my darlings and teach us the truth.

To be mistaken in such a spirit may be better religion than to be right in a different spirit. But the number of those who will think Thackeray's conclusions about the Bible were mistaken is less than it was in his day, and seems likely to diminish from decade to decade in the generations to come.

Colonel Waring got back to New York from Cuba on October 25, and took to his bed with what his physicians presently determined to be yellow fever, thus demonstrating the pressing importance of the mission he had undertaken, which was to report on the possibility and expense of making Cuban cities clean and healthy. The news of his illness from so grave a disease was received with consternation, though for three days there was no reason not to expect his recovery. His death on October 29 was a great grief to this community.

In a recent lecture in Columbus, Ohio, on the choosing of callings, Dr. Washington Gladden said:

I would not say that there are no actors and actresses whose work is directed by high moral motives; far from it. But association with actors and actresses, as they run, is not morally edifying, and the atmosphere of the greenroom is not morally bracing.

Dr. Gladden speaks with due caution, and could probably get abundant corroboration for his opinions from the ladies and gentlemen of the stage. It is an interesting question, however, whether there is any calling of which as much might not be said. Is the atmosphere of law courts, newspaper offices, hospitals, the stock exchange, railroad offices, department stores, or hotel lobbies morally bracing? Is association even with bishops, "as they run," morally edifying. There is much choice in company in this world, but it is suspected that the people whose atmosphere is morally bracing are exceptional individuals. Very valuable folks they are, too, in whatever calling they may be found.

Mention was made last week, in this department of the WEEKLY, of the propensity of some supporters of Colonel Roosevelt to claim for him an undue share of such glory as ensued from the Santiago campaign. It was suggested that General Hawkins was in the San Juan fight, and that his share in the successes of that day ought not to be overlooked. In justice to Colonel Roosevelt, space should be given to the assertion made by authority, that he is neither ignorant of General Hawkins's exploits nor indifferent about them, but has taken pains to state in the newspapers that he thinks General Hawkins deserving of more honor than any one else in the battle.

As for the charge up one of the San Juan hills, in which the Rough Riders and the Ninth and Tenth regular cavalry took part, there is assurance which seems eminently trustworthy that the colonel led the charge of all those regiments, and for having led it was recommended for the medal of honor. About his personal gallantry there has been neither doubt nor dispute.

It seems that Christian Science had to do with the death of the late Harold Frederic, and a British coroner has been trying to find out whether any one is criminally responsible for it. At Mr. Frederic's desire, his doctors left him, and his case was put in the hands of a Mrs. Mills, a Christian Science healer. We are familiar with that situation in this country, and with the embarrassments which ensue if the patient dies. The report of the impression it makes on a British coroner and British law will find a good many attentive American readers.

There are many disturbing reports about the activity to which the anarchists of Europe have been stirred by William II.'s imperial procession to Palestine. If we believe what we read, we must conclude that the anarchists feel that the Emperor's journey affords them the opportunity of a lifetime, and that it will be a cause of professional mortification to the whole gang of them if he is not blown up in transit. On the other hand, if he is blown up, the police of Europe and Asia, the Sultan, and all friends of order throughout the world will be mortified and exasperated. Very likely the reports are more alarming than the facts, though extreme vigilance is doubtless fully warranted. The Emperor and his party have finished their visit to Constantinople, and arrived safely at Haifa, Palestine, on October 25.

"Race wars" continue to be unusually prevalent in the South. One curious explanation of the unusual number of them is that a strong impression has been made on the minds of the more ignorant and isolated Southern negroes by the stories of the exploits of the colored regulars at San Juan. It will be remembered that the colored soldiers and the Rough Riders fought side by side, and very valiantly. Everything that concerned the Rough Riders was thoroughly narrated and printed, and the colored regiments, by reason of their fortunate propinquity got fuller and more general credit for their work than others of the regulars. Perhaps their gallantry and its renown had their effect on the other colored brethren; perhaps not. At any rate, last week there were race riots near Harpersville, Scott County, Mississippi, in which, up to October 24, eleven negroes and one white man had been killed and one negro and three white men seriously wounded, and the situation was such as to make more casualties probable. Near Ashpole, Robeson County, North Carolina, on October 23, a band of negroes shot and wounded three white men, who were part of a guard left after a recent riot to prevent further disturbance. Four of the negroes were captured.

On the same day a negro was lynched at Lafayette, Alabama, for the murder of a white farmer; a white boy was killed in Dallas, Texas, by three negroes, and a lynching was expected, and a white man was shot by a colored soldier in a street row at Chattanooga, Tennessee.

Paris has again been vehemently agitated. On the opening of the session of the Chamber of Deputies, October 25 M. Déroulède made a violent attack on General Chanoine, the Minister of War, abusing the government for not protecting the army from slander. General Chanoine replied with heat that it was no fault of his, and that he was of the same opinion about the army as his predecessors. Immediately there was a violent rumpus in the Chamber. Two Deputies got into a fight, and there was intense excitement on the floor and in the galleries. When quiet was restored, General Chanoine resumed speaking, and concluded by resigning his portfolio in the presence of the Chamber. M. Brisson, the Premier, then went to President Faure and reported General Chanoine's resignation. When he returned to the Chamber a resolution was adopted, 296 to 243, that the government should put an end to the insults to the army. The proposal of the ministers to the effect that the Chamber was confident that the cabinet would take measures to protect the fame of the army was lost, 286 to 234. The ministers then left the Chamber and presented their resignations to President Faure.

The following day (October 26) President Faure requested M. Charles Dupuy to form a new cabinet, which he undertook to do. The cause of the action in the Chamber which led to the overturn of the ministry was the desire to prevent the revision of the Dreyfus trial by a civil court.

E. S. MARTIN

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

LONDON.

FASHODA.

LONDON, October 15, 1898.

LORD SALISBURY is rehabilitated. He has taken his countrymen into his confidence by publishing the Fashoda papers. They leave little to be desired, and present a refreshing contrast to the latest Russian Blue-Book, when British men-of-war were permitted to leave Port Arthur soon after Russia had expressed an urgent desire that they should leave. It has been difficult for Frenchmen to understand why England is in earnest about Fashoda. The best Frenchmen begin to realize it. It is a rude awakening. Lord Rosebery, Mr. Asquith, and the non-conformists are as much in earnest as ministers. Lord Rosebery has magnanimously emerged from his tent to sustain his rival. Whenever difficult and delicate questions of territorial rights have cropped up during the last few years between the two countries, France had only to demand much more than she was entitled to in order to get far more than her due. There is no doubt that England's invariable concessions on question after question and her surrender of point after point, for the sake of peace and quietness, has brought about the concoction of the scheme that finally landed Major Marchand and the French flag on a malarious spit of sand on the Upper Nile. "Face the Anglo-Saxon resolutely and he will retire," has been the accepted formula in France. The American branch of the Anglo-Saxon race is not of a retiring disposition, and American example now reacts healthily on the old country.

To understand intelligently the reason for the unanimity with which Lord Salisbury is supported, a concise statement of England's recent sacrifices and expenditure of life and gold on Egypt's behalf is more eloquent than Jingo rhetoric or legal conundrums. The present state of national feeling is not to be explained only on the theory that Lord Khartum—as H. Kitchener will in future be known—last month fought and won the battle of Omdurman. England blundered into Egypt for good when the Sultan, by firman, rendered the Khedive Ismail practically independent, thus enabling the voluptuary viceroy to kick up his heels, get into debt, and exchange Egyptian credit for French dancers and extravagant living. Ismail's riotous living brought the present First Lord of the Admiralty on the scene. It was twenty-two years yesterday since Mr. Goschen arrived in Cairo to prepare a financial scheme with his French colleague, M. Joubert, on behalf of the Khedive's European creditors. The scheme was accepted. The Khedive, untaught by experience, again "painted the town red," was deposed by the Sultan, and the virtual government of Egypt, with the consent of the concert of Europe, was placed in the hands of Sir Evelyn Baring, now Lord Cromer, and of M. de Blignières, representing France, who were appointed Comptrollers-General under Tewfik. It was at this time that Sir Evelyn Baring founded his great reputation as a cautious diplomatist, a wise financier, and a determined economist. The wits did not leave him alone. The following unpublished epigram gave contemporary expression to the discontent of the pleasure-loving pashas with honest administration. Egypt was then much in the same state as Cuba is now:

> The virtues of patience are known,
> But I think that when put to the touch
> The people of Egypt will own, with a groan,
> There's an Evelyn Baring too much.

Nevertheless, Sir Evelyn Baring succeeded, while the envoy of France failed. In 1882 the latter resigned. The political and military crisis began. Rebellion broke out. Riots at Alexandria occasioned a great emigration of Europeans from that city. Alexandria was fortified by Arabi, and its bombardment was threatened by the British admiral. The threat was carried out, while the French fleet turned tail and steamed out into the Mediterranean, leaving Admiral Sir Beauchamp Seymour to begin the work at one end which Lord Khartum has now completed at the other. Then came Tel-el-Kebir. England sent an army of 31,468 men of all ranks to Egypt, fought Tel-el-Kebir, seized Cairo, banished Arabi Pasha to Ceylon, and on the 11th of January, 1883, ended the dual control. England being thus left with Egypt and the Sudan on her hands.

There was now no Egyptian army. The old army organized by Turks had been smashed, and the new had not begun to exist. The total British force in Egypt and the Sudan in 1883 was 16,000 men. Gordon was sent to the Sudan as Governor-General in January, 1884, to deal with Mahdism; the sheik Mahomet Ahmed, of Dongola, having declared himself, in July, 1881, to be a prophet foretold by Moslem prophets. The Mahdi had defeated the Egyptians in 1881, massacred 6000 of them in the same year, and destroyed Colonel Hicks's army at El-Obeid in 1883, 11,000 being killed. A general rising then began throughout the country. Mr. Gladstone was in the zenith of his power, but was worried both with Egypt and the Transvaal, which were on his hands. He temporized on both questions. I remember hearing him say at the time that in dealing with difficulties about Russia or with other powers there were guiding precedents, but that the trouble with Egypt and the Sudan was that there were no precedents. Against her will, and Gladstone or no Gladstone, England was compelled to face the distasteful Sudan. Gladstone tried hard to ignore facts. Tokat was besieged and its garrison massacred. Sir Valentine Baker with 3500 men was defeated at El Teb, with a loss of 2250. General Graham, with some of the crack regiments of the British army, fought the battle of El Teb and defeated the Dervishes, but they did not seem to understand that they were beaten. Still they came on. Tokat surrendered. Osman Digna advanced. The battle of Tamanieb was fought in March of the same year—1884. The enemy was defeated, but a British square was broken, and the butcher's bill was heavy. No impression of any kind was made upon the Dervishes. Then came the siege of Khartum, Lord Wolseley's fruitless and costly expedition, the grim tragedy of Abu-Klea, the loss of General Stewart, Gubat, the advance of Sir Charles Wilson and his party within eight hundred yards of Khartum, the battle of Kirbekan, and the death of Gordon. The battle of Hasheen near Suakim, General MacNeill's battle, the evacuation of Korti, the arrival of a contingent from New South Wales, and the evacuation of Dongola and contraction of the Egyptian southern boundary completed the first grim chapter of the Sudan drama.

The turn of the tide came with the appearance of a man—Major Kitchener—of whom Gordon had prophetically said, "One of the few really first-class officers in the British army." Kitchener saw that the defeat of Dervishes was not the chief factor in the subjugation of the murderous Sudan, which had lapped up so much British blo ; but distances, drought, climate, and sand—in other words, transport. Sir Francis Grenfell then became Sirdar, defeated Osman Digna at Suakim, at Halieb, and finally at Toski. After seven hours' hard fighting 3000 Dervishes were killed, and the remainder of the army driven out into the desert to die of thirst or to surrender. Toski was the first strategic success. Tactically English generals had all succeeded except Hicks and Valentine Baker. The Dervishes advanced no further after Toski, where Kitchener commanded a division. The Mahdi being dead, the Khalifa Abdullahi endeavored to follow the plans of his predecessor. It was no use. His ruin was already preparing in the workshops of Wady-Halfa. The young fighting force of Egypt had begun to feel confidence in itself after Toski. Little by little Egypt—British Egypt now—gained strength and new resolution. The men who worked and died in organizing the workshops and the railway in a vile climate deserve no less the gratitude of their countrymen and of the emancipated slaves of the Sudan than those English, Scotch, and Irish who had shed their blood in battle for them. While one terminus was in the hands of the enemy, a railway was built from Korosko to Abu-Hamed across the arc of the great bend of the Nile. Major Hunter swooped down on Abu-Hamed, and in April last the battle of the Atbara, in which the flower of the British army took part, was fought, while success at Omdurman on the 2d September enabled Lord Khartum to garrison Fashoda and Sobat—500 miles further south—in force. For every white man who lost his life in rescuing the Sudan from torture and slavery ten have lost their health. Up and down England, Scotland, and Ireland there are scattered thousands of homes, saddened and desolated by the Sudan. I will not speak of the money, of the labor, or of national self-respect, but, after this tale of steady purpose and of continuous national sacrifice, it is not reasonable to expect that the English people should negotiate with the French regarding an explorer in difficulties, without medicine, ammunition, or clothes, who finds himself with eight French companions on a spit of sand in Egyptian territory on the Upper Nile, cut off from his base by 3000 miles of impenetrable country, surrounded by troops under British officers flushed with recent victory and within four days down stream of their natural base at Omdurman.

M. Paul de Cassagnac, the mouth-piece of the Bonapartists, whose star is believed to be once more in the ascendant, discusses the chances of a war between England and France. He urges that an Anglo-French conflict would give Russia an opportunity to strike her blow at India. This may be true; but if Russia were to mobilize, the blow that she could strike at India would not be decisive as against England. But the French fleet, now in a process of construction, would be outmatched by that of England. Germany might be tempted to secure still more safely her Rhenish position, and Italy, which also has her domestic difficulties, might find the time convenient to raise the question of the ownership of Nice and Savoy, filched from her at the peace of Villafranca. If the trouble culminates in war, which is not likely, England will not go scathless. There will be suffering, perhaps serious losses, and possibly some great disaster. But France will be finally beaten, partly because her journalist lawyer governing classes are as morally rotten as the governing classes of Spain; and if another reason is wanted, because she has succeeded in rousing the old English spirit as completely as in 1805. The destruction and ruin of France may be the most effective means of realizing the Tsar's disarmament proposals, if it falls to England's lot to give the French a naval Sedan.

France is the cat's-paw of Russia, and will be betrayed by Russia in her extremity. Russia will not fight for Fashoda. It is owing to the late Prince Lobanoff that France has been reckless enough to invade Egypt with a few Senegalese, hoping that she will not come back empty-handed out of her trespass. It was on the banks of the Neva that the Liotard-Marchand conspiracy was hatched. Russia desired that France, Abyssinia, and England should bleed each other white while the Russification of China was proceeding unhindered by interference from England. Russia has borrowed French money; France has raked Russian chestnuts out of the fire, and has played the Russian game at French expense. Russia, conscious of Russian game at French expense. Russia, conscious of security, has now bidden France disarm, and still contemplates the despatch of the French inferior fleet against the British superior fleet. It is almost impossible to believe that even French politicians and journalists can be so bereft of reason as to play the Russian game as they are doing. Fashoda is nothing to them except as a means of hurting England. They have succeeded. England's pride is stabbed. The Nile may become as open to Frenchmen as to Englishmen, but no point on the Nile will be French. The Channel Fleet is quietly on its way to Gibraltar. If the French want war, they will not be disappointed.

Under these circumstances, the circulation throughout France last Sunday of a million maps illustrating the Marchand mission and its relation to England is an instructive comment on the madness of our neighbors. According to this map, France claims over six hundred miles of the Nile, the whole of the Bahr-el-Ghazal, and an eastern boundary coterminous with Abyssinia. Adroit in discussion, with a logic available for all points of the compass, but always rebellious against the despotisms of fact, the reasons advanced by French advocates are both plausible and absurd. The map referred to has now probably been seen and studied by at least five millions of the French people, and they are convinced that England is seizing French territory, not that France has invaded Egypt.

Frenchmen, however, are not to be judged like the more serious races, and their Paris Exhibition of 1900 is a great factor that makes for peace. There will be no exhibition if Marchand is maintained at Fashoda, and the Parisian shopkeeper prefers profit to prestige. A very large investment of French capital has already been made in the hope of getting back a great deal more at the close of the century from foreign guests. This element in the question is one that tells none the less decisively because its influence is silently exerted. The colonial school in France is able to command great means of publicity, and thus to seem more important than it really is. Politically it carries very little weight, and probably not ten Frenchmen in a million care where Fashoda is or anything about it; and when they appreciate what war would mean—the loss of their best customer, the annihilation of the Riviera traffic, the destruction of their navy, and the obliteration of France as a great power—it is safe to conclude that if reason reigns there will be no fighting over this question of Fashoda, although the controversy will yet become more acute than it is to-day. That this is the conviction of those who are best informed on the subject is shown by the fact that Major Marchand is about to be invited to deliver an address on his wonderful expedition over unexplored country before one of the royal societies in London. The story of his arduous journey, and his acceptance of British hospitality at the end, as told before an appreciative London audience, would be a fitting, and is a probable, dénouement to the Fashoda fuss.

MR. BRODRICK.

Mr. Curzon's successor, the new Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, though not so brilliant as his predecessor, is one of the straightest men for a politician I have ever encountered. It was Mr. Brodrick's hand that fired the mine that exploded the Rosebery ministry. On June 21, 1895, Sir H. Campbell Bannerman, the War Secretary, announced with decent expressions of regret the retirement of the Duke of Cambridge. Before the excitement and prestige of this much-longed-for administrative change had died down, Mr. Brodrick rose up and declared that the store of small-arms ammunition was inadequate for sudden emergency, and was not sufficient to do more than meet the current wants of the service. Sir Campbell Bannerman contradicted Mr. Brodrick, and the question largely became one of character; since on questions of public safety the House of Commons is no less patriotic than other legislatures. The House of Commons believed Mr. Brodrick, and on a division placed the ministers in a minority of seven. Sir H. Campbell Bannerman regarded the vote as a personal affront, and resigned. The government accompanied him into retirement. As Under-Secretary at the War Office, Mr. Brodrick has had an extremely difficult task. He has introduced the army estimates, and defended a congested and ill-managed department with a skill and urbanity worthy of a better cause. The dominant note in Mr. Brodrick's personality is that of intrepid integrity. What he says he means, and what he says, he believes to be true. Mr. George Wyndham's failure to secure the most responsible post outside the cabinet—namely, the representation of the Foreign Office in the House of Commons—is a surprise. Mr. Brodrick, however, if not the more accomplished, is the stronger man, and his appointment is an agreeable break to the recent practice of continually enlarging what is colloquially known as "The Cecil Gang" in the government. Mr. Brodrick, like Mr. Curzon, was President of the Oxford Union, and stepped straight from the university to the House of Commons in 1880. He is industrious and painstaking, forty-two years of age, is the eldest son of a viscount, and should go far.

THE ALDERSHOT COMMAND.

Another change, of perhaps even greater importance in the personnel of the great posts under the crown, is the substitution of Sir Redvers Buller as commander of the Aldershot District, in succession to the Duke of Connaught. The latter has gained golden opinions during the five years of his command. Within the narrow lines laid down during the autumn manœuvres at Salisbury, the Duke of Connaught (who was opposed to his successor in the Aldershot command) conducted his operations in such a manner as to win the unfeigned commendation of practised soldiers. Sir Redvers Buller is a strong, hard man. He was one of Wolseley's men, was with him on the Red River expedition, in Ashanti, throughout the Zulu war, and was chief of the staff in the abortive Nile expedition. Buller has been well described as a stern, ruthless, and saturnine man. It is understood that if the Venezuela message of President Cleveland had led to war, Buller would have had command of any re-enforcements that might have been sent to Canada, and would have led the Queen's forces in the campaign. The commander of the Aldershot District is a very important personage in the military hierarchy, and the appointment will be held during Buller's tenure of office by the strongest all-round soldier in the army at the present time. He has filled the position of Adjutant-General at the War Office, and is thoroughly acquainted with the defects of that interesting institution—a knowledge which gives him some advantage over his younger rival, Lord Khartum, whose services have lain outside the circumference of War Office control, and whose advent to the central administration is regarded with holy horror by the Tite Barnacles of Pall Mall. Sir Redvers Buller is well born, is a man of property and estate. He is not indifferent to the amenities of life. He can order a dinner, and when off duty can tell a good story; is a good friend, a dangerous enemy—in short, a man and a soldier in whom the country trusts. He is not supposed at the present time to burn with enthusiasm for the commander-in-chief, Lord Wolseley. Buller himself was the nomination of the late government for the post of commander-in-chief.

THE ROUGEMONT FRAUD.

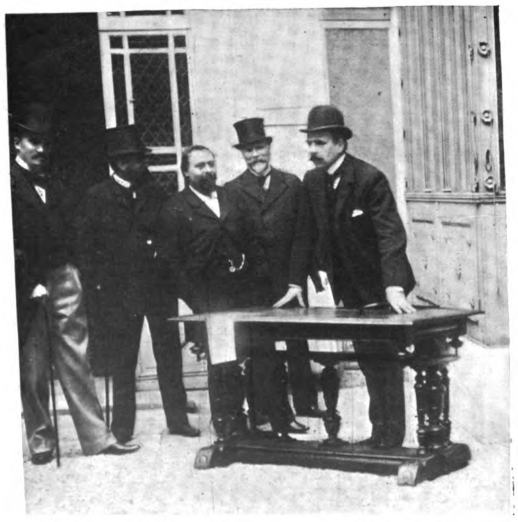
The echoes of the Rougemont fraud have probably reached the other side of the Atlantic. Having been behind the scenes while preparations for its exposure were being perfected, I was unable to refer to it without breach of confidence, but the skill and pertinacity of Mr. H. W. Massingham, the editor of the Daily Chronicle, in the analytical destruction of a charlatan who had been accepted by the British Association on his own valuation, and who had fastened himself upon a publishing firm of the highest character, is as interesting, in its way, as the exposure of George Psalmanazar or of the Tichborne claimant. Rougemont—or Grin, which is his real name—was not the sole author of his deceptive story. He had assistants.

ARNOLD WHITE.

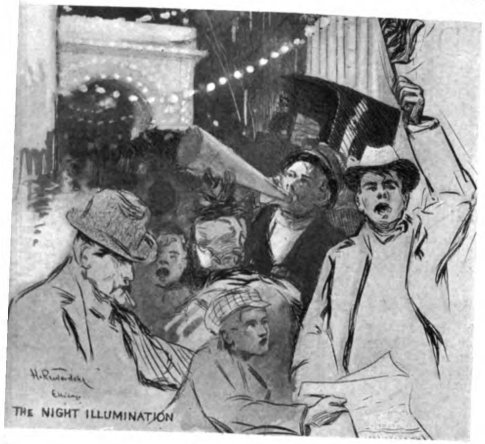


Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

CUIRASSIERS DISMOUNTED FOR LUNCH ON THE EXPOSITION GROUNDS—CHAMPS-ELYSÉES.

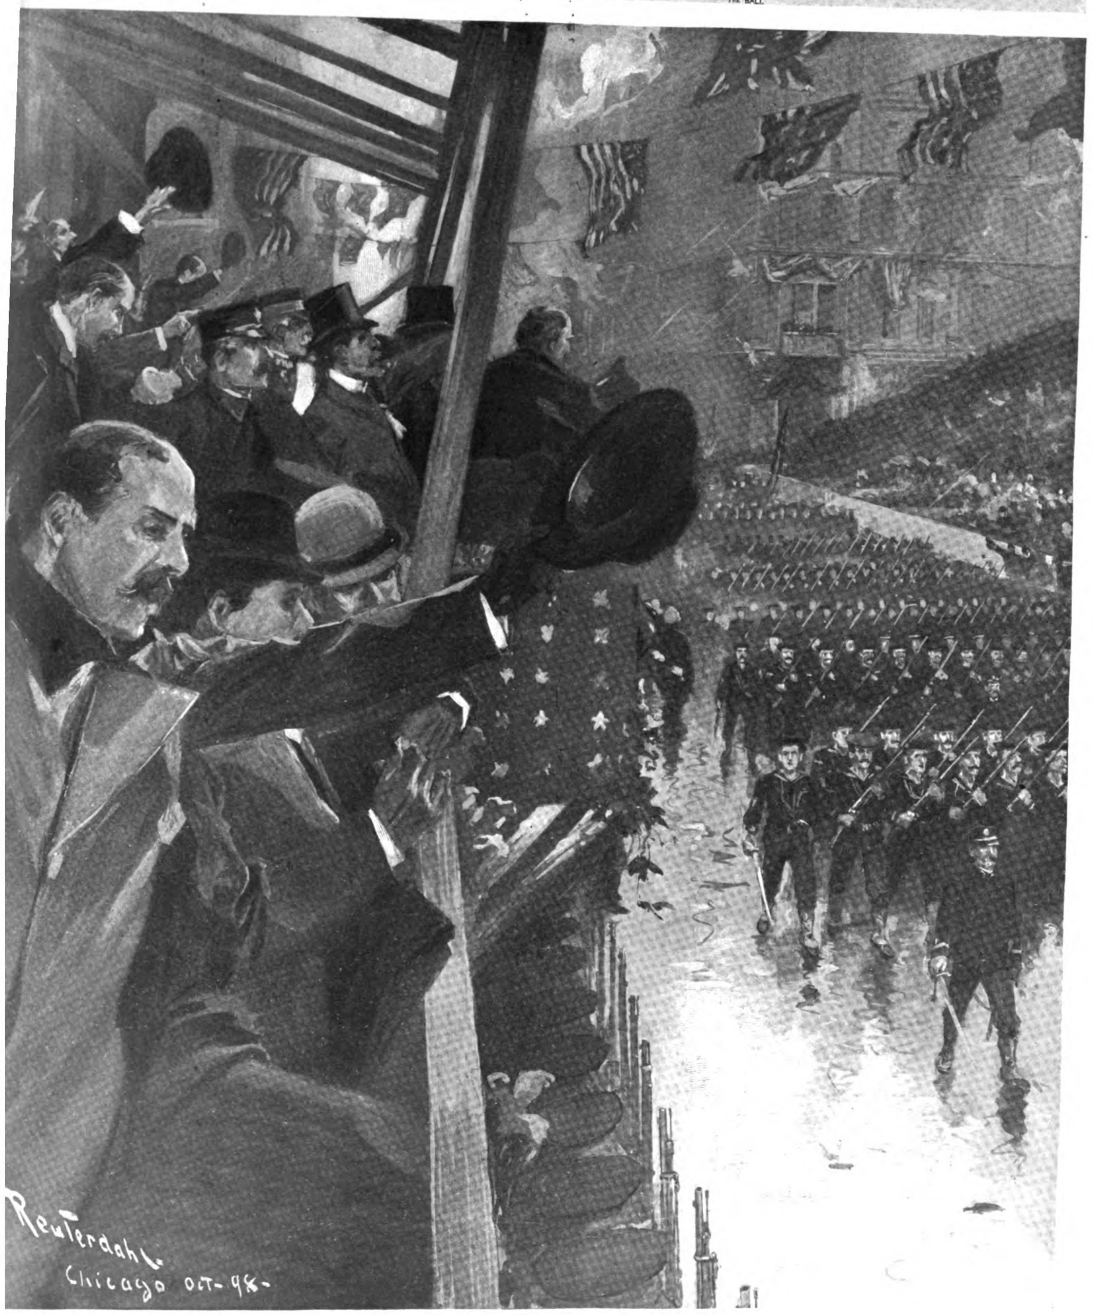
INFANTRY GUARDING THE EXPOSITION GROUNDS—CHAMP-DE-MARS.

THE SALE OF M. ZOLA'S TABLE AT AUCTION TO SATISFY JUDGMENTS FOR LIBEL.



ZOLA'S HOUSE—MORNING OF THE AUCTION—LEGAL NOTICES OF SALE POSTED ON THE DOOR.

SCENES OF PRESENT INTEREST IN THE FRENCH CAPITAL.



PHOTOGRAPHS BY MESSRS. GRIBAYÉDOFF AND FITTING, PARIS.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

PRESIDENT McKINLEY REVIEWING THE PROCESSION.

THE PEACE JUBILEE IN CHICAGO, OCTOBER 18.
SKETCHES BY H. REUTERDAHL, SPECIAL ARTIST FOR "HARPER'S WEEKLY."

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THE AWKWARD AGE.*

A Novel.

BY HENRY JAMES,

AUTHOR OF "DAISY MILLER," "AN INTERNATIONAL EPISODE," ETC.

XIII.

HAROLD BROOKENHAM, whom Mr. Cashmore, ushered in and announced, had found in the act of helping himself to a cup of tea at the table apparently just prepared—Harold Brookenham arrived at the point with a dash so direct as to leave the visitor an option between but two suppositions: that of a desperate plunge, to have his shame soon over, or that of the acquired habit of such appeals, which had taught him the easiest way. There was no great sharpness in the face of Mr. Cashmore, who was, somehow, massive without majesty; yet he might not have been proof against the suspicion that his young friend's embarrassment was an easy precaution, a conscious corrective to the danger of audacity. It would not have been impossible to divine that if Harold shut his eyes and jumped, it was mainly for the appearance of doing so. Experience seemed to show that one might get a five-pound note as one got a light for a cigarette, but one had to check the friendly impulse to ask for it in the same way. Mr. Cashmore had in fact looked surprised, yet not, on the whole, so surprised as the young man seemed to have expected of him. There was almost a quiet grace in the combination of promptitude and diffidence with which Harold took over the responsibility of all proprietorship of the crisp morsel of paper that he slipped with slow firmness into the pocket of his waistcoat, rubbing it gently, in its passage, against the delicately buff-colored duck of which that garment was composed. "So quite too awfully kind of you that I really don't know what to say"—there was a marked recall, in the manner of this speech, of the sweetness of his mother's droop and the tenderness of her wail. It was as if he had been moved for the moment to moralize, but the eyes he raised to his benefactor had the oddest effect of marking that personage himself as the source of the lesson.

Mr. Cashmore, who would have been very red-headed if he had not been very bald, showed a single eye-glass and a long upper lip; he was large and jaunty, with little petulant movements and intense ejaculations that were not in the line of his type. "You may say anything you like if you don't say you'll repay it. That's always nonsense—I hate it."

Harold remained sad, but showed himself really superior. "Then I won't say it." Pensively, a minute, he appeared to figure the words, in their absurdity, on the lips of some young man not, like himself, tactful. "I know just what you mean."

"But I think, you know, that you ought to tell your father," Mr. Cashmore said.

"Tell him I've borrowed of you?"

Mr. Cashmore good-humoredly demurred. "It would serve me right—it's so shocking my having listened to you. Tell him, certainly," he went on after an instant. "But what I mean is that if you're in such straits you should speak to him like a man."

Harold smiled as at the innocence of a friend who could suppose him not to have exhausted that resource. "I'm always speaking to him like a man, and that's just what puts him so awfully out. He denies to my face that I am one. One would suppose, to hear him, not only that I'm a small objectionable child, but that I'm scarcely even human. He doesn't conceive me as with any wants."

"Oh," Mr. Cashmore laughed, "you've all—you youngsters—as many wants, I know, as an advertisement page of the Times."

Harold showed an admiration. "That's awfully good. If you think you ought to speak of it," he continued, "do it rather to mamma." He hoted the hour. "I'll go, if you'll excuse me, to give you the chance."

The visitor referred to his own watch. "It's your mother herself who gives the chances—the chances you take."

Harold looked kind and simple. "She has come in, I know. She'll be with you in a moment."

He was half-way to the door, but Mr. Cashmore, though so easy, had not done with him. "I suppose you mean that if it's only your mother who's told, you may depend on her to shield you."

Harold turned this over as if it were a questionable sovereign, but on second thoughts he wonderfully smiled. "Do you think that after you've let me have it you can tell? You could, of course, if you hadn't." He appeared to work it out for Mr. Cashmore's benefit. "But I don't mind," he added, "your telling mamma."

"Don't mind, you mean, really, its annoying her so awfully?"

The invitation to repent thrown off in this could only strike the young man as absurd—it was so previous to any enjoyment. Harold liked things in their proper order; but, at the same time, his evolutions were quick. "I dare say I am selfish, but what I was thinking of was that the terrific wigging, don't you know?—well, I'd take it from her. She knows about one's life—about our having to go on, by no fault of our own, as our parents start us. She knows all about wants—no one has more than mamma."

Mr. Cashmore stared, but there was amusement in it too. "So she'll say it's all right?"

"Oh no; she'll let me have it hot. But she'll recognize that, at such a pass, more must be done for a fellow, and that may lead to something—indirectly, don't you see? for she won't tell my father, she'll only, in her own way, work on him—that will put me on a better footing, and for which, therefore, at bottom, I shall have to thank you."

The eye assisted by Mr. Cashmore's glass had fixed, during this address, with a discernible growth of something like alarm, the subject of his beneficence. The thread of their relations somehow lost itself in this subtler twist, and he fell back on mere stature, position and property, things always convenient in the presence of crookedness. "I shall say nothing to your mother, but I think I shall be rather glad that you're not a son of mine."

Harold wondered at this new element in their talk. "Do your sons never—?"

"Borrow money of their mother's visitors?" Mr. Cashmore had taken him up, ready, evidently, quite to satisfy him; but the question was caught on the wing by Mrs. Brookenham herself, who had opened the door as her friend spoke and who quickly advanced with an echo of it.

"Lady Fanny's visitors?"—and, though her eyes rather avoided than met his own, she seemed to cover her ladyship's husband with a vague but competent sympathy. "What on earth are you saying to Harold about them?" Thus it was that, at the end of a few minutes, Mr. Cashmore, on the sofa face to face with her, found his consciousness quite purged of its actual sense of his weakness and a new turn given to the idea of what, in one's very drawing-room, might go on behind one's back. Harold had quickly vanished—had been tacitly disposed of, and Mrs. Brook's caller had moved, even in the short space of time, so far in quite another direction as to have drawn from her the little cold question: "'Presents'? You don't mean money?"

He clearly felt the importance of expressing at least by his silence and his eye-glass what he meant. "Her extravagance is beyond everything, and though there are bills enough, God knows, that do come in to me, I don't see how she pulls through unless there are others that go elsewhere."

Mrs. Brookenham had given him his tea—her own she had placed on a small table near her, and she could now respond freely to the impulse felt, on this, of settling herself to something of real interest. Except to Harold she was incapable of reproach, though there were shades, of course, in her resignation, and her daughter's report of her to Mr. Longdon as conscious of an absence of prejudice would have been justified, for a spectator, by the particular feeling that Mr. Cashmore's speech caused her to disclose. What did this feeling wonderfully appear unless strangely irrelevant? "I've no patience when I hear you talk as if you weren't horribly rich."

He looked at her an instant as if with the fancy that she might have derived that impression from Harold. "What has that to do with it? Does a rich man enjoy any more than a poor his wife's making a fool of him?"

Her eyes opened wider: it was one of her very few ways of betraying amusement. There was little indeed to be amused at here except his choice of the particular invidious name. "You know I don't believe a word you say."

Mr. Cashmore drank his tea, then rose to carry the cup somewhere and put it down, declining, with a motion, any assistance. When he was on the sofa again he resumed their intimate talk. "I like tremendously to be with you, but you mustn't think I've come here to let you say to me such dreadful things as that." He was an odd compound, Mr. Cashmore, and the air of personal good health, the unvarnished bloom which sometimes lent a monstrous serenity to his mention of the barely mentionable, was on occasion balanced or matched by his playful application of extravagant terms to matters of much less moment. "You know what I come to you for, Mrs. Brook: I won't come any more if you're going to be horrid and impossible."

"You come to me, I suppose, because—for my deep misfortune, I assure you—I've a kind of vision of things, of the wretched miseries in which you all knot yourselves up, which you yourselves are as little blessed with as if, tumbling about together in your heap, you were a litter of blind kittens."

"Awfully good, that—you do lift the burden of my trouble!" He had laughed out, in the manner of the man who made notes, for platform use, of things that might serve; but the next moment he was grave again, as if his observation had reminded him of Harold's praise of his wit. It was in this spirit that he abruptly brought out: "Where, by-the-way, is your daughter?"

"I haven't the least idea. I do all I can to enter into her life, but you can't get into a railway train while it's on the rush."

Mr. Cashmore swung back to hilarity. "You give me lots of things. Do you mean she's so 'fast'?" He could keep the ball going.

Mrs. Brookenham hesitated. "No; she's a tremendous dear, and we're great friends. But she has her free young life, which, by that law of our time that I'm sure I only want, like all other laws, once I know what they are, to accept—she has her precious freshness of feeling which I say to myself that, so far as control is concerned, I ought to respect. I try to get her to sit with me, and she does so often, because she's kind. But before I know it she leaves me again: she feels that her presence makes a difference in one's liberty of talk."

Mr. Cashmore was struck by this picture. "That's awfully charming of her."

"Isn't it too dear?" The thought of it, for Mrs. Brook, seemed fairly to open out vistas. "The modern daughter!"

"But not the ancient mother!" Mr. Cashmore smiled.

She shook her head with a world of accepted woe. "'Give me back, give me back one hour of my youth'? Oh, I haven't a single thrill left to answer a compliment. I sit here now face to face with things as they are. They come in their turn, I assure you—and they find me," Mrs. Brook sighed, "ready. Nanda has stepped on the stage, and I give her up the house. Besides," she went on musingly, "it's awfully interesting. It is the modern daughter—we're really 'doing' her, the child and I; and as the modern has always been my own note—I've gone in, I mean, frankly for my very own Time—who is one, after all, that one should pretend to decline to go where it may lead?" Mr. Cashmore was unprepared with an answer to this question, and his hostess continued in a different tone: "It's sweet her sparing one!"

This, for the visitor, was firmer ground. "Do you mean about talking before her?"

Mrs. Brook's assent was positively tender. "She won't have a difference in my freedom. It's as if the dear thing knew, don't you see? what we must keep back. She wants us not to have to think. It's quite maternal!" she mused again. Then, as if with the pleasure of presenting it to him afresh: "That's the modern daughter!"

"Well," said Mr. Cashmore, "I can't help wishing she were a trifle less considerate. In that case I might find her with you, and I may tell you frankly that I get more from her than I do from you. She has the great merit for me, in the first place, of not being such an admirer of my wife."

Mrs. Brookenham took this up with interest. "No—you're right; she doesn't, as I do, see Lady Fanny, and that's a kind of mercy."

"There you are, then, you inconsistent creature," he cried with a laugh; "after all you do believe me. You recognize how benighted it would be for your daughter not to feel that Fanny's bad."

"You're too tiresome, my dear man," Mrs. Brook returned, "with your ridiculous simplifications. Fanny's not 'bad'; she's magnificently good—in the sense of being generous and simple and true, too adorably unaffected and without the least mesquinerie. She's a great calm silver statue."

Mr. Cashmore showed, on this, something of the strength that comes from the practice of public debate. "Then why are you glad that your daughter doesn't like her?"

Mrs. Brook smiled as with the sadness of having too much to triumph. "Because I'm not, like Fanny, without mesquinerie. I'm not generous and simple. I'm exaggeratedly anxious about Nanda. I care, in spite of myself, for what people may say. Your wife doesn't—she towers above them. I can be a shade less brave through the chance of my girl's not happening to feel her as the rest of us do."

Mr. Cashmore too heavily followed. "To 'feel' her?"

Mrs. Brook floated over. "There would be, in that case perhaps, something to hint to her not to shriek on the house-tops. When you say," she continued, "that one admits, as regards Fanny, anything wrong, you pervert dreadfully what one does freely grant—that she's a glorious pagan. It's a real relief to know such a type—it's like a flash of insight into history. None the less, if you ask me why then it isn't all right for young things to 'shriek' as I say, I have my answer perfectly ready." After which, as her visitor seemed not only too reduced to doubt it, but too baffled to distinguish audibly, for his credit, between resignation and admiration, she produced: "Because she's purely instinctive. Her instincts are splendid—but it's terrific."

"That's all I ever maintained it to be!" Mr. Cashmore cried. "It is terrific."

"Well," his friend answered, "I'm watching her. We're all watching her. It's like some great natural poetic thing—an Alpine sunrise or a big high tide."

"You're amazing!" Mr. Cashmore laughed. "I'm watching her too."

"And I'm also watching you," Mrs. Brook lucidly continued. "What I don't for a moment believe is that her bills are paid by any one. It's much more probable," she sagaciously observed, "that they're not paid at all."

"Oh, well, if she can get on that way—!"

"There can't be a place in London," Mrs. Brook pursued, "where they're not delighted to dress such a woman. She shows things, don't you see? as some great quiet wall shows placards and posters. And what proof can you adduce?" she asked.

Mr. Cashmore had grown restless; he picked a stray thread off the knee of his trousers. "Ah, when you talk about 'adducing'—!" He appeared to intimate, as if with the hint that if she didn't take care she might bore him, that it was the kind of word he used only in the House of Commons.

"When I talk about it you can't meet me," she placidly returned. But she fixed him with her weary penetration. "You try to believe what you can't believe, in order to give yourself excuses. And she does the same—only less, for she recognizes less, in general, the need of them. She's so grand and simple."

Poor Mr. Cashmore stared. "Grander and simpler than I, you mean?"

Mrs. Brookenham thought. "Not simpler—no; but very much grander. She wouldn't, in the case you conceive, recognize really the need of what you conceive." "I don't understand you."

Mrs. Brook seeing it all from dim depths, tracked it further and further. "We've talked her over so!"

Mr. Cashmore groaned as if too conscious of it. "Indeed we have!"

"I mean we"—and it was wonderful how her accent discriminated. "We've talked you too—but of course we talk every one." She had a pause through which there glimmered a ray from luminous hours, the inner intimacy which, privileged as he was, he couldn't pretend to share; then she broke out almost impatiently: "We're looking after her—leave her to us!"

He looked suddenly so curious as to seem really envious, but he tried to throw it off. "I doubt if, after all, you're good for her."

But Mrs. Brookenham knew. "She's just the sort of person we are good for, and the thing for her is to be with us as much as possible—just live with us naturally and easily, listen to our talk, feel our confidence in her, be kept up, don't you know? by the sense of what we expect of her splendid type, and so, little by little, let our influence act. What I meant to say just now is that I do perfectly see her taking what you call presents."

"Well, then," Mr. Cashmore inquired, "what do you want more?"

Mrs. Brook hung fire an instant—she seemed on the

* Begun in HARPER'S WEEKLY No. 2180.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google point of telling him. "I don't see her, as I said, recognizing the obligation."

"The obligation—?"

"To give anything back. Anything at all." Mrs. Brook was positive. "The comprehension of petty calculations? Never!"

"I don't say the calculations are petty," Mr. Cashmore objected.

"Well, she's a great creature. If she does fall—" His hostess lost herself in the view, which was at last all before her. "Be sure we shall all know it."

"That's exactly what I'm afraid of!"

"Then don't be afraid till we do. She would fall, as it were, on us, don't you see? and," said Mrs. Brook with decision this time in her head-shake, "that couldn't be. We must keep her up—that's your guarantee. It's rather too much," she added with the same increase of briskness, "to have to keep you up too. Be very sure that if Carrie really wavers—"

"Carrie?"

His interruption was clearly too vague to be sincere, and it was as such that, going straight on, she treated it. "I shall never again give her three minutes' attention. To answer to you for Fanny without being able—"

"To answer to Fanny for me, do you mean?" He had flushed quickly as if he awaited her there. "It wouldn't suit you, you contend? Well then, I hope it will ease you off," he went on with spirit, "to know that I wholly loathe Mrs. Donner."

Mrs. Brook, staring, met the announcement with an absolute change of color. "And since when, pray?" It was as if a fabric had crumbled. "She was here but the other day, and as full of you, poor thing, as an egg of meat."

Mr. Cashmore could only blush for her. "I don't say she wasn't. My life's a burden from her."

Nothing, for a spectator, could have been so odd as Mrs. Brook's disappointment unless it had been her determination. "Have you done with her already?"

"One has never done with a buzzing insect—"

"Until one has literally killed it?" Mrs. Brookenham wailed. "I can't take that from you, my dear man: it was yourself who originally distilled the poison that courses through her veins." He jumped up, at this, as if he couldn't bear it, presenting as he walked across the room, however, a large, foolish, fugitive back, on which her eyes rested as on a proof of her penetration. "If you spoil everything by trying to deceive me, how can I help you?"

He had looked, in his restlessness, at a picture or two, but he finally turned round. "With whom is it you talk us over? With Petherton and his friend Mitchy? With your beloved Mr. Vanderbank? With your awful Duchess?"

"You know my little circle, and you've not always despised it." She met him on his return with a figure that had visibly flashed for her. "Don't foul your own nest! Remember that, after all, we've more or less produced you." She had a smile that attenuated a little her image, for there were things that, on a second thought, he appeared ready to take from her. She patted the sofa as if to invite him again to be seated, and, though he still stood before her, it was with a face that seemed to show how her touch went home. "You know I've never quite thought you do us full honor, but it was because she took you for one of us that Carrie first—"

At this, to stop her, he dropped straight into the seat. "I assure you there has really been nothing." With a continuation of his fidget he pulled out his watch. "Won't she come in at all?"

"Do you mean Nanda?"

"Talk me over with her," he smiled, "if you like. If you don't believe Mrs. Donner is dust and ashes to me," he continued, "you do little justice to your daughter."

"Do you wish to break it to me that you're in love with her?"

He hesitated, but only as if to give weight to his reply. "Awfully. I can't tell you how I like her."

She wondered. "And pray how will that help me? Help me, I mean, to help you. Is it what I'm to tell your wife?"

He sat looking away, but he evidently had his idea, which he at last produced. "Why wouldn't it be just the thing? It would exactly prove my purity."

There might have been in her momentary silence a hint of acceptance of it as a practical contribution to their problem, and there were indeed several lights in which it could be considered. Mrs. Brook, on a quick survey, selected the ironic. "I see, I see. I might, by the same law, arrange somehow that Lady Fanny should find herself in love with Edward. That would 'prove' her purity. And you could be quite at ease," she laughed—"he wouldn't make any presents!"

Mr. Cashmore regarded her with a candor that was almost a reproach to her mirth. "I like your daughter better than I like you."

But it only amused her more. "Is that perhaps because I don't prove your purity?"

What he might have replied remained in the air, for the door opened so exactly at the moment she spoke that he rose again with a start and the butler, coming in, received her inquiry full in the face. This functionary's answer to it, however, had no more than the usual austerity. "Mr. Vanderbank and Mr. Longdon."

These visitors took a minute to appear, and Mrs. Brook, not stirring—still only looking, from the sofa, calmly up at Mr. Cashmore—used the time, it might have seemed, for correcting any impression of undue levity made by her recent question. "Where did you last meet Nanda?"

He glanced at the door to see if he were heard. "At the Grendons'."

"So you do go there?"

"I went over from Hicks the other day for an hour."

"And Carrie was there?"

"Yes. It was a dreadful horrid bore. But I talked only to your daughter."

She got up—the others were at hand, and she offered Mr. Cashmore a face that might have struck him as strange. "It's serious."

"Serious?"—he had no eyes for the others.

"She didn't tell me."

He gave a sound, controlled by discretion, which sufficed, none the less, to make Mr. Longdon—beholding him for the first time—receive it with a little of the stiffness of a person greeted with a guffaw. Mr. Cashmore visibly liked this silence of Nanda's about their meeting.

XIV.

Mrs. Brookenham, who had introduced Mr. Cashmore to the elder of her visitors, had also found, in serving these gentlemen with tea, a chance to edge at him with an intensity not to be resisted: "Talk to Mr. Longdon—take him off there." She had indicated the sofa at the opposite end of the room, and had set him an example by possessing herself, in the place she already occupied, of Vanderbank. This arrangement, however, when she had made it, constituted for her, in her own corner, the ground of an instant appeal. "Will he hate me any worse for doing that?"

Vanderbank glanced at the others. "Will Cashmore, do you mean?"

"Dear no—I don't care whom he hates. But with Mr. Longdon I want to avoid mistakes."

"Then don't try quite so hard!" Vanderbank laughed. "Is that your reason for throwing him into Cashmore's arms?"

"Yes, precisely—so that I shall have these few moments to ask you for directions: you must know him, by this time, so well. I only want, Heaven knows, to be as nice to him as I possibly can."

"That's quite the best thing for you and altogether why, this afternoon, I brought him: he might have better luck in finding you—it was he who suggested it—than he has had by himself. I'm in a general way," Vanderbank added, "watching over him."

"I see—and he's watching over you." Mrs. Brook's lovely vacancy had already taken in so much. "He wants to judge of what I may be doing to you—he wants to save you from me. He quite detests me."

Vanderbank, with the interest as well as the amusement of this, fairly threw himself back. "There's nobody like you—you're too magnificent!"

"I am; and that I can look the truth in the face and not be angry or silly about it is, as you know, the one thing in the world for which I think a bit well of myself."

"Oh yes, I know—I know; you're too wonderful!"

Mrs. Brookenham, in a brief pause, completed her consciousness. "They're doing beautifully—he's taking Cashmore with a seriousness!"

"And with what is Cashmore taking him?"

"With the hope that, from one moment to another, Nanda may come in."

"But how on earth does that concern him?"

"Through an extraordinary fancy he has suddenly taken to her." Mrs. Brook had been swift to master the facts. "He has been meeting her at Tishy's, and she has talked to him so effectually about his behavior that she has quite made him cease to think about Carrie. He prefers her now—and of course she's much nicer."

Vanderbank's attention, it was clear, had now been fully seized. "She's much nicer. Rather! What you mean is," he asked the next moment, "that Nanda, this afternoon, has been the object of his call?"

"Yes—really; though he tried to keep it from me. She makes him feel," she went on, "so innocent and good."

Her companion, for a moment, said nothing; and then at last: "And will she come in?"

"I haven't the least idea."

"Don't you know where she is?"

"I suppose she's with Tishy, who has returned to town."

Vanderbank turned this over. "Is that your system now—to ask no questions?"

"Why should I ask any—when I want her life to be as much as possible like my own? It's simply that the hour has struck, as you know. From the moment she is down, the only thing for us is to live as friends. I think it's so vulgar," Mrs. Brook sighed, "not to have the same good manners with one's children as one has with other people. She asks me nothing."

"Nothing?" Vanderbank echoed.

"Nothing."

He paused again; after which, "It's very disgusting!" he exclaimed. Then as she took it up as he had taken her word of a moment before, "It's very preposterous," he continued.

Mrs. Brook appeared at a loss. "Do you mean her helping him?"

"It's not of Nanda I'm speaking—it's of him." Vanderbank spoke with a certain impatience. "His being with her in any sort of direct relation at all. His mixing her up with his not very tidy muddles."

Mrs. Brook looked intelligent and wan about it, but also perfectly good-humored. "My dear man, he is such a perfect ass!"

Vanderbank laughed in spite of himself. "And does that make it any better?"

Mrs. Brook thought, but presently had a light—she almost smiled with it. "For us." Then more wofully, "Don't you want Carrie to be saved?" she asked.

"Why should I? Not a jot. Carrie be hanged!"

"But it's for Fanny," Mrs. Brook protested. "If Carrie is rescued, it's a pretext the less for her." As the young man looked for an instant rather gloomily vague she softly quavered: "I suppose you don't positively want her to bolt?"

"To bolt?"

"Surely I've not to remind you at this time of day how Captain Dent-Douglas is always round the corner with the post-chaise, and how tight, on our side, we're all clutching her."

"But why not let her go?"

Mrs. Brook, at this, showed a sentiment more sharp. "'Go'? Then what would become of us?" She recalled his wandering fancy. "She's the delight of our life."

"Oh!" Vanderbank sceptically murmured.

"She's the ornament of our circle," his companion insisted. "She will, she won't—she won't, she will! It's the excitement, every day, of plucking the daisy over." Vanderbank's attention, as she spoke, had attached itself, across the room, to Mr. Longdon; it gave her thus an image of the way his imagination had just seemed to her to stray, and she saw a reason in it moreover for her coming up in another place. "Isn't he rather rich?" She allowed the question all its effect of abruptness.

Vanderbank looked round at her. "I haven't the least idea."

"Not after becoming so intimate? It's usually, with people, the very first thing I get my impression of." There came into her face, for another glance at their friend, no crudity of curiosity, but an expression more tenderly wistful. "He must have some mysterious box under his bed."

"Down in Suffolk?—a miser's hoard? Who knows? I dare say," Vanderbank went on. "He isn't a miser, but he strikes me as careful."

Mrs. Brook meanwhile had thought it out. "Then he has something to be careful of; it would take something really handsome to inspire in a man like him that sort of interest. With his small expenses all these years, his savings must be immense. And how could he have proposed to mamma unless he had originally had money?"

If Vanderbank hesitated he also laughed. "You must remember your mother refused him."

"Ah, but not because there was not enough."

"No—I imagine the force of the blow, for him, was just in the other reason."

"Well, it would have been in that one, just as much, if that one had been the other." Mrs. Brook was sagacious, though a trifle obscure, and she pursued the next moment: "Mamma was so sincere. The fortune was nothing to her. That shows it was immense."

"It couldn't have been as great as your logic," Vanderbank smiled; "but of course if it has been growing ever since—!"

"I can see it grow while he sits there," Mrs. Brook declared. But her logic had in fact its own law, and her next transition was an equal jump. "It was too lovely, the frankness of your admission a minute ago that I affect him uncannily. Ah, don't spoil it by explanations!" she beautifully pleaded; "he's not the first and he won't be the last with whom I shall not have been what they call a combination. The only thing that matters is that I shouldn't, if possible, make the case worse. So you must guide me. What is one to do?"

Vanderbank, now amused again, looked at her kindly. "Be yourself, my dear woman. Obey your fine instincts."

"How can you be," she sweetly asked, "so hideously hypocritical? You know as well as you sit there that my fine instincts are the thing in the world you're most in terror of. 'Be myself'?" she echoed. "What you would like to say is: 'Be somebody else—that's your only chance.' Well, I'll try—I'll try."

He laughed again, shaking his head. "Don't—don't!"

"You mean it's too hopeless? There's no way of effacing the bad impression or of starting a good one?" On this, with a drop of his mirth, he met her eyes, and for an instant, through the superficial levity of their talk, they might have appeared to sound each other. It lasted till Mrs. Brook went on: "I should really like not to lose him."

Vanderbank hesitated, but at last he said: "I think you won't lose him."

"Do you mean you'll help me, Van—you will?" Her voice had at moments the most touching tones of any in England, and, humble, helpless, affectionate, she spoke with a familiarity of friendship. "It's for the sense of the link with mamma," she explained. "He's simply full of her."

"Oh, I know. He's prodigious."

"He has told you more—he comes back to it?" Mrs. Brook eagerly asked.

"Well," the young man replied a trifle evasively, "we've had a great deal of talk, and he's the jolliest old boy possible, and in short I like him."

"I see," said Mrs. Brook blandly, "and he likes you, in return, as much as he despises me. That makes it all right—makes me somehow so happy for you. There's something in him—what is it?—that suggests the oncle d'Amérique, the eccentric benefactor, the fairy godmother. He's a little of an old woman—but all the better for it." She hung fire but an instant before she pursued: "What can we make him do for you?"

Vanderbank, at this, was very blank. "Do for me?"

"How can any one love you," she asked, "without wanting to show it in some way? You know all the ways, dear Van," she breathed, "in which I want to show it."

He might have known them, something suddenly fixed in his face appeared to say, but they were not what was, on this speech of hers, most immediately present to him. "That, for instance, is the tone not to take with him."

"There you are!" she sighed with discouragement. "Well, only tell me." Then as he said nothing: "I must be more like mamma?"

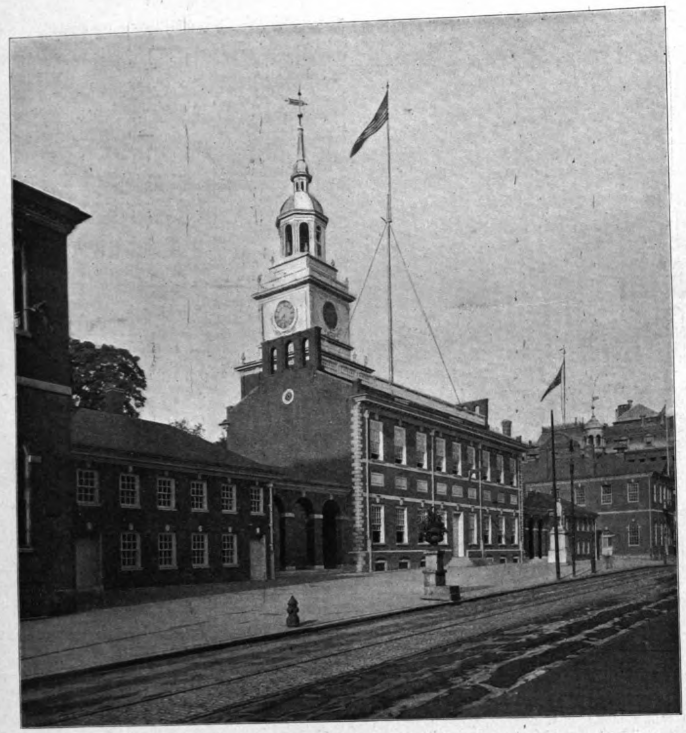
His smile confessed to his feeling an awkwardness. "You're perhaps not quite enough like her."

"Oh, I know that if he deplores me as I am now, she would have done so quite as much; in fact probably, as seeing it nearer, a good deal more. She would have despised me even more than he. But if it's a question," Mrs. Brook went on, "of not saying what mamma wouldn't, how can I know, don't you see? what she would have said?" Mrs. Brook became as wonderful as if she saw in her friend's face some admiring reflection of the fine freedom of mind that—in such a connection quite as much as in any other—she could always show. "Of course I revere mamma just as much as he does, and there was everything in her to revere. But she was none the less, in every way, a charming woman too, and I don't know, after all, do I? what even she—in their peculiar relation—may not have said to him."

Vanderbank's laugh came back. "Very good—very good. I return to my first idea. Try with him whatever comes into your head. You're a woman of genius, after all, and genius mostly justifies itself. To make you right," he went on pleasantly and inexorably, "might perhaps be to make you wrong. Since you have so great a charm, trust it not at all or all in all. That, I dare say, is all you can do. Therefore—yes—be yourself."

These remarks were followed on either side by the repetition of a somewhat intenser mutual gaze, though indeed the speaker's eyes had more the air of meeting his friend's than of seeking them. "I can't be you, certainly, Van," Mrs. Brook sadly brought forth.

"I know what you mean by that," he rejoined in a moment. "You mean I'm hypocritical."

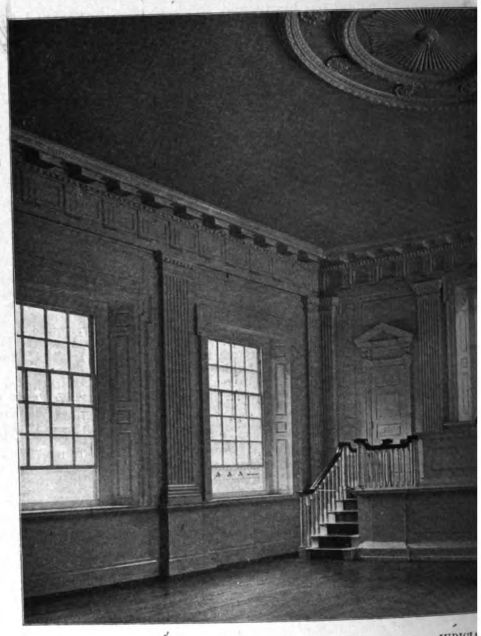


"Hypocritical?"

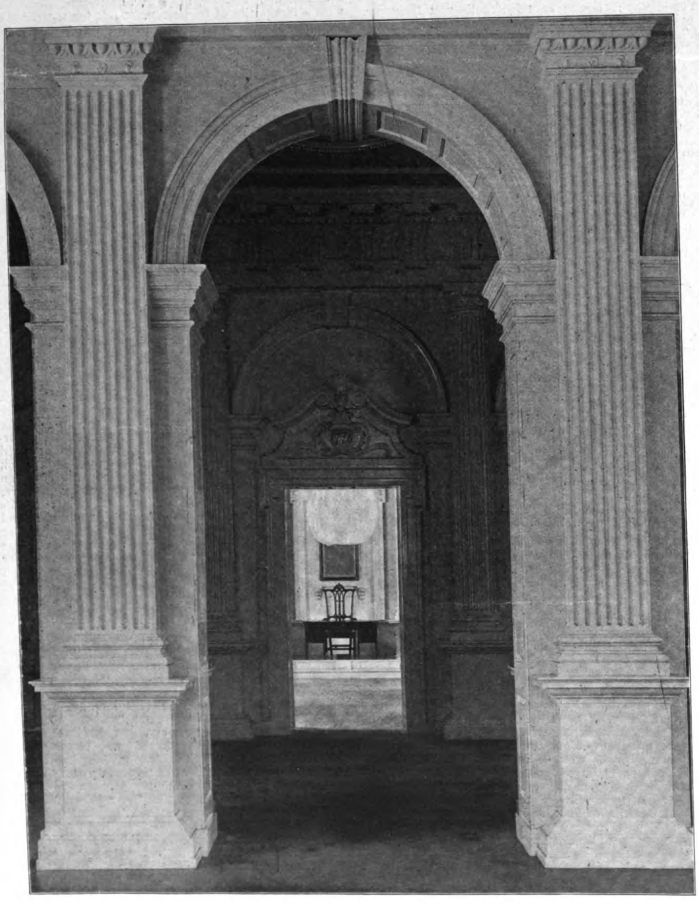
"I'm diplomatic and calculating—I don't show him how bad I am; whereas with you he knows the worst."

Of this observation Mrs. Brook, whose eyes attached themselves again to Mr. Longdon, took at first no further notice than might have been indicated by the way it set her musing. "'Calculating'?"—she at last took him up. "On what is there to calculate?"

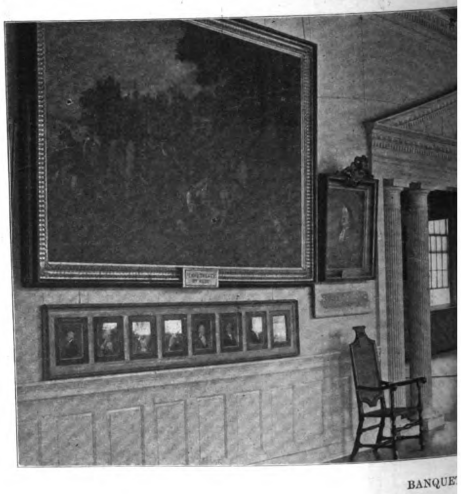
"Why," said Vanderbank, "if, as you just hinted, he's



Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google



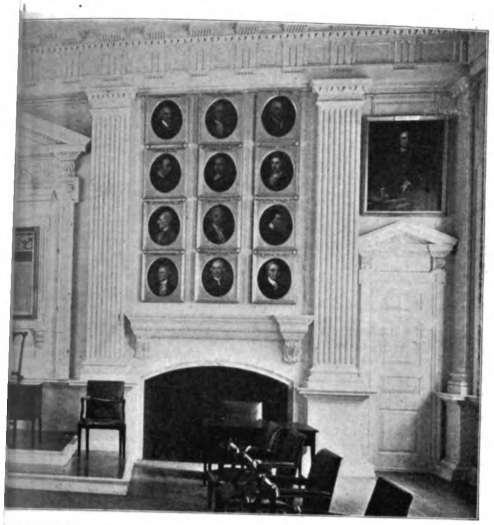
FRONT VIEW OF EXTERIOR.



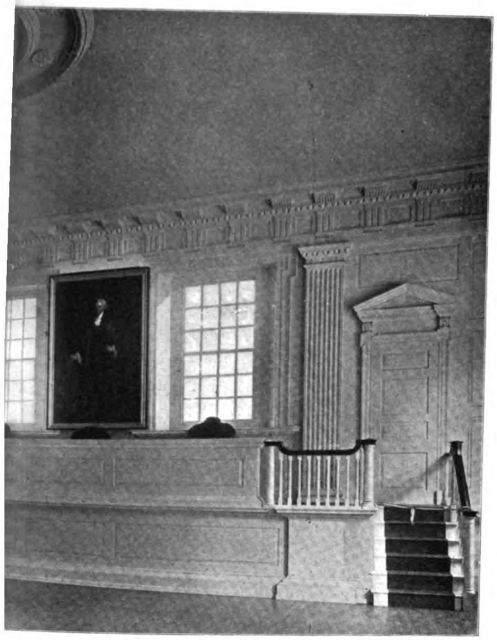
INDEPENDENC

JUDICIA

VISTA THROUGH HALL.



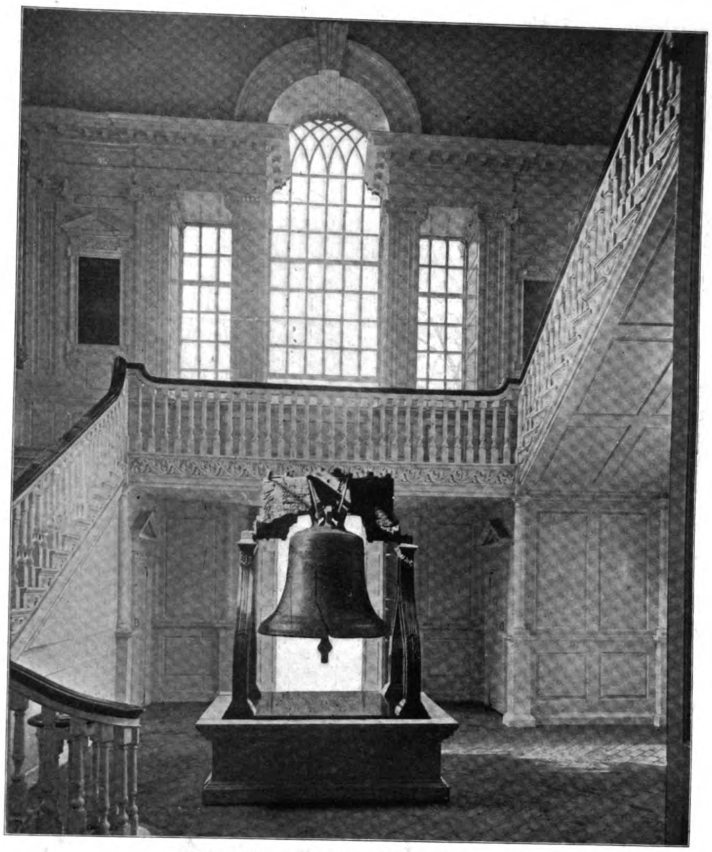
BANQUE



THE RESTORATION OF INI

An Illustrated Article, outlining the Plans for restoring this Historic Building in accordance with its Original Design, appeared in "Hat

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google



CHAMBER.

AMBER.

EST SIDE.

THE LIBERTY BELL AND STAIRWAY TO TOWER.

STAIRWAY TO SECOND FLOOR, AND SMALL STAIRWAY TO BELL TOWER.

DENCE HALL, PHILADELPHIA.

ly" July 24, 1897. The Restoration is now Completed, and the Views herewith shown indicate how successfully the Work has been Done.

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

a blessing in disguise—! I perfectly admit," he resumed, "that I'm capable of sacrifices to keep on good terms with him."

"You're not afraid he'll bore you?"

"Oh yes—distinctly."

"But it will be worth it? Then," Mrs. Brook said, as he appeared to assent, "it will be worth a great deal." She continued to watch Mr. Longdon, who, without his glasses, stared straight at the floor while Mr. Cashmore talked to him. She pursued, however, dispassionately enough: "He must be of a narrowness—!"

"Oh, beautiful!"

She was silent again. "I shall broaden him. You won't."

"Heaven forbid!" Vanderbank heartily concurred. "But none the less, as I've said, I'll help you."

Her attention was still fixed. "It will be him you'll help. If you're to make sacrifices to keep on good terms with him, the first sacrifice will be of me." Then on his leaving this remark so long unanswered that she had finally looked at him again: "I'm perfectly prepared for it."

It was as if, jocosely enough, he had had time to make up his mind how to meet her. "What will you have—when he loved my mother?"

Nothing could have been droller than the gloom of her surprise. "Yours too?"

"I didn't tell you the other day—out of delicacy."

Mrs. Brookenham darkly thought. "He didn't tell me either."

"The same consideration deterred him. But if I didn't speak of it," Vanderbank continued, "when I arranged with you, after meeting him here at dinner, that you should come to tea with him at my rooms—if I didn't mention it then it wasn't because I hadn't learnt it early."

Mrs. Brook more deeply sounded this affair, but she spoke with the exaggerated mildness which was the form her gayety mostly took. "It was because, of course, it makes him out such a wretch! What becomes in that case of his loyalty—?"

"To your mother's memory? Oh, it's all right—he has it quite clear. She came later—mine, after my father's death, had refused him. But, you see, he might have been my step-father."

Mrs. Brookenham took it in, but she had suddenly a brighter light. "He might have been my own father! Besides," she went on, "if his line is to love the mothers, why on earth doesn't he love me? I'm in all conscience enough of one."

"Ah, but isn't there in your case the fact of a daughter?" Vanderbank asked with a slight embarrassment.

Mrs. Brookenham stared. "What good does that do me?"

"Why, didn't she tell you?"

"Nanda? She told me he doesn't like her any better than he likes me."

Vanderbank, in his turn, showed surprise. "That's really what she said?"

"She had on her return from your rooms a most unusual fit of frankness, for she generally tells me nothing."

"Well," said Vanderbank, "how did she put it?"

Mrs. Brook reflected—recovered it. "'I like him awfully, but I'm not in the least his idea.'"

"His idea of what?"

"That's just what I asked her. Of the proper grandchild for mamma."

Vanderbank hesitated. "Well, she isn't." Then after another pause: "But she'll do."

His companion gave him a deep look. "You'll make her?"

He got up, and on seeing him move Mr. Longdon also rose, so that, facing each other across the room, they exchanged a friendly signal or two. "I'll make her."

XV.

Their hostess's account of Mr. Cashmore's motive for not staying on was so far justified as that Vanderbank, while Mr. Longdon came over to Mrs. Brook, appeared without difficulty to engage him further. The lady in question, meanwhile, had drawn her old friend down, and her present method of approach would have interested an observer aware of the unhappy conviction that she had just privately expressed. Some trace indeed of the glimpse of it enjoyed by Mr. Cashmore's present interlocutor might have been detected in the restlessness that Vanderbank's desire to keep the other pair uninterrupted was still not able to banish from his attitude. Not, however, that Mrs. Brook took the smallest account of it as she quickly broke out: "How can we thank you enough, my dear man, for your extraordinary kindness?" The reference was vivid, yet Mr. Longdon looked so blank about it that she had immediately to explain. "I mean to dear Van, who has told us of your giving him the great happiness—unless he's too dreadfully mistaken—of letting him really know you. He's such a tremendous friend of ours that nothing so delightful can befall him without its affecting us in the same way." She had proceeded with confidence, but suddenly she pulled up. "Don't tell me he is mistaken—I shouldn't be able to bear it." She challenged the pale old man with a loveliness that was for the moment absolutely juvenile. "Aren't you letting him—really?"

Mr. Longdon's smile was queer. "I can't prevent him. I'm not a great house—to give orders to go over me. The kindness is Mr. Vanderbank's own, and I've taken up, I'm afraid, a great deal of his time."

"You have indeed." Mrs. Brook was undiscouraged. "He has been talking with me just now of nothing else. You may say," she went on, "that it's I who have kept him at it. So I have, for his pleasure's a joy to us. If you can't prevent what he feels, you know, you can't prevent, either, what we feel."

Mr. Longdon's face reflected for a minute something he could scarcely have supposed her acute enough to make out, the struggle between his real mistrust of her, founded on the unconscious violence offered by her nature to his every memory of her mother, and his sense, on the other hand, of the high propriety of his liking her; to which latter force his interest in Vanderbank was a contribution, inasmuch as he was obliged to recognize on the part of the pair an alliance it would have been difficult to explain at Beccles. "Perhaps I don't quite see the value of what your husband and you and I are in a position to do for him."

"Do you mean because he's himself so clever?"

"Well," said Mr. Longdon, "I dare say that's at the bottom of my feeling so proud to be taken up by him. I think of the young men of my time, and I see that he takes in more. But that's what you all do," he rather helplessly sighed. "You're very wonderful!"

She met him with an almost extravagant eagerness that the meeting should be just where he wished. "I don't take in everything, but I take in all I can. That's a great affair, in London, to-day, and I often feel as if I were a circus woman, in pink tights and no particular skirts, riding half a dozen horses at once. We're all in the troupe now, I suppose," she smiled, "and we must travel with the show. But when you say we're different," she added, "think, after all, of mamma."

Mr. Longdon stared. "It's from her you are different."

"Ah, but she had an awfully fine mind. We're not cleverer than she."

His conscious, honest eyes looked away an instant. "It's perhaps enough, for the present, that you're cleverer than I! I was very glad, the other day," he continued, "to make the acquaintance of your daughter. I hoped I should find her with you."

If Mrs. Brook cast about, it was but for a few seconds. "If she had known you were coming, she would certainly have been here. She wanted so to please you." Then, as her visitor took no further notice of this speech than to ask if Nanda were out of the house, she had to admit it as an aggravation of failure; but she pursued in the next breath: "Of course you won't care, but she raves about you."

He appeared indeed at first not to care. "Isn't she eighteen?"—it was oddly abrupt.

"I have to think. Wouldn't it be nearer twenty?" Mrs. Brook audaciously returned. Then she tried again. "She told me all about your interview. I staid away on purpose—I had my idea."

"And what was your idea?"

"I thought she would remind you more of mamma if I wasn't there. But she's a little person who sees. Perhaps you didn't think it, but she knew."

"And what did she know?" asked Mr. Longdon, who was unable, however, to keep from his tone a certain coldness which really deprived the question of its proper curiosity.

Mrs. Brook just showed the chill of it, but she had always her courage. "Why, that you don't like her." She had the courage of carrying off as well as of backing out. "She too has her little place with the circus—it's the way we earn our living."

Mr. Longdon said nothing for a moment, and when he at last spoke, it was almost with an air of contradiction. "She's your mother to the life."

His hostess, for three seconds, looked at him hard. "Ah, but with such differences! You'll lose it," she added with a head-shake of pity.

He had his eyes only on Vanderbank. "Well, my losses are my own affair." Then his eyes came back. "Did she tell you I didn't like her?"

The indulgence in Mrs. Brook's view of his simplicity was marked. "You thought you succeeded so in hiding it? No matter—she bears up. I think she really feels a great deal as I do—that it's no matter how many of us hate if you'll only go on feeling as you do about mamma. To show us that—that's what we want."

Nothing could have expressed more the balm of reassurance, but the mild drops fell short of the spot to which they were directed. "'Show' you?"

Oh, how he had sounded the word! "I see—you don't show. That's just what Nanda saw you thought! But you can't keep us from knowing it—can't keep it in fact, I think, from affecting your own behavior. You'd be much worse to us if it wasn't for the still warm ashes of your old passion." It was an immense pity that Vanderbank, at this moment, was too far off to fit, for his amusement, to the expression of his old friend's face, so much of the cause of it as had sprung from the deeply informed tone of Mrs. Brook's allusion. To what degree the speaker herself made the connection will never be known to history, nor whether, as she went on, she thought she bettered her case or simply lost her head. "The great thing for us is that we can never be for you quite like other ordinary people."

"And what's the great thing for me?"

"Oh, for you, there is nothing, I'm afraid, but small things—so small that they can scarcely be worth the trouble of your making them out. Our being so happy that you've come back to us—if only just for a glimpse and to leave us again, in no matter what horror, forever; our positive delight in your being exactly so different; the pleasure we have in talking about you, and shall still have—or indeed all the more—even if we've seen you only to lose you: whatever all this represents for ourselves, it's for none of us to pretend to say how much or how little you may pick out of it. And yet," Mrs. Brook wandered on, "however much we may disappoint you, some little spark of the past can't help being in us—for the past is the one thing beyond all spoiling: there it is, don't you think?—to speak for itself and, if need be, only of itself." She stopped a moment, but she appeared to have destroyed all power of speech in him, so that while she waited she had time for a fresh inspiration. It might perhaps frankly have been mentioned as on the whole her finest. "Don't you think it possible that if you once get the point of view of realizing that I know—?"

She held the note so long that he at last supplied a sound. "That you know what?"

"Why, that, compared with her, I'm a poor creeping thing. I mean"—she hastened to forestall any protest of mere decency that would spoil her idea—"that of course I ache in every limb with the certainty of my dreadful difference. It isn't as if I didn't know it, don't you see? There it is, as a matter of course: I've helplessly, but finally and completely, accepted it. Won't that help you?" she so ingeniously pleaded. "It isn't as if I tormented you with any recall of her whatever. I can quite see how awful it would be for you if, with the effect I produce on you, I did have her lovely eyes or her distinguished nose or the shape of her forehead or the color of her hair. Strange as it is in a daughter, I'm disconnected altogether, and don't you think I may be a little saved for you by becoming thus simply out of the question? Of course," she continued, "your real trial is poor Nanda—she's likewise so fearfully out of it, and yet she's so fearfully in it. And she," said Mrs. Brook wonderfully—"she doesn't know?"

A strange faint flush, while she talked, had come into Mr. Longdon's face, and, whatever effect, as she put it, she produced on him, it was clearly not that of causing his attention to wander. She held him at least, for weal or woe; his bright eyes grew brighter and opened into a stare that finally seemed to offer him as submerged in mere wonder. At last, however, he rose to the surface, and he appeared to have lighted, at the bottom of the sea, on the pearl of the particular wisdom he needed. "I dare say there may be something in what you so extraordinarily suggest."

She jumped at it as if in pleasant pain. "In just letting me go—?"

But at this he dropped. "I shall never let you go."

It renewed her fear. "Not just for what I am?"

He rose from his place beside her, but looking away from her and with his color marked. "I shall never let you go," he repeated.

"Oh, you angel!" She sprang up more quickly, and the others were by this time on their feet. "I've done it, I've done it!" she joyously cried to Vanderbank; "he likes me, or at least he can bear me—I've found him the way; and now I don't care even if he says I haven't." Then she turned again to her old friend. "We can manage about Nanda—you needn't ever see her. She's 'down' now, but she can go up again. We can arrange it at any rate—c'est la moindre des choses."

"Upon my honor I protest," Mr. Cashmore exclaimed, "against anything of the sort! I defy you to 'arrange' that young lady in any such manner without also arranging me. I'm one of her greatest admirers," he gayly announced to Mr. Longdon.

Vanderbank said nothing, and Mr. Longdon seemed to show that he would have preferred to do the same: the old man's eyes might have represented an appeal to him somehow to intervene, to show the due acquaintance, springing from practice and wanting in himself, with the art of conversation developed to the point at which it could thus sustain a lady in the upper air. Vanderbank's silence might, without his mere kind, amused look, have seemed almost inhuman. Poor Mr. Longdon had finally to do his own simple best. "Will you bring your daughter to see me?" he asked of Mrs. Brookenham.

"Oh, oh—that's an idea: will you bring her to see me?" Mr. Cashmore again broke out.

Mrs. Brook had only fixed Mr. Longdon with the look of unutterable things. "You angel, you angel!"—they found expression but in that.

"I don't need to ask you to bring her, do I?" Vanderbank now said to his hostess. "I hope you don't mind my bragging all over the place of the great honor she did me the other day in appearing quite by herself."

"Quite by herself? I say, Mrs. Brook!" Mr. Cashmore stupidly went on.

It was only now that she noticed him; which she did indeed but by answering Vanderbank. "She didn't go for you, I'm afraid—though of course she might: she went because you had promised her Mr. Longdon. But I should have no more feeling about her going to you—and should expect her to have no more—than about her taking a pound of tea, as she sometimes does, to her old nurse, or her going to read to the old women at the workhouse. May you never have less to brag of!"

"I wish she'd bring me a pound of tea!" Mr. Cashmore resumed. "Or ain't I enough of an old woman to come and read to me at home?"

"Does she habitually visit the workhouse?" Mr. Longdon inquired of Mrs. Brook.

This lady kept him in a moment's suspense, which another pair of eyes might moreover have detected that Vanderbank in some degree shared. "Every Friday at three."

Vanderbank, with a sudden turn, moved slowly to one of the windows, and Mr. Cashmore had a happy remembrance. "Why, this is Friday—she must have gone today. But does she stay so late?"

"She was to go afterwards to little Aggie: I'm trying so, in spite of difficulties," Mrs. Brook explained, "to keep them on together." She addressed herself with a new thought to Mr. Longdon. "You must know little Aggie—the niece of the Duchess: I forget if you've met the Duchess, but you must know her too—there are so many things on which, I'm sure, she'll feel with you. Little Aggie's the one," she continued; "you'll delight in her; she ought to have been mamma's grandchild."

"Dearest lady, how can you pretend, or for a moment compare her—?" Mr. Cashmore broke in. "She says nothing to me at all."

"She says nothing to any one," Mrs. Brook serenely replied; "that's just her type and her charm—just, above all, her education." Then she appealed to Vanderbank. "Won't Mr. Longdon be struck with little Aggie, and won't he find it interesting to talk about all that sort of thing with the Duchess?"

Vanderbank came back laughing, but Mr. Longdon anticipated his reply. "What sort of thing do you mean?"

"Oh," said Mrs. Brook, "the whole question, don't you know? of bringing girls forward or not. The question of—well, what do you call it?—their exposure. It's the question, it appears—the question of the future; it's awfully interesting, and the Duchess, at any rate, is great on it. Nanda, of course, is exposed," Mrs. Brook pursued—"fearfully."

"And what on earth is she exposed to?" Mr. Cashmore gayly demanded.

"She's exposed to you, it would seem, my dear fellow!" Vanderbank spoke with a certain discernible impatience not so much of the fact he mentioned as of the turn of their talk.

It might have been in almost compassionate deprecation of this weak note that Mrs. Brookenham looked at him. Her reply to Mr. Cashmore's question, however, was uttered at Mr. Longdon. "She's exposed—it's much worse—to me. But Aggie isn't exposed to anything—never has been and never is to be; and we're watching to see if the Duchess can carry it through."

"Why not," asked Mr. Cashmore, "if there's nothing she can be exposed to but the Duchess herself?"

He had appealed to his companions impartially, but Mr. Longdon, whose attention was now all for his hostess, appeared unconscious. "If you're all watching, is it your idea that I should watch with you?"

The inquiry, on his lips, was a waft of cold air, the sense of which clearly led Mrs. Brook to put her invita-

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

tion on the right ground. "Not, of course, on the chance of anything's happening to the dear child—to whom nothing, obviously, can happen but that her aunt will marry her off in the shortest possible time and in the best possible conditions. No, the interest is, much more, in the way the Duchess herself steers."

"Ah, she's in a boat," Mr. Cashmore fully concurred, "that will take a good bit of that!"

It is not for Mr. Longdon's historian to overlook that if he was not unnaturally mystified, he was yet also visibly interested. "What boat is she in?"

He had addressed his curiosity, with politeness, to Mr. Cashmore, but they were all arrested by the wonderful way in which Mrs. Brook managed to smile at once very dimly, very darkly, and yet make it take them all in. "I think you must tell him, Van."

"Heaven forbid!"—and Vanderbank turned away.

"I'll tell him like a shot—if you really give me leave," said Mr. Cashmore, for whom any scruple referred itself manifestly not to the subject of the information, but to the presence of a lady.

"I don't give you leave, and I beg you'll hold your tongue," Mrs. Brookenham replied. "You handle such matters with a minuteness—! In short," she broke off to Mr. Longdon, "he would tell you a good deal more than you'll care to know. She is in a boat—but she's an experienced mariner. Busta, as she would say. Do you know Mitchy?" Mrs. Brook suddenly asked.

"Oh yes, he knows Mitchy"—Vanderbank had approached again.

"Then make him tell him"—she put it before the young man as a charming turn for them all. "Mitchy can be refined when he tries."

"Oh dear—when Mitchy 'tries'!" Vanderbank laughed. "I think I should rather, for the job, offer him to Mr. Longdon as abandoned to his native wild impulse."

"I like Mr. Mitchett," the old man said, endeavoring to look his hostess straight in the eye, and speaking as if somewhat to defy her to convict him, even from the point of view of Beccles, of a mistake.

Mrs. Brookenham took it with a wonderful bright emotion. "My dear friend, vous me rendez la vie! If you can stand Mitchy you can stand any of us!"

"Upon my honor, I should think so!" Mr. Cashmore was eager to remark. "What on earth do you mean," he demand of Mrs. Brook, "by saying that I'm more 'minute' than he?"

She turned her beauty an instant on this visitor. "I don't say you're more minute—I say he's more brilliant. Besides, as I've told you before, you're not one of us." With which, as a check to further discussion, she went straight on to Mr. Longdon: "The point about Aggie's conservative education is the wonderful sincerity with which the Duchess feels that one's girl may so perfectly and consistently be hedged in without one's really ever (for it comes to that,) depriving one's own self—"

"Well, of what?" Mr. Longdon boldly demanded while his hostess appeared thoughtfully to falter.

She addressed herself mutely to Vanderbank, in whom the movement produced a laugh. "I defy you," he exclaimed, "to say!"

"Well, you don't defy me!" Mr. Cashmore cried as Mrs. Brook failed to take up the challenge. "If you know Mitchy," he went on to Mr. Longdon, "you must know Petherton."

The old man remained vague and not imperceptibly cold. "Petherton?"

"My brother-in-law—whom, God knows why, Mitchy runs."

"Runs?" Mr. Longdon again echoed.

Mrs. Brook appealed afresh to Vanderbank. "I think we ought to spare him. I may not remind you of mamma," she continued to their companion, "but I hope you don't mind my saying how much you remind me. Explanations, after all, spoil things, and if you can make anything of us, and will sometimes come back, you'll find everything in its native freshness. You'll see, you'll feel for yourself."

Mr. Longdon stood before her and raised to Vanderbank, when she had ceased, the eyes he had attached to the carpet while she talked. "And must I go now?" Explanations, she had said, spoiled things, but he might have been a stranger at an Eastern court, comically helpless without his interpreter.

"If Mrs. Brook desires to 'spare' you," Vanderbank kindly replied, "the best way to make sure of it would perhaps indeed be to remove you. But hadn't we a hope of Nanda?"

"It might be of use for us to wait for her?"—it was still to his young friend that Mr. Longdon put it.

"Ah, when she's once on the loose—!" Mrs. Brookenham sighed. "Unless la voilà," she said the next moment, as a hand was heard at the door-latch. It was only, however, a footman who entered with a little tray that, on his approaching his mistress, offered to sight the brown envelope of a telegram. She immediately took leave to open this missive, after the quick perusal of which she had another vision of them all. "It is she—the modern daughter. 'Tishy keeps me dinner and opera; clothes all right; return uncertain, but if before morning have latch-key.' She won't come home till morning!" said Mrs. Brook.

"But think of the comfort of the latch-key!" Vanderbank laughed. "You might go to the opera," he said to Mr. Longdon.

"Hanged if I don't!" Mr. Cashmore exclaimed.

Mr. Longdon appeared to have caught from Nanda's message an obscure agitation; he met his young friend's suggestion, at all events, with visible intensity. "Will you go with me?"

Vanderbank had just hesitated, recalling engagements; which gave Mrs. Brook time to intervene. "Can't you live without him?" she asked of her elder friend.

Vanderbank had looked at her an instant. "I think I can get there late," he then replied to Mr. Longdon.

"I think I can get there early," Mr. Cashmore declared. "Mrs. Grendon must have a box; in fact I know which, and they don't," he jocosely continued to his hostess.

Mrs. Brook, meanwhile, had given Mr. Longdon her hand. "Well, at any rate, the child shall soon come to you. And oh, alone," she insisted; "you needn't make phrases—I know too well what I'm about."

"One hopes really you do," pursued the unquenched Mr. Cashmore. "If that's what one gets by having known your mother!"

"It wouldn't have helped you," Mrs. Brook retorted. "And won't you have to say it's all you were to get?" she pityingly murmured to her other visitor.

He turned to Vanderbank with a strange gasp, and Vanderbank said "Come!"

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

THE RED CROSS.

St. George, I learned to love thee in my youth
When of thy deeds I read in deathless song;
And now when I behold the dragon Wrong
Hard by the castle gates of Love and Truth,
I feel the world's great need of thee, forsooth,
To strike the heavy blow delayed too long.
Then turning from the mediæval throng,
Where thou wert bravest, yet the first in ruth,
I watch thy votaries by land and sea
Armed with thy sacred sign go forth to fight
Anew the battles of humanity
Beneath the flag of mercy and of right;
No holier band a holier realm e'er trod
Than this—the world's knight-errantry of God!

Charles Hamilton Musgrove.

PHILADELPHIA PHOTOGRAPHIC SALON.

Photography nowadays is pursued more or less seriously by such a large number of people that widespread interest will be taken in the first exhibition of the Philadelphia Photographic Salon. American exhibitors have made a conspicuous mark at the salons in London and Paris. For example, in the persons of Miss Mathilde Weil, of Philadelphia, and Mr. William A. Fraser they took two out of the six medals awarded this year by the Royal Society. The American work, moreover, is characterized by so much individuality and artistic feeling—the very qualities that the foreign salons are pledged to promote—that the only wonder is that we have had to wait so long for a representative exhibition in this country. By a very happy idea, the Photographic Society of Philadelphia, in resolving to establish a salon, allied itself with the Pennsylvania Academy of Fine Arts. The society has already been in existence twenty-six years, and has always exacted of its members a very high standard of excellence; and the Academy is the oldest art institution in the country. The child of their union, this Photographic Salon, comes, therefore, of good stock, and takes its place in the art world at once as worthy of serious recognition. Its position is still further assured by the methods attending its introduction. Instead of ushering it in with a large retinue of exhibits, the committee have limited the display to a comparatively small number, distinguished by superlative excellence. The purpose of the salon has been to exhibit "only such pictures, produced by photography, as may give distinct evidences of individual artistic feeling and execution." Out of fifteen hundred examples submitted, a selection was made of two hundred and fifty-nine, which seemed to fulfil in the highest degree these requirements. The jury was composed of Messrs. W. M. Chase and Robert W. Vonnoh, painters; Miss Alice Barber Stephens, illustrator; and Messrs. Alfred Stieglitz and Robert S. Redfield, photographers. These names are a sufficient guarantee not only of the fairness of the selection, but also of the high degree of artistic excellence that has been striven for. The result, as shown on the walls of the Academy, will be an inspiration to students of the art, and a delightful revelation to laymen. It is an artistic triumph for the Salon.

